Rheinberger's concerto for organ, with John Marshall as soloist, with strings and three horns is music of academic clearness and order. The organ is used with a distinctive sense of its powers. There is fugal treatment of ideas of less dignity than their development. Mr Marshall's performance was marked by fluent technic, by a nice sense of registration and of dynamic proportion. The cadenza was tastefully played.

Mr Malkin was soloist in Saint-Saens' first concerto in A-minor for cello and orchestra. A creditable appearance, although one not distinguished either in technic or in beauty of style. In the opening overture to "The Magic Flute," Dr Muck exhausts the possibilities of the broad tempo of the Adagio, and the irregularly accented notes in the brilliant fugue.

Md.

G WITH ON SYMPHONY

IUCK has made an in-rogram for the third con-ston Symphony Orches-be given in the Lyric

ERNEST SCHETLING

Theatre next Wednesday evening at 8.15. With the exception of the charming little symphony of Haydn in E flat, No. 1, the program is decidedly modern, including what many regard as the greatest tone poem of Richard Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration," Ernest Schelling's new symphonic variations for orchestra and piano and the diabolically clever Scherzo of the Frenchman Paul Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

Novelties always arouse great interest among music lovers and Mr. Schelling's new symphonic variations are a novelty in the full sense of the word, for they have just had their first performances in Boston. Mr. Schelling has written with extraordinary skil and fancy. They are not a piano concerto in any sense of the word, for he makes the piano an integral part of the orchestra, and having written the variations with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in view, he has given incidental solos to all the leaders of the various sections. Mr. Schelling will play the piano part.

The program in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in E flat major.......................Hayd
Tone Poem—Death and Transfiguration.....Straus
Symphonic Variations.............................Schellin
The Sorcerer's Apprentice........................Duka

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 4 - 1916

Establish

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Its Third Concert for the Season at the Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gave its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening when the naturally great interest of the occasion was enhanced by the appearance of Mme. Melba, as the assisting artist. The varied and interesting programme presented was one that made no exacting demands upon the attention and could be appreciated and enjoyed with a minimum of mental effort. As its central feature, it had Haydn's light hearted symphony in E flat, B. and H. No. 1, which was played with an admirable refinement and lucidity and with a careful avoidance of anything in the nature of an exaggerated emphasis. It is as simple as it is sunny and any attempt to invest it with a gravity or importance which it does not possess, would have denatured its purport and its significance. From such a good artist as Dr. Muck, no such attempt was to be expected.

Other orchestral numbers were a double concerto by Mozart for violin and viola, a beautiful composition beautifully played by Mr. Anton Witek and Mr. E. Ferir, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage." Mme. Melba's selections were Handel's aria "Sweet Bird" with flute obligato accompaniment and two songs from "The Marriage of Figaro," the "Porgi d'Amor" and the "Voiche Sapete." These are numbers which are very well adapted for the exhibition of Mme. Melba's consummate vocal art. She was in good voice and she delivered them with a lovely quality of tone and an unsurpassed facility of execution which rendered her performance an exemplar of what really fine singing means. It was a great treat and a high privilege to hear here, and the audience was enthusiastic with its applause. The next of these concerts will take place on Monday evening, February 14.

From Bulletin
Address Providence, R. I.
Date

Esta

MADAME HOMER TOO ILL TO APPEAR WITH SYMPHONY

Noted Soloist's Place to be Taken by Joseph Malkin.

Madame Louise Homer, who was to have appeared here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall this evening, will be unable to sing, as she is ill with the grip. Her place as soloist will be taken by Joseph Malkin, the brilliant virtuoso, who shares with Mr. Warnke the first desk of the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Malkin played the same selection he will render here at the regular concerts in Boston last Friday and Saturday with much success.

The programme will be as follows: Symphony, "Antar," Rimsky-Korsakoff; Symphonic Poem, "Vysehrad," Smetana; Concerto for Violoncello in A-minor, opus 33, Saint-Saens; overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," Mendelssohn.

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City
Date

Establi

BOSTON BAND AT CARNEGIE HALL

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Carnetgie Hall last evening for the first of their two January concerts in New York. It was wintry weather without and there were also chills of sorts within. Some of the chill communicated itself to Beethoven's Summertime Pastoral Symphony, which began the frigidities of the evening in Dr. Muck's chastened filtration of its sunlight, while most of the remainder of the chill already existed within the piece that followed.

This was the "Impressions (from an Artist's Life) in Form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte," by Ernest Schelling, the friendly pianists' friendly pianist. One sets down the title in all its length and parentheses, not omitting the latter, since they may have some occult bearing upon the piece. A parenthetical artist's life might, perhaps, explain many things about these Schellingesque engima variations, even the prime enigma of their inclusion in a Boston Symphony programme.

But, explainable or not, the programme did include them, and this was their first performance in New York. It would be vastly more profitable to discuss Dr. Muck's performance of Beethoven's Sixth Sym the Sixth Symphony itself, and the two things were not ide But custom, oblivious to values, a fetish of the label, "First Here," placed beneath a musical and thus the major portions views of last evening's doings a negie Hall concern themselves these Schelling "Impressions (f Artist's Life) in Form of Var on an Original Theme for Orc and Pianoforte—First Time H

The originality of the the question any one might quarre Mr. Schelling over, includin shade of Tschaikowsky, but since the quarrel would, on the same grounds, extend through the greater part of the very numerous variations themselves, this phase of the matter would better be dropped, else would it become as unendurably lengthy as the "Impressions."

Sir Edward Elgar once pleased himself and, no doubt, a number of his friends by writing a set of "Enigma Variations," appending various initals to each of the segments. Mr. Schelling has pleased himself—the feelings of his friends have not transpired—by appending initials to most of these variations of his. Thus one read "B. S. O."—the Boston Symphony Orchestra; "K. M."—Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; "G. L."—Georges Longy, first oboeist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Schelling confesses that he had the Boston orchestra largely in mind when he was delivering himself of these "Variations." Thus do the fates work on, and all of us, even the Boston orchestra, even Dr. Muck himself, perhaps, lie within the palms of their hands, unknowing what is in store.

What was in store was some forty-odd minutes of as utterly jejune music as this writer remembers to have heard on a Boston Symphony programme. Even the execrable Mracek "Max und Moritz" was a towering work of genius compared to these "Impressions (from an Artist's Life)." One of these variations was a travesty [illegible] the memory of Gustav Mahler, [illegible] this sort of mediocrity [illegible] perpetrate.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN [illegible] 1916

Establish

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Delightful Concert in Which Melba's Singing is a Feature.

As though to atone for the Bruckner affliction of his last visit, Dr. Karl Muck brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy last night, to play a program designed to delight every lover of the really beautiful and melodious in music. The offerings were as varied as they were interesting, and comprised the E Flat Major Symphony of Haydn, a Mozart "Concertante Symphonie" for violin and viola, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," as the orchestral portion. Melba sang the "Sweet Bird that Shun'st the Noise of Folby," from Haendel's "L'Allegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderato," and two arias from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro"—"Porgi Amor" and "Voi che Sapete."

Indeed, so much variety at one orchestral entertainment and all of it so different from the usual type of thing heard, made the program seem almost like a "continuous performance." To begin with, there was the lovely E Flat Major Symphony of Haydn, with its fine opportunity in the third variation of the andante for a violinist's art to shine.

Witek played the solo in the polished style familiar to his admirers, and the work in its entirety was much applauded. Next, Melba proved, by her graceful singing of the Haendel aria, that the beauty and fluency of her coloratura is still a thing of vitality and brilliancy. For those who delight in this florid style, the performance of the "Sweet Bird," with its agile flute obligato, done by Andre Maquarre, was a delight. Melba was in fine voice and was given a great ovation, being recalled fully a dozen times.

This would seem, under ordinary circumstances, to be a complete entertainment, yet it was a mere beginning. Dr. Muck, like a modern Aladdin, next produced, in the Mozart Concertante Symphonie, for violin and viola, one of the striking novelties of a season remarkable for the extent of new things being done. Witek, concertmeister of the orchestra, and Ferir, principal viola player, gave a splendid performance of this interesting and unusual work, the instruments blending beautifully in the double work and being ever more enjoyable in the portions allotted to the single voice. The cadenza was taken at a rapid tempo and was brilliant and fascinating. Melba then returned and in the two arias from the "Marriage of Figaro," completely charmed her audience. The "Voi che Sapete" was a marvel of graceful, fluid tone.

Melba was in much better condition vocally than when she sang here in the autumn, her voice last night seeming as clear, sweet and resonant and as true to the pitch as it was in her golden era.

Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm" floated the audience along in unresisting fashion, despite lack of charm, and ended an alto-

---

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 2 - 1916

Establ

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

Dr. Muck has announced the program for the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon. It contains a novelty, a set of variations for orchestra and piano by Ernest Schelling, and Mr. Schelling himself will play the piano part.

The symphony will be Mozart's in E flat. Another important work will be the symphonic poem of the Russian, Rachmaninoff, "The Island of the Dead," which was inspired by Arnold Bocklin's picture. The remaining num- [illegible] "Roman Carnival"

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date DEC 29 1915

Established

ONCERT MARRE BY ILLNESS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Played Under Difficulties.

Bad weather has become almost proverbial in connection with Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, but the fact does not seem to seriously effect the attendance at these popular musical events. For that reason Infantry Hall was filled as usual last night for the third of the present series by this organization.

Unfortunately, however, the weather was not the most serious difficulty in connection with this concert, for illness played a more prominent part in marring the harmony of the event. Not only was Mme. Louise Homer, who was to have been the soloist, unable to appear, as had been announced would be the case, but Dr. Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, was also incapacitated by sickness and his place was taken by Mr. Schmidt, his assistant. It is no disparagment of the substitutes to say that the combination of unfavorable circumstances was reflected upon the audience and made the concert somewhat less enjoyable. Still another change was made by the substitution in the programme of Eulsco's Rhapsodie Roumaine for Mendelssohn's Overture, "Sea—Calm and Prosperous Voyage" as the last number.

The symphony was "Antar," by Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakoff, the Russian naval officer, who first pursued music as an avocation and then devoted practically his whole time to it. This symphony has never been rendered here before and it was heard with interest and pleasure. Most pople are apt to forget that Russia is an Eastern as well as a Western nation, and so, at first thought, surprise is felt that the work of this Russian composer, while, essentially, Russian in character, feeling and expression as that nation is usually rated, is also touched and tinged with the spirit of the Orient. When the double characteric of Russsia is remembered, however, this combination and blending of the Oriental with the Occidental appears natural. The foundation for this work is an Arabian romance of an early century, and it is to be expected, therefore, that the music will have Oriental coloring, and those elements are prominent in the theme and its treatment, as they are, indeed, in most of the work of this composer. The three movements are rich in melody and beauty.

The second orchestral number was the symphonic poem of the Bohemian composer, Smetana, "Vysehrad." This is one of seven similar works, written in the form of a cycle, to celebrate the glories, beauties and traditions of the native land of the composer. This is rated as the finest of these, which are extant, and it is marked by grandeur and beauty, with passages filled with the fire of patriotism, and others expressive of the strength and solidity of the nation at the height of its power and influence.

The final number, the substitute, was the least enjoyable of the orchestral selections. It does not possess the artistic character and polish that marks most of the music selected for presentation by this orchestra, but is of a livelier and lighter nature and not quite suited to a programme of serious numbers. Under other conditions, it would probably have found more favor.

There was naturally and inevitably not little disappointment at the inability Madame Louise Homer to appear, but the grip is no respecter of persons, and when that disease lays its icy hand upon one there is no resisting its urgency for rest and recuperation. In place of the vocalist, Joseph Malkin, who holds a seat in the first section of the 'cellists of the orchestra, was pressed into service. That was an easy task, however, as Mr. Malkin has been doing similar work recently in Boston. His selevtion was Saint Saens's concerto for violoncello in A minor, opus 33, which he rendered wit admirable expression and delicacy o touch. Mr. Malkin is an artist of n mean order, and his performance las night won him many admirers and muc applause.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 2 - 1916

Estab

ORCHESTRA CONCERT WITH MELBA AS STAR

Gabrilowitsch to Play Piano Concerto With Local Symphony Organization.

KNEISEL SEASON TO OPEN

First Recital Here of Kreisler This Season—Fortnightly Club's Program.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tomorrow night in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Melba, who is to be in this country only a few weeks more. She will leave at the end of January for Australia.

MADAM MELBA.

An interesting item in the program is Mozart's Concertante Symphonie for violin and viola and string orchestra. It is believed that this work has never been heard in Philadelphia. It is a piece full of typical Mozartean beauty and will enable Philadelphia to hear as soloist two of the greatest artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Witek, the concertmaster, and Ferir, leader of the viola section. The program in full is as follows:

Haydn—Symphony in E-flat, B. and H. No. 1
Haendel—Aria, "Sweet Bird."
Mozart—Double Concerto for violin and viola orchestra.
(Violin, Witek; viola, Ferir.)
Mozart—Two Arias from "The Marriage of Figaro."
(a) Porgi Amor.
(b) Voi che sapete.
Mendelssohn—Overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

* * *

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 2 - 19

Establis

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tomorrow night in the Academy of Music at 8.15. The soloist will be Madame Melba, the greatest singer of our time. Madame Melba is to be in this country only a few weeks more as she is leaving the end of January for Australia and this will be the last opportunity to hear her this year.

A very interesting item in the programme is Mozart's concertante symphonie for violin and viola and string orchestra. The chances are that this work has never been heard in Philadelphia. It is a piece full of typical Mozartean beauty and will enable Philadelphia to hear as soloist two of the greatest artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Witek, the concert master, and Mr. Ferir, the leader of the viola section. The programme in full is as follows:

Haydn, symphony in E flat, B. and H. No. 1.
Handel, aria, "Sweet Bird."
Mozart, double concerto for violin and viola and orchestra. Violin, Mr. Witek; viola, Mr. Ferir.
Mozart, two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro."
a Porgi Amor.
b Voi che sapete.
Mendelssohn, overture, "Sea calm and Prosperous Voyage."

[77]

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 4 - 1916

Establish

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Its Third Concert for the Season at the Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gave its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening when the naturally great interest of the occasion was enhanced by the appearance of Mme. Melba, as the assisting artist. The varied and interesting programme presented was one that made no exacting demands upon the attention and could be appreciated and enjoyed with a minimum of mental effort. As its central feature, it had Haydn's light hearted symphony in E flat, B. and H. No. 1, which was played with an admirable refinement and lucidity and with a careful avoidance of anything in the nature of an exaggerated emphasis. It is as simple as it is sunny and any attempt to invest it with a gravity or importance which it does not possess, would have denatured its purport and its significance. From such a good artist as Dr. Muck, no such attempt was to be expected.

Other orchestral numbers were a double concerto by Mozart for violin and viola, a beautiful composition beautifully played by Mr. Anton Witek and Mr. E. Ferir, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage." Mme. Melba's selections were Handel's aria "Sweet Bird" with flute obligato accompaniment and two songs from "The Marriage of Figaro," the "Porgi d'Amor" and the "Voiche Sapete." These are numbers which are very well adapted for the exhibition of Mme. Melba's consummate vocal art. She was in good voice and she delivered them with a lovely quality of tone and an unsurpassed facility of execution which rendered her performance an exemplar of what really fine singing means. It was a great treat and a high privilege to hear here, and the audience was enthusiastic with its applause. The next of these concerts will take place on Monday evening, February 14.

From Bulletin
Address Providence, R. I.
Date 1915

MADAME HOMER TOO ILL TO APPEAR WITH SYMPHONY

Noted Soloist's Place to be Taken by Joseph Malkin.

Madame Louise Homer, who was to have appeared here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall this evening, will be unable to sing, as she is ill with the grip. Her place as soloist will be taken by Joseph Malkin, the brilliant virtuoso, who shares with Mr. Warnke the first desk of the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Malkin played the same selection he will render here at the regular concerts in Boston last Friday and Saturday with much success.

The programme will be as follows: Symphony, "Antar," Rimsky-Korsakoff; Symphonic Poem, "Vysehrad," Smetana; Concerto for Violoncello in A-minor, opus 33, Saint-Saens; overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," Mendelssohn.

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City
Date JAN 7 - 191

BOSTON BAND AT CARNEGIE HALL

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Carnetgie Hall last evening for the first of their two January concerts in New York. It was wintry weather without and there were also chills of sorts within. Some of the chill communicated itself to Beethoven's Summertime Pastoral Symphony, which began the frigidities of the evening in Dr. Muck's chastened filtration of its sunlight, while most of the remainder of the chill already existed within the piece that followed.

This was the "Impressions (from an Artist's Life) in Form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte," by Ernest Schelling, the friendly pianists' friendly pianist. One sets down the title in all its length and parentheses, not omitting the latter, since they may have some occult bearing upon the piece. A parenthetical artist's life might, perhaps, explain many things about these Schellingesque engima variations, even the prime enigma of their inclusion in a Boston Symphony programme.

But, explainable or not, the programme did include them, and this was their first performance in New York. It would be vastly more profitable to discuss Dr. Muck's perform-

[illegible] the Sixth Symphony itself, and why the two things were not identical. But custom, oblivious to values, makes a fetish of the label, "First Time Here," placed beneath a musical work, and thus the major portions of reviews of last evening's doings at Carnegie Hall concern themselves with these Schelling 'Impressions (from an Artist's Life) in Form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte—First Time Here."

The originality of the theme in question any one might quarrel with Mr. Schelling over, including the shade of Tschaikowsky, but since the quarrel would, on the same grounds, extend through the greater part of the very numerous variations themselves, this phase of the matter would better be dropped, else would it become as unendurably lengthy as the "Impressions."

Sir Edward Elgar once pleased himself and, no doubt, a number of his friends by writing a set of "Enigma Variations," appending various initals to each of the segments. Mr. Schelling has pleased himself—the feelings of his friends have not transpired—by appending initials to most of these variations of his. Thus one read "B. S. O."—the Boston Symphony Orchestra; "K. M."—Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; "G. L."—Georges Longy, first oboeist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Schelling confesses that he had the Boston orchestra largely in mind when he was delivering himself of these "Variations." Thus do the fates work on, and all of us, even the Boston orchestra, even Dr. Muck himself, perhaps, lie within the palms of their hands, unknowing what is in store.

What was in store was some forty-odd minutes of as utterly jejune music as this writer remembers to have heard on a Boston Symphony programme. Even the execrable Mracek "Max und Moritz" was a towering work of genius compared to these "Impressions (from an Artist's Life)." One of these variations was a travesty upon the memory of Gustav (Mahler, such as only this sort of mediocrity would have the courage to perpetrate.

JAN 4 - 1916

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Delightful Concert in Which Melba's Singing is a Feature.

As though to atone for the Bruckner affliction of his last visit, Dr. Karl Muck brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy last night, to play a program designed to delight every lover of the really beautiful and melodious in music. The offerings were as varied as they were interesting, and comprised the E Flat Major Symphony of Haydn, a Mozart "Concertante Symphonie" for violin and viola, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," as the orchestral portion. Melba sang the "Sweet Bird that Shun'st the Noise of Folby," from Haendel's "L'Allegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderato," and two arias from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro"—"Porgi Amor" and "Voi che Sapete."

Indeed, so much variety at one orchestral entertainment and all of it so different from the usual type of thing heard, made the program seem almost like a "continuous performance." To begin with, there was the lovely E Flat Major Symphony of Haydn, with its fine opportunity in the third variation of the andante for a violinist's art to shine.

Witek played the solo in the polished style familiar to his admirers, and the work in its entirety was much applauded. Next, Melba proved, by her graceful singing of the Haendel aria, that the beauty and fluency of her coloratura is still a thing of vitality and brilliancy. For those who delight in this florid style, the performance of the "Sweet Bird," with its agile flute obligato, done by Andre Maquarre, was a delight. Melba was in fine voice and was given a great ovation, being recalled fully a dozen times.

This would seem, under ordinary circumstances, to be a complete entertainment, yet it was a mere beginning. Dr. Muck, like a modern Aladdin, next produced, in the Mozart Concertante Symphonie, for violin and viola, one of the striking novelties of a season remarkable for the extent of new things being done. Witek, concertmeister of the orchestra, and Ferir, principal viola player, gave a splendid performance of this interesting and unusual work, the instruments blending beautifully in the double work and being ever more enjoyable in the portions allotted to the single voice. The cadenza was taken at a rapid tempo and was brilliant and fascinating. Melba then returned and in the two arias from the "Marriage of Figaro," completely charmed her audience. The "Voi che Sapete" was a marvel of graceful, fluid tone.

Melba was in much better condition vocally than when she sang here in the autumn, her voice last night seeming as clear, sweet and resonant and as true to the pitch as it was in her golden era.

Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm" floated the audience along in unresisting fashion, despite lack of charm, and ended an altogether delightful evening.

1 G

Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 2 - 1916

Establ

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

Dr. Muck has announced the program for the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon. It contains a novelty, a set of variations for orchestra and piano by Ernest Schelling, and Mr. Schelling himself will play the piano part.

The symphony will be Mozart's in E flat. Another important work will be the symphonic poem of the Russian, Rachmaninoff, "The Island of the Dead," which was inspired by Arnold Bocklin's picture. The remaining num-

---

BUNE
Providence, R. I.
DEC 29 1915

CONCERT MARRED BY ILLNESS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Played Under Difficulties.

Bad weather has become almost proverbial in connection with Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, but the fact does not seem to seriously effect the attendance at these popular musical events. For that reason Infantry Hall was filled as usual last night for the third of the present series by this organization.

Unfortunately, however, the weather was not the most serious difficulty in connection with this concert, for illness played a more prominent part in marring the harmony of the event. Not only was Mme. Louise Homer, who was to have been the soloist, unable to appear, as had been announced would be the case, but Dr. Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, was also incapacitated by sickness and his place was taken by Mr. Schmidt, his assistant. It is no disparagment of the substitutes to say that the combination of unfavorable circumstances was reflected upon the audience and made the concert somewhat less enjoyable. Still another change was made by the substitution in the programme of Eulsco's Rhapsodie Roumaine for Mendelssohn's Overture, "Sea—Calm and Prosperous Voyage" as the last number.

The symphony was "Antar," by Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakoff, the Russian naval officer, who first pursued music as an avocation and then devoted practically his whole time to it. This symphony has never been rendered here before and it was heard with interest and pleasure. Most pople are apt to forget that Russia is an Eastern as well as a Western nation, and so, at first thought, surprise is felt that the work of this Russian composer, while, essentially, Russian in character, feeling and expression as that nation is usually rated, is also touched and tinged with the spirit of the Orient. When the double characteric of Russsia is remembered, however, this combination and blending of the Oriental with the Occidental appears natural. The foundation for this work is an Arabian romance of an early century, and it is to be expected, therefore, that the music will have Oriental coloring, and those elements are prominent in the theme and its treatment, as they are, indeed, in most of the work of this composer. The three movements are rich in melody and beauty.

The second orchestral number was the symphonic poem of the Bohemian composer, Smetana, "Vysehrad." This is one of seven similar works, written in the form of a cycle, to celebrate the glories, beauties and traditions of the native land of the composer. This is rated as the finest of these, which are extant, and it is marked by grandeur and beauty, with passages filled with the fire of patriotism, and others expressive of the strength and solidity of the nation at the height of its power and influence.

The final number, the substitute, was the least enjoyable of the orchestral selections. It does not possess the artistic character and polish that marks most of the music selected for presentation by this orchestra, but is of a livelier and lighter nature and not quite suited to a programme of serious numbers. Under other conditions, it would probably have found more favor.

There was naturally and inevitably not little disappointment at the inability Madame Louise Homer to appear, but the grip is no respecter of persons, and when that disease lays its icy hand upon one there is no resisting its urgency for rest and recuperation. In place of the vocalist, Joseph Malkin, who holds a seat in the first section of the 'cellists of the orchestra, was pressed into service. That was an easy task, however, as Mr. Malkin has been doing similar work recently in Boston. His selevtion was Saint-Saens's concerto for violoncello in A-minor, opus 33, which he rendered with admirable expression and delicacy of touch. Mr. Malkin is an artist of no mean order, and his performance last night won him many admirers and much applause.

RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 2 - 1916

ORCHESTRA CONCERT WITH MELBA AS STAR

Gabrilowitsch to Play Piano Concerto With Local Symphony Organization.

KNEISEL SEASON TO OPEN

First Recital Here of Kreisler This Season—Fortnightly Club's Program.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tomorrow night in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Melba, who is to be in this country only a few weeks more. She will leave at the end of January for Australia.

MADAM MELBA.

An interesting item in the program is Mozart's Concertante Symphonie for violin and viola and string orchestra. It is believed that this work has never been heard in Philadelphia. It is a piece full of typical Mozartean beauty and will enable Philadelphia to hear as soloist two of the greatest artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Witek, the concertmaster, and Ferir, leader of the viola section. The program in full is as follows:

Haydn—Symphony in E-flat, B. and H. No. 1
Haendel—Aria. "Sweet Bird."
Mozart—Double Concerto for violin and viola orchestra.
(Violin, Witek; viola, Ferir.)
Mozart—Two Arias from "The Marriage of Figaro."
(a) Porgi Amor.
(b) Voi che sapete.
Mendelssohn—Overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 2 - 1916

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tomorrow night in the Academy of Music at 8.15. The soloist will be Madame Melba, the greatest singer of our time. Madame Melba is to be in this country only a few weeks more as she is leaving the end of January for Australia and this will be the last opportunity to hear her this year.

A very interesting item in the programme is Mozart's concertante symphonie for violin and viola and string orchestra. The chances are that this work has never been heard in Philadelphia. It is a piece full of typical Mozartean beauty and will enable Philadelphia to hear as soloist two of the greatest artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Witek, the concert master, and Mr. Ferir, the leader of the viola section. The programme in full is as follows:

Haydn, symphony in E flat, B. and H. No. 1.
Handel, aria, "Sweet Bird."
Mozart, double concerto for violin and viola and orchestra, Violin, Mr. Witek; viola, Mr. Ferir.
Mozart, two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro."
a Porgi Amor.
b Voi che sapete.
Mendelssohn, overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage."

[77]

From ENQUIRER

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date JAN 4 - 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Its Third Concert for the Season at the Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gave its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening when the naturally great interest of the occasion was enhanced by the appearance of Mme. Melba, as the assisting artist. The varied and interesting programme presented was one that made no exacting demands upon the attention and could be appreciated and enjoyed with a minimum of mental effort. As its central feature, it had Haydn's light hearted symphony in E flat, B. and H. No. 1, which was played with an admirable refinement and lucidity and with a careful avoidance of anything in the nature of an exaggerated emphasis. It is as simple as it is sunny and any attempt to invest it with a gravity or importance which it does not possess, would have denatured its purport and its significance. From such a good artist as Dr. Muck, no such attempt was to be expected.

Other orchestral numbers were a double concerto by Mozart for violin and viola, a beautiful composition beautifully played by Mr. Anton Witek and Mr. E. Ferir, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage." Mme. Melba's selections were Handel's aria "Sweet Bird" with flute obligato accompaniment and two songs from "The Marriage of Figaro," the "Porgi d'Amor" and the "Voiche Sapete." These are numbers which are very well adapted for the exhibition of Mme. Melba's consummate vocal art. She was in good voice and she delivered them with a lovely quality of tone and an unsurpassed facility of execution which rendered her performance an exemplar of what really fine singing means. It was a great treat and a high privilege to hear here, and the audience was enthusiastic with its applause. The next of these concerts will take place on Monday evening, February 14.

From Bulletin

Address Providence, R. I.

Date

MADAME HOMER TOO ILL TO APPEAR WITH SYMPHONY

Noted Soloist's Place to be Taken by Joseph Malkin.

Madame Louise Homer, who was to have appeared here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall this evening, will be unable to sing, as she is ill with the grip. Her place as soloist will be taken by Joseph Malkin, the brilliant virtuoso, who shares with Mr. Warnke the first desk of the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Malkin played the same selection he will render here at the regular concerts in Boston last Friday and Saturday with much success.

The programme will be as follows: Symphony, "Antar," Rimsky-Korsakoff; Symphonic Poem, "Vysehrad," Smetana; Concerto for Violoncello in A-minor, opus 33, Saint-Saens; overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," Mendelssohn.

From EVENING JOURNAL

Address: New York City

Date

BOSTON BAND AT CARNEGIE HALL

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Carnetgie Hall last evening for the first of their two January concerts in New York. It was wintry weather without and there were also chills of sorts within. Some of the chill communicated itself to Beethoven's Summertime Pastoral Symphony, which began the frigidities of the evening in Dr. Muck's chastened filtration of its sunlight, while most of the remainder of the chill already existed within the piece that followed.

This was the "Impressions (from an Artist's Life) in Form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte," by Ernest Schelling, the friendly pianists' friendly pianist. One sets down the title in all its length and parentheses, not omitting the latter, since they may have some occult bearing upon the piece. A parenthetical artist's life might, perhaps, explain many things about these Schellingesque engima variations, even the prime enigma of their inclusion in a Boston Symphony programme.

But, explainable or not, the programme did include them, and this was their first performance in New York. It would be vastly more profitable to discuss Dr. Muck's performance of Beethoven's Sixth Symphony, the Sixth Symphony itself, and why the two things were not identical. But custom, oblivious to values, makes a fetish of the label, "First Time Here," placed beneath a musical work, and thus the major portions of reviews of last evening's doings at Carnegie Hall concern themselves with these Schelling "Impressions (from an Artist's Life) in Form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte—First Time Here."

The originality of the theme in question any one might quarrel with Mr. Schelling over, including the shade of Tschaikowsky, but since the quarrel would, on the same grounds, extend through the greater part of the very numerous variations themselves, this phase of the matter would better be dropped, else would it become as unendurably lengthy as the "Impressions."

Sir Edward Elgar once pleased himself and, no doubt, a number of his friends by writing a set of "Enigma Variations," appending various initals to each of the segments. Mr. Schelling has pleased himself—the feelings of his friends have not transpired—by appending initials to most of these variations of his. Thus one read "B. S. O."—the Boston Symphony Orchestra; "K. M."—Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; "G. L."—Georges Longy, first oboeist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Schelling confesses that he had the Boston orchestra largely in mind when he was delivering himself of these "Variations." Thus do the fates work on, and all of us, even the Boston orchestra, even Dr. Muck himself, perhaps, lie within the palms of their hands, unknowing what is in store.

What was in store was some forty-odd minutes of as utterly jejune music as this writer remembers to have heard on a Boston Symphony programme. Even the execrable Mracek "Max und Moritz" was a towering work of genius compared to these "Impressions (from an Artist's Life)." One of these variations was a travesty upon the memory of Gustav (Mahler, such as only this sort of mediocrity would have the courage to perpetrate.

---

a.

JAN 1916

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Delightful Concert in Which Melba's Singing is a Feature.

As though to atone for the Bruckner affliction of his last visit, Dr. Karl Muck brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy last night, to play a program designed to delight every lover of the really beautiful and melodious in music. The offerings were as varied as they were interesting, and comprised the E Flat Major Symphony of Haydn, a Mozart "Concertante Symphonie" for violin and viola, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," as the orchestral portion. Melba sang the "Sweet Bird that Shun'st the Noise of Folby," from Haendel's "L'Allegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderato," and two arias from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro"—"Porgi Amor" and "Voi che Sapete."

Indeed, so much variety at one orchestral entertainment and all of it so different from the usual type of thing heard, made the program seem almost like a "continuous performance." To begin with, there was the lovely E Flat Major Symphony of Haydn, with its fine opportunity in the third variation of the andante for a violinist's art to shine.

Witek played the solo in the polished style familiar to his admirers, and the work in its entirety was much applauded. Next, Melba proved, by her graceful singing of the Haendel aria, that the beauty and fluency of her coloratura is still a thing of vitality and brilliancy. For those who delight in this florid style, the performance of the "Sweet Bird," with its agile flute obligato, done by Andre Maquarre, was a delight. Melba was in fine voice and was given a great ovation, being recalled fully a dozen times.

This would seem, under ordinary circumstances, to be a complete entertainment, yet it was a mere beginning. Dr. Muck, like a modern Aladdin, next produced, in the Mozart Concertante Symphenie, for violin and viola, one of the striking novelties of a season remarkable for the extent of new things being done. Witek, concertmeister of the orchestra, and Ferir, principal viola player, gave a splendid performance of this interesting and unusual work, the instruments blending beautifully in the double work and being ever more enjoyable in the portions allotted to the single voice. The cadenza was taken at a rapid tempo and was brilliant and fascinating. Melba then returned and in the two arias from the "Marriage of Figaro," completely charmed her audience. The "Voi che Sapete" was a marvel of graceful, fluid tone.

Melba was in much better condition vocally than when she sang here in the autumn, her voice last night seeming as clear, sweet and resonant and as true to the pitch as it was in her golden era.

Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm" floated the audience along in unresisting fashion, despite lack of charm, and ended an altogether delightful evening.

16

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date JAN 2 - 1916

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

Dr. Muck has announced the program for the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon. It contains a novelty, a set of variations for orchestra and piano by Ernest Schelling, and Mr. Schelling himself will play the piano part.

The symphony will be Mozart's in E flat. Another important work will be the symphonic poem of the Russian, Rachmaninoff, "The Island of the Dead," which was inspired by Arnold Bocklin's picture. The remaining num-

---

IBUNE

Providence, R. I.

DEC 29 1915

ONCERT MARRED BY ILLNESS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Played Under Difficulties.

Bad weather has become almost proverbial in connection with Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, but the fact does not seem to seriously effect the attendance at these popular musical events. For that reason Infantry Hall was filled as usual last night for the third of the present series by this organization.

Unfortunately, however, the weather was not the most serious difficulty in connection with this concert, for illness played a more prominent part in marring the harmony of the event. Not only was Mme. Louise Homer, who was to have been the soloist, unable to appear, as had been announced would be the case, but Dr. Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, was also incapacitated by sickness and his place was taken by Mr. Schmidt, his assistant. It is no disparagment of the substitutes to say that the combination of unfavorable circumstances was reflected upon the audience and made the concert somewhat less enjoyable. Still another change was made by the substitution in the programme of Eulsco's Rhapsodie Roumaine for Mendelssohn's Overture, "Sea—Calm and Prosperous Voyage" as the last number.

The symphony was "Antar," by Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakoff, the Russian naval officer, who first pursued music as an avocation and then devoted practically his whole time to it. This symphony has never been rendered here before and it was heard with interest and pleasure. Most pople are apt to forget that Russia is an Eastern as well as a Western nation, and so, at first thought, surprise is felt that the work of this Russian composer, while, essentially, Russian in character, feeling and expression as that nation is usually rated, is also touched and tinged with the spirit of the Orient. When the double characteric of Russsia is remembered, however, this combination and blending of the Oriental with the Occidental appears natural. The foundation for this work is an Arabian romance of an early century, and it is to be expected, therefore, that the music will have Oriental coloring, and those elements are prominent in the theme and its treatment, as they are, indeed, in most of the work of this composer. The three movements are rich in melody and beauty.

The second orchestral number was the symphonic poem of the Bohemian composer, Smetana, "Vysehrad." This is one of seven similar works, written in the form of a cycle, to celebrate the glories, beauties and traditions of the native land of the composer. This is rated as the finest of these, which are extant, and it is marked by grandeur and beauty, with passages filled with the fire of patriotism, and others expressive of the strength and solidity of the nation at the height of its power and influence.

The final number, the substitute, was the least enjoyable of the orchestral selections. It does not possess the artistic character and polish that marks most of the music selected for presentation by this orchestra, but is of a livelier and lighter nature and not quite suited to a programme of serious numbers. Under other conditions, it would probably have found more favor.

There was naturally and inevitably not little disappointment at the inability Madame Louise Homer to appear, but the grip is no respecter of persons, and when that disease lays its icy hand upon one there is no resisting its urgency for rest and recuperation. In place of the vocalist, Joseph Malkin, who holds a seat in the first section of the 'cellists of the orchestra, was pressed into service. That was an easy task, however, as Mr. Malkin has been doing similar work recently in Boston. His selevtion was Saint-Saens's concerto for violoncello in A-minor, opus 33, which he rendered with admirable expression and delicacy of touch. Mr. Malkin is an artist of no mean order, and his performance last night won him many admirers and much applause.

RECORD

ess: Philadelphia, Pa.

AN 2 - 1916

ORCHESTRA CONCERT WITH MELBA AS STAR

Gabrilowitsch to Play Piano Concerto With Local Symphony Organization.

KNEISEL SEASON TO OPEN

First Recital Here of Kreisler This Season—Fortnightly Club's Program.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tomorrow night in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Melba, who is to be in this country only a few weeks more. She will leave at the end of January for Australia.

MADAM MELBA.

An interesting item in the program is Mozart's Concertante Symphonie for violin and viola and string orchestra. It is believed that this work has never been heard in Philadelphia. It is a piece full of typical Mozartean beauty and will enable Philadelphia to hear as soloist two of the greatest artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Witek, the concertmaster, and Ferir, leader of the viola section. The program in full is as follows:

Haydn—Symphony in E-flat, B. and H. No. 1
Haendel—Aria, "Sweet Bird."
Mozart—Double Concerto for violin and viola orchestra.
(Violin, Witek; viola, Ferir.)
Mozart—Two Arias from "The Marriage of Figaro."
(a) Porgi Amor.
(b) Voi che sapete.
Mendelssohn—Overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

* * *

ENQUIRER

ss: Philadelphia, Pa.

JAN 2 - 19

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tomorrow night in the Academy of Music at 8.15. The soloist will be Madame Melba, the greatest singer of our time. Madame Melba is to be in this country only a few weeks more as she is leaving the end of January for Australia and this will be the last opportunity to hear her this year.

A very interesting item in the programme is Mozart's concertante symphonie for violin and viola and string orchestra. The chances are that this work has never been heard in Philadelphia. It is a piece full of typical Mozartean beauty and will enable Philadelphia to hear as soloist two of the greatest artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Witek, the concert master, and Mr. Ferir, the leader of the viola section. The programme in full is as follows:

Haydn, symphony in E flat, B. and H. No. 1.
Handel, aria, "Sweet Bird."
Mozart, double concerto for violin and viola and orchestra. Violin, Mr. Witek; viola, Mr. Ferir.
Mozart, two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro."
a Porgi Amor.
b Voi che sapete.
Mendelssohn, overture, "Sea calm and Prosperous Voyage."

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date JAN 7 - 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES A SURPRISE

Theme and 19 Variations by Schelling Prove Test for Entire Orchestra.

Establi 84

It has been said that every player in the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a virtuoso. Ernest Schelling gave the matter a practical test by writing a theme and nineteen variations, which Karl Muck presented at Carnegie Hall last evening.

The full title of the work is "Impressions from an Artist's Life, in the Form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte." It might fairly be changed to "The Orchestra and Its Instruments: Their Possibilities and Their Limitations."

Mr. Schelling's theme is hardly more than a series of minor phrases, somewhat Oriental in color, and easily disguised with a variety of rhythmic and harmonic devices. It is ushered in by a brilliant pianoforte introduction, which says in plain words, "Whatever else this piece may be, you can depend upon its difficulty."

As one variation follows another nearly every instrument in the orchestra is made to testify to the truth of this warning. The wood-wind in particular labors under an almost constant strain, the tones of the oboe being once carried almost to the breaking point.

Mr. Schelling meanwhile does not spare himself, but does his full share of hard work at the piano. Personal and national characteristics enter largely into the variations. By the insertion of initials, names and dates in his sub-titles the composer attempts to indicate the influences which affected his work.

Dr. Muck himself, Hans Pfitzner, Georges Longy, Pavlowa, Paderewski, Granados, Mahler, Kreisler, the Biltmore estate in North Carolina, the war and the Wartburg all have their turn. Ireland is represented by a realistic jig, orchestrated in the Grainger style. and Spain has its conventional tambourines and castanets.

The other numbers on Dr. Muck's programme were Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony and the "Sorcerer's Apprentice" of Paul Dukas.

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date JAN 7 - 1916

SCHELLING'S MUSIC PLEASES AUDIENCE

Esta 1884

New Variations Admirably Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began the year 1916 at Carnegie Hall last evening with one of those concerts which delight the admirers of the organization and irritate many other persons. The programme embraced three numbers, the "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven, a new set of variations for piano and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, and Dukas's "Apprenti Sorcier." The first consideration, and that a brief one, must be given to the new work of the American pianist and composer.

The title in full is "Impressions (from an artist's life) in Form of Variations on Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte." There are altogether twenty-one variations, of which one was cut in last evening's perormance. The theme, which is one of much intrinsic charm, is sung by the violins and violas, the piano supplying an ornamental commentary. The composer then sets out on a series of sketches, which need not be catalogued. The first, for example, for wood wind is marked "B. S. O.," which means that Mr. Schelling in writing it thought of the tonal splendors of the wood choir of the Boston orchestra. Could one mistake the second? A canon, "rather martial, precise in rhythm, incisive, K. M." Why, one could see Karl Muck conducting himself.

The fourth is in honor of Mr. Schelling's orchestration teacher, the composer Hans Pfitzner. A string quartet variation with horn solo does double duty under the title of Flonzaley. It honors the quartet and the beautiful place on the Signale de Chebres. Who is "I. J. P.," with his weird Polish lament, but Paderewski? And there is one for Fritz Kreisler with a viola solo, and there is another in full orchestra for Wilhelm Mengelberg, the Amsterdam conductor.

Most of the variations are more than ordinarily good—some are beautiful; some are pregnant with suggestion. The oboe solo for "G. L." (Georges Longy, who played it) was delightful. The Siciliano and the Habanera had the true character. But Mr Schelling as a delineative composer reached his highest level in the variation entitled "August, 1914." There were grim realism and a fine musical insight in his employment of the martial rhythm and the screaming of harsh trumpet tones, the dull beat of drums and the mutter of war's threats throughout the [illegible]

It was a good piece of writing. So too was his transformation of his theme into a Lutheran choral, which he annotated "Wartburg, 1915."

Mr. Schelling was far from the ancient seat of the Landgraves of Thuringia in the summer of 1915, but perhaps in that momentous year Mr. Schelling remembered that, while a prisoner in the Wartburg, Luther translated the Bible into German. At any rate he made a fine development of his theme in the chorale form and soon afterward brought his work to an effective conclusion.

It goes almost without saying that the composition was well played. Mr. Schelling aided not a little in bringing about this happy result by his own brilliant performance of the piano part, which is not dominant, but an integral share of the whole. The composition will add to Mr. Schelling's repute and will cause music lovers to expect something of larger ambition from his pen.

Doubtless those who have unhappily outlived their admiration for the classics will dismiss the performance of the "Pastoral" symphony with the denunciation of its perfect classicism. But those who can still enjoy pure and restful art had a delightful time listening to this same performance, which was so delicate in all its touches, so transparent and luminous in all its tonal tints and withal so poetic in its reproduction of the spirit of the work that it left the hearer with recollections worth possessing.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date JAN 7 - 1916

PLAYS OWN COMPOSITION.

Ernest Schelling Calls It an Expression of Personalities.

Estab 384

Ernest Schelling, pianist, playing a new composition of his own, was the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall last night.

The new composition is written in the form of nineteen variations on an original theme. Schelling says: "They are impressions of personalities, of places and of happenings as they happened to strike my imagination."

Beethoven's Sixth Symphony was given a splendid reading, which contrasted strangely with the variations which followed.

Duka's "L'Apprenti Sorcier" was the third and closing number.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address [illegible] N. Y.
Date JAN 6

DR. MUCK'S NUMBERS AGAIN.

Estab 84

Editor Brooklyn Daily Eagle:

I am ready to join your correspondent, "Music Loving Subscriber," in protesting against the unmusical programmes offered to us by Dr. Muck of the Boston Symphony. The correspondent writes that there must be many subscribers who think that such "doses" as we were made to swallow at the last concert are unbearable. I know of a number of such subscribers.

ANOTHER SUBSCRIBER.

Brooklyn, January 5, 1916.

From EVE. SUN
Address New York City.
Date JAN 7 - 1916

Estab. 384

Boston Symphony patrons last evening not only packed Carnegie Hall as usual, but listened to the best programme given by the wise men from the Hub this season, if not in years. A guest composer was the American pianist, Ernest Schelling, whose "Variations" in the form of impressions of people and places were designated by cryptic letters which he who runs may read to-day. These labels, easily guessed, made it an "initial" performance in more senses than one. And after orchestrating a personal column, so to speak, the native artist penned at least one glowing, vivid page of war. His "August, 1914," set even the highbrows beating time with earthbound feet. A choked drumbeat recaled word pictures of the oncoming mass of moving gray, which poured into many a "town in northern France" eighteen months ago as a winter fog sweeps through the narrows from the sea.

Schelling's music did not gild the lily; it was brief, kaleidoscopic. Playing his own solo, he painted Paderewski, not as pianist but as patriot, in a lament of Poland like the chorus of maidens in "Prince Igor." Fritz Kreisler he scored for viola, not as fiddler but as friend. There was magic atmosphere in a memorial to Hans Pfitzner, from whom alone he learned orchestral resource. More naive was the "Siciliano" to an earlier teacher, his father, and very merry the Irish reel to his wife. Perhaps the music's highest point was a number, all strings, picturing the lake at Biltmore, N. C., or another of sparks from a fire in the Great Smoky Mountains. One flash of humor was a "canon, rather martial, precise in rhythm," to Karl Muck. In an oboe solo for Georges Longy he led that wind choir's star to impossible heights, where the veteran player was not ashamed to choke unblushingly on a [illegible] note. There was a [illegible] to William Mengel-berg, who produced Schelling's previous "Fantastic Suite;" some real characterization in tense, nervous tribute to Mahler, and a "Habanera" to Pavlowa of heavenly grace.

---

Papa Stergel, of the former neighbors at Swiss Lausanne, sat in a box with the Flonzaleys and De Coppets. Amato of the opera was on the floor, and so was Granados, whose Spanish dances are in Schelling's recital programme next Monday at a smaller hall. To-night in Brooklyn the "Variations" are repeated, while the Beethoven "Pastoral" and Dukas "Sorcerer" give place there to Haydn, Strauss and Enesco.

W. B. CHASE.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City
Date JAN 7 1916

E 188

DR. MUCK'S lucid and beautiful reading of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony was the chief beauty of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last night.

Ernest Shelling played the pianoforte sections of his own work. Impressions an Artist's Life, in the form of variation

These impressions in some cases aim portraiture. For instance, the third i canon form bears the sub-title "Rathe martial. Precise in rhythm. Incisive K. M."

Of course, the K. M. is none other than Dr. Muck. Mr. Schelling's sub-title is more eloquent of Dr. Muck than is the music he composed.

Fr. Kr. is undoubtedly the famous violinist who attended the concert. Other initials are not so easily deciphered, but I. J. P. is surely the great Polish pianist who was Schelling's teacher.

Dukas' charming "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which has been given here before, concluded the programme by the Big Band from Boston.

Incidentally this concert is the first of an avalanche of orchestral performances which includes both the home orchestras.

---

om EVE. STAATS ZEITUNG dress: New York City
te JAN 6 - 1916

384

Symphonie-Konzert.

Das dritte im dieswinterlichen Cyclus von Brooklyner Konzerten gibt das rühmlichſt bekannte Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter morgen Abend unter den Auſpizien des Brooklyn Inſtituts für Künſte und Wiſſenſchaften im Opernſaale der Academy of Muſic. Der geniale Kapellmeiſter Dr. Carl Muck hat wieder ein äußerſt gediegenes Programm zuſammengeſtellt und den Pianiſten Erneſt Schelling als Soliſten gewonnen. Es werden Piecen von Haydn, Richard Strauß und Enesco zu Gehör gebracht. Am Samstag Nachmittag geben der Geſang- und Mandolin-Club der Columbia Univerſität zuſammen unter denſelben Auſpizien ein Konzert im Muſikſaale der Academy of Muſic.

---

m MORNING TELEGRAPH
ress: New York City
e JAN 7 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

ablish

Renders Pleasing Program to Large Audience of Music Lovers Under Dr. Karl Muck's Direction.

PASTORAL FIRST NUMBER

Ernest Schelling's "Impressions" Proves Decidedly Original Piece of Work.

The Boston Symphony Soicety, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, was heard again in Carnegie Hall last night. The Sixth Symphony of Beethoven, known as the Pastoral, was the first number on the program, a symphony full of the beauty and peaceful tranquility of life in the country, a vivid contrast to the rush and turmoil of city life, especially in these troublous times.

It reminds one strongly of the word painting of the same subject by the English poet Goldsmith in his pastoral, "The Deserted Village," in which he brings to our minds a picture of the contented and happy rustic folk, with their simple pleasures, their dances, their games and their companions. He describes for us the peaceful country in which these kindly peasants live and the beauty of their surroundings, but "poor old Goldy" felt that this simple rustic life [illegible] to the heart. All three works [illegible]

[illegible] lament:

Peasantry the Thing.

"But a bold peasantry, a country's pride,
When once destroyed can never be supplied."

Beethoven's pastoral contains no lament, no warning; he felt just the beauty and the exquisite peace of nature, which never fails to soothe aching and weary hearts, but he describes the storm and the gradual resuming of the same old occupations the moment it has passed.

After the peaceful scene came the clash and noise of a new composition—Ernest Schelling's "Impressions" (from an artist's life) in form of variations on an original theme for orchestra and piano, played by Mr. Schelling himself for the first time in New York. It is a decidedly original piece of work, and needless to say received every advantage in its rendering last night.

Some of It Humorous.

Evidently parts were intended to be humorous, noticeably No. X., for full orchestra-Erin, or else it was taken sadly amiss last night.

No. XVI., for viola solo and piano, which, judging by the program, was dedicated to Fritz Kreisler, was particularly pleasing, as was also No. XIV., a decription of a lagoon. Several numbers were omitted.

The last composition was D

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date JAN 7 - 1916

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Ernest Schelling Plays His New Variations—The Pastoral Symphony.

Esta 1884

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given las evening in Carnegie Hall, brought forward music new and old, one of the new pieces being played for the first time. It is a set of variations for pianoforte and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, well known in New York as a pianist and composer, entitled "Impressions from an Artist's Life in Form of Variations on an Original Theme." Schelling had already played here his fantastic suite for pianoforte and orchestra and other compositions of his own. He played the solo part of this. There are twenty-one variations in this set, with two more marked with a letter. Of these three were omitted in the performance.

The composer says of them: "The variations are impressions of personalities, of places, of happenings, as they happened to strike my imagination." Most are marked with initials or a name which he thinks may sometimes be o interest to the listener, sometimes not. Of these may be identified Dr. Muck, Mr. Longy of the orchestra, Anna Pavlowa, Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Kreisler; others are marked with the names of Hans Pfitzner, "Flonzaley," Gustav Mahler; others were suggested by a lagoon in North Carolina, by the oncoming of war in August, 1914, by a view of the Wartburg; "Savoyard" and "Afghan" suggest obvious characteristics.

The variations are fanciful in the extreme, even fantastic. As is intimated by several of Mr. Schelling's notes, he had the Boston Orchestra much in his mind when writing them, and they are timed toward exploiting the virtuos ity of that band and of several o its individual players. There are man unusual and often experimental effects in treating the orchestra; the pianoforte itself is often used almost as an orche tral instrument, sometimes merely em broidering with brilliant passages, some times standing completely aside whi the orchestra plays alone.

The variations are of unequal music value. Mr. Longy has an expressi oboe solo in one of the most charmi of them; the Polish movement to whic Mr. Paderewski's initials are affixe the viola solo with Mr. Kreisler's, th Siciliano, have beauty of a spo taneous sort. The Irish variation mar ed "Erin" is an ingenious use of Iri dance rhythms, with ingenious effec of orchestral tone, as the harmo upon the violins. The one u which the composer seems to have pended the most serious thought is suggestive of the war, with its dr and discordant trumpets, its sini ostinato figure in the bass, its pro mation of the Gregorian "Dies Ir its stern climax—a movement of dramatic power and impressiveness.

In some there is extravagance th amusing, as in the Habañera, the Af dance, if it is an Afghan dance Lutheran choral, which closes the s is impressively wrought. Most lis will have lost hold of the theme b many of the variations have passe for Mr. Schelling has used it wit complete indifference of the modern poser, as merely a convenient pe imagination has indeed run rio facility and ingenuity in orchestr vice have kept it company, an variations, rather too many for a series, leave, as they doubtless we tended to leave, a kaleidoscopic i sion, in which there is diversely ple ble stimulation. The performance brilliant, on the part of both the chestra and the composer, who pl the pianoforte part.

The program began with an exquis performance of Beethoven's "Pasto symphony of marvelously pur and gl ing tone; a performance which perfect clarity, balance and prec was like a great piece of chamber m and completely mirrored all the be and serenity of Beethoven's inspira At the end came Paul Dukas's am humoresque "L'Apprenti Sorcier familiar item of modern French

[78]

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date JAN 7 - 1916
Establi 84

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES A SURPRISE

Theme and 19 Variations by Schelling Prove Test for Entire Orchestra.

It has been said that every player in the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a virtuoso. Ernest Schelling gave the matter a practical test by writing a theme and nineteen variations, which Karl Muck presented at Carnegie Hall last evening.

The full title of the work is "Impressions from an Artist's Life, in the Form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte." It might fairly be changed to "The Orchestra and Its Instruments: Their Possibilities and Their Limitations."

Mr. Schelling's theme is hardly more than a series of minor phrases, somewhat Oriental in color, and easily disguised with a variety of rhythmic and harmonic devices. It is ushered in by a brilliant pianoforte introduction, which says in plain words, "Whatever else this piece may be, you can depend upon its difficulty."

As one variation follows another nearly every instrument in the orchestra is made to testify to the truth of this warning. The wood-wind in particular labors under an almost constant strain, the tones of the oboe being once carried almost to the breaking point.

Mr. Schelling meanwhile does not spare himself, but does his full share of hard work at the piano. Personal and national characteristics enter largely into the variations. By the insertion of initials, names and dates in his sub-titles the composer attempts to indicate the influences which affected his work.

Dr. Muck himself, Hans Pfitzner, Georges Longy, Pavlowa, Paderewski, Granados, Mahler, Kreisler, the Biltmore estate in North Carolina, the war and the Wartburg all have their turn. Ireland is represented by a realistic jig, orchestrated in the Grainger style. and Spain has its conventional tambourines and castanets.

The other numbers on Dr. Muck's programme were Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony and the "Sorcerer's Apprentice" of Paul Dukas.

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date JAN 7 -
Esta 1884

SCHELLING'S MUSIC PLEASES AUDIENCE

New Variations Admirably Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began the year 1916 at Carnegie Hall last evening with one of those concerts which delight the admirers of the organization and irritate many other persons. The programme embraced three numbers, the "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven, a new set of variations for piano and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, and Dukas's "Apprenti Sorcier." The first consideration, and that a brief one, must be given to the new work of the American pianist and composer.

The title in full is "Impressions (from an artist's life) in Form of Variations on Original Tneme for Orchestra and Pianoforte." There are altogether twenty-one variations, of which one was cut in last evening's perormance. The theme, which is one of much intrinsic charm, is sung by the violins and violas, the piano supplying an ornamental commentary. The composer then sets out on a series of sketches, which need not be catalogued. The first, for example, for wood wind is marked "B. S. O.," which means that Mr. Schelling in writing it thought of the tonal splendors of the wood choir of the Boston orchestra. Could one mistake the second? A canon, "rather martial, precise in rhythm, incisive, K. M." Why, one could see Karl Muck conducting himself.

The fourth is in honor of Mr. Schelling's orchestration teacher, the composer Hans Pfitzner. A string quartet variation with horn solo does double duty under the title of Flonzaley. It honors the quartet and the beautiful place on the Signale de Chebres. Who is "I. J. P.," with his weird Polish lament, but Paderewski? And there is one for Fritz Kreisler with a viola solo, and there is another in full orchestra for Wilhelm Mengelberg, the Amsterdam conductor.

Most of the variations are more than ordinarily good—some are beautiful; some are pregnant with suggestion. The oboe solo for "G. L." (Georges Longy, who played it) was delightful. The Siciliano and the Habanera had the true character. But Mr Schelling as a delineative composer reached his highest level in the variation entitled "August, 1914." There were grim realism and a fine musical insight in his employment of the martial rhythm and the screaming of harsh trumpet tones, the dull beat of drums and the mutter of war's threats throughout the orchestra. It was a good piece of writing. So too was his transformation of his theme into a Lutheran choral, which he annotated "Wartburg, 1915."

Mr. Schelling was far from the ancient seat of the Landgraves of Thuringia in the summer of 1915, but perhaps in that momentous year Mr. Schelling remembered that, while a prisoner in the Wartburg, Luther translated the Bible into German. At any rate he made a fine development of his theme in the chorale form and soon afterward brought his work to an effective conclusion.

It goes almost without saying that the composition was well played. Mr. Schelling aided not a little in bringing about this happy result by his own brilliant performance of the piano part, which is not dominant, but an integral share of the whole. The composition will add to Mr. Schelling's repute and will cause music lovers to expect something of larger ambition from his pen.

Doubtless those who have unhappily outlived their admiration for the classics will dismiss the performance of the "Pastoral" symphony with the denunciation of its perfect classicism. But those who can still enjoy pure and restful art had a delightful time listening to this same performance, which was so delicate in all its touches, so transparent and luminous in all its tonal tints and withal so poetic in its reproduction of the spirit of the work that it left the hearer with recollections worth possessing.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date JAN 7 - 1916
Establ 884

PLAYS OWN COMPOSITION.

Ernest Schelling Calls It an Expression of Personalities.

Ernest Schelling, pianist, playing a new composition of his own, was the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall last night.

The new composition is written in the form of nineteen variations on an original theme. Schelling says: "They are impressions of personalities, of places and of happenings as they happened to strike my imagination."

Beethoven's Sixth Symphony was given a splendid reading, which contrasted strangely with the variations which followed.

Duka's "L'Apprenti Sorcier" was the third and closing number.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address
Date
Estab 84

DR. MUCK'S NUMBERS AGAIN.

Editor Brooklyn Daily Eagle:

I am ready to join your correspondent, "Music Loving Subscriber," in protesting against the unmusical programmes offered to us by Dr. Muck of the Boston Symphony. The correspondent writes that there must be many subscribers who think that such "doses" as we were made to swallow at the last concert are unbearable. I know of a number of such subscribers.

ANOTHER SUBSCRIBER.

Brooklyn, January 5, 1916.

From EVE. SUN
Address New York City.
Date JAN 7
Estab. 884

Boston Symphony patrons last evening not only packed Carnegie Hall as usual, but listened to the best programme given by the wise men from the Hub this season, if not in years. A guest composer was the American pianist, Ernest Schelling, whose "Variations" in the form of impressions of people and places were designated by cryptic letters which he who runs may read to-day. These labels, easily guessed, made it an "initial" performance in more senses than one. And after orchestrating a personal column, so to speak, the native artist penned at least one glowing, vivid page of war. His "August, 1914," set even the highbrows beating time with earthbound feet. A choked drumbeat recaled word pictures of the oncoming mass of moving gray, which poured into many a "town in northern France" eighteen months ago as a winter fog sweps through the narrows from the sea.

Schelling's music did not gild the lily; it was brief, kaleidoscopic. Playing his own solo, he painted Paderewski, not as pianist but as patriot, in a lament of Poland like the chorus of maidens in "Prince Igor." Fritz Kreisler he scored for viola, not as fiddler but as friend. There was magic atmosphere in a memorial to Hans Pfitzner, from whom alone he learned orchestral resource. More naive was the "Siciliano" to an earlier teacher, his father, and very merry the Irish reel to his wife. Perhaps the music's highest point was a number, all strings, picturing the lake at Biltmore, N. C., or another of sparks from a fire in the Great Smoky Mountains. One flash of humor was a "canon, rather martial, precise in rhythm," to Karl Muck. In an oboe solo for Georges Longy he led that wind choir's star to impossible heights, where the veteran player was not ashamed to choke unblushingly on a top note. There was a full orchestra piece to Willem Mengelberg, who produced Schelling's previous "Fantastic Suite;" some real characterization in tense, nervous tribute to Mahler, and a "Habanera" to Pavlowa of heavenly grace.

Papa Stergel, of the former neighbors at Swiss Lausanne, sat in a box with the Flonzaleys and De Coppets. Amato of the opera was on the floor, nd so was Granados, whose Spanish dances are in Schelling's recital programme next Monday at a smaller hall. To-night in Brooklyn the "Variations" are repeated, while the Beethoven "Pastoral" and Dukas "Sorcerer" give place there to Haydn, Strauss and Enesco.

W. B. CHASE.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City
Date JAN 7 1916

DR. MUCK'S lucid and beautiful reading of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony was the chief beauty of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last night.

Ernest Shelling played the pianoforte sections of his own work. Impressions of an Artist's Life, in the form of variation

These impressions in some cases aim a portraiture. For instance, the third i canon form bears the sub-title "Rathe martial. Precise in rhythm. Incisive K. M."

Of course, the K. M. is none other than Dr. Muck. Mr. Schelling's sub-title is more eloquent of Dr. Muck than is the music he composed.

Fr. Kr. is undoubtedly the famous violinist who attended the concert. Other initials are not so easily deciphered, but I. J. P. is surely the great Polish pianist who was Schelling's teacher.

Dukas' charming "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which has been given here before, concluded the programme by the Big Band from Boston.

Incidentally this concert is the first of an avalanche of orchestral performances which includes both the home orchestras.

---

om EVE. STAATS ZEITUNG dress: New York City
te IAN 6 - 1916
884

Symphonie-Konzert.

Das dritte im dieswinterlichen Cyclus von Brcoklyner Konzerten gibt das rühmlichſt bekannte Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter morgen Abend unter den Auſvizien des Brooklyn Inſtituts für Künſte und Wiſſenſchaften im Opernſaale der Academy of Muſic. Der geniale Kapellmeiſter Dr. Carl Muck hat wieder ein äußerſt gediegenes Programm zuſammengeſtellt und den Pianiſten Erneſt Schelling als Soliſten gewonnen. Es werden Piecen von Haydn, Richard Strauß und Eneſco zu Gehör gebracht. Am Samstag Nachmittag geben der Geſang- und Mandolin-Club der Columbia Univerſität zuſammen unter denſelben Auſpizien ein Konzert im Muſikſaale der Academy cf Muſic.

---

m MORNING TELEGRAPH
lress: New York City
e 1916
ablish

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Renders Pleasing Program to Large Audience of Music Lovers Under Dr. Karl Muck's Direction.

PASTORAL FIRST NUMBER

Ernest Schelling's "Impressions" Proves Decidedly Original Piece of Work.

The Boston Symphony Soicety, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, was heard again in Carnegie Hall last night. The Sixth Symphony of Beethoven, known as the Pastoral, was the first number on the program, a symphony full of the beauty and peaceful tranquility of life in the country, a vivid contrast to the rush and turmoil of city life, especially in these troublous times.

It reminds one strongly of the word painting of the same subject by the English poet Goldsmith in his pastoral, "The Deserted Village," in which he brings to our minds a picture of the contented and happy rustic folk, with their simple pleasures, their dances, their games and their companions. He describes for us the peaceful country in which these kindly peasants live and the beauty of their surroundings, but "poor old Goldy" felt that this simple rustic life [illegible] to the heart. All three works [illegible] [illegible] with a warning and lament:

Peasantry the Thing.

"But a bold peasantry, a country's pride,
When once destroyed can never be supplied."

Beethoven's pastoral contains no lament, no warning; he felt just the beauty and the exquisite peace of nature, which never fails to soothe aching and weary hearts, but he describes the storm and the gradual resuming of the same old occupations the moment it has passed.

After the peaceful scene came the clash and noise of a new composition—Ernest Schelling's "Impressions" (from an artist's life) in form of variations on an original theme for orchestra and piano, played by Mr. Schelling himself for the first time in New York. It is a decidedly original piece of work, and needless to say received every advantage in its rendering last night.

Some of It Humorous.

Evidently parts were intended to be humorous, noticeably No. X., for full orchestra-Erin. or else it was taken sadly amiss last night.

No. XVI., for viola solo and piano, which, judging by the program, was dedicated to Fritz Kreisler, was particularly pleasing, as was also No. XIV., a decription of a lagoon. Several numbers were omitted.

The last composition was D

18

From TIMES
Address: New York City
JAN 7 - 1916
Da
Esta 1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Ernest Schelling Plays His New Variations—The Pastoral Symphony

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given las evening in Carnegie Hall, brought forward music new and old, one of the new pieces being played for the first time. It is a set of variations for pianoforte and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, well known in New York as a pianist and composer, entitled "Impressions from an Artist's Life in Form of Variations on an Original Theme." Mr. Schelling had already played here his fantastic suite for pianoforte and orchestra and other compositions of his own. He played the solo part of this. There are twenty-one variations in this set, with two more marked with a letter. Of these three were omitted in the performance.

The composer says of them: "The variations are impressions of personalities, of places, of happenings, as they happened to strike my imagination." Most are marked with initials or a name, which he thinks may sometimes be of interest to the listener, sometimes not. Of these may be identified Dr. Muck, Mr. Longy of the orchestra, Anna Pavlowa, Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Kreisler; others are marked with the names of Hans Pfitzner, "Flonzaley," Gustav Mahler; others were suggested by a lagoon in North Carolina, by the oncomming of war in August, 1914, by a view of the Wartburg; "Savoyard" and "Afghan" suggest obvious characteristics.

The variations are fanciful in the extreme, even fantastic. As is intimated by several of Mr. Schelling's notes, he had the Boston Orchestra much in his mind when writing them, and they are timed toward exploiting the virtuosity of that band and of several o its individual players. There are man unusual and often experimental effects in treating the orchestra; the pianoforte itself is often used almost as an orchestral instrument, sometimes merely embroidering with brilliant passages, sometimes standing completely aside whi the orchestra plays alone.

The variations are of unequal music value. Mr. Longy has an expressiv oboe solo in one of the most charmi of them; the Polish movement to whi Mr. Paderewski's initials are affixe the viola solo with Mr. Kreisler's Siciliano, have beauty of a spo taneous sort. The Irish variation m ed "Erin" is an ingenious use of Iri dance rhythms, with ingenious effec of orchestral tone, as the harmon upon the violins. The one u which the composer seems to have pended the most serious thought is suggestive of the war, with its dr and discordant trumpets. Its sini ostinato figure in the basses, its mation of the Gregorian "Dies Ir its stern climax—a movement of dramatic power and impressiveness.

In some there is extravagance th amusing, as in the Habanera, the dance, if it is an Afghan dance Lutheran choral, which closes the is impressively wrought. Most list will have lost hold of the theme many of the variations have passe for Mr. Schelling has used it wi complete indifference of the moder poser, as merely a convenient peg imagination has indeed run ric facility and ingenuity in orchestr vice have kept it company. variations, rather too many for series, leave, as they doubtless w tended to leave, a kaleidoscopic sion, in which there is diversely ble stimulation. The performan brilliant, on the part of both chestra and the composer, who the pianoforte part.

The program began with an exqui performance of Beethoven's "Pastor symphony of marvelously pur ing tone; a performance which perfect clarity, balance and pro was like a great piece of chambe and completely mirrored all the and serenity of Beethoven's inspir At the end came Paul Dukas's am humoresque "L'Apprenti Sorcier familiar item of modern French

[78]

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date JAN 7 - 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES A SURPRISE

Theme and 19 Variations by Schelling Prove Test for Entire Orchestra.

Establi … 84

It has been said that every player in the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a virtuoso. Ernest Schelling gave the matter a practical test by writing a theme and nineteen variations, which Karl Muck presented at Carnegie Hall last evening.

The full title of the work is "Impressions from an Artist's Life, in the Form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte." It might fairly be changed to "The Orchestra and Its Instruments: Their Possibilities and Their Limitations."

Mr. Schelling's theme is hardly more than a series of minor phrases, somewhat Oriental in color, and easily disguised with a variety of rhythmic and harmonic devices. It is ushered in by a brilliant pianoforte introduction, which says in plain words, "Whatever else this piece may be, you can depend upon its difficulty."

As one variation follows another nearly every instrument in the orchestra is made to testify to the truth of this warning. The wood-wind in particular labors under an almost constant strain, the tones of the oboe being once carried almost to the breaking point.

Mr. Schelling meanwhile does not spare himself, but does his full share of hard work at the piano. Personal and national characteristics enter largely into the variations. By the insertion of initials, names and dates in his sub-titles the composer attempts to indicate the influences which affected his work.

Dr. Muck himself, Hans Pfitzner, Georges Longy, Pavlowa, Paderewski, Granados, Mahler, Kreisler, the Biltmore estate in North Carolina, the war and the Wartburg all have their turn. Ireland is represented by a realistic jig, orchestrated in the Grainger style, and Spain has its conventional tambourines and castanets.

The other numbers on Dr. Muck's programme were Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony and the "Sorcerer's Apprentice" of Paul Dukas.

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date JAN 7 - 1916

SCHELLING'S MUSIC PLEASES AUDIENCE

Esta … 1884

New Variations Admirably Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began the year 1916 at Carnegie Hall last evening with one of those concerts which delight the admirers of the organization and irritate many other persons. The programme embraced three numbers, the "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven, a new set of variations for piano and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, and Dukas's "Apprenti Sorcier." The first consideration, and that a brief one, must be given to the new work of the American pianist and composer.

The title in full is "Impressions (from an artist's life) in Form of Variations on Original Tneme for Orchestra and Pianoforte." There are altogether twenty-one variations, of which one was cut in last evening's perormance. The theme, which is one of much intrinsic charm, is sung by the violins and violas, the piano supplying an ornamental commentary. The composer then sets out on a series of sketches, which need not be catalogued. The first, for example, for wood wind is marked "B. S. O.," which means that Mr. Schelling in writing it thought of the tonal splendors of the wood choir of the Boston orchestra. Could one mistake the second? A canon, "rather martial, precise in rhythm, incisive, K. M." Why, one could see Karl Muck conducting himself.

The fourth is in honor of Mr. Schelling's orchestration teacher, the composer Hans Pfitzner. A string quartet variation with horn solo does double duty under the title of Flonzaley. It honors the quartet and the beautiful place on the Signale de Chebres. Who is "I. J. P.," with his weird Polish lament, but Paderewski? And there is one for Fritz Kreisler with a viola solo, and there is another in full orchestra for Wilhelm Mengelberg, the Amsterdam conductor.

Most of the variations are more than ordinarily good—some are beautiful; some are pregnant with suggestion. The oboe solo for "G. L." (Georges Longy, who played it) was delightful. The Siciliano and the Habanera had the true character. But Mr Schelling as a delineative composer reached his highest level in the variation entitled "August, 1914." There were grim realism and a fine musical insight in his employment of the martial rhythm and the screaming of harsh trumpet tones, the dull beat of drums and the mutter of war's threats throughout the orchestra.

It was a good piece of writing. So too was his transformation of his theme into a Lutheran choral, which he annotated "Wartburg, 1915."

Mr. Schelling was far from the ancient seat of the Landgraves of Thuringia in the summer of 1915, but perhaps in that momentous year Mr. Schelling remembered that, while a prisoner in the Wartburg, Luther translated the Bible into German. At any rate he made a fine development of his theme in the chorale form and soon afterward brought his work to an effective conclusion.

It goes almost without saying that the composition was well played. Mr. Schelling aided not a little in bringing about this happy result by his own brilliant performance of the piano part, which is not dominant, but an integral share of the whole. The composition will add to Mr. Schelling's repute and will cause music lovers to expect something of larger ambition from his pen.

Doubtless those who have unhappily outlived their admiration for the classics will dismiss the performance of the "Pastoral" symphony with the denunciation of its perfect classicism. But those who can still enjoy pure and restful art had a delightful time listening to this same performance, which was so delicate in all its touches, so transparent and luminous in all its tonal tints and withal so poetic in its reproduction of the spirit of the work that it left the hearer with recollections worth possessing.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date JAN 7 - 1916

PLAYS OWN COMPOSITION.

Ernest Schelling Calls It an Expression of Personalities.

Establ … 384

Ernest Schelling, pianist, playing a new composition of his own, was the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall last night.

The new composition is written in the form of nineteen variations on an original theme. Schelling says: "They are impressions of personalities, of places and of happenings as they happened to strike my imagination."

Beethoven's Sixth Symphony was given a splendid reading, which contrasted strangely with the variations which followed.

Duka's "L'Apprenti Sorcier" was the third and closing number.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address
Date

DR. MUCK'S NUMBERS AGAIN.

Estab … 84

Editor Brooklyn Daily Eagle:

I am ready to join your correspondent, "Music Loving Subscriber," in protesting against the unmusical programmes offered to us by Dr. Muck of the Boston Symphony. The correspondent writes that there must be many subscribers who think that such "doses" as we were made to swallow at the last concert are unbearable. I know of a number of such subscribers.

ANOTHER SUBSCRIBER.

Brooklyn, January 5, 1916.

From EVE. SUN
Address New York
Date JAN 7 -

Estab.

Boston Symphony patrons last ning not only packed Carnegie as usual, but listened to the best gramme given by the wise men fr the Hub this season, if not in yea A guest composer was the Americ pianist, Ernest Schelling, whose "Var ations" in the form of impressions o people and places were designated by cryptic letters which he who runs may read to-day. These labels, easily guessed, made it an "initial" performance in more senses than one. And after orchestrating a personal column, so to speak, the native artist penned at least one glowing, vivid page of war. His "August, 1914," set even the highbrows beating time with earthbound feet. A choked drumbeat recaled word pictures of the oncoming mass of moving gray, which poured into many a "town in northern France" eighteen months ago as a winter fog sweeps through the narrows from the sea.

Schelling's music did not gild the ily; it was brief, kaleidoscopic. Playing his own solo, he painted Paderewski, not as pianist but as patriot, in a lament of Poland like the chorus of maidens in "Prince Igor." Fritz Kreisler he scored for viola, not as fiddler but as friend. There was magic atmosphere in a memorial to Hans Pfitzner, from whom alone he learned orchestral resource. More naive was the "Siciliano" to an earlier teacher, his father, and very merry the Irish reel to his wife. Perhaps the music's highest point was a number, all strings, picturing the lake at Biltmore, N. C., or another of sparks from a fire in the Great Smoky Mountains. One flash of humor was a "canon, rather martial, precise in rhythm," to Karl Muck. In an oboe solo for Georges Longy he led that wind choir's star to impossible heights, where the veteran player was not ashamed to choke unblushingly on a top note. There was a ful orchestra piece to Willem Mengel-berg, who produced Schelling's previous "Fantastic Suite;" some real characterization in tense, nervous tribute to Mahler, and a "Habanera" to Pavlowa of heavenly grace.

---

Papa Stergel, of the former neighbors at Swiss Lausanne, sat in a box with the Flonzaleys and De Coppets. Amato of the opera was on the floor, and so was Granados, whose Spanish dances are in Schelling's recital programme next Monday at a smaller hall. To-night in Brooklyn the "Variations" are repeated, while the Beethoven "Pastoral" and Dukas "Sorcerer" give place there to Haydn, Strauss and Enesco.

W. B. CHASE.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City
Date JAN 7 1916

DR. MUCK'S lucid and beautiful reading of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony was the chief beauty of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last night.

E … 188

Ernest Shelling played the pianoforte sections of his own work. Impressions of an Artist's Life, in the form of variations.

These impressions in some cases aim at portraiture. For instance, the third in canon form bears the sub-title "Rather martial. Precise in rhythm. Incisive. K. M."

Of course, the K. M. is none other than Dr. Muck. Mr. Schelling's sub-title is more eloquent of Dr. Muck than is the music he composed.

Fr. Kr. is undoubtedly the famous violinist who attended the concert. Other initials are not so easily deciphered, but I. J. P. is surely the great Polish pianist who was Schelling's teacher.

Dukas' charming "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which has been given here before, concluded the programme by the Big Band from Boston.

Incidentally this concert is the first of an avalanche of orchestral performances which includes both the home orchestras.

From EVE. STAATS ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date JAN 6 - 1916

384

Symphonie-Konzert.

Das dritte im dieswinterlichen Cyclus von Brooklyner Konzerten gibt das rühmlichſt bekannte Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter morgen Abend unter den Auſpizien des Brooklyn Inſtituts für Künſte und Wiſſenſchaften im Opernſaale der Academy of Muſic. Der geniale Kapellmeiſter Dr. Carl Muck hat wieder ein äußerſt gediegenes Programm zuſammengeſtellt und den Pianiſten Erneſt Schelling als Soliſten gewonnen. Es werden Piecen von Haydn, Richard Strauß und Enesco zu Gehör gebracht. Am Samstag Nachmittag geben der Geſang- und Mandolin-Club der Columbia Univerſität zuſammen unter denſelben Auſpizien ein Konzert im Muſikſaale der Academy of Muſic.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date JAN 7 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

stablish

Renders Pleasing Program to Large Audience of Music Lovers Under Dr. Karl Muck's Direction.

PASTORAL FIRST NUMBER

Ernest Schelling's "Impressions" Proves Decidedly Original Piece of Work.

The Boston Symphony Soicety, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, was heard again in Carnegie Hall last night. The Sixth Symphony of Beethoven, known as the Pastoral, was the first number on the program, a symphony full of the beauty and peaceful tranquility of life in the country, a vivid contrast to the rush and turmoil of city life, especially in these troublous times.

It reminds one strongly of the word painting of the same subject by the English poet Goldsmith in his pastoral, "The Deserted Village," in which he brings to our minds a picture of the contented and happy rustic folk, with their simple pleasures, their dances, their games and their companions. He describes for us the peaceful country in which these kindly peasants live and the beauty of their surroundings, but "poor old Goldy" felt that this simple rustic life [illegible] to the heart. All three works lament:

[78]

---

Peasantry the Thing.

"But a bold peasantry, a country's pride,
When once destroyed can never be supplied."

Beethoven's pastoral contains no lament, no warning; he felt just the beauty and the exquisite peace of nature, which never fails to soothe aching and weary hearts, but he describes the storm and the gradual resuming of the same old occupations the moment it has passed.

After the peaceful scene came the clash and noise of a new composition—Ernest Schelling's "Impressions" (from an artist's life) in form of variations on an original theme for orchestra and piano, played by Mr. Schelling himself for the first time in New York. It is a decidedly original piece of work, and needless to say received every advantage in its rendering last night.

Some of It Humorous.

Evidently parts were intended to be humorous, noticeably No. X., for full orchestra-Erin, or else it was taken sadly amiss last night.

No. XVI., for viola solo and piano, which, judging by the program, was dedicated to Fritz Kreisler, was particularly pleasing, as was also No. XIV., a decription of a lagoon. Several numbers were omitted.

The last composition was Duka's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" (after a ballad by Goethe), which was played with life and spirit. The Society will give a new program at its concert on Saturday afternoon.

---

ony Orchestra, which was given last ening in Carnegie Hall, brought for ard music new and old, one of the ew pieces being played for the first time. It is a set of variations for pianoforte and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, well known in New York as a pianist and composer, entitled "Impressions from an Artist's Life in Form of Variations on an Original Theme." Mr. Schelling had already played here his fantastic suite for pianoforte and orchestra and other compositions of his own. He played the solo part of this. There are twenty-one variations in this set, with two more marked with a letter. Of these three were omitted in the performance.

1884

The composer says of them: "The variations are impressions of personalities, of places, of happenings, as they happened to strike my imagination." Most are marked with initials or a name, which he thinks may sometimes be of interest to the listener, sometimes not. Of these may be identified Dr. Muck, Mr. Longy of the orchestra, Anna Pavlowa, Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Kreisler; others are marked with the names of Hans Pfitzner, "Flonzaley," Gustav Mahler; others were suggested by a lagoon in North Carolina, by the oncoming of war in August, 1914, by a view of the Wartburg; "Savoyard" and "Afghan" suggest obvious characteristics.

The variations are fanciful in the extreme, even fantastic. As is intimated by several of Mr. Schelling's notes, he had the Boston Orchestra much in his mind when writing them, and they are timed toward exploiting the virtuosity of that band and of several o its individual players. There are man unusual and often experimental effects in treating the orchestra; the pianoforte itself is often used almost as an orchestral instrument, sometimes merely embroidering with brilliant passages, sometimes standing completely aside whi the orchestra plays alone.

The variations are of unequal music value. Mr. Longy has an express oboe solo in one of the most charmi of them; the Polish movement to whic Mr. Paderewski's initials are affixe the viola solo with Mr. Kreisler's, th Siciliano, have beauty of a spontaneous sort. The Irish variation marked "Erin" is an ingenious use of Iris dance rhythms, with ingenious effec of orchestral tone, as the harmon upon the violins. The one u which the composer seems to have pended the most serious thought is suggestive of the war, with its dr and discordant trumpets, its sin ostinato figure in the bass, its pro mation of the Gregorian "Dies Ir its stern climax—a movement of t dramatic power and impressivenes

In some there is extravagance th amusing, as in the Habañera, the Af dance, if it is an Afghan dance. Lutheran choral, which closes the s is impressively wrought. Most lis will have lost hold of the theme b many of the variations have passe for Mr. Schelling has used it with complete indifference of the modern poser, as merely a convenient pe imagination has indeed run rio facility and ingenuity in orchestr vice have kept it company, an variations, rather too many for a series, leave, as they doubtless we tended to leave, a kaleidoscopic im sion, in which there is diversely plea ble stimulation. The performance brilliant, on the part of both the chestra and the composer, who pl the pianoforte part.

The program began with an exquis performance of Beethoven's "Pastor symphony of marvelously pur and g ing tone; a performance whic perfect clarity, balance and prec was like a great piece of chamber m and completely mirrored all the be and serenity of Beethoven's inspira At the end came Paul Dukas's am humoresque "L'Apprenti Sorcier familiar item of modern French m

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 7 - 1916

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Dr. Muck hat uns geſtern in Carnegie Hall einen vollen Genuß geboten, den ich vor Allem der unvergleichlich liebevoll und glänzend gebrachten Ausgeſtaltung von Beethoven's „Paſtoral"-Symphonie zuſchreiben muß. Dieſe ſechſte in der heiligen Neunzahl des Altmeiſters iſt gerade diejenige, welche die meiſten Falten zeigt, — ſo wiedergegeben wie geſtern, wirkt ſie jedoch wie neu — ſchön und ſo friſch, als ob ſie erſt vom Himmel gefallen wäre. Mit wonnigem Behagen malte Muck die Glücksempfindung bei der Ankunft auf dem Lande. Wir genießen mit ihm und ſeinem Meiſterorcheſter die liebliche Szene am Bach. Das Grünen und Blühen der Natur, die wonnigen Stimmen aus dem Vogelreiche. Wir folgen ihm mit Vergnügen auf den Tanzboden; wir genießen — ſit venia verbo — das Gewitterchen, das zur Zeit des Entſtehens der Symphonie als ſo ungemein realiſtiſch empfunden wurde, — ſchließlich ſchlägt uns der innige, gemütvolle Hirtengeſang des Allegretto in ſeine Bande. Es war eine wonnige Halbſtunde, für die wir dem Dirigenten und ſeiner Schar zu wirklichem Dank verbunden ſind.

Von ragender Virtuoſität, in den Farben dabei ungemein fein und ſtiliſtiſch gedämpft, war die Waſſerkalamität in Dukas' „Zauberlehrling" erfüllt. Man weiß, wie die Boſtoner derlei Sachen ſpielen können, und die geſtrige Darbietung war eine der glänzendſten Leiſtungen, deren man ſich erinnern kann.

Als Neuheit führte uns Dr. Muck Erneſt Schelling's neueſtes Werk mit dem Komponiſten am Piano vor. Der Künſtler nennt ſeine Arbeit „Eindrücke (aus einem Künſtlerleben) in Form von Variationen über ein Originalthema für Orcheſter und Pianoforte", und zwar iſt das Werk, das urſprünglich 19 Variationen enthält, im Verlauf der letzten zwei Jahre entſtanden. Wir zitieren den Komponiſten zur Charakteriſierung ſeines Werkes wie folgt: Das Originalthema Gis-Moll, Sechsachteltakt, iſt für Violinen und Bratſchen uniſono geſchrieben mit ornamentalen Figuren des Piano über Fermaten geführt.

„Die Variationen geben Eindrücke von Perſönlichkeiten, von Plätzen und Begebenheiten wieder, welche meine Phantaſie angeregt haben. Ich habe den einzelnen Variationen gewöhnlich ein Wort oder Initialen beigefügt, welche die Zuhörer manchmal intereſſieren ſollten, manchmal auch nicht.

Variation No. 1 iſt für Holzbläſer geſchrieben. Als ich dieſen Teil ſchrieb, hatte ich nur einen Klang in meinem Ohr: den des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters. Das erklärt die beigefügten Initialen B. S. O."

Von den übrigen Variationen will ich folgende anführen: No. 3 „Klarinette Octinato. Savoyard (Patre). No. 4 für Violincelliſoli und drei Flöten, mit Piano- und Streicherbegleitung. (Zur Erinnerung an Hans Pfitzer. Dem Schreiber dieſes iſt es übrigens nicht bekannt, daß Hans Pfitzer, der bekannte Komponiſt des „Armen Heinrich" und der „Roſe vom Liebesgarten", der Lehrer von Erneſt Schelling, geſtorben ſei.

Weitere Teile ſind No. 8, „Habanera Arragoneſe" für volles Orcheſter (A. P.), No. 12 „Hornſolo und Piano" (E. G.), No. 13 für volles Orcheſter (zum Andenken an Guſtav Mahler), No. 17a für volles Orcheſter (Auguſt 1914), welche Variation den Todeszug der Legionen dem Sieg oder dem Untergang entgegen malen ſoll; No. 18a für volles Orcheſter („Afghan") und No. 19 „Lutheriſcher Choral" (Wartburg 1905). Die Variationen No. 11 und No. 17 wurden bei der geſtrigen Aufführung weggelaſſen.

Das neueſte Werk Schellings muß als ſehr gelungen bezeichnet werden. Vor allem iſt es recht originell in Anlage und Durchführung; es webt eine ſtarke und ſympathiſche Stimmung darin, und die meiſten dieſer „perſönlichen Eindrücke" nehmen ſich in Wirklichkeit als „Erlebtes" aus. Das verleiht dem Werk ein Moment wohltuender Friſche und Ungezwungenheit, zudem das Geſetz der wirkenden Kontraſte faſt durchweg ſehr effektvoll eingehalten iſt. Die einzelnen Teile ſind ſelbſtverſtändlich nicht ganz gleichwertig, ich wüßte aber keines davon anzugeben, das beim erſten Anhören ermüden oder gar verſtimmen ſollte. Durchweg iſt die Stimmung wechſelvoll und treffend wiedergegeben, in einigen ſchwebt ſogar ein Moment ſtarker Perſönlichkeit darüber.

Das Hauptthema iſt ſtark und brauchbar, in ſeinem intermittierenden Gange mit den ganz modernen Intervallenſchritten plaſtiſch und variiert genug, um das Umwenden und Umkrempeln zu geſtatten. Die Orcheſtrierung iſt farbig und wechſelvoll, die einzelnen Inſtrumente, welche faſt alle konzertierend eingeführt werden, ſind ſehr wirkſam, zum Teil meiſterhaft behandelt. Ganz erleſen iſt die dem Piano zugedachte, dankbare Partie, deren Möglichkeiten ſich der am Flügel ſitzende Komponiſt auch nicht entgehen ließ. Eine Beſprechung im Einzelnen wäre nach dem Geſagten wohl verführeriſch, ſcheitert jedoch vorläufig an den dieſer Beſprechung geſetzten räumlichen Grenzen. Man wird das ſtimmungsvolle Werk aber gerne wieder hören.

Der Erfolg der etwa 42 Minuten

---

ess: New York City
JAN 7 - 1916

NOVELTY BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

New Composition by Ernest Schelling Played at Concert in Carnegie Hall.

With an American novel as a special attraction, the Boston Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, gave a concert last night in Carnegie Hall. Ernest Shelling, composer of the new work, also was a soloist, playing the piano part of his own composition, which was called "Impressions (from an Artist's Life) in form of Vaviations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte."

While the Impressions did not turn to be inspired or impressive music th were in part at least, very cleverly w ten. Writing of his purpose the compo said:—"The variations are impressi of personalities, or places, of happeni as they happened to strike my imagi tion." After each variation an initial name appeared. Among them were O. S." meaning (Boston Symphony chestra); K. M. (Karl Muck), F. S. (composer's father), L. S. (his wife), A. (Anna Pavlova), I. J. P. (Paderewski), G. (Enrique Granados) Fr. Kr. (F Kreisler), and G. L. (George Longy).

Sir Edward Elgar has written variations similarly annotated, and the spirit of the work is a little reminiscent of Fuchs; variations written in imitation of various composers. The different parts had little connection with each other. It would have required a careful study of the score to have followed the original theme in some of the sections. That alone showed cleverness. How any man could have made the same theme, if he really did use the same theme, sound like an Irish jig, an Oriental dance, a Siciliano, a Habanera, a Lutheran choral and a dozen other unrelated things is difficult to understand.

There were twenty variations in all, and eighteen were played. Some of them were interesting and some were not. Nearly all had rhythmic variety and charm. Not all of the sections were exactly appropriate to the subject, but surely the one inscribed to Dr. Muck had an appropriate inscription, "Rather martial, precise in rhythm, incisive." That is the impression that the average Boston Symphony subscriber has of the conductor. The one inscribed to Mr. Longy, first oboe player of the orches evidently was not quite appreciated by as he failed to play the oboe solo in it his usual technical skill and perfect tonation. Among the best variations those inscribed to the composer's fa and Paderewski.

Clever if not very musical was a Va tion marked August, 1914, a bit of gramme music picturing war and th to arms. The Lutheran choral at th was not entirely a fitting close, as choral in the brass sounded empty ins of full in its loudness, and the loud cra of percussion instruments only serve cover this defect. There was little ori orchestral color, though some of the vidual players had parts of unusual culty. The piano part which Mr. Sche played was not in reality a solo, but a nately an obligato to the orchestra an accompaniment to some solo instrument. It was received with prolonged applause though not with the enthusiasm which followed the symphony.

Beethoven's sixth symphony, played with astonishing beauty of tone, preceded and Dukas' skilfully scored and brilliant "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" followed the Variations.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date

Boston Symphony Has Schelling as Soloist

THE chief feature of the programme played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall was not the well-known and ingenuous "Pastoral" Symphony of Beethoven, with its cuckoo calls, its rustic dances and mock storm.

Nor was it the fanciful and ever-welcome "Sorcerer's Apprentice" Scherzo of Dukas, which had been heard here often.

It was something different, very different, though not better, in the shape of a set of strange and "characteristic" Variations on a short theme invented by Ernest Schelling, who himself performed the chief solo parts at the piano.

"Characteristic" does not quite describe these Variations. "Impressionistic" would, perhaps, be more appropriate. Mr. Schelling has done something once achieved in a similar way by Sir Edward Elgar. But the Englishman was vastly more successful in his work than his German-American (or, shall we not say, American) emulator.

The theme of Mr. Schelling was soon lost and merged in fantastic broideries of many curious patterns. There were altogether nineteen variations, supposed to suggest to the composer what they only sometimes could suggest to the public, the personalities of this or that acquaintance or memories of places and events which had left impressions on his mind.

The musical results throughout were technically interesting; while now and then, as in one variation

---

From PO
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 2 - 19

Musical Event

DR. MUCK has arranged a p gram of unusual beauty a interest for the third conc of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given at the National Tuesday afternoon, January 4. As already announced, it contains an important novelty, a set of variations for orchestra and piano by Ernest Schelling, and Mr. Schelling himself will play the piano part. This work had its first performance in Boston Friday.

The symphony will be Mozart's in E flat. Another important work on the program will be the remarkable symphonic poem of the Russian Rachmaninoff, "The Island of the Dead," which was inspired by Arnold Bochlin's great picture of the same name. The other number will be Berloiz's "Roman Carnival" overture.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Musical Fraternity

THE visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the coincident reception to our own orchestra by Mr. Van Rensselaer, at which the visitors were guests, gave occasion for the manifestation of that freemasonry in music of which there cannot be too many examples. "We are not rivals, we are artists," a great violinist said, when a comparison was suggested between himself and another eminent player. Too often the prima donna or the conductor is at daggers drawn with a professional colleague. The tense, nervous atmosphere of the stage seems to engender petty jealousies. The star and the leading lady who engage in an impassioned love scene quarrel in the wings. The musical art that by its very nature should be conducive to spiritual harmony gives rise to fierce disputes for primacy; but these bickerings are born not of the art itself, but of that strange, inscrutable possession known as "temperament." It is a fortunate circumstance for music in this city that good feeling subsists between the orchestral players and the management; and no man has been more assiduous in cultivating these friendly relations than Mr. Van Rensselaer. The presentation of the loving-cups to him was not an empty ceremonial.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

MELBA ON BOSTON PROGRAM

Soprano Sings with Dr. Muck's Orchestra—Mozart Concerto Given.

To the popular ear it doubtless seemed last night that Mme. Nellie Melba was the glistening star of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third program at the Academy of Music. The famous soprano had her moments of pulsating loveliness, and was radiant to look on; she attacked Handel's "Sweet Bird" and two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro" with all the zest, if not all the freshness, of a maiden; she was sincere and vigorous and hard working throughout; but the truth is that there were times when the thin silver of her voice was alloyed ignobly. Forced tone and ejaculatory method made themselves plain, even when ingeniously covered with the artifices of which Mme. Melba still is mistress, just as she still is mistress of her auditors, drawing fervor from them by a sheer graciousness and quaint almost-ld-fashionedness, that in itself atones or many lacks.

To the sensitive ear, the "big scene" (as we say at the play) of the evening was the playing by Messrs. Witek and Ferir of the Mozart symphonic concerto. The marriage of violin and viola rarely has been consummated with finer suavity, more strength and delicacy and purity, rising at points to an interpretation of Tschaikowsky's most worshipped idol that was purging and holy in its beauty.

The concerto, in fact, ousted the symphony of the occasion, Haydn's First, from the central position, though the latter was read most delightfully by Dr. Muck, who evidently was in a reactionary mood when he mapped the program. The last number was Mendelssohn's "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 8 - 1916

TO MAKE BALTIMORE DEBUT

Pianist Schelling A Feature Of The Boston Symphony Concert.

Ernest Schelling, one of the eminent pianists of the day, will make his Baltimore debut tonight, when he will appear at the Lyric as soloist at the third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing his own symphonic variations.

This number is said to be particularly interesting. It is not a concerto in the generally accepted sense of the word, being more in the nature of a symphonic poem in which not only the piano but other instruments are given solo parts.

The symphony selected by Dr. Karl Muck, the director, is the beautiful one by Haydn in E flat, and the other numbers will be Richard Strauss' tone

---

BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 4 - 1916

Boston Symphony

Third Concert of the Season, With Madame Melba as Soloist

MAKING her farewell appearance of the season, Madame Melba was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the third of its thirty-fifth series of concerts in this city, at the Academy of Music last evening, giving two numbers on a program which was purely of a classical nature, with Haydn, Handel, Mozart and Mendelssohn as the composers represented. Haydn's Symphony in E flat major, which was composed for the memorable Salomon concerts in London, where it was played at one of these concerts in 1795, was the opening number, and while it might not be called the most ingratiating of Haydn's symphony works, it nevertheless is of great beauty, which had a radiant realization in the interpretation given under Dr. Muck's comprehensive if rather unanimated leadership, [illegible] evening. There was real joy in listening to the andante, so exquisitely was its charm of melodious simplicity disclosed, although it is scarcely necessary to mention one part where all was so well done.

Even more to the liking of the audience, however, seemed to be the orchestra's second number, Concertante Symphonie for Violin and Viola, by Mozart, with the solo instruments played respectively by A. Witek, the concertmeister, and E. Ferir, the first viola player. This work is in the form of a duet for the violin and viola, although their voices are combined in comparatively few phrases, most notably in the second part, the andante, where for a moment they sing ecstatically together. Their colloquy, however, is delightfully carried on throughout, to the harmonious accompaniment of oboes, horns and strings, the presto movement, the finale being more in the true Mozart spirit of spontaneous melodization than those that precedt it.

The composition enabled Mr. Witek to give further demonstration of his highly artistic ability as a solo violinist, in addition to his oft-recognized skill as concertmeister, and introduced Mr. Ferir as master of a modest instrument, which, blending its tonal beauty in the rich alto of the string choir, seldom is permitted to lift its mellow-sweet voice in song by itself. The audience gave both artists an enthusiastic demonstration of its admiration.

The orchestra's third offering of the evening was the overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, a glowing example of descriptive music, which was suggested to Mendelssohn by a poem of Goethe, and which he repudiated later, after he had experienced an ocean voyage during which "calm sea" was not a term accurately to describe the actions of the waves. Nevertheless, the music is tonally delineative and melodiously beautiful in its suggestion of murmuring ocean and soft breeze, with the joyous culmination of a safe arrival in port, and the composition was the fitting last number on a program unmarred by aught of "modern" inharmoniousness.

Melba sang first Handel's aria, "Sweet Bird that Shunst the Noise of Folly," and as her second number the Countess's aria, "Porgi Amor," from "Le Nozze di Figaro," Mozart, and the song of Cherubino, "Voi, Che Sapete," from the same opera. The soprano, looking quite youthful and wholly charming in her becoming gown of cerise silk, with white bodice and a scarf of white tulle about her shoulders, was given such an ovation as must have been gratifying to her, even after the many triumphs of her long ful as in years agone. It is not to be lightful as in years agone. It is not to be expected that this wonderful voice should to-day have lost none of its first beauty, but it is still matchless, and in some respects more appealing than ever.

The "Sweet Bird" aria of Handel was sung by Melba, with the Boston Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, February 18, 1907, and while now there is a little nearer approach to thinness in some of her upper tones, where there is not the same limpid facility in florid passages, much of the same purity and sweetness are there, the middle and lower tones being even more mellow and warm. It was in the Mozart arias that Melba was most effective last evening, however, the Cherubino number being flawless in tonal beauty and execution.

After this number, the applause was so enthusiastic and so prolonged that, when Melba had returned to the stage five or six times, Dr. Muck appeared to resent the ardor of the audience, and refused to begin the final orchestral selection, turning his back and carelessly conversing with some of the musicians; this, too, after the applause had died down and there was ample opportunity for him to return to his stand. Even going so far as to motion one of the musicians to rise, so that he mhiht have a chair, the conductor sat down, still ignoring the audience, and continued his conversation, while Melba, evidently not knowing what else to do, twice came back and made a few bows. While it must be admitted that the matter of applause for a soloist is overdone, and that it might have somewhat too prolonged last even he enthusiasm upon the farewell ap nce of an artist of Melba's popular is entirely justified. The same can said, however, of Dr. Muck's atti owards a representative audience, ty which the Boston Orchestra has regularly for thirty-four years, which he invariably has been re with courtesy and appreciation.

[79]

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York Cit
Date JAN

Boſtoner Symphonie-Ko

Dr. Muck hat uns geſtern in Hall einen vollen Genuß geboten, vor Allem der unvergleichlich liebe glänzend gebrachten Ausgeſtaltu Beethoven's „Paſtoral"-Sympho ſchreiben muß. Dieſe ſechſte in der Neunzahl des Altmeiſters iſt gerade diejenige, welche die meiſten Falten zeigt, — ſo wiedergegeben wie geſtern, wirkt ſie jedoch wie neu — ſchön und ſo friſch, als ob ſie erſt vom Himmel gefallen wäre. Mit wonnigem Behagen malte Muck die Glücksempfindung bei der Ankunft auf dem Lande. Wir genießen mit ihm und ſeinem Meiſterorcheſter die liebliche Szene am Bach. Das Grünen und Blühen der Natur, die wonnigen Stimmen aus dem Vogelreiche. Wir folgen ihm mit Vergnügen auf den Tanzboden; wir genießen — ſit venia verbo — das Gewitterchen, das zur Zeit des Entſtehens der Symphonie als ſo ungemein realiſtiſch empfunden wurde, — ſchließlich ſchlägt uns der innige, gemütvolle Hirtengeſang des Alegretto in ſeine Bande. Es war eine wonnige Halbſtunde, für die wir dem Dirigenten und ſeiner Schar zu wirklichem Dank verbunden ſind.

Von ragender Virtuoſität, in den Farben dabei ungemein fein und ſtiliſtiſch gedämpft, war die Waſſerkalamität in Dukas' „Zauberlehrling" erfüllt. Man weiß, wie die Boſtoner derlei Sachen ſpielen können, und die geſtrige Darbietung war eine der glänzendſten Leiſtungen, deren man ſich erinnern kann.

Als Neuheit führte uns Dr. Muck Erneſt Schelling's neueſtes Werk mit dem Komponiſten am Piano vor. Der Künſtler nennt ſeine Arbeit „Eindrücke (aus einem Künſtlerleben) in Form von Variationen über ein Originalthema für Orcheſter und Pianoforte", und zwar iſt das Werk, das urſprünglich 19 Variationen enthält, im Verlauf der letzten zwei Jahre entſtanden. Wir zitieren den Komponiſten zur Charakteriſierung ſeines Werkes wie folgt: Das Originalthema Gis-Moll, Sechsachteltakt, iſt für Violinen und Bratſchen uniſono geſchrieben mit ornamentalen Figiren des Piano über Fermaten geführt.

„Die Variationen geben Eindrücke von Perſönlichkeiten, von Plätzen und Begebenheiten wieder, welche meine Phantaſie angeregt haben. Ich habe den einzlnen Variationen gewöhnlich ein Wort oder Initialen beigefügt, welche die Zuhörer manchmal intereſſieren ſollten, manchmal auch nicht.

Variation No. 1 iſt für Holzbläſer geſchrieben. Als ich dieſen Teil ſchrieb, hatte ich nur einen Klang in meinem Ohr: den des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters. Das erklärt die beigefügten Initialen B. S. O."

Von den übrigen Variationen will ich folgende anführen: No. 3 „Klarinette Octinato. Savoyard (Patre). No. 4 für Violincelliſoli und drei Flöten, mit Piano- und Streicherbegleitung. (Zur Erinnerung an Hans Pfitzer. Dem Schreiber dieſes iſt es übrigens nicht bekannt, daß Hans Pfitzer, der bekannte Komponiſt des „Armen Heinrich" und der „Roſe vom Liebesgarten", der Lehrer von Erneſt Schelling, geſtorben ſei.

Weitere Teile ſind No. 8, „Habanera Arragoneſe" für volles Orcheſter (A. P.), No. 12 „Hornſolo und Piano" (E. G.), No. 13 für volles Orcheſter (zum Andenken an Guſtav Mahler), No. 17a für volles Orcheſter (Auguſt 1914), welche Variation den Todeszug der Legionen dem Sieg oder dem Untergang entgegen malen ſoll; No. 18a für volles Orcheſter („Afghan") und No. 19 „Lutheriſcher Choral" (Wartburg 1905). Die Variationen No. 11 und No. 17 wurden bei der geſtrigen Aufführung weggelaſſen.

Das neueſte Werk Schellings muß als ſehr gelungen bezeichnet werden. Vor allem iſt es recht originell in Anlage und Durchführung; es webt eine ſtarke und ſympathiſche Stimmung darin, und die meiſten dieſer „perſönlichen Eindrücke" nehmen ſich in Wirklichkeit als „Erlebtes" aus. Das verleiht dem Werk ein Moment wohltuender Friſche und Ungezwungenheit, zudem das Geſetz der wirkenden Kontraſte faſt durchweg ſehr effektvoll eingehalten iſt. Die einzelnen Teile ſind ſelbſtverſtändlich nicht ganz gleichwertig, ich wüßte aber keines davon anzugeben, das beim erſten Anhören ermüden oder gar verſtimmen ſollte. Durchweg iſt die Stimmung wechſelvoll und treffend wiedergegeben, in einigen ſchwebt ſogar ein Moment ſtarker Perſönlichkeit darüber.

Das Hauptthema iſt ſtark und brauchbar, in ſeinem intermittierenden Gange mit den ganz modernen Intervallenſchritten plaſtiſch und variiert genug, um das Umwenden und Umkrempeln zu geſtatten. Die Orcheſtrierung iſt farbig und wechſelvoll, die einzelnen Inſtrumente, welche faſt alle konzertierend eingeführt werden, ſind ſehr wirkſam, zum Teil meiſterhaft behandelt. Ganz erleſen iſt die dem Piano zugedachte, dankbare Partie, deren Möglichkeiten ſich der am Flügel ſitzende Komponiſt auch nicht entgehen ließ. Eine Beſprechung im Einzelnen wäre nach dem Geſagten wohl verführeriſch, ſcheitert jedoch vorläufig an den dieſer Beſprechung geſetzten räumlichen Grenzen. Man wird das ſtimmungsvolle Werk aber gerne wieder hören.

Der Erfolg der etwa 42 Minut

From
Address: New York City
Date JAN 7 - 1916

NOVELTY BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

◆

New Composition by Ernest Schelling Played at Concert in Carnegie Hall.

◆

With an American novel as a special attraction, the Boston Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, gave a concert last night in Carnegie Hall. Ernest Shelling, composer of the new work, also was a soloist, playing the piano part of his own composition, which was called "Impressions (from an Artist's Life) in form of Vaviations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte."

While the Impressions did not turn out to be inspired or impressive music they were in part at least, very cleverly written. Writing of his purpose the composer said:—"The variations are impressions of personalities, or places, of happenings as they happened to strike my imagination." After each variation an initial or name appeared. Among them were "B. O. S." meaning (Boston Symphony Orchestra); K. M. (Karl Muck), F. S. (the composer's father), L. S. (his wife), A. P. (Anna Pavlova), I. J. P. (Paderewski), E. G. (Enrique Granados) Fr. Kr. (Fritz Kreisler), and G. L. (George Longy).

Sir Edward Elgar has written variations similarly annotated, and the spirit of the work is a little reminiscent of Fuchs; variations written in imitation of various composers. The different parts had little connection with each other. It would have required a careful study of the score to have followed the original theme in some of the sections. That alone showed cleverness. How any man could have made the same theme, if he really did use the same theme, sound like an Irish jig, an Oriental dance, a Siciliano, a Habanera, a Lutheran choral and a dozen other unrelated things is difficult to understand.

There were twenty variations in all, and eighteen were played. Some of them were interesting and some were not. Nearly all had rhythmic variety and charm. Not all of the sections were exactly appropriate to the subject, but surely the one inscribed to Dr. Muck had an appropriate inscription, "Rather martial, precise in rhythm, incisive." That is the impression that the average Boston Symphony subscriber has of the conductor. The one inscribed to Mr. Longy, first oboe player of the orchestra, evidently was not quite appreciated by him as he failed to play the oboe solo in it with his usual technical skill and perfect intonation. Among the best variations were those inscribed to the composer's father and Paderewski.

Clever if not very musical was a Variation marked August, 1914, a bit of programme music picturing war and the call to arms. The Lutheran choral at the end was not entirely a fitting close, as the choral in the brass sounded empty instead of full in its loudness, and the loud crashes of percussion instruments only served to cover this defect. There was little original orchestral color, though some of the individual players had parts of unusual difficulty. The piano part which Mr. Schelling played was not in reality a solo, but alternately an obligato to the orchestra and an accompaniment to some solo instrument. It was received with prolonged applause though not with the enthusiasm which followed the symphony.

Beethoven's sixth symphony, played with astonishing beauty of tone, preceded and Dukas' skilfully scored and brilliant "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" followed the Variations.

◆

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date

Boston Symphony Has Schelling as Soloist

THE chief feature of the programme played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall was not the well-known and ingenuous "Pastoral" Symphony of Beethoven, with its cuckoo calls, its rustic dances and mock storm.

Nor was it the fanciful and ever-welcome "Sorcerer's Apprentice" Scherzo of Dukas, which had been heard here often.

It was something different, very different, though not better, in the shape of a set of strange and "characteristic" Variations on a short theme invented by Ernest Schelling, who himself performed the chief solo parts at the piano.

"Characteristic" does not quite describe these Variations. "Impressionistic" would, perhaps, be more appropriate. Mr. Schelling has done something once achieved in a similar way by Sir Edward Elgar. But the Englishman was vastly more successful in his work than his German-American (or, shall we not say, American) emulator.

The theme of Mr. Schelling was soon lost and merged in fantastic broideries of many curious patterns. There were altogether nineteen variations, supposed to suggest to the composer what they only sometimes could suggest to the public, the personalities of this or that acquaintance or memories of places and events which had left impressions on his mind.

The musical results throughout were technically interesting; while now and then, as in one variation

---

PO
s: Washington, D. C.
JAN 2 - 1916

Musical Events

DR. MUCK has arranged a program of unusual beauty and interest for the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given at the National Tuesday ~~afternoon~~, January 4. As already announced, it contains an important novelty, a set of variations for orchestra and piano by Ernest Schelling, and Mr. Schelling himself will play the piano part. This work had its first performance in Boston Friday.

The symphony will be Mozart's in E flat. Another important work on the program will be the remarkable symphonic poem of the Russian Rachmaninoff, "The Island of the Dead," which was inspired by Arnold Bochlin's great picture of the same name. The other number will be Berloiz's "Roman Carnival" overture.

PUBLIC LEDGER
s: Philadelphia, Pa.

Musical Fraternity

THE visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the coincident reception to our own orchestra by Mr. Van Rensselaer, at which the visitors were guests, gave occasion for the manifestation of that freemasonry in music of which there cannot be too many examples. "We are not rivals, we are artists," a great violinist said, when a comparison was suggested between himself and another eminent player. Too often the prima donna or the conductor is at daggers drawn with a professional colleague. The tense, nervous atmosphere of the stage seems to engender petty jealousies. The star and the leading lady who engage in an impassioned love scene quarrel in the wings. The musical art that by its very nature should be conducive to spiritual harmony gives rise to fierce disputes for primacy; but these bickerings are born not of the art itself, but of that strange, inscrutable possession known as "temperament." It is a fortunate circumstance for music in this city that good feeling subsists between the orchestral players and the management; and no man has been more assiduous in cultivating these friendly relations than Mr. Van Rensselaer. The presentation of the loving-cups to him was not an empty ceremonial.

EVENING TELEGRAM
Philadelphia, Pa.

MELBA ON BOSTON PROGRAM

Soprano Sings with Dr. Muck's Orchestra—Mozart Concerto Given.

To the popular ear it doubtless seemed last night that Mme. Nellie Melba was the glistening star of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third program at the Academy of Music. The famous soprano had her moments of pulsating loveliness, and was radiant to look on; she attacked Handel's "Sweet Bird" and two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro" with all the zest, if not all the freshness, of a maiden; she was sincere and vigorous and hard working throughout; but the truth is that there were times when the thin silver of her voice was alloyed ignobly. Forced tone and ejaculatory method made themselves plain, even when ingeniously covered with the artifices of which Mme. Melba still is mistress, just as she still is mistress of her auditors, drawing fervor from them by a sheer graciousness and quaint almost-old-fashionedness, that in itself atones for many lacks.

To the sensitive ear, the "big scene" (as we say at the play) of the evening was the playing by Messrs. Witek and Ferir of the Mozart symphonic concerto. The marriage of violin and viola rarely has been consummated with finer suavity, more strength and delicacy and purity, rising at points to an interpretation of Tschaikowsky's most worshipped idol that was purging and holy in its beauty.

The concerto, in fact, ousted the symphony of the occasion, Haydn's First, from the central position, though the latter was read most delightfully by Dr. Muck, who evidently was in a reactionary mood when he mapped the program. The last number was Mendelssohn's "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN

TO MAKE BALTIMORE DE

Pianist Schelling A Feature O Boston Symphony Conce

Ernest Schelling, one of the e pianists of the day, will ma Baltimore debut tonight, when appear at the Lyric as soloist at the third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing his own symphonic variations.

This number is said to be particularly interesting. It is not a concerto in the generally accepted sense of the word, being more in the nature of a symphonic poem in which not only the piano but other instruments are given solo parts.

The symphony selected by Dr. Karl Muck, the director, is the beautiful one by Haydn in E flat, and the other numbers will be Richard Strauss' tone

---

LETIN
Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 4 - 1916

Boston Symphony

Third Concert of the Season, With Madame Melba as Soloist

MAKING her farewell appearance of the season, Madame Melba was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the third of its thirty-fifth series of concerts in this city, at the Academy of Music last evening, giving two numbers on a program which was purely of a classical nature, with Haydn, Handel, Mozart and Mendelssohn as the composers represented. Haydn's Symphony in E flat major, which was composed for the memorable Salomon concerts in London, where it was played at one of these concerts in 1795, was the opening number, and while it might not be called the most ingratiating of Haydn's symphony works, it nevertheless is of great beauty, which had a radiant realization in the interpretation given under Dr. Muck's comprehensive if rather unanimated leadership, last evening. There was real joy in listening to the andante, so exquisitely was its charm of melodious simplicity disclosed; although it is scarcely necessary to mention one part where all was so well done.

Even more to the liking of the audience, however, seemed to be the orchestra's second number, Concertante Symphonie for Violin and Viola, by Mozart, with the solo instruments played respectively by A. Witek, the concertmeister, and E. Ferir, the first viola player. This work is in the form of a duet for the violin and viola, although their voices are combined in comparatively few phrases, most notably in the second part, the andante, where for a moment they sing ecstatically together. Their colloquy, however, is delightfully carried on throughout, to the harmonious accompaniment of oboes, horns and strings, the presto movement, the finale being more in the true Mozart spirit of spontaneous melodization than those that precedt it.

The composition enabled Mr. Witek to give further demonstration of his highly artistic ability as a solo violinist, in addition to his oft-recognized skill as concertmeister, and introduced Mr. Ferir as master of a modest instrument, which, blending its tonal beauty in the rich alto of the string choir, seldom is permitted to lift its mellow-sweet voice in song by itself. The audience gave both artists an enthusiastic demonstration of its admiration.

The orchestra's third offering of the evening was the overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, a glowing example of descriptive music, which was suggested to Mendelssohn by a poem of Goethe, and which he repudiated later, after he had experienced an ocean voyage during which "calm sea" was not a term accurately to describe the actions of the waves. Nevertheless, the music is tonally delineative and melodiously beautiful in its suggestion of murmuring ocean and soft breeze, with the joyous culmination of a safe arrival in port, and the composition was the fitting last number on a program unmarred by aught of "modern" inharmoniousness.

Melba sang first Handel's aria, "Sweet Bird that Shunst the Noise of Folly," and as her second number the Countess's aria, "Porgi Amor," from "Le Nozze di Figaro," Mozart, and the song of Cherubino, "Voi, Che Sapete," from the same opera. The soprano, looking quite youthful and wholly charming in her becoming gown of cerise silk, with white bodice and a scarf of white tulle about her shoulders, was given such an ovation as must have been gratifying to her, even after the many triumphs of her long ful as in years agone. It is not to be lightful as in years agone. It is not to be expected that this wonderful voice should to-day have lost none of its first beauty, but it is still matchless, and in some respects more appealing than ever.

The "Sweet Bird" aria of Handel was sung by Melba, with the Boston Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, February 18, 1907, and while now there is a little nearer approach to thinness in some of her upper tones, where there is not the same limpid facility in florid passages, much of the same purity and sweetness are there, the middle and lower tones being even more mellow and warm. It was in the Mozart arias that Melba was most effective last evening, however, the Cherubino number being flawless in tonal beauty and execution.

After this number, the applause was so enthusiastic and so prolonged that, when Melba had returned to the stage five or six times, Dr. Muck appeared to resent the ardor of the audience, and refused to begin the final orchestral selection, turning his back and carelessly conversing with some of the musicians; this, too, after the applause had died down and there was ample opportunity for him to return to his stand. Even going so far as to motion one of the musicians to rise, so that he mhiht have a chair, the conductor sat down, still ignoring the audience, and continued his conversation, while Melba, evidently not knowing what else to do, twice came back and made a few bows. While it must be admitted that the matter of applause for a soloist often is overdone, and that it might have been somewhat too prolonged last evening, the enthusiasm upon the farewell appearance of an artist of Melba's popularity was entirely justified. The same cannot be said, however, of Dr. Muck's attitude towards a representative audience, in a city which the Boston Orchestra has visited regularly for thirty-four years, and in which he invariably has been received with courtesy and appreciation.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 4 - 1916
Established:

THIRD CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck Gives a Masterly Reading of Haydn's E Flat Symphony—Melba the Soloist.

Haydn—Symphony in E Flat (B. & H. No. 1).
Handel—Aria, "Sweet Bird."
Mozart—Double Concerto for violin and viola and orchestra. Violin, Mr. Witek; viola, Mr. Ferir.
Mozart—Two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro."
(a) Porgi Amor.
(b) Voi che sapete.
Mendelssohn—Overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage."

Conductor	Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist	Madame Melba

The Boston Symphony's third program of the season last evening was one delight from start to finish, not only in the perfect playing of this great body of musicians, but in the variety presented in the program, in which Madame Melba appeared as the soloist, and two prominent members of the orchestra, Mr. Witek, the concertmeister, and Mr. Ferir, the first violinist, played a concerto with the orchestra.

The Symphony was Haydn's E flat, which is unquestionably his most attractive excursion in this form. It was read with that grace and vivacity which is characteristic of all Dr. Muck's interpretations, with an entire absence of anything that was sluggish or inharmonious to mar the general fine effect. This Haydn Symphony is quite familiar to Philadelphia, but it received a new lustre in its delicate handling by the Boston conductor, and it was most voluptuous harmony throughout, especially in the satin finish of the string choir. The entire body played in such a way as to pale criticism.

The Double Concerto.

The reason for such admirable work is understood. Every musician is a master of his instrument, whether he sits in the first chair or the last. Dr. Muck and the Boston management will tolerate no other. That is the secret of the Boston Symphony's success. In order to fully appreciate the material in the orchestra, Dr. Muck gave the audience the opportunity last evening in his second orchestral number, the Mozart Double Concerto, in which Mr. Witek and Mr. Ferir played, and with such finish as to leave a doubt as to which is the greater master. Mr. Witek is undoubtedly the best first violin in America, and Mr. Ferir is entitled to a similar position in a violo section, for he has a most marvelous tone, it makes no difference upon what part of his instrument he plays. The Mozart work exacts much of its interpreters, and both men acquitted themselves admirably and flawlessly.

Bird-like Tones of Melba.

Madame Melba was in excellent voice and spirit. Her old-time power in coloratura was well shown in the brilliant "Sweet Bird" aria by Handel, in which her flute tones were always in perfect unison with the fine work of Mr. Maquarre. In no recital in recent years has Melba displayed her old-time form as in this aria. Her second numbers were also admirably rendered, and she was given an ovation both times she sung, and was recalled repeatedly after her second appearance.

The next Boston Symphony concert will be given on February 14, with Ernest Schelling, pianist, as soloist.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date JAN 2 - 1916
Established 1884

DR. MUCK AND TRADES UNIONISM.

To the Musical Editor of The Tribune.

Sir: Your publication of Dr. Muck's article invites some suggestions that I think may seem pertinent.

I am especially struck with Dr. Muck's misunderstanding of the position of the musical unions in their relation to the development of American music. The doctor seems to believe that the chief and first concern of the musical unions relates to emolument. Now, I am quite confident, after a professional experience of over twenty years, that the individual instrumentalists do not differ in this respect from the conductors themselves.

As a matter of fact, the unions bear the same relation to American music that the protective tariff did to the infant industries of this country years ago. They have made it possible for the cities that the doctor mentions to have good symphony orchestras, composed of musicians who have been trained in America or who have become American citizens and have identified themselves with the aims and purposes of an adopted country. They have done this by denying short-sighted and selfish impresarios the privilege of importing European (or any other foreign) artists whenever resident musicians have been available—and suitable.

As a consequence of this policy every symphony orchestra in the United States, with the single exception of the Boston orchestra, is typically American in its personnel. The Boston orchestra has consistently and persistently maintained its attitude as a stumbling block in the development of musical America. In all the years that it has lived it has not developed an American conductor, and the foreign conductors who have been at the head of that organization would seem to have considered their association with the orchestra as a "financial" arrangement leading to comfortable old age in a European home.

The names of Thomas, Seidl, Herbert, Leopold and Walter Damrosch, Stock and Hadley outweigh, in my opinion, that of Mr. Higginson or any of his European conductors in the help given to this country in nationalizing its muscal expression.

D. EDWARD PORTER
New York, Dec. 12, 1915

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 2 - 1916
Established

* * *

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tomorrow night, January 3, in the Academy of Music, at 8:15. The soloist will be Madame Melba. She is to remain in this country only a few weeks more, as she is leaving at the end of January for Australia, and this will be the last local opportunity to hear her this year.

A very interesting item in the program is Mozart's concertante symphonie for violin and viola and string orchestra. This work has probably not had a public hearing before in Philadelphia. It is distinguished by typical Mozartian beauty, and will enable Philadelphia to hear as soloists two of the most eminent artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Witek, the concert-master, and Mr. Ferir, the leader of the viola section. The program in full is as follows:

Symphony in E flat, B. and H. No. 1	Haydn
Aria, "Sweet Bird"	Handel
Double concerto for violin and viola and orchestra Violin, Mr. Witek; viola, Mr. Ferir.	Mozart
Two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro" (a) Porgi Amor. (b) Voi che sapete.	Mozart
Overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage"	Mendelssohn

* * *

Fritz Kreisler gives a recital at the Academy next Saturday afternoon, January 8, at 2:30.

His program in full is as follows:

Sonata in A major	Handel
Grave in C minor	Friedman Bach
Fugue in A major	Tartini
Fantasy in C major, op. 131	Schumann
Larghetto Lamentoso	Godowsky
Legende	Godowsky
Impromptu	Schubert
Rondine (on a theme by Beethoven)	Kreisler
Mazurka in A minor (posthumous)	Chopin
Variations	Tartini
Indian Lament	Dvorak-Kreisler
Spanish Dance	Granados-Kreisler
Viennese Popular Song	Arr. by Kreisler
Tambourin Chinois	Kreisler

* * *

From Bulletin
Address Providence, R. I.
Date DEC 27 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE ITS THIRD CONCERT HERE

Dr. Karl Muck Will Lead Bostonians To-morrow Evening.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, will be given in Infantry Hall to-morrow evening. Madame Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera Company will be the soloist. It is a number of years since Madame Homer has been heard here with the orchestra. She is on the programme for two numbers. The first will comprise two arias by Gluck, the "Che faro" from "Orpheus and Eurydice," and the "Divinities du Styx" from "Alceste." Her second number will be Delilah's aria from Saint-Saens's opera "Samson and Delilah," "My Heart Opens at Thy Dear Voice."

The programme in full is as follows: "Antar," the symphony by the Russian composer, Rimsky-Korsakoff; "Che faro" by Gluck, and "Divinities du Styx," by Gluck; "Vysehrad," symphonic poem, by the Bohemian composer, Smetana; aria from "Samson and Delilah," by Saint-Saens, and the overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," by Mendelssohn.

EAGLE
From
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 3 - 1916
Established 1884

DISLIKES DR. MUCK'S NUMBERS.

Editor Brooklyn Daily Eagle:

With the echoes of melody heard at the exquisite concert given, this afternoon, by the New York Philharmonic still ringing in my ears I feel moved to make an effort to find someone who will protest with me against the miserable, unmusical programmes offered us by Dr. Muck of the Boston Symphony. The programme, this afternoon, arranged by that most admirable of programme makers, Stransky, was beyond criticism, a musical feast. Why cannot he have the same? Our orchestra certainly is fine enough. There must be many subscribers who think such doses as we were made to swallow at the last concert unbearable. To whom can we make protest for more music?

MUSIC LOVING SUBSCRIBER.
Brooklyn, January 2, 1916.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 4 - 1916
Established

MADAME MELBA SINGS WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Double Concerto of Mozart, for Violin and Viola, Played by Anton Witek and Emil Ferir

PROGRAM

Haydn	Symphony in E flat, No. 1
Handel	"Sweet Bird That Shun'st"
Mozart	Concertante Symphony, Violin and Viola
Mozart	"Porgi Amor" and "Voi, Che Sapete," from "Figaro."
Mendelssohn	Overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage."

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Karl Muck, filled the Academy last evening with an audience that reluctantly bade a present farewell to Madame Melba, who is on her way to Australia. The great singer, who of late has placed her art chiefly at the disposal of the Empire of which she is so loyal a subject, sang with melting beauty of tone and pathetic sincerity the famous Handel aria, "Sweet Bird That Shun'st," and "Porgi Amor" and "Voi, Che Sapete," from "Figaro." Probably she could have chosen no sweeter and more eloquent music. The voice carried the message of the composer with a sympathy which the circumstances intensify. The singer has had her own cross to carry in the loss of those near and dear to her, and it has passed into her art. After each appearance she was recalled again and again. There were found in her singing the wonted grace and ease and simplicity of execution, even in the elaborate mazes of the Handel aria, and the ravishing loveliness of the tone of years ago. In twenty-two seasons of appearances on the American stage the voice has lost neither its cunning nor its feeling. The orchestra accompanied with a rare community of interest, and Andre Maquane played the flute obligato for the Handel music so beautifully that the prima donna brought him forward to share the honors.

The Mozart double concerto for violin and viola played by Anton Witek and Emil Ferir was played with ideal crispness and precision of technique, and oneness of purpose and execution. The theme passed from instrument to instrument as though a single set of strings gave it expression in different registers. In the cadenzas (written by Hellmesberger) that soared out of the first and second movements there was such fullness and freedom of sound it was as though a whole string quartet were playing. The rich and virile tone-coloring of the viola was in sharp contrast to the feminine but never effeminate voice of the violin. The support by the orchestra was masterful. The viola is seldom heard as a solo instrument with the orchestra. When the instrument is handled as Mr. Ferir used it last evening, one is led to wonder at the indifference of so many composers to its possibilities.

The naive and blithe Symphony in E flat major, No. 1, of Haydn was an apt prelude for a program that consistently adhered to the classical pattern. A delicious violin obligato by Mr. Witek was a feature of the slow movement, and the whole work was interpreted by Doctor Muck in a way to bring out to best advantage the spirit of sunny gayety characteristic of the serenest optimist among the writers of music. The mellifluous tranquillities of the Mendelssohn overture at the program's close suitably balanced the initial mood. From the first note to the last—especially in the Mozart concerto—the splendid quality of the tone of the strings was in constant evidence.

E. L. H.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 1 - 1916
Established 1884

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Karl Muck has made a most remarkable program for the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening at 8:15. With the exception of the charming little Symphony of Haydn in E flat, No. 1, the program is decidedly modern, including what many regard as the greatest tone poem of Richard Strauss, Death and Transfiguration, Ernest Schelling's new Symphonic Variations for orchestra and piano, and the diabolically clever Scherzo of the French Paul Dukas, The Sorcerer's Apprentice.

From RESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 4 - 1916
Established:

THIRD CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck Gives a Masterly Reading of Haydn's E Flat Symphony—Melba the Soloist.

Haydn—Symphony in E Flat (B. & H. No. 1).
Handel—Aria, "Sweet Bird."
Mozart—Double Concerto for violin and viola and orchestra. Violin, Mr. Witek; viola, Mr. Ferir.
Mozart—Two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro."
(a) Porgi Amor.
(b) Voi che sapete.
Mendelssohn—Overture, Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage."

Conductor	Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist	Madame Melba

The Boston Symphony's third program of the season last evening was one delight from start to finish, not only in the perfect playing of this great body of musicians, but in the variety presented in the program, in which Madame Melba appeared as the soloist, and two prominent members of the orchestra, Mr. Witek, the concertmeister, and Mr. Ferir, the first violinist, played a concerto with the orchestra.

The Symphony was Haydn's E flat, which is unquestionably his most attractive excursion in this form. It was read with that grace and vivacity which is characteristic of all Dr. Muck's interpretations, with an entire absence of anything that was sluggish or inharmonious to mar the general fine effect. This Haydn Symphony is quite familiar to Philadelphia, but it received a new lustre in its delicate handling by the Boston conductor, and it was most voluptuous harmony throughout, especially in the satin finish of the string choir. The entire body played in such a way as to pale criticism.

The Double Concerto.

The reason for such admirable work is understood. Every musician is a master of his instrument, whether he sits in the first chair or the last. Dr. Muck and the Boston management will tolerate no other. That is the secret of the Boston Symphony's success. In order to fully appreciate the material in the orchestra, Dr. Muck gave the aud- ence the opportunity last evening in h second orchestral number, the Moza Double Concerto, in which Mr. Wite and Mr. Ferir played, and with such finish as to leave a doubt as to whic is the greater master. Mr. Witek is un doubtedly the best first violin in Amer ica, and Mr. Ferir is entitled to a similar position in a violo section, for he has a most marvelous tone, it makes no difference upon what part of his instrument he plays. The Mozart work exacts much of its interpreters, and both men acquitted themselves admirably and flawlessly.

Bird-like Tones of Melba.

Madame Melba was in excellent voice and spirit. Her old-time power in coloratura was well shown in the brilliant "Sweet Bird" aria by Handel, in which her flute tones were always in perfect unison with the fine work of Mr. Maquarre. In no recital in recent years has Melba displayed her old-time form as in this aria. Her second numbers were also admirably rendered, and she was given an ovation both times she sung, and was recalled repeatedly after her second appearance.

The next Boston Symphony concert will be given on February 14, with Ernest Schelling, pianist, as soloist.

From Bulletin
Address Providence, R. I.
Date DEC 27 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE ITS THIRD CONCERT HERE

Dr. Karl Muck Will Lead Bostonians To-morrow Evening.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, will be given in Infantry Hall to-morrow evening. Madame Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera Company will be the soloist. It is a number of years since Madame Homer has been heard here with the orchestra. She is on the programme for two numbers. The first will comprise two arias by Gluck, the "Che faro" from "Orpheus and Eurydice," and the "Divinities du Styx" from "Alceste." Her second number will be Delilah's aria from Saint-Saens's opera, "Samson and Delilah," "My Heart Opens at Thy Dear Voice."

The programme in full is as follow: "Antar," the symphony by the Russia composer, Rimsky-Korsakoff; "Che faro," by Gluck, and "Divinities du Styx," by Gluck; "Vysehrad," symphonic poem, by the Bohemian composer, Smetana; aria from "Samson and Delilah," by Saint-Saens, and the overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," by Mendelssohn.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date JAN 2 - 1916

DR. MUCK AND TRADES UNIONISM.

To the Musical Editor of The Tribune.

Sir: Your publication of Dr. Muck's article invites some suggestions that I think may seem pertinent.

I am especially struck with Dr. Muck's misunderstanding of the position of the musical unions in their relation to the development of American music. The doctor seems to believe that the chief and first concern of the musical unions relates to emolument. Now, I am quite confident, after a professional experience of over twenty years, that the individual instrumentalists do not differ in this respect from the conductors themselves.

As a matter of fact, the unions bear the same relation to American music that the protective tariff did to the infant industries of this country years ago. They have made it possible for the cities that the doctor mentions to have good symphony orchestras, composed of musicians who have been trained in America or who have become American citizens and have identified themselves with the aims and purposes of an adopted country. They have done this by denying short-sighted and selfish impresarios the privilege of importing European (or any other foreign) artists whenever resident musicians have been available—and suitable.

As a consequence of this policy every symphony orchestra in the United States, with the single exception of the Boston orchestra, is typically American in its personnel. The Boston orchestra has consistently and persistently maintained its attitude as a stumbling block in the development of musical America. In all the years that it has lived it has not developed an American conductor, and the foreign conductors who have been at the head of that organization would seem to have considered their association with the orchestra as a "financial" arrangement leading to comfortable old age in a European home.

The names of Thomas, Seidl, Herbert, Leopold and Walter Damrosch, Stock and Hadley outweigh, in my opinion, that of Mr. Higginson or any of his European conductors in the help given to this country in nationalizing its muscal expression.

D. EDWARD PORTER
New York, Dec. 12, 1915

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 2 -

* * *

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tomorrow night, January 3, in the Academy of Music, at 8:15. The soloist will be Madame Melba. She is to remain in this country only a few weeks more, as she is leaving at the end of January for Australia, and this will be the last local opportunity to hear her this year.

A very interesting item in the program is Mozart's concertante symphonie for violin and viola and string orchestra. This work has probably not had a public hearing before in Philadelphia. It is distinguished by typical Mozartian beauty, and will enable Philadelphia to hear as soloists two of the most eminent artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Witek, the concert-master, and Mr. Ferir, the leader of the viola section. The program in full is as follows:

Symphony in E flat, B. and H. No. 1	Haydn
Aria, "Sweet Bird"	Handel
Double concerto for violin and viola and orchestra Violin, Mr. Witek; viola, Mr. Ferir.	Mozart
Two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro" (a) Porgi Amor. (b) Voi che sapete.	Mozart
Overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage"	Mendelssohn

* * *

Fritz Kreisler gives a recital at the cademy next Saturday afternoon, Janu-ry 8, at 2:30.

His program in full is as follows:

onata in A major	Handel
rave in C minor	Friedman Bach
ugue in A major	Tartini
antasy in C major, op. 131	Schumann
Larghetto Lamentoso	Godowsky
Legende	Godowsky
Impromptu	Schubert
Rondino (on a theme by Beethoven)	Kreisler
Mazurka in A minor (posthumous)	Chopin
Variations	Tartini
Indian Lament	Dvorak-Kreisler
Spanish Dance	Granados-Kreisler
Viennese Popular Song	Arr. by Kreisler
Tambourin Chinois	Kreisler

* * *

From
Address
Date JAN 2 16

DISLIKES DR. MUCK'S NUMBERS.

Editor Brooklyn Daily Eagle:

With the echoes of melody heard at the exquisite concert given, this afternoon, by the New York Philharmonic still ringing in my ears I feel moved to make an effort to find someone who will protest with me against the miserable, unmusical programmes offered us by Dr. Muck of the Boston Symphony. The programme, this afternoon, arranged by that most admirable of programme makers, Stransky, was beyond criticism, a musical feast. Why cannot he have the same? Our orchestra certainly is fine enough. There must be many subscribers who think such doses as we were made to swallow at the last concert unbearable. To whom can we make protest for more music?

MUSIC LOVING SUBSCRIBER.
Brooklyn, January 2, 1916.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 4 - 1916

MADAME MELBA SINGS WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Double Concerto of Mozart, for Violin and Viola, Played by Anton Witek and Emil Ferir

PROGRAM

Haydn	Symphony in E flat, No. 1
Handel	"Sweet Bird That Shun'st"
Mozart	Concertante Symphony, Violin and Viola
Mozart	"Porgi Amor" and "Voi, Che Sapete," from "Figaro."
Mendelssohn	Overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage."

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Karl Muck, filled the Academy last evening with an audience that reluctantly bade a present farewell to Madame Melba, who is on her way to Australia. The great singer, who of late has placed her art chiefly at the disposal of the Empire of which she is so loyal a subject, sang with melting beauty of tone and pathetic sincerity the famous Handel aria, "Sweet Bird That Shun'st," and "Porgi Amor" and "Voi, Che Sapete," from "Figaro." Probably she could have chosen no sweeter and more eloquent music. The voice carried the message of the composer with a sympathy which the circumstances intensify. The singer has had her own cross to carry in the loss of those near and dear to her, and it has passed into her art. After each appearance she was recalled again and again. There were found in her singing the wonted grace and ease and simplicity of execution, even in the elaborate mazes of the Handel aria, and the ravishing loveliness of the tone of years ago. In twenty-two seasons of appearances on the American stage the voice has lost neither its cunning nor its feeling. The orchestra accompanied with a rare community of interest, and Andre Maquane played the flute obligato for the Handel music so beautifully that the prima donna brought him forward to share the honors.

The Mozart double concerto for violin and viola played by Anton Witek and Emil Ferir was played with ideal crispness and precision of technique, and oneness of purpose and execution. The theme passed from instrument to instrument as though a single set of strings gave it expression in different registers. In the cadenzas (written by Hellmesberger) that soared out of the first and second movements there was such fullness and freedom of sound it was as though a whole string quartet were playing. The rich and virile tone-coloring of the viola was in sharp contrast to the feminine but never effeminate voice of the violin. The support by the orchestra was masterful. The viola is seldom heard as a solo instrument with the orchestra. When the instrument is handled as Mr. Ferir used it last evening, one is led to wonder at the indifference of so many composers to its possibilities.

The naive and blithe Symphony in E flat major, No. 1, of Haydn was an apt prelude for a program that consistently adhered to the classical pattern. A delicious violin obligato by Mr. Witek was a feature of the slow movement, and the whole work was interpreted by Doctor Muck in a way to bring out to best advantage the spirit of sunny gayety characteristic of the serenest optimist among the writers of music. The mellifluous tranquillities of the Mendelssohn overture at the program's close suitably balanced the initial mood. From the first note to the last—especially in the Mozart concerto—the splendid quality of the tone of the strings was in constant evidence.

F. L. W.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Karl Muck has made a most remarkable program for the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening at 8:15. With the exception of the charming little Symphony of Haydn in E flat, No. 1, the program is decidedly modern, including what many regard as the greatest tone poem of Richard Strauss, Death and Transfiguration, Ernest Schelling's new Symphonic Variations for orchestra and piano, and the diabolically clever Scherzo, of the French Paul Dukas, The Sorcerer's Apprentice.

From RESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 4 - 1916
Established:

THIRD CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck Gives a Masterly Reading of Haydn's E Flat Symphony—Melba the Soloist.

Haydn—Symphony in E Flat (B. & H. No. 1).
Handel—Aria, "Sweet Bird."
Mozart—Double Concerto for violin and viola and orchestra. Violin, Mr. Witek; viola, Mr. Ferir.
Mozart—Two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro."
(a) Porgi Amor.
(b) Voi che sapete.
Mendelssohn—Overture, Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage."
Conductor ....Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist ....Madame Melba

The Boston Symphony's third program of the season last evening was one delight from start to finish, not only in the perfect playing of this great body of musicians, but in the variety presented in the program, in which Madame Melba appeared as the soloist, and two prominent members of the orchestra, Mr. Witek, the concertmeister, and Mr. Ferir, the first violinist, played a concerto with the orchestra.

The Symphony was Haydn's E flat, which is unquestionably his most attractive excursion in this form. It was read with that grace and vivacity which is characteristic of all Dr. Muck's interpretations, with an entire absence of anything that was sluggish or inharmonious to mar the general fine effect. This Haydn Symphony is quite familiar to Philadelphia, but it received a new lustre in its delicate handling by the Boston conductor, and it was most voluptuous harmony throughout, especially in the satin finish of the string choir. The entire body played in such a way as to pale criticism.

The Double Concerto.

The reason for such admirable work is understood. Every musician is a master of his instrument, whether he sits in the first chair or the last. Dr. Muck and the Boston management will tolerate no other. That is the secret of the Boston Symphony's success. In order to fully appreciate the material in the orchestra, Dr. Muck gave the audience the opportunity last evening in his second orchestral number, the Mozart Double Concerto, in which Mr. Witek and Mr. Ferir played, and with such a finish as to leave a doubt as to which is the greater master. Mr. Witek is undoubtedly the best first violin in America, and Mr. Ferir is entitled to a similar position in a violo section, for he has a most marvelous tone, it makes no difference upon what part of his instrument he plays. The Mozart work exacts much of its interpreters, and both men acquitted themselves admirably and flawlessly.

Bird-like Tones of Melba.

Madame Melba was in excellent voice and spirit. Her old-time power in coloratura was well shown in the brilliant "Sweet Bird" aria by Handel, in which her flute tones were always in perfect unison with the fine work of Mr. Maquarre. In no recital in recent years has Melba displayed her old-time form as in this aria. Her second numbers were also admirably rendered, and she was given an ovation both times she sung, and was recalled repeatedly after her second appearance.

The next Boston Symphony concert will be given on February 14, with Ernest Schelling, pianist, as soloist.

From Bulletin
Address Providence, R. I.
Date DEC 27 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE ITS THIRD CONCERT HERE

Dr. Karl Muck Will Lead Bostonians To-morrow Evening.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, will be given in Infantry Hall to-morrow evening. Madame Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera Company will be the soloist. It is a number of years since Madame Homer has been heard here with the orchestra. She is on the programme for two numbers. The first will comprise two arias by Gluck, the "Che faro" from "Orpheus and Eurydice," and the "Divinities du Styx" from "Alceste." Her second number will be Delilah's aria from Saint-Saens's opera, "Samson and Delilah," "My Heart Opens at Thy Dear Voice."

The programme in full is as follows: "Antar," the symphony by the Russian composer, Rimsky-Korsakoff; "Che faro," by Gluck, and "Divinities du Styx," by Gluck; "Vysehrad," symphonic poem, by the Bohemian composer, Smetana; aria from "Samson and Delilah," by Saint-Saens, and the overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," by Mendelssohn.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date JAN 2 - 1916
Established 1884

DR. MUCK AND TRADES UNIONISM.

To the Musical Editor of The Tribune.

Sir: Your publication of Dr. Muck's article invites some suggestions that I think may seem pertinent.

I am especially struck with Dr. Muck's misunderstanding of the position of the musical unions in their relation to the development of American music. The doctor seems to believe that the chief and first concern of the musical unions relates to emolument. Now, I am quite confident, after a professional experience of over twenty years, that the individual instrumentalists do not differ in this respect from the conductors themselves.

As a matter of fact, the unions bear the same relation to American music that the protective tariff did to the infant industries of this country years ago. They have made it possible for the cities that the doctor mentions to have good symphony orchestras, composed of musicians who have been trained in America or who have become American citizens and have identified themselves with the aims and purposes of an adopted country. They have done this by denying short-sighted and selfish impresarios the privilege of importing European (or any other foreign) artists whenever resident musicians have been available—and suitable.

As a consequence of this policy every symphony orchestra in the United States, with the single exception of the Boston orchestra, is typically American in its personnel. The Boston orchestra has consistently and persistently maintained its attitude as a stumbling block in the development of musical America. In all the years that it has lived it has not developed an American conductor, and the foreign conductors who have been at the head of that organization would seem to have considered their association with the orchestra as a "financial" arrangement leading to comfortable old age in a European home.

The names of Thomas, Seidl, Herbert, Leopold and Walter Damrosch, Stock and Hadley outweigh, in my opinion, that of Mr. Higginson or any of his European conductors in the help given to this country in nationalizing its muscal expression.

D. EDWARD PORTER
New York, Dec. 12, 1915.

PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 2 -
Established

* * *

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tomorrow night, January 3, in the Academy of Music, at 8:15. The soloist will be Madame Melba. She is to remain in this country only a few weeks more, as she is leaving at the end of January for Australia, and this will be the last local opportunity to hear her this year.

A very interesting item in the program is Mozart's concertante symphonie for violin and viola and string orchestra. This work has probably not had a public hearing before in Philadelphia. It is distinguished by typical Mozartian beauty, and will enable Philadelphia to hear as soloists two of the most eminent artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Witek, the concert-master, and Mr. Ferir, the leader of the viola section. The program in full is as follows:

Symphony in E flat, B. and H. No. 1	Haydn
Aria, "Sweet Bird"	Handel
Double concerto for violin and viola and orchestra Violin, Mr. Witek; viola, Mr. Ferir.	Mozart
Two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro" (a) Porgi Amor. (b) Voi che sapete.	Mozart
Overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage"	Mendelssohn

* * *

Fritz Kreisler gives a recital at the Academy next Saturday afternoon, January 8, at 2:30.

His program in full is as follows:

Sonata in A major	Handel
Grave in C minor	Friedman Bach
Fugue in A major	Tartini
Fantasy in C major, op. 131	Schumann
Larghetto Lamentoso	Godowsky
Legende	Godowsky
Impromptu	Schubert
Rondino (on a theme by Beethoven)	Kreisler
Mazurka in A minor (posthumous)	Chopin
Variations	Tartini
Indian Lament	Dvorak-Kreisler
Spanish Dance	Granados-Kreisler
Viennese Popular Song	Arr. by Kreisler
Tambourin Chinois	Kreisler

* * *

From
Address
Date JAN 2 1916
Established 1884

DISLIKES DR. MUCK'S NUMBERS.

Editor Brooklyn Daily Eagle:

With the echoes of melody heard at the exquisite concert given, this afternoon, by the New York Philharmonic still ringing in my ears I feel moved to make an effort to find someone who will protest with me against the miserable, unmusical programmes offered us by Dr. Muck of the Boston Symphony. The programme, this afternoon, arranged by that most admirable of programme makers, Stransky, was beyond criticism, a musical feast. Why cannot he have the same? Our orchestra certainly is fine enough. There must be many subscribers who think such doses as we were made to swallow at the last concert unbearable. To whom can we make protest for more music?

MUSIC LOVING SUBSCRIBER.
Brooklyn, January 2, 1916.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 4 - 1916
Establi

MADAME MELBA SINGS WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Double Concerto of Mozart, for Violin and Viola, Played by Anton Witek and Emil Ferir

PROGRAM

Haydn	Symphony in E flat, No. 1
Handel	"Sweet Bird That Shun'st"
Mozart	Concertante Symphony, Violin and Viola
Mozart	"Porgi Amor" and "Voi, Che Sapete," from "Figaro."
Mendelssohn	Overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage."

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Karl Muck, filled the Academy last evening with an audience that reluctantly bade a present farewell to Madame Melba, who is on her way to Australia. The great singer, who of late has placed her art chiefly at the disposal of the Empire of which she is so loyal a subject, sang with melting beauty of tone and pathetic sincerity the famous Handel aria, "Sweet Bird That Shun'st," and "Porgi Amor" and "Voi, Che Sapete," from "Figaro." Probably she could have chosen no sweeter and more eloquent music. The voice carried the message of the composer with a sympathy which the circumstances intensify. The singer has had her own cross to carry in the loss of those near and dear to her, and it has passed into her art. After each appearance she was recalled again and again. There were found in her singing the wonted grace and ease and simplicity of execution, even in the elaborate mazes of the Handel aria, and the ravishing loveliness of the tone of years ago. In twenty-two seasons of appearances on the American stage the voice has lost neither its cunning nor its feeling. The orchestra accompanied with a rare community of interest, and Andre Maquane played the flute obligato for the Handel music so beautifully that the prima donna brought him forward to share the honors.

The Mozart double concerto for violin and viola played by Anton Witek and Emil Ferir was played with ideal crispness and precision of technique, and oneness of purpose and execution. The theme passed from instrument to instrument as though a single set of strings gave it expression in different registers. In the cadenzas (written by Hellmesberger) that soared out of the first and second movements there was such fullness and freedom of sound it was as though a whole string quartet were playing. The rich and virile tone-coloring of the viola was in sharp contrast to the feminine but never effeminate voice of the violin. The support by the orchestra was masterful. The viola is seldom heard as a solo instrument with the orchestra. When the instrument is handled as Mr. Ferir used it last evening, one is led to wonder at the indifference of so many composers to its possibilities.

The naive and blithe Symphony in E flat major, No. 1, of Haydn was an apt prelude for a program that consistently adhered to the classical pattern. A delicious violin obligato by Mr. Witek was a feature of the slow movement, and the whole work was interpreted by Doctor Muck in a way to bring out to best advantage the spirit of sunny gayety characteristic of the serenest optimist among the writers of music. The mellifluous tranquillities of the Mendelssohn overture at the program's close suitably balanced the initial mood. From the first note to the last—especially in the Mozart concerto—the splendid quality of the tone of the strings was in constant evidence.

F. L. W.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date
Esta 1884

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Karl Muck has made a most remarkable program for the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening at 8:15. With the exception of the charming little Symphony of Haydn in E flat, No. 1, the program is decidedly modern, including what many regard as the greatest tone poem of Richard Strauss, Death and Transfiguration, Ernest Schelling's new Symphonic Variations for orchestra and piano, and the diabolically clever Scherzo of the French Paul Dukas, The Sorcerer's Apprentice.

[80]

From STAATSZEITUNG

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date DEC 29 1915

SYMPHONY CONCERT BADLY DISARRANGED

Illness of Dr. Muck, Conductor, Affects Programme.

MME. HOMER ALSO ABSENT

Novelty by Enesco is Substituted for Mendelssohn's Overture as Last Number on Card at Infantry Hall.—Performance Lacking in Unity.

For over 100 years the world has been bearing witness to the truth of the statement made by Bobby Burns, that "the best-laid schemes o' mice and men gang aft agley, and lea'e us nought but grief and pain for promised joy," and it had still another chance last evening, when the programme of special interest promised for the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall, was sadly disarranged by a series of unexpected happenings.

That is not to say that the poet's words must be taken too literally, since the withdrawal of the "promised joy," did not in this case result in "grief and pain," but in a series of disappointments beginning with the announcement in yesterday morning's Journal that Mme. Louise Homer, whose appearance had been eagerly awaited, was prevented by illness from fulfilling her engagement. However, as the management stated that Mr. Joseph Malkin, 'cellist of the orchestra, who had been announced as soloist for the fourth concert, would play in Mme. Homer's place, the audience prepared to enjoy his performance; and while there were a few more empty seats than usual, the storm and the prevailing epidemic may have had an equal share in that effect.

ASSISTANT IS CONDUCTOR.

Before the audience had grasped the significance of a further change in the insertion in the programme announcement was made that on account of a bad cold Dr. Muck would be unable to conduct the orchestra, Mr. Schmidt, assistant conductor, taking his place, which threw light on the substitution of a novelty by Enesco for the last number, Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," so successfully given at a recent concert in Boston.

The programme in its rearrangement was given as follows:

Rimsky-Korsakoff........................
........Symphony No. 2, "Antar," op. 15
I. Largo: Allegretto vivace
II. Allegro
III. Allegro risoluto alla Marcia
IV. Allegretto vivace: Andante amoroso
Saint-Saens........................
..Concerto for Violoncello in A-minor, op. 33
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Allegretto con moto
III. Allegro non troppo.
Smetana ...."Vysehrad"
Symphonic Poem: No. 1 of the Cycle. "Ma Vlast" ("My Country").
Enesco........................
Rhapsodie Roumaine, in A-major, op. 11, No. 1

In spite of the strong Oriental flavor of its orchestral numbers and the comparatively modern quality of the music, the programme seemed lacking in unity, and in its presentation verged more nearly on the commonplace, and showed less distinction than usual.

The "Antar" symphony of Rimsky-Korsakoff, composed nearly 50 years ago, shows the strong influence exerted by the music of the East on the composer. Especially characteristic was its first movement, with the monotonous undertone of the kettledrum at intervals, beneath the Oriental melody of the flute accompanied by harp and horns. It may be that the assistant conductor was a bit nervous, since one felt a lack of precision, a loss of the finer shading demanded by the first number, that was less evident as the symphony progressed.

THIRD MOVEMENT FEATURES.

The third movement, in its brilliant rhythm, was one of the happiest in the work, which, concluding with the measures of an Arabian love song, is full of color, suggestive to the imagination.

Sharing interest with the symphony and superseding it in performance was the concerto for violoncello by Saint-Saens, played by Mr. Malkin. No longer ago than the last concert, the audience had an opportunity to appreciate the demands for delicacy and technical elegance made by the composer in his concerto for the piano; again last evening, with the 'cello as a medium, the themes and their elaboration were given in a masterly manner, with purity and richness of tone and mechanical perfection When such a player as Mr. Malkin gives us of his best on such an instrument the result is likely to be a satisfying performance, worthy of the repeated recalls he received at its conclusion.

Smetana's "Vysehrad" was to many the most enjoyable orchestral performance of the evening, dignified and moving brilliantly to its conclusion, in marked contrast to the concluding number, which was of the "descriptive" order, better adapted to one of the orchestra's "pop" concerts. Its substitution for the Mendelssohn overture made what someone in the audience characterized as its "musical rough-house," less appreciated, perhaps, than it might have been in another connection. Opening with a sort of village theme, sung by the clarinet, soon joined by the oboe, the music grew fast and furious, with occasional interruptions, as when a crowd pauses in its merriment to listen to a brief exhortation or announcement before resuming its frenzied jollity.

The fourth concert in the series will be given on Tuesday evening, Feb. 8.

A. W. C.

From Bulletin
Address Providence, R. I.
Date DEC 27 1915

ORCHESTRAL CLUB OF BOSTON GIVES SUNDAY CONCERTS

Large Audiences Listen to Programmes in Afternoon and Evening at Keith's. — Selections from Lighter Classics Well Played.

The Boston Symphony Orchestral Club, an organization composed of 16 player from the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave two "pop" concerts in Keith's Theatre yesterday afternoon and evening. Both programmes were drawn from the lighter classics and were exceedingly well played. The club is really a miniature symphony orchestra, and is ideally fitted to perform works that are light and delicate in character. But when occasion demanded, a very full and sonorous body of tone is obtained, and the heavier numbers are played with excellent effect.

In Andre Maquarre the club has an able conductor. Also, each member is an artist of many years experience in ensemble playing, so it is not surprising that they play together as one man and seem moved by a common impulse in the artistic conception of whatever they play.

The assisting vocalist, Mme. Margarita Boas of the Boston Opera Company, was unable to appear, owing to illness, her place being filled by soloists from the club, Mr. Cella, harpist, at the matinee, and Mr. Hyde, trumpet soloist, in the evening. In the afternoon the programme was as follows:

Overture, "Oberon," Weber; cornet solo, "Serenade," Schubert, Mr. Heim; "Jewels of the Madonna," (a) intermezzo, (b) waltz, Wolf-Ferrari; harp solo, Mr. Cella; selection, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Hungarian Rhapsodie, No. 2, Liszt; violin solo, Meditation from "Thais," Massenet, Mr. Theodorowicz; "Dance of the Hours," Ponchielli; fantasie, "Aida," Verdi.

The various soloists acquitted themselves admirably. Mr. Heim is one of the few cornetists that believe in quality rather than in quantity of tone, the result being a beautiful performance of his solo. Mr. Theodorowicz also gained applause by his playing of a violin number. It was Mr. Cella, however, that made the greatest impression. The harp requires a master hand to make it unusually interesting as a solo instrument. Lacking possibilities in tone color, the player relies mostly on brilliancy of technique for variety of effect. This is what Mr. Cella had to offer. In clearness and rapidity of finger work his performance was astonishing. Showers of glittering notes and lightning arpeggios sprang in bewildering profusion from beneath his magic fingers. His audience recognized the unusual quality of his work and demanded an encore.

In the evening a larger audience attended, the soloists being Mr. Nagel, 'cello; Mr. Hyde, trumpet, and Mr. Marquarre, flute, besides Messrs. Cella and Theodorowicz. As at the matinee the audience was demonstrative. The order of the programme follows:

Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai, ballet music from the "Queen of Sheba," Goldmark ('cello obligato), Mr. Nagel; selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; harp solo, "Rondo Brilliant," Cella, Mr. Cella; trumpet solo, Mr. Hyde; overture, "Mignon," Thomas; flute solo, "Fantasie," Demersman, Mr. Marquarre; (a) "Largo," Handel (violin obligato), Mr. Theodorowicz, (b) Intermezzo from "Midsummer," Marquarre; operatic selection, "Tannhauser," Wagner.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date DEC 31 1915

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TWO interesting programmes have been arranged by Dr. Karl Muck for the third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, January 6, and Saturday afternoon, January 8. The Thursday evening programme comprises Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, Ernest Schelling's new symphonic Variations for orchestra and piano, with Mr. Schelling as pianist, and Dukas's Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The programme for Saturday afternoon comprises the Brahms Symphony in F major, Enesco's first Rumanian Rhapsody, Rimsky-Korsakoff's poem, "The Island of the Dead," and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JA 1915

Karl Muck has made a most remarkable programme for the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Jan. 7, at 8:15. With the exception of the charming little symphony of Haydn in E flat, No. 1, the programme is decidedly modern, including what many regard as the greatest tone poem of Richard Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration"; Ernest Schelling's new symphonic variations for orchestra and piano and the Roumanian rhapsody of the Roumanian composer, Enesco. Novelties always arouse interest among music lovers, and Mr. Schelling's new symphonic variations are a novelty in the full sense of the word, for they have just had their first performances in Boston. Mr. Schelling has written with extraordinary skill and fancy. They are not a piano concerto by any means, for he makes the piano an integral part of the orchestra, and having written the variations with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in view, he has given incidental solos to all the leaders of the various sections. Mr. Schelling will play the piano part.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
JANUARY 15,

BOSTON HEARS "NEW ENGLAND" IN A SYMPHONY

SYMPHONY HALL—Eleventh afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Ernst Schmidt replacing Karl Muck as conductor, Mme. Nellie Melba soloist, afternoon of Jan. 14. The program:

Edgar Stillman Kelley—Symphony No. 2, "New England," in B-flat minor, op. 33, first time in Boston; Handel—Scena, "Sweet Bird That Shun'st the Noise of Folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderato" (flute obbligato, André Maquarre); Gluck—Ballet suite No. 2 (put together by Gevaert): III. tambourin from "Iphigénie en Aulide," IV. gavotte from "Armide," V. chaconne from "Iphigénie en Aulide" and "Orphée"; Mozart—a, cavatina, "Porgi Amor," Act II., Scene 1 of "Le Nozze di Figaro"; b, canzona, "Voi, che sapete," Act. II., Scene 3 of "Le Nozze di Figaro"; Cherubini—Overture to "Anacreon."

A glance at Mr. Kelley's achievements in music, both in composition and commentary, reveals a sound career. Careful schooling in methods of writing music, experience in the practical application of various sorts of musical theory, painstaking research into the life and works of a great composer, to say nothing of the excellent training to be got from the urging press of newspaper criticism, have all fitted him to set down musical ideas in scholarly and logical fashion, correct according to the canons of the schools. Not that any apology is needed for Mr. Kelley's musical scholarship. His mastery of his craft is plain, and whatever comes to him to say, he can say, clearly and forcefully.

A hearing of his second symphony is convincing of all this ability. Its thoughtful and careful construction is best described by the word German, which in musical matters has come to be synonymous with thoroughness of scholarship. One feels that Mr. Kelley has said, and said well, all that he can say about his subject.

Statement and development of theme come in well-wrought cadences, and generally recapitulation follows in orderly fashion. Admirable, too, is the instinct that led Mr. Kelley to choose the form of a symphony to express his ideas rather than a symphonic poem. As he conceives the New England spirit, the more rigid the form of its musical expression, the truer. So, too, he has kept away from the so-called modern idiom and its colorful harmonies.

Having found that Mr. Kelley says most satisfactorily what he has to give out, the listener naturally slips into an examination of what he says, and in so doing learns promptly the difference between an exercise in symphonic writing and a symphony. Admirable as the form may be—the externals, if you please—what really counts, of course, is the idea behind the music; in this case, the estimate of those ideas cognately expressed in New England traits of character and in his music.

Now, judging from this work, Mr. Kelley's conception of characterizing New England traits is an austerity amounting almost to barrenness. With the mottoes by which each movement is designated no one will have any disposition to quarrel. They are New England, written by a first New Englander, William Bradford, and well calculated to inspire eloquent expression.

Over the lento: allegro appassionato is inscribed: "All great and honorable actions are accompanied with great difficulties; and must be both enterprised and overcome with answerable courages."

It is of course futile to speculate on what great actions Mr. Kelley had in mind when he wrote this movement one might at least surmise that they were not inspired by the [illegible] of human affection which would enterprise a great good to fellowmen.

[81]

The allegretto pastorale is described by Governor Bradford's entry, which says: "Warm and fair weather, the birds sang in the woods most pleasantly." However, there has evidently not been enough warm and fair weather to take the chill off the shady side of the rocks in the pasture. If Mr. Kelley had not treated so freely the thematic material he got from the birds, if he had not put their songs through the German mill of counterpoint, the result would have been happier, for even in New England the birds sing joyously.

"Great lamentation and heaviness" introduces the lento, and in this movement Timothy Swan's funeral hymn tune, "China" is utilized. So imbued with his lugubrious notion regarding New England chaacter is the composer, however, that this melancholy movement is really of the four the most in keeping with its designation.

The key to the allegro con fuoco is supposed to be contained in this sentiment: "The fit way to honor and lament the departed is to be true to one another and to work together bravely for the cause to which living and dead have consecrated themselves." Surely in these words is no repining, but bravery and optimism and a sober joy in living life well,—in short, a description of the true New England traits. Through the conscientious development of Mr. Kelley's themes one seeks fruitlessly for the courage that dares, inspired by the religious faith that brought the first New Englanders, that they might make their worship of God a part of their daily lives.

It was unfortunate that Dr. Muck could not conduct this symphony; he surely would have had a greater appreciation of the meaning of New England than Mr. Schmidt. Too, the first violin section was weakened by the absence of the concert master. Yet making allowance for handicaps the fact remains that the New England portrayed is not the New England that has wrought and achieved gloriously and lives with its full measure of joy.

Mme. Melba had to respond to many recalls because of the pleasure her gratifying voice gave. The fact that her selections were so well known did not militate against the enjoyment in her flawless singing.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

JANUARY 8,

SYMPHONY SALE FOR NEXT YEAR TO BE TAKEN UP

Manager of Orchestra to Arrange With Holders of Seats For Renewals — Receipts at Autumn Auctions Estimated

Ever since the manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra announced last September that the subscription sale of tickets for the Boston concerts would be conducted this year for the last time by auction, and that in the season of 1916-17 the seats in Symphony hall would be sold on a flat-rate basis, the question has been asked here and there what scale of prices would be adopted. When making the announcement, the manager expressed himself as desirous of abolishing the old method on the ground that it was ponderous and antiquated and that it did not accomplish the fairness intended. He declared that the auctioneer, starting each ticket at a nominal price and letting it go to the buyer who offered the largest premium, was no longer the useful public servant he was 30 years ago. For nowadays, he pointed out, subscribers instead of attending the sale and bidding for their locations, leave the whole thing in the hands of a dozen or so ticket brokers.

Arguing further for the retirement of the auctioneer and his hammer, he referred to the success of the flat-rate system in the cities of the tours, noting particularly New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, where subscribers all pay alike and have long so paid, with satisfaction on both sides. At the close of his announcement he urged for acceptance in Boston a scheme of seat allotment that is now working with happy results in New York, whereby the holders of places this year can subscribe for the same places next year and can continue to hold them for as many years as they desire. He remarked that not more than 100 seats in Carnegie hall change owners from season to season, and he urged a similar permanence in Symphony hall.

It is to be supposed, then, that when plans for next season begin to be considered, which ought to be soon, present holders of seats at the 24 Friday afternoon concerts and at the 24 Saturday evening concerts in Boston will be asked whether they want to retain their locations for next year, and necessarily they will at the same time be informed as to the rates they will have to pay for renewal.

There may or there may not be some intricacy in the question as to who the holders of the seats are. Of course no difficulty will arise on this point for those who bought their season tickets at the auction last fall in person. But some difficulty may arise for those—and they are enormously in the majority—who bought through an agent. Does the broker possess the seat, or does the person who purchased it of him possess it? If the broker, then nearly the whole floor plan and a large portion of the balcony plans of Symphony hall will be controlled for years to come by a group whose interest in the concerts is solely a trade interest.

In regard to prices, perhaps the most important point to be determined is whether the subscription rate will be the same or different for the Friday afternoon and the Saturday evening series. For it is well known that under the auction system the matinee subscribers have paid considerably more than have the evening subscribers. And the Friday patrons, though paying more, have received no more in return. In fact, until this year they have been given to understand that they heard only a rehearsal of the program and that the Saturday patrons heard the official presentation of it. The question is, whether the majority ought to be charged extra for the privilege of hearing the program first and for hearing it in the afternoon. Doubtless a social rather than a financial adjustment is needed. If the evening concert were changed from Saturday night to Thursday night, the whole matter might straighten out of itself.

Some figures on the auction sales of last autumn at Symphony hall will throw light on the situation as to the relative demand for the two sets of concerts. The sales, it will be recalled, were held on two pairs of days: Sept. 27 and 28, when the auctioneer put up the seats for Fridays; and on Sept. 30 and Oct. 1, when he put up those for Saturdays. On the first day of each sale, the forward locations were offered at a starting price of $18. On the second day, the rear locations were offered at $10. The actual prices which purchasers, or their agents for them, paid for the better places were from $35.50 to $118 on Fridays; and from $19 to $63 on Saturdays. The prices which they paid for the poorer ranged from $25 to $41 on Fridays; and from $11 to $30 on Saturdays.

The bidding was rather even, and as a rule the prices paid were proportionate to the value of the location. The only bidders who could have been at all disappointed were some who set their desire on the first row of $10 seats. For when they closed with the auctioneer they found they paid as much as the purchasers of the last row of $18 seats. About the average price paid for places on Fridays in the middle of the floor was $72 for the season, or $3 a concert. About the average paid at the sides was $60, or $2.50 a concert. About the average toward the rear or far forward was $48, or $2 a concert. Thus if the manager were to scale the matinee house next season according to the prices paid at the last auction sales, he would ask for the good floor seats something like $3, $2.50 and $2. And if he were to make the evening scale according to the auction, he would charge for the same locations something like $1, $1.50 and $2.

These figures have an interest at this time beyond the community for which Symphony hall is a musical focus. They can be studied profitably by patrons of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the cities of the monthly tours, namely, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. For a reorganization of the scale of prices in certain of these places is said to have been considered, if not positively to have been decided on. Should standardization of prices in all the cities be made, it will be important for subscribers everywhere to understand what are the conditions in the place where the concerts originate. Now a comparison of the present prices in all the cities proves that the $3 rate at the Friday concerts in Boston is the highest anywhere. For in Philadelphia, at the Academy of Music, according to the official circular of the orchestra issued last fall, the highest rate for the season of five concerts is $60 for a box seating five persons, or $2.40 a concert for each person. The rates run from this down to $3.50 for the season, or a little less than 75 cents a concert. In New York, at Carnegie hall, the maximum is the same as in Philadelphia, while the minimum rate is 60 cents a concert. In Baltimore, at the Lyric theater, the maximum is $2 and the minimum $1.50 a concert. The rates in Brooklyn are the same [illegible] in Washington are about the same as those in Baltimore. In all the cities of the monthly tour, the price of single seats, when any are available, is $2.50.

If the highest prices are paid in Boston, so are the lowest. For there are about 50 subscribers for Saturday evenings, located in the rear of the second balcony of Symphony hall, who average $12 for the season, or 50 cents a concert.

Subscribers to concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra and all patrons of orchestral music will be interested to know how much money was paid into the box office at Symphony hall at the two auction sales of two days each last fall. The seats were sold singly, in twos, in threes or in fours, according to the wish of the bidders; and, as has been pointed out, the receipts for Fridays far exceeded those for Saturdays. The totals, based on the figures called out by the auctioneer at the close of each sale, are as follows:

Friday concerts	$100,346.50
Saturday concerts	$65,380.50

These figures may not show the precise amount received from purchasers. For a number of the seats may have been bid in by representatives of the manager of the orchestra and put on sale from the box office window afterwards. Most of such seats were probably for Saturdays, and the effect of subtracting the price of them would only make the difference between the matinee and evening demand even stronger.

Figures regarding the capacity of the halls in which the orchestra regularly plays can be studied to advantage in connection with prices. The capacity of Symphony hall is something over 2500 seats. The capacity of Carnegie hall, New York, is slightly more. The capacity of the Academy of Music in Philadelphia is about 3000 and of the hall in which the orchestra plays in Brooklyn about the same as Symphony hall. The capacity of the New National theater in Washington is only 1900. That of the Lyric theater in Baltimore is set at 2000.

The work of the orchestra includes tours to cities of New England and to cities of the West. In Providence, R. I., the concerts are managed the same as in the cities of the monthly tour. In New Bedford, Mass., Springfield, Mass., Lawrence, Mass., Fall River, Mass., Hartford, Conn., and Portland, Me., the concerts are given for a fixed fee. In troy, N. Y., Rochester, N. Y., Buffalo, N. Y., Cleveland, O., and Detroit, Mich., which are all more or less regularly visited, the concerts are likewise given for a fixed fee and are locally managed. The seven western cities of the October, 1915, tour were visited on the fixed fee plan, about 30,000 people attending in all.

Perhaps the most favored subscribers of the orchestra, price, location of seats and all considered, are those of Cambridge, Mass., who hear eight annual concerts in Sanders theater, Harvard University, for $7. The most favored single ticket buyers are unquestionably those who get seats in the second balcony of Symphony hall on Friday afternoons for 25 cents and those who have a similar privilege in the Academy of Music, Philadelphia. It is said that whatever rearrangement of prices is made the coming season, the 25 cent seats in Boston and Philadelphia will remain.

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 15,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A MELANCHOLY AFTERNOON WITH DR. MUCK AWAY

Once More, Revelation of How Much the Interest of Music and Performance Depends on the Conductor—Mr. Kelley's New Symphony Obscured and Hampered—The Contrasts of Mme. Melba's Singing

DISILLUSION and enlightenment came timely yesterday afternoon to those that like to believe the Symphony Concerts are so "institutional" that they would go on of themselves, whoever might be leading the orchestra. For the whole week an affection of the throat with the consequent fever had kept Dr. Muck from work and the assistant conductor, Mr. Schmidt, had prepared the programme in his stead—Mr. Kelley's new symphony and the other pieces except Mme. Melba's three airs. In actual performance, he disclosed more elasticity of pace and rhythm, more regard for color and contrast and more heed of quality of tone than he has hitherto revealed when Dr. Muck has been disabled; but, outside Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon," the purely orchestral music of the day sounded dull, lifeless and neutral-colored in comparison with the vivid and animating voice that it was easy to believe the absent chief would have given it. Moreover, under Mr. Schmidt's leading, the orchestra seemed no more than a faithful and practised instrument, fulfilling its function as mechanically as a singing disc.

As the conventional phrases go, Mr. Schmidt is a "well-equipped" and "well-schooled" conductor, but in the Symphony concerts he has never yet, outside that same overture to "Anacreon," risen an inch above routine. In spite of his imposing figure, he lacks any sort of personality to impress his forces and his hearers; he wants flexibility and finesse of mind, temperament and hand; in a word, he conducts with very little insight, imagination or enkindled and transmitting feeling. He reads off the score faithfully according to what it bears plainly on the surface; he keeps his band to its work.

A hundred "well-equipped" and "well-schooled" conductors from Petrograd to Paris and from London to San Francisco can conduct in similar fashion. But what would the "Institutional" Symphony Orchestra and the usually engrossing and stimulating Symphony Concerts become under such as they? Both are for the few conductors of the largest and the finest powers, the richest in mind and temperament, the most forceful of personality, the most exacting in work—for Dr. Muck and the few conductors who stand with him in the first rank of their profession. In four years he has lifted and held the Symphony Concerts to their present standards; he has transformed them in his own image; without him or the equivalent of him, they become as they did yesterday, relatively nil.

In a sense with the three dances from Gluck's operas, that were intermezzo between Mme. Melba's numbers, and with the overture to "Anacreon" that ended the concert and that went more animatedly and eloquently than all the rest, it mattered little whether Dr. Muck or Mr. Schmidt was conducting. All four are repertory pieces, heard often "at these concerts" and likely to be heard many times more. But with Mr. Kelley's "New England Symphony," played for the first time in Boston and indeed in the East, the quality of the conductor mattered much, since the music needs all the illumination, enforcement and vitality that re-creating and enhancing performance may give it. When it became apparent that Dr. Muck could neither rehearse the piece nor conduct in it, Mr. Kelley was asked whether he wished Mr. Schmidt to proceed with it or to have it laid over to next winter, since there was no available place for it in the scheme of the remaining concerts of the current season. As most composers, being human and loving their tone-children, would, he preferred immediate performance—unwisely and unhappily, as the outcome proved.

The fate of all new music in first performance depends primarily upon the ability of the conductor to release the underlying melodic voice and to set forth the melodic design of the piece, since therein lies much of its whole being and significance and of whatever beauty and power the composer's resource and imagination may summon. Now it was clear yesterday that Mr. Schmidt in mind and feeling had penetrated hardly an inch below the surface of the symphony as it stood on the engraved page. What Dr. Muck, with his facilities newly and alertly awakened to all things American by his journeys up and down the whole country last year, would almost surely have divined of the spirit, the suggestion, the whole imagery and eloquence of Mr. Kelley's music, Mr. Schmidt never so much as guessed. On that score the "New England Symphony" was voiceless. Worse still, by all the promptings of the engraved page to the understanding mind, his chosen pace, in each movement, except the scherzo of bird-song, clouded the substance and the implication of the music and sorely hampered its progress.

It is an old story that Montemezzi's opera, "L'Amore dei Tre Re" seemed but a poor thing when he who led in it at the first performance on any stage in Milan, mistook nearly all the tempi and that it emerged in New York in true voice and glory only when Mr. Toscanini had penetratingly and imaginatively discerned and applied them. In somewhat similar case stood Mr. Kelley's symphony yesterday. It seemed a poor thing, dry, dun, labored and monotonous under Mr. Schmidt's hand. Under Dr. Muck's by many a suggestion of the score, it might have risen more than once to large and grave eloquence. By the same tokens, the music demands all possible elasticity, all possible application and shadings of color, and all possible play of sensuous feeling that performance can give it by adroit modulation and progression, by rich and luminous quality of tone, by shrewd play with rhythm and accent, by all the means of understanding, imagination and impartment that a conductor like Dr. Muck infuses into none too articulate or freely moving music. It received none of these necessities yesterday. It did not sound with anything akin to what the score suggests is its true voice and significance. It were as unfair to judge it further, as it was to judge "The Loves of Three Kings" by the miscarriage of Milan. Perhaps, and in fair due to Mr. Kelley and his symphony, Dr. Muck may return to it at some future day.

Nor did Mme. Melba's singing add too much to the dubious pleasures of the afternoon. Once and for all, the day has passed wherein she may prudently undertake such ornate and exacting music, lying almost invariably within the uppermost range of her voice as the air of the fluting bird from Händel's setting of Milton's "Il Penseroso" that was her first number. It has been one of her favorite pieces since she came first to the concert stage; she has sung it more than once at the Symphony Concerts in the full vocal glories of her golden noon as the singer whose voice was the loveliest and whose vocal artistry was the easiest, surest and finest of her illustrious generation. Many yesterday recalled her singing of the piece in those radiant nineties and let the echoes of memory replace the thin, sharp and labored tones of the struggling singer.

On the other hand, when Mme. Melba passed to the two airs from Mozart's opera of "Figaro"—the Countess's "Porgi Amor" and the page's "Voi che Sapete"—she summoned many a distinction of her prime. Both pieces, and especially Cherubino's song, lie well within her middle and best-preserved tones—still limpid, edgeless, soft and silvery, tones of a lustrous timbre, a velvety texture and a haunting sweetness, the memory of which will be not the least of the pleasures of song that Mme. Melba has to the heart. All three

One might as least [illegible] that they were not inspired by that glow of human affection which would enterprise a great good to fellowmen.

The allegretto pastorale is described by Governor Bradford's entry, which says: "Warm and fair weather, the birds sang in the woods most pleasantly." However, there has evidently not been enough warm and fair weather to take the chill off the shady side of the rocks in the pasture. If Mr. Kelley had not treated so freely the thematic material he got from the birds, if he had not put their songs through the German mill of counterpoint, the result would have been happier, for even in New England the birds sing joyously.

"Great lamentation and heaviness" introduces the lento, and in this movement Timothy Swan's funeral hymn tune, "China" is utilized. So imbued with his lugubrious notion regarding New England chaacter is the composer, however, that this melancholy movement is really of the four the most in keeping with its designation.

The key to the allegro con fuoco is supposed to be contained in this sentiment: "The fit way to honor and lament the departed is to be true to one another and to work together bravely for the cause to which living and dead have consecrated themselves." Surely in these words is no repining, but bravery and optimism and a sober joy in living life well,—in short, a description of the true New England traits. Through the conscientious development of Mr. Kelley's themes one seeks fruitlessly for the courage that dares, inspired by the religious faith that brought the first New Englanders, that they might make their worship of God a part of their daily lives.

It was unfortunate that Dr. Muck could not conduct this symphony; he surely would have had a greater appreciation of the meaning of New England than Mr. Schmidt. Too, the first violin section was weakened by the absence of the concert master. Yet making allowance for handicaps the fact remains that the New England portrayed is not the New England that has wrought and achieved gloriously and lives with its full measure of joy.

Mme. Melba had to respond to many recalls because of the pleasure her gratifying voice gave. The fact that her selections were so well known did not militate against the enjoyment in her flawless singing.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

JANUARY 8,

SYMPHONY SALE FOR NEXT YEAR TO BE TAKEN UP

Manager of Orchestra to Arrange With Holders of Seats For Renewals — Receipts at Autumn Auctions Estimated

Ever since the manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra announced last September that the subscription sale of tickets for the Boston concerts would be conducted this year for the last time by auction, and that in the season of 1916-17 the seats in Symphony hall would be sold on a flat-rate basis, the question has been asked here and there what scale of prices would be adopted. When making the announcement, the manager expressed himself as desirous of abolishing the old method on the ground that it was ponderous and antiquated and that it did not accomplish the fairness intended. He declared that the auctioneer, starting each ticket at a nominal price and letting it go to the buyer who offered the largest premium, was no longer the useful public servant he was 30 years ago. For nowadays, he pointed out, subscribers instead of attending the sale and bidding for their locations, leave the whole thing in the hands of a dozen or so ticket brokers.

Arguing further for the retirement of the auctioneer and his hammer, he referred to the success of the flat-rate system in the cities of the tours, noting particularly New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, where subscribers all pay alike and have long so paid, with satisfaction on both sides. At the close of his announcement he urged for acceptance in Boston a scheme of seat allotment that is now working with happy results in New York, whereby the holders of places this year can subscribe for the same places next year and can continue to hold them for as many years as they desire. He remarked that not more than 100 seats in Carnegie hall change owners from season to season, and he urged a similar permanence in Symphony hall.

It is to be supposed, then, that when plans for next season begin to be considered, which ought to be soon, present holders of seats at the 24 Friday afternoon concerts and at the 24 Saturday evening concerts in Boston will be asked whether they want to retain their locations for next year, and necessarily they will at the same time be informed as to the rates they will have to pay for renewal.

There may or there may not be some intricacy in the question as to who the holders of the seats are. Of course no difficulty will arise on this point for those who bought their season tickets at the auction last fall in person. But some difficulty may arise for those—and they are enormously in the majority—who bought through an agent. Does the broker possess the seat, or does the person who purchased it of him possess it? If the broker, then nearly the whole floor plan and a large portion of the balcony plans of Symphony hall will be controlled for years to come by a group whose interest in the concerts is solely a trade interest.

In regard to prices, perhaps the most important point to be determined is whether the subscription rate will be the same or different for the Friday afternoon and the Saturday evening series. For it is well known that under the auction system the matinee subscribers have paid considerably more than have the evening subscribers. And the Friday patrons, though paying more, have received no more in return. In fact, until this year they have been given to understand that they heard only a rehearsal of the program and that the Saturday patrons heard the official presentation of it. The question is, whether the majority ought to be charged extra for the privilege of hearing the program first and for hearing it in the afternoon. Doubtless a social rather than a financial adjustment is needed. If the evening concert were changed from Saturday night to Thursday night, the whole matter might straighten out of itself.

Some figures on the auction sales of last autumn at Symphony hall will throw light on the situation as to the relative demand for the two sets of concerts. The sales, it will be recalled, were held on two pairs of days: Sept. 27 and 28, when the auctioneer put up the seats for Fridays; and on Sept. 30 and Oct. 1, when he put up those for Saturdays. On the first day of each sale, the forward locations were offered at a starting price of $18. On the second day, the rear locations were offered at $10. The actual prices which purchasers, or their agents for them, paid for the better places were from $35.50 to $118 on Fridays; and from $19 to $63 on Saturdays. The prices which they paid for the poorer ranged from $25 to $41 on Fridays; and from $11 to $30 on Saturdays.

The bidding was rather even, and as a rule the prices paid were proportionate to the value of the location. The only bidders who could have been at all disappointed were some who set their desire on the first row of $10 seats. For when they closed with the auctioneer they found they paid as much as the purchasers of the last row of $18 seats. About the average price paid for places on Fridays in the middle of the floor was $72 for the season, or $3 a concert. About the average paid at the sides was $60, or $2.50 a concert. About the average toward the rear or far forward was $48, or $2 a concert. Thus if the manager were to scale the matinee house next season according to the prices paid at the last auction sales, he would ask for the good floor seats something like $3, $2.50 and $2. And if he were to make the evening scale according to the auction, he would charge for the same locations something like $1, $1.50 and $2.

These figures have an interest at this time beyond the community for which Symphony hall is a musical focus. They can be studied profitably by patrons of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the cities of the monthly tours, namely, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. For a reorganization of the scale of prices in certain of these places is said to have been considered, if not positively to have been decided on. Should standardization of prices in all the cities be made, it will be important for subscribers everywhere to understand what are the conditions in the place where the concerts originate. Now a comparison of the present prices in all the cities proves that the $3 rate at the Friday concerts in Boston is the highest anywhere. For in Philadelphia, at the Academy of Music, according to the official circular of the orchestra issued last fall, the highest rate for the season of five concerts is $60 for a box seating five persons, or $2.40 a concert for each person. The rates run from this down to $3.50 for the season, or a little less than 75 cents a concert. In New York, at Carnegie hall, the maximum is the same as in Philadelphia, while the minimum rate is 60 cents a concert. In Baltimore, at the Lyric theater, the maximum is $2 and the minimum $1.50 a concert. The rates in Brooklyn are the same as those in New York and the rates in Washington are about the same as those in Baltimore. In all the cities of the monthly tour, the price of single seats, when any are available, is $2.50.

If the highest prices are paid in Boston, so are the lowest. For there are about 50 subscribers for Saturday evenings, located in the rear of the second balcony of Symphony hall, who average $12 for the season, or 50 cents a concert.

Subscribers to concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra and all patrons of orchestral music will be interested to know how much money was paid into the box office at Symphony hall at the two auction sales of two days each last fall. The seats were sold singly, in twos, in threes or in fours, according to the wish of the bidders; and, as has been pointed out, the receipts for Fridays far exceeded those for Saturdays. The totals, based on the figures called out by the auctioneer at the close of each sale, are as follows:

Friday concerts	$100,346.50
Saturday concerts	$65,380.50

These figures may not show the precise amount received from purchasers. For a number of the seats may have been bid in by representatives of the manager of the orchestra and put on sale from the box office window afterwards. Most of such seats were probably for Saturdays, and the effect of subtracting the price of them would only make the difference between the matinee and evening demand even stronger.

Figures regarding the capacity of the halls in which the orchestra regularly plays can be studied to advantage in connection with prices. The capacity of Symphony hall is something over 2500 seats. The capacity of Carnegie hall, New York, is slightly more. The capacity of the Academy of Music in Philadelphia is about 3000 and of the hall in which the orchestra plays in Brooklyn about the same as Symphony hall. The capacity of the New National theater in Washington is only 1900. That of the Lyric theater in Baltimore is set at 2000.

The work of the orchestra includes tours to cities of New England and to cities of the West. In Providence, R. I., the concerts are managed the same as in the cities of the monthly tour. In New Bedford, Mass., Springfield, Mass., Lawrence, Mass., Fall River, Mass., Hartford, Conn., and Portland, Me., the concerts are given for a fixed fee. In troy, N. Y., Rochester, N. Y., Buffalo, N. Y., Cleveland, O., and Detroit, Mich., which are all more or less regularly visited, the concerts are likewise given for a fixed fee and are locally managed. The seven western cities of the October, 1915, tour were visited on the fixed fee plan, about 30,000 people attending in all.

Perhaps the most favored subscribers of the orchestra, price, location of seats and all considered, are those of Cambridge, Mass., who hear eight annual concerts in Sanders theater Harvard University, for $7. The most favored single ticket buyers are unquestionably those who get seats in the second balcony of Symphony hall on Friday afternoons for 25 cents and those who have a similar privilege in the Academy of Music, Philadelphia. It is said that whatever rearrangement of prices is made the coming season, the 25 cent seats in Boston and Philadelphia will remain.

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 15,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A MELANCHOLY AFTERNOON WITH DR. MUCK AWAY

Once More, Revelation of How Much the Interest of Music and Performance Depends on the Conductor—Mr. Kelley's New Symphony Obscured and Hampered —The Contrasts of Mme. Melba's Singing

DISILLUSION and enlightenment came timely yesterday afternoon to those that like to believe the Symphony Concerts are so "institutional" that they would go on of themselves, whoever might be leading the orchestra. For the whole week an affection of the throat with the consequent fever had kept Dr. Muck from work and the assistant conductor, Mr. Schmidt, had prepared the programme in his stead—Mr. Kelley's new symphony and the other pieces except Mme. Melba's three airs. In actual performance, he disclosed more elasticity of pace and rhythm, more regard for color and contrast and more heed of quality of tone than he has hitherto revealed when Dr. Muck has been disabled; but, outside Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon," the purely orchestral music of the day sounded dull, lifeless and neutral-colored in comparison with the vivid and animating voice that it was easy to believe the absent chief would have given it. Moreover, under Mr. Schmidt's leading, the orchestra seemed no more than a faithful and practised instrument, fulfilling its function as mechanically as a singing disc.

As the conventional phrases go, Mr. Schmidt is a "well-equipped" and "well-schooled" conductor, but in the Symphony concerts he has never yet, outside that same overture to "Anacreon," risen an inch above routine. In spite of his imposing figure, he lacks any sort of personality to impress his forces and his hearers; he wants flexibility and finesse of mind, temperament and hand; in a word, he conducts with very little insight, imagination or enkindled and transmitting feeling. He reads off the score faithfully according to what it bears plainly on the surface; he keeps his band to its work.

A hundred "well-equipped" and "well-schooled" conductors from Petrograd to Paris and from London to San Francisco can conduct in similar fashion. But what would the "institutional" Symphony Orchestra and the usually engrossing and stimulating Symphony Concerts become under such as they? Both are for the few conductors of the largest and the finest powers, the richest in mind and temperament, the most forceful of personality, the most exacting in work—for Dr. Muck and the few conductors who stand with him in the first rank of their profession. In four years he has lifted and held the Symphony Concerts to their present standards; he has transformed them in his own image; without him or the equivalent of him, they become as they did yesterday, relatively nil.

In a sense with the three dances from Gluck's operas, that were intermezzo between Mme. Melba's numbers, and with the overture to "Anacreon" that ended the concert and that went more animatedly and eloquently than all the rest, it mattered little whether Dr. Muck or Mr. Schmidt was conducting. All four are repertory pieces, heard often "at these concerts" and likely to be heard many times more. But with Mr. Kelley's "New England Symphony," played for the first time in Boston and indeed in the East, the quality of the conductor mattered much, since the music needs all the illumination, enforcement and vitality that re-creating and enhancing performance may give it. When it became apparent that Dr. Muck could neither rehearse the piece nor conduct in it, Mr. Kelley was asked whether he wished Mr. Schmidt to proceed with it or to have it laid over to next winter, since there was no available place for it in the scheme of the remaining concerts of the current season. As most com posers, being human and loving their tone-children, would, he preferred immediate performance—unwisely and unhappily, as the outcome proved.

The fate of all new music in first performance depends primarily upon the ability of the conductor to release the underlying melodic voice and to set forth the melodic design of the piece, since therein lies much of its whole being and significance and of whatever beauty and power the composer's resource and imagination may summon. Now it was clear yesterday that Mr. Schmidt in mind and feeling had penetrated hardly an inch below the surface of the symphony as it stood on the engraved page. What Dr. Muck, with his facilities newly and alertly awakened to all things American by his journeys up and down the whole country last year, would almost surely have divined of the spirit, the suggestion, the whole imagery and eloquence of Mr. Kelley's music, Mr. Schmidt never so much as guessed. On that score the "New England Symphony" was voiceless. Worse still, by all the promptings of the engraved page to the understanding mind, his chosen pace, in each movement, except the scherzo of bird-song, clouded the substance and the implication of the music and sorely hampered its progress.

It is an old story that Montemezzi's opera, "L'Amore dei Tre Re" seemed but a poor thing when he who led in it at the first performance on any stage in Milan, mistook nearly all the tempi and that it emerged in New York in true voice and glory only when Mr. Toscanini had penetratingly and imaginatively discerned and applied them. In somewhat similar case stood Mr. Kelley's symphony yesterday. It seemed a poor thing, dry, dun, labored and monotonous under Mr. Schmidt's hand. Under Dr. Muck's by many a suggestion of the score, it might have risen more than once to large and grave eloquence. By the same tokens, the music demands all possible elasticity, all possible application and shadings of color, and all possible play of sensuous feeling that performance can give it by adroit modulation and progression, by rich and luminous quality of tone, by shrewd play with rhythm and accent, by all the means of understanding, imagination and impartment that a conductor like Dr. Muck infuses into none too articulate or freely moving music. It received none of these necessities yesterday. It did not sound with anything akin to what the score suggests is its true voice and significance. It were as unfair to judge it further, as it was to judge "The Loves of Three Kings" by the miscarriage of Milan. Perhaps, and in fair due to Mr. Kelley and his symphony, Dr. Muck may return to it at some future day.

Nor did Mme. Melba's singing add too much to the dubious pleasures of the afternoon. Once and for all, the day has passed wherein she may prudently undertake such ornate and exacting music, lying almost invariably within the uppermost range of her voice as the air of the fluting bird from Händel's setting of Milton's "Il Penseroso" that was her first number. It has been one of her favorite pieces since she came first to the concert stage; she has sung it more than once at the Symphony Concerts in the full vocal glories of her golden noon as the singer whose voice was the loveliest and whose vocal artistry was the easiest, surest and finest of her illustrious generation. Many yesterday recalled her singing of the piece in those radiant nineties and let the echoes of memory replace the thin, sharp and labored tones of the struggling singer.

On the other hand, when Mme. Melba passed to the two airs from Mozart's opera of "Figaro"—the Countess's "Porgi Amor" and the page's "Voi che Sapete" —she summoned many a distinction of her prime. Both pieces, and especially Cherubino's song, lie well within her middle and best-preserved tones—still limpid, edgeless, soft and silvery, tones of a lustrous timbre, a velvety texture and a haunting sweetness, the memory of which will be not the least of the pleasures of song that Mme. Melba has to the heart. All three wo

From STAATSZEITUNG

lavished upon her time. They are the tones that Mozart may well have heard in the inmost chambers of his imagination when he set the melancholy musings of his Countess or the wistful amorous longing of his Page to some of the loveliest of his music. So he might have fancied his melodies running their suave and shimmering course in the radiance of sound; so he might have wished his little tendrils of ornament to wave about them; so he would have each phrase like a cameo cut in velvet; and so he might have felt the charm of the sentiment exfoliating from the music and wreathing the whole with its glamor. For when Mme. Melba, even today, sings the music of Mozart, she is more than the expert and practised singer. As she divines it by a songful instinct and intuition, that is the complement of her voice and not less rare and ravishing, so she imparts it.

H. T. P.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

THE SEASON ONCE MORE IN FULL TIDE

Dr. Muck to Resurrect a Neglected Symphonic Poem of Liszt—Mr. Casals and Mr. Bauer in Sonatas—Mme. Melba and Mr. Grainger Together—The "Morning Musicale"—Chamber Music for String Quartet and Wind Choir—Two New and Notable Pianists — Mr. Copeland and Mr. Powell Besides—Novel Debussy

MORE diligently than any previous conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck seeks to make known the symphonic poems of Liszt. At his hands the public of the Symphony Concerts has already heard "The Preludes," "Mazeppa," "The Battle of the Huns" and the seldom played "Hungaria," and to these he will add next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the still less-known "Ce qu' on Entend sur la Montagne." Certainly the piece has never before appeared on the programmes of the Symphony Concerts; in all probability it is new to Boston. Other capitals of music in the United States rarely listen to it; and only in Germany, where it is commonly called "The Mountain Symphony" has it kept place in the active repertory. "Ce qu' on Entend sur la Montagne" is the first and one of the longest of Liszt's twelve symphonic poems; like-named verses in Hugo's "Feuilles d'Automne" suggested it. As the poem in words and the poem in tones runs, the poet sits musing by the sea. In imagination he hears two voices. One joyfully celebrates the beauty of the natural world; the other bewails the unhappy lot of man. Hugo ends questioningly, wondering that the Creator should so mingle good and evil in the world; Liszt solves or tries to solve the riddle in a consoling Andante Religioso. So runs not the least interesting, if one of the least known of these symphonic poems about the course and the content of which more will be printed in this place next week. The symphony of the impending programme is that in which Schumann gloriously sings of the coming of the spring in the Rhineland and unusually it will end the concert. The third item of the list is the seldom heard overture that Berlioz wrote to "Rob Roy" when the Waverley Novels were one of the sacred books of the Romantics of France.

JANUARY 15,

JOURNAL—

MELBA SINGS; NEW SYMPHONY PLAYED

Mme. Melba's presence as soloist makes this week's Symphony concerts more attractive even than they usual are. Hundreds stood in line yesterday waiting for a chance to reach the second balcony.

Ernst Schmidt, the assistant conductor of the orchestra, is temporarily taking the place of Dr. Muck, who is in the throes of the grip.

Mme. Melba's numbers are "Sweet Bird That Shun'st the Noise of Folly," from one of the Handel cantatas, and two Mozart songs, "Porgi armor" and "Voi, che sapete," both from "The Marriage of Figaro." Yesterday the prima donna whose achievements have given so much brilliancy to the last 25 years of musical history was in fairly good voice. Time has dealt kindly with all but her upper tones. The art that has made her one of the few living mistresses of bel canto remains virtually unimpaired. Her every effort is a lesson.

Edgar Stillman Kelley's "New England Symphony" yesterday had its first performance in Boston. Mr. Kelley, who comes of old New England stock, though he was born and still lives in the Middle West, has taken his inspiration from the log-book of the Mayflower, which was written by Gov. Bradford, one of his ancestors. The first two movements, one of which pictures the Pilgrims' "mental traits and moral tendencies," and the other a sort of spring scene, are the most admirable. The third movement is based largely on the old hymn, "Why do we mourn departing friends?" The last is a medley of what went before. The woodland scene was warmly applauded by the discriminating audience.

Three bits from Gluck's second ballet suite, and Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture fill out the program. The orchestra played finely under Mr. Schmidt's leadership.

A symphony poem by Liszt, never before heard at the Symphony concerts, will be played next week; also Berlioz' [illegible] overture and Schumann's [illegible] symphony.

From

ADVERTISER,

JANUARY 15,

SYMPHONY PLEASES AND AMAZES CRITIC

SUGGESTIONS HOW IT MIGHT BE OTHERWISE

Earnest and Dignified Work by Melba in New England Number and Others

By LOUIS C. ELSON

Programme.

Kelley: New England Symphony.
Handel: 'Sweet Bird," with flute obbligato.
Gluck: Three dances arr. by Gevaert.
Mozart: Arias from "Marriage of Figaro."
Cherubini: Overture, "Anacreon."
Soloist, Madame Melba

Naturally, to the public, the entree of Mme. Melba was the great attraction of the concert, the magnet which caused a long line of applicants for admission to form in the early morning and brave the wintry breezes for hours before the doors opened; but to the musician, who has America's musical advance at heart, the first performance of Edgar Stillman Kelley's "New England Symphony" meant very much more—great as the famous soprano was.

Before we heard the new symphony, we imagined that such a work could be worked out on about the following lines: Introduction: A quartette of oboes pictures the Pilgrims nasally engaged in singing psalms. "Ten Thousand Times Ten Thousand" might be used here, but for small orchestras it could be reduced to 100 times 100. The Introduction might lead into the first movement, called "Spring."

Skips from piccolo to contrabass might portray variations of the thermometer in a New England spring. A passage, "Con Fuoco," would suggest the relighting of the furnace in May. A contrapuntal interweaving of the Chest Protector motive and the Grippe motive, now follows. The Umbrella motive is now heard, and after a heavy gust on the wind instruments it is again given in inversion—inside out.

A mysterious horn solo pictures the dampened New Englander, seeking to ward off a cold by draughts from a bottle in the closet. The movement ends with the Mustard Poultice motive fortissimo.

Andante. Sunday Morning. The Brown Bread motive is intertwined with the Bean motive, followed by a transition into the Church scene which ends with a Slumber song after the preacher has reached "Tenthly, my Dear Brethren," skilfully shown by double counterpoint at the tenth.

Scherzo. A Sunday School picnic. Joyous feelings on coming into the country. A restless figure portrays the superintendent trying to make everybody happy. A string motive pictures him putting up the swings. A bacchanalian theme on piccolo shows him unpacking the Birch Beer from the baskets. Taps of kettle-drums show him driving tent-pegs to hold down the tablecloths, a vigorous sforzando chord of the ninth, on four bassoons and two E-flat clarinets, show that he has hit his thumb with the hammer. The trombones give a sharp "Tut tut!", while an inversion of the Superintendent figure shows him tripped up by his own tent pegs. A weird and desolate phase on muted horns pictures him seated on the custard pie.

Finale. A melody in the spirited rhythm of "Oh the Roast Beef of Old England," suggests "Oh the Cod-fish of New England," the national hymn of Massachusetts. At the close a gradual change of "Yankee Doodle" into "The Wearing of the Green" indicates the gradual change which has come over the population of New England.

But this scenario was not followed. Instead we found a most earnest and dignified work, the creation of a learned musician who has a melodic instinct which preserves him from experimenting with the absurd ugliness of the ultra-modern school. There is an enthusiasm in the work which ought to arouse any audience. The motto of the first movement gives the key to the exaltation of the entire work. It is taken from the log of the "Mayflower,"——

"All great and honorable actions are accompanied with great difficulties; and must be both enterprized and overcome with answerable courages."

Subsequent mottoes continue the voices of the Pilgrims. We wish that the lines of the first New England composer, the Bostonian, William Billings, could have found their place among these quotations——

> "Let Tyrants shake their iron rod,
> And Slavery clank her galling chains,
> We'll fear them not; we trust in God,
> New England's God forever reigns!"

But after all the spirit of this is in the work. And, in spite of these mottoes Mr. Kelley does not give "programme-music," except in the second movement. It is the character of the sturdy New Englander, not his specific deeds, that is portrayed. There is a firmness, a decision, a directness that suits perfectly to its subject. And Mr. Kelley has not left musical form either. Beethoven pictured a hero without leaving the classical form, and the present composer can picture the New Englander in the same sonata-allegro limits, and does it. The only fault we found with the first movement was that it gave a series of striking episodes rather than a sustained unity. It was somewhat ascetic at times, but that was in keepilng with the subject.

The second movement pictures the beauty of the woods, and the carolling of birds. There are good tangible melodies here, interwoven with various bird-notes which Mr. Kelley gathered for himself in New England. This bit of realism may be condoned, just as one may excuse the "real Indian themes" which several American composers are disguising with every device of civilized music. The flute had plenty of work in this New England "Waldeswehen," and deserves especial mention for all its bird-music in the concert of yesterday.

In the third movement Mr. Kelley employs a real New England hymn as his core. He uses Timothy Swan's good old "China," and gives variations of it. A Richard Strauss could have made more effective tone-coloring here (it seemed rather monochromatic), but the variations are ingenious and effective. Mr. Kelley speaks of "China" as being even comparable to the old German chorales, but we doubt if so much disjunct movement would be found in the best of them. Fortunately Mr. Kelley does not allow the Variation-demon to run away with him, and the movement is of reasonable length.

The finale brings in several reminiscences of the preceding movements, the prominent points of each being passed in review, with new treatment or with rhythmic changes. There is a very long pedal-point upon the kettle-drum, the longest we have ever heard, but it obtains some variety by gradually changing into rhythm. There is a triumphant ending, a noble climax. This Finale seems to us the best movement of the entire work. The symphony was much applauded, the conductor (Mr. Schmidt) recalled, and the orchestra forced to rise.

But, by the way, one of the most famous of sopranos appeared in this concert, and we have kept her waiting all this time. Let it not be laid against the Boston public that they preferred a living prima donna to a dead Pilgrim. The self-same thing would have happened in London, Paris or Berlin. Mme. Melba's most florid number was Handel's "Sweet Bird," and as this fowl was not a double-headed eagle, and was charmingly accompanied with a flute obligato by M. Maquarre, it was something to enjoy greatly. The vocalist's fioriture were admirable although she showed some caution at times in the matter of high notes, and the final cadence has had a more brilliant ending. But the audience was very enthusiastic and the singer was recalled three times.

We prefer "Voi che Sapete" in a lower key, as Mozart wrote it. It is a true alto or mezzo-soprano song, and loses somewhat when a soprano attempts it, but in this and in "Porgi Amor" Mme. Melba showed that she has not lost that "bel canto" in which she has been unrivalled.

Little space is left to dwell upon Gluck's dances, or Cherubini's glorious "Anacreon" overture. They are not new, but they were very enjoyable. It was a peculiarity of this concert that from beginning to end it was real music. For almost two hours the auditor could forget that musical anarchists existed or that great length, great ugliness, and a tremendously great orchestra were necessary for any composition that deserved attention in the modern concert-room.

The illness of Dr. Muck brought Mr. Ernst Schmidt again to the conductor's stand. We have already spoken of this conductor in terms of praise. He is possibly the best assistant conductor that we have had in these concerts. His readings were intelligent, his beat sure, and there was an elasticity which showed that he was not merely a substitute but a good conductor in his own right. Nevertheless we wished that Mr. Kelley's remarkable symphony could have had the leadership of our own Dr. Muck, whom we believe to be unrivalled.

BOSTON GLOBE

JANUARY 15, 1916

"NEW ENGLAND" SYMPHONY PLAYED

Mme Melba Sings Arias From Mozart.

Mr Schmidt, in Dr Muck's Illness, Conducts Concert.

Edgar Stillman Kelley, although born in Wisconsin, is of New England heritage. Gov Bradford, who he has found to be the author of the log book of the Mayflower, was his ancestor. This log book contained "mottoes." They, and an inherited New England subconsciousness, prompted Mr Kelley to write the symphony played yesterday afternoon for the first time in Boston. The composer has endeavored to crystalize the spirit of the sturdy folk who for a civic and religious principle built the foundations of a Nation on these shores.

Mr Kelley, who has written in an informing and personally interesting manner upon his purpose and ideals, says he was able to "feel New England." The chief impression derived from this score is that of sincerity and conviction of feeling. There is no evident attempt to display learning, to exploit ideas of invention, development or orchestral treatment for their own sake. There is a direct frankness of expression, even when the mood of music and motto may not seem identical, as in the last act where devoted and spirited resolution would speak through music of a lighter cast, even for the moment that of operetta.

The first movement is inspired by the quotation: "All great and honorable actions are accompanied with great difficulties; and must be enterprised and overcome with answerable courages." The chief theme is of stern and purposeful character. A contrasting one is not incongruous in its gentler asperation, yet is not sensuous. The second movement is an ingeniously woven fabric from themes given the composer by his "colleagues," the New England birds. "Warm and fair weather; the birds sang in the woods most pleasantly." The New England colonial climate evidently then possessed that boon now lost—a Spring. The welcome relaxation from the vigorous Winter is clearly expressed in this pastoral, ingratiating movement. The bird themes are made to flower, but not to obscure their origin and character.

The slow movement, "Great lamentation and heaviness," is based upon a typical hymn tune of Old New England psalmody, "Why do we mourn departing friends?" lachrymose and doleful, the type of tune which even now may be heard sung in nasal and tremulous woe in an occasional New England village church. The motto of the last movement urges that lament for the dead find fittest expression in brave consecration to their work while living.

Altogether a score of genuine musical value, retaining the composer's tendency toward sequence in development, but stimulating and characterizing in its reflection of an important phase of National life.

Because of Dr Muck's illness, Mr Schmidt conducted a good performance. Three movements from Gluck's charming ballet, suite No 2, made familiar also through Mme Pavlowa's dances, and Cherubini's "Anaceron" overture completed the orchestral program.

Mme Melba sang two airs from "The Marriage of Figaro," "Porgi Amor" and "Voi, che sapete," in a voice of extraordinary freshness, vibrancy and with a purity of line and style that still defies many of her younger sisters. Her reception after these and the preceding aria from Handel—more grateful in sustained than florid and embellishing passages—was that of love and respect for her in this golden sunset of her career. Many had not forgotten her noble devotion and sacrifice in aiding the wounded of her Nation. Her very dress and manner bespoke an hour of graver thoughts than those of display or adornment.

[83]

BOSTON HERALD,

JANUARY 15, 1916.

'NEW ENGLAND' SYMPHONY AT 11TH CONCERT

Work by Kelley Based on Puritan Sense of Duty Given Here for First Time—Music Might Have Been More Sportive at Times Without Fear of the Stocks—Dr. Muck Ill.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 11th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Ernst Schmidt conducted, for Dr. Muck has not yet recovered from an attack of the grip. The orchestral pieces were these: Kelley's Symphony No. 2, "New England" (first time in Boston); Gluck-Gevaert, Ballet Suite No. 2—Tambourin, Gavotte, Chaconne; Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon." Mme. Melba sang these airs: Handel's "Sweet Bird"; Mozart's "Porgi Amor" and "Voi, che sapete." Mr. Maquarre played the flute obligato for Handel's air.

We remember with pleasure many pagesof Mr. Kelley's operetta, "Puritania," and the music of his "Aladdin" suite, especially "The Flight of the Genius with the Palace," a movement that fascinated Edward MacDowell, of which he often spoke. We also remember some songs of genuine fancy. Mr. Kelley is well known as a musician of the soundest training, of solid acquirements, a man of original thought and views.

His symphony, written for the Litchfield County (Conn.) Choral Union, was first performed at Norfolk in June, 1913. A New Englander by descent, he "feels" New England, as he himself has said, and he felt that he should "write New England." For this symphony he chose as mottoes for the movements passages from the log book of the Mayflower, which was afterwards enlarged into the "History of the Plymouth Plantation." And to express the sentiment of early New England he chose for a theme, with variations, the old funeral tune, "China," to which the hymn, "Why do we mourn departing friends," was sung.

It might be said that this symphony expresses the stern New England idea of beauty—the New England conscience—as opposed or affected by a longing for the beautiful—"love of life in its best sense." It is to be expected that a symphony in traditional form contains a first movement in which there are two strongly contrasted themes. It matters little what these themes may typify. The interest, even where there is an elaborate program, is chiefly musical. The hearer considers first of all the nature of the themes and the use made of them: ingenuity, workmanship, harmonic and orchestral color.

New England! The oppressing sense of duty! The longing for the beautiful, that was in some instances crushed, while in rarer instances it softened austerity! Whenever we hear about New England duty we recall "Orpheus C. Kerr's" parody of Whittier in the form of a rejected national authem:

My native land, thy Puritanic stock
Still finds its roots firm-bound in Plymouth Rock,
And all thy sons unite in one grand wish—
To keep the virtues of Preserv-ed Fish.

Preserv-ed Fish, the Deacon stern and true,
Told our New England what her sons should do,
And should they swerve from loyalty and right,
Then the whole land were lost indeed in night.

Too much of this symphony sounds as if it were "made in Germany." With the possible exception of the Scherzo, which has for motto "Warm and fair weather, the birds sang in the trees most pleasantly," there is little that reveals the individuality of the composer shown in other works. The chief motive—Duty—is well found, but the composer was not fortunate in his expression of longing for the beautiful. A more sensuous strain would not have brought blushes to the cheeks of fair New England women with forbidding Christian names. The thematic treatment throughout is no doubt scholarly, but seldom striking, impressive. Take the variations, for instance; they are sombre, without true variety in expression. The Scherzo contains the relieving pages. Here is a pretty melodic idea and there is freshness, there is spontaneity in the invention. The symphony suffers from a lack of variety in orchestral color. Perhaps the composer wished to portray the prevailing monotony of early New England life. But one drab movement should be enough. It seems as if Mr. Kelley as a composer had been oppressed by the sense of duty; that he feared if his Muse were even innocently sportive, she would be pilloried. Her feet, at least, are in the stocks.

Mr. Kelley, fortunate man, is now free to compose at leisure. Let us hope that with his natural gifts he will turn his back on Germany, where he has spent many years; let him consider the French and their ways; let him kindle his fancy again by dreams of fairy tales and the Orient; or if he must have an American subject, let him choose one in which Duty does not like a Gorgon freeze his blood. He was in the audience yesterday and had reason to be [illegible] with the [illegible] of his work.

[illegible] for the fourth time at these conrts. The first time was 20 years go. It was not to be expected that er performance yesterday of this florid ir would be so brilliant as in former ears. But if the years are inexorable n certain ways, they are merciful in thers. Mme. Melba's singing of the irs from "Le Nozze di Figaro" was elightful. In them the voice was as resh and beautiful as of old. There was the charm of exquisite phrasing; there was the simplicity of the great artist.

The dances of Gluck pleased the audience, and the noble overture of Cherubini brought the end.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Berlioz, overture "Rob Roy"; Liszt, symphonic poem, "What One Hears on the Mountain" (first time at these concerts); Schumann, Symphony in B flat.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

JANUARY 20, 1916

SEAT HOLDERS AT SYMPHONY TO REGISTER NAMES

The management of the Symphony orchestra is this week taking the first step in the promised change of methods for disposing of the season tickets. As announced last September the auctions are given up entirely and beginning with next fall all the seats in Symphony hall, both for the Friday and Saturday series, will be sold by subscription at fixed prices. Likewise the owners of seats for this season have an option until March 4 on their seats for the coming season.

The first step in this new process is to have owners of seats for the present season for both series, register their seats, their names and addresses, so that the management will have a complete record of the seats that are held and that no injustice may result from the change.

The registration will be at Symphony hall between the hours of 10 and 1 o'clock on Thursday, Friday and Saturday of each week up to and including March 4, and during the concerts on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. Cards have been provided whereon owners of seats may register.

This registration, it is announced, incurs no obligation. It merely means that the patrons wish to be identified as owners of their seats and to have the opportunity later to subscribe. At the end of the registration they will be notified as to prices.

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 20,

In accordance with the announcement made in September last, all seats for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, both for the Friday and the Saturday series, will henceforth be sold by subscription at fixed prices. Owners of seats for the present season will have the right to retain them for the season of 1916-1917, and from season to season thereafter. For purpose of record, they must register their names, addresses and the seats they own. The registration books will be open at Symphony Hall, beginning Thursday, Jan. 20, and continuing every Thursday, Friday and Saturday thereafter, from 10 to 1, and during the concerts on Fridays and Saturdays. To avoid errors subscribers should present their season tickets when registering. The registration books will close Saturday, March 4, when the option to this year's subscribers will expire. Registration incurs no obligation to subscribe for the coming season. At the end of the registration the fixed prices for next year will be announced.

BOSTON POST,

JANUARY 15, 1916

KELLEY'S SYMPHONY IS ENJOYED

First Performance in Boston—Melba in Fine Voice

BY OLIN DOWNES

Owing to the illness of Dr. Muck, Ernst Schmidt, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted the concert given by that organization yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mme. Melba was soloist. Edgar Stillmann-Kelley's "New England" Symphony was played for the first time in Boston.

Mr. Kelley's [illegible] was first performed at the music festival given on the estate of Carl Stoeckel at Norfolk, Conn., June 3, 1913. Mr. Kelley, though born in Wisconsin, is by life-long association and by ancestry keenly sympathetic with the locality and the spirit of New England. Mr. Kelley believes that as yet American expression in music must be local, individual, rather than synthetic.

The motto of the first movement is a quotation from the log book of the Mayflower: "All great and honorable actions are accompanied by great difficulties; and must be both enterprised and overcome with answerable courages." A Cromwellian sentence, fit to inspire any composer of true idealism.

The motto of the second movement: "Warm and fair weather; the birds sang in the woods most pleasantly." Here bird themes, the free transcription of songs actually heard in the woods of New England are employed. Movement III.: "Great lamentation and heaviness." The old funeral hymn, "Why do we maurn departed friends," is employed, and this hymn is employed through the movement as the basis for variations. Movement IV.: "The fit way to honor the departed is to be true to one another and to work bravely for the cause to which living and dead have consecrated themselves." In this movement there are quotations from themes heard in the earlier movements, and the whole comes to a conclusion with the theme of the hymn, with new harmonic and orchestral dress.

In the history of American music Mr. Kelley will occupy a very individual and honorable position. We must not forget that he is of the same generation as Messrs. Chadwick, Parker and Foote.

Features of the Work

The symphony is not founded upon negro folksong or cowboy ditty. It harks back to previous generations, but it is music for the young people of today, nevertheless, and it is the music of a man who, regardless of the caprices of fortune and favor, has written that which he felt it incumbent upon him to write. The entire character of the symphony bears witness to this. The introduction, the stern opening theme, the austere harmonies, the coloring which is severe throughout, with the exception of the second movement, where there are some delightful effects—all these things are admirably adapted to and expressive of the purpose of the work.

The use of the funeral hymn is typical, whether or not we agree with Mr. Kelley's very high estimation of this hymn. He compares it for artistic value to the typical German choral. To us this theme is so peculiarly in place because of its whine, its snivel. We are not so young as to have forgotten these hymns and the morals they drove home on damp Sundays. In the first movement the themes are in admirable contrast. Then there is the re-entrance of the second theme in the second movement, and the restatements of many preceding themes in a dramatic manner at the last.

Deserves Repetition

This symphony deserves to be heard again. Its workmanship places it among the few compositions by American composers which deserve repeated hearings at Symphony concerts. Its spirit is lofty, a noble echo of that which founded America and made it great. The symphony was well received, and a less modest man than the composer, who was present, would have been more in evidence, as the applause continued until Mr. Schmidt bade his orchestra rise to its feet in acknowledgment. The performance was sympathetic and Mr. Schmidt conducted with insight and authority.

Mme. Melba sang Handel's "Sweet Bird" and two airs of Mozart, "Porgi d'amor" from the "Marriage of Figaro," and "Voi che sapete" from "Don Giovanni." She sang Mozart's music with the utmost beauty of tone, and taste and musicianship in delivery. The purity and beauty of this voice are heard under excellent conditions in the music o' Mozart. Handel's air is in certain respects more taxing, at least in a technical sense, and its delivery was less felicitous, but all in all, this was one of the most notable appearances which Mme. Melba has given of late years.

The other orchestral pieces of the afternoon were three of the charming dances from Gluck's operas, "Armide" and "Iphigenia in Aulis," as Gaveart has arranged them in the second of two orchestral suites, and Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon."

BOSTON JOURNAL-

JANUARY 20,

SYMPHONY PATRONS REGISTER FOR SEATS

Registration for seats for the Symphony concerts is now going on at Symphony Hall, this innovation being due to the abolition of the auction sales. Cards have been provided for the registering of the regular Symphony patrons' names and addresses. In this way options are being secured on seats for coming seasons. The registration will end March 4.

In the future Symphony seats will be sold by subscription and at fixed prices, but the prices have not yet been announced.

BOSTON POST,

JANUARY 20,

REGISTRATION FOR SYMPHONY

First Step in Changing Seat Sale Method

The management of the Symphony Orchestra is this week taking the first step in the promised change of methods for disposing of the season tickets of the Symphony concerts. As announced last September the auctions are given up entirely and beginning with next fall all the seats in the hall, both for the Friday and Saturday series, will be sold by subscription at fixed prices. Likewise the owners of seats for this season will have an option until a given date, this date being March 4, on their seats for the coming season.

The first step in this new process is to have owners of seats for the present season, for both series, register their seats, their names and addresses, so that the management will have a complete record of the seats that are held and that no injustice may result from the change.

The registration will be at Symphony Hall, between the hours of 10 and 1 on Thursday, Friday and Saturday of each week up to and including March 4, and during the concerts on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. Cards have been provided wherein owners of seats may properly register, and the data on these cards will be then transferred to books, especially prepared for the purpose.

ADVERTISER,

JANUARY 20,

SYMPHONY SEATS TO BE REGISTERED

The management of the Symphony Orchestra is this week taking the first step in the promised change of methods for disposing of the season tickets of the Symphony Concerts. As announced last September, the auctions are given up entirely, and beginning with next fall all the seats in the hall, both for the Friday and Saturday series, will be sold by subscription at fixed prices. Likewise the owners of seats for this season have an option until a given date, this date being March 4, on their seats for the coming season.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date 1916

Es 1884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD

Varied Programme Offered Concertgoers in Carnegie Hall.

There could be no complaint of lack of variety in the programme which was offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

Brahms's third symphony, with its stately and exuberant measures, given a carefully smooth and spirited reading, was followed by Georges Enesco's "Rhapsodie Roumaine," Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "Island of the Dead," and the overture, "Le Carnaval Romain" of Berlioz.

Probably no greater contrast to Enesco's liveliness and gay spirits could be imagined than the solemn, oppressive "Todteninsel" of Rachmaninoff. To each of them the Boston men did full justice.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date JAN 1916

Estab

DR. KARL MUCK ILL.

Unable to Conduct Orchestra, but May Do So To-Day.

Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was unable to direct it at the concert which took place last night at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn. Arthur Brooke, flutist, announced that the director would be unable to appear because of an attack of the grip. Ernest Schmidt, a first violinist, took up the baton and directed the concert.

At the Gotham Hotel, where Mr. Muck is stopping, it was announced late last night that he was feeling must better and expected to wield his baton at the concert to be given this afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

BOSTON HERALD,
JANUARY 15, 1916.

'NEW ENGLAND' SYMPHONY AT 11TH CONCERT

Work by Kelley Based on Puritan Sense of Duty Given Here for First Time—Music Might Have Been More Sportive at Times Without Fear of the Stocks—Dr. Muck Ill.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 11th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Ernst Schmidt conducted, for Dr. Muck has not yet recovered from an attack of the grip. The orchestral pieces were these: Kelley's Symphony No. 2, "New England" (first time in Boston); Gluck-Gevaert, Ballet Suite No. 2—Tambourin, Gavotte, Chaconne; Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon." Mme. Melba sang these airs: Handel's "Sweet Bird"; Mozart's "Porgi Amor" and "Voi, che sapete." Mr. Maquarre played the flute obligato for Handel's air.

We remember with pleasure many pages of Mr. Kelley's operetta, "Puritania," and the music of his "Aladdin" suite, especially "The Flight of the Genius with the Palace," a movement that fascinated Edward MacDowell, of which he often spoke. We also remember some songs of genuine fancy. Mr. Kelley is well known as a musician of the soundest training, of solid acquirements, a man of original thought and views.

His symphony, written for the Litchfield County (Conn.) Choral Union, was first performed at Norfolk in June, 1913. A New Englander by descent, he "feels" New England, as he himself has said, and he felt that he should "write New England." For this symphony he chose as mottoes for the movements passages from the log book of the Mayflower, which was afterwards enlarged into the "History of the Plymouth Plantation." And to express the sentiment of early New England he chose for a theme, with variations, the old funeral tune, "China," to which the hymn, "Why do we mourn departing friends," was sung.

It might be said that this symphony expresses the stern New England idea of beauty—the New England conscience—as opposed or affected by a longing for the beautiful—"love of life in its best sense." It is to be expected that a symphony in traditional form contains a first movement in which there are two strongly contrasted themes. It matters little what these themes may typify. The interest, even where there is an elaborate program, is chiefly musical. The hearer considers first of all the nature of the themes and the use made of them: ingenuity, workmanship, harmonic and orchestral color.

New England! The oppressing sense of duty! The longing for the beautiful, that was in some instances crushed, while in rarer instances it softened austerity! Whenever we hear about New England duty we recall "Orpheus C. Kerr's" parody of Whittier in the form of a rejected national authem:

> My native land, thy Puritanic stock
> Still finds its roots firm-bound in Plymouth Rock,
> And all thy sons unite in one grand wish—
> To keep the virtues of Preserv-ed Fish.
>
> Preserv-ed Fish, the Deacon stern and true,
> Told our New England what her sons should do,
> And should they swerve from loyalty and right,
> Then the whole land were lost indeed in night.

Too much of this symphony sounds as if it were "made in Germany." With the possible exception of the Scherzo, which has for motto "Warm and fair weather, the birds sang in the trees most pleasantly," there is little that reveals the individuality of the composer shown in other works. The chief motive—Duty—is well found, but the composer was not fortunate in his expression of longing for the beautiful. A more sensuous strain would not have brought blushes to the cheeks of fair New England women with forbidding Christian names. The thematic treatment throughout is no doubt scholarly, but seldom striking, impressive. Take the variations, for instance; they are sombre, without true variety in expression. The Scherzo contains the relieving pages. Here is a pretty melodic idea and there is freshness, there is spontaneity in the invention. The symphony suffers from a lack of variety in orchestral color. Perhaps the composer wished to portray the prevailing monotony of early New England life. But one drab movement should be enough. It seems as if Mr. Kelley as a composer had been oppressed by the sense of duty; that he feared if his Muse were even innocently sportive, she would be pilloried. Her feet, at least, are in the stocks.

Mr. Kelley, fortunate man, is now free to compose at leisure. Let us hope that with his natural gifts he will turn his back on Germany, where he has spent many years; let him consider the French and their ways; let him kindle his fancy again by dreams of fairy tales and the Orient; or if he must have an American subject, let him choose one in which Duty does not like a Gorgon freeze his blood. He was in the audience yesterday and had reason to be pleased with the reception of his work.

Mme. Melba yesterday sang "Sweet Bird" for the fourth time at these concerts. The first time was 20 years ago. It was not to be expected that her performance yesterday of this florid air would be so brilliant as in former years. But if the years are inexorable in certain ways, they are merciful in others. Mme. Melba's singing of the airs from "Le Nozze di Figaro" was delightful. In them the voice was as fresh and beautiful as of old. There was the charm of exquisite phrasing; there was the simplicity of the great artist.

The dances of Gluck pleased the audience, and the noble overture of Cherubini brought the end.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Berlioz, overture "Rob Roy"; Liszt, symphonic poem, "What One Hears on the Mountain" (first time at these concerts); Schumann, Symphony in B flat.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

JANUARY 20, 1916

SEAT HOLDERS AT SYMPHONY TO REGISTER NAMES

The management of the Symphony orchestra is this week taking the first step in the promised change of methods for disposing of the season tickets. As announced last September the auctions are given up entirely and beginning with next fall all the seats in Symphony hall, both for the Friday and Saturday series, will be sold by subscription at fixed prices. Likewise the owners of seats for this season have an option until March 4 on their seats for the coming season.

The first step in this new process is to have owners of seats for the present season for both series, register their seats, their names and addresses, so that the management will have a complete record of the seats that are held and that no injustice may result from the change.

The registration will be at Symphony hall between the hours of 10 and 1 o'clock on Thursday, Friday and Saturday of each week up to and including March 4, and during the concerts on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. Cards have been provided whereon owners of seats may register.

This registration, it is announced, incurs no obligation. It merely means that the patrons wish to be identified as owners of their seats and to have the opportunity later to subscribe. At the end of the registration they will be notified as to prices.

TRANSCRIPT,
JANUARY 20,

In accordance with the announcement made in September last, all seats for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, both for the Friday and the Saturday series, will henceforth be sold by subscription at fixed prices. Owners of seats for the present season will have the right to retain them for the season of 1916-1917, and from season to season thereafter. For purpose of record, they must register their names, addresses and the seats they own. The registration books will be open at Symphony Hall, beginning Thursday, Jan. 20, and continuing every Thursday, Friday and Saturday thereafter, from 10 to 1, and during the concerts on Fridays and Saturdays. To avoid errors subscribers should present their season tickets when registering. The registration books will close Saturday, March 4, when the option to this year's subscribers will expire. Registration incurs no obligation to subscribe for the coming season. At the end of the registration the fixed prices for next year will be announced.

BOSTON POST,
JANUARY 15, 1916

KELLEY'S SYMPHONY IS ENJOYED

First Performance in Boston—Melba in Fine Voice

BY OLIN DOWNES

Owing to the illness of Dr. Muck, Ernst Schmidt, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted the concert given by that organization yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mme. Melba was soloist. Edgar Stillmann-Kelley's "New England" Symphony was played for the first time in Boston.

FIRST [illegible]

Mr. Kelley's symphony was first performed at the music festival given on the estate of Carl Stoeckel at Norfolk, Conn., June 8, 1913. Mr. Kelley, though born in Wisconsin, is by life-long association and by ancestry keenly sympathetic with the locality and the spirit of New England. Mr. Kelley believes that as yet American expression in music must be local, individual, rather than synthetic.

The motto of the first movement is a quotation from the log book of the Mayflower: "All great and honorable actions are accompanied by great difficulties; and must be both enterprised and overcome with answerable courages." A Cromwellian sentence, fit to inspire any composer of true idealism.

The motto of the second movement: "Warm and fair weather; the birds sang in the woods most pleasantly." Here bird themes, the free transcription of songs actually heard in the woods of New England are employed. Movement III.: "Great lamentation and heaviness." The old funeral hymn, "Why do we mourn departed friends," is employed, and this hymn is employed through the movement as the basis for variations. Movement IV.: "The fit way to honor the departed is to be true to one another and to work bravely for the cause to which living and dead have consecrated themselves." In this movement there are quotations from themes heard in the earlier movements, and the whole comes to a conclusion with the theme of the hymn, with new harmonic and orchestral dress.

In the history of American music Mr. Kelley will occupy a very individual and honorable position. We must not forget that he is of the same generation as Messrs. Chadwick, Parker and Foote.

Features of the Work

The symphony is not founded upon negro folksong or cowboy ditty. It harks back to previous generations, but it is music for the young people of today, nevertheless, and it is the music of a man who, regardless of the caprices of fortune and favor, has written that which he felt it incumbent upon him to write. The entire character of the symphony bears witness to this. The introduction, the stern opening theme, the austere harmonies, the coloring which is severe throughout, with the exception of the second movement, where there are some delightful effects—all these things are admirably adapted to and expressive of the purpose of the work.

The use of the funeral hymn is typical, whether or not we agree with Mr. Kelley's very high estimation of this hymn. He compares it for artistic value to the typical German choral. To us this theme is so peculiarly in place because of its whine, its snivel. We are not so young as to have forgotten these hymns and the morals they drove home on damp Sundays. In the first movement the themes are in admirable contrast. Then there is the re-entrance of the second theme in the second movement, and the restatements of many preceding themes in a dramatic manner at the last.

Deserves Repetition

This symphony deserves to be heard again. Its workmanship places it among the few compositions by American composers which deserve repeated hearings at Symphony concerts. Its spirit is lofty, a noble echo of that which founded America and made it great. The symphony was well received, and a less modest man than the composer, who was present, would have been more in evidence, as the applause continued until Mr. Schmidt bade his orchestra rise to its feet in acknowledgment. The performance was sympathetic and Mr. Schmidt conducted with insight and authority.

Mme. Melba sang Handel's "Sweet Bird" and two airs of Mozart, "Porgi d'amor" from the "Marriage of Figaro," and "Voi che sapete" from "Don Giovanni." She sang Mozart's music with the utmost beauty of tone, and taste and musicianship in delivery. The purity and beauty of this voice are heard under excellent conditions in the music of Mozart. Handel's air is in certain respects more taxing, at least in a technical sense, and its delivery was less felicitous, but all in all, this was one of the most notable appearances which Mme. Melba has given of late years.

The other orchestral pieces of the afternoon were three of the charming dances from Gluck's operas, "Armide" and "Iphigenia in Aulis," as Gaveart has arranged them in the second of two orchestral suites, and Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon."

BOSTON JOURNAL—

JANUARY 20,

SYMPHONY PATRONS REGISTER FOR SEATS

Registration for seats for the Symphony concerts is now going on at Symphony Hall, this innovation being due to the abolition of the auction sales. Cards have been provided for the registering of the regular Symphony patrons' names and addresses. In this way options are being secured on seats for coming seasons. The registration will end March 4.

In the future Symphony seats will be sold by subscription and at fixed prices, but the prices have not yet been announced.

BOSTON POST,
JANUARY 20,

REGISTRATION FOR SYMPHONY

First Step in Changing Seat Sale Method

The management of the Symphony Orchestra is this week taking the first step in the promised change of methods for disposing of the season tickets of the Symphony concerts. As announced last September the auctions are given up entirely and beginning with next fall all the seats in the hall, both for the Friday and Saturday series, will be sold by subscription at fixed prices. Likewise the owners of seats for this season will have an option until a given date, this date being March 4, on their seats for the coming season.

The first step in this new process is to have owners of seats for the present season, for both series, register their seats, their names and addresses, so that the management will have a complete record of the seats that are held and that no injustice may result from the change.

The registration will be at Symphony Hall, between the hours of 10 and 1 on Thursday, Friday and Saturday of each week up to and including March 4, and during the concerts on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. Cards have been provided wherein owners of seats may properly register, and the data on these cards will be then transferred to books, especially prepared for the purpose.

ADVERTISER,

JANUARY 20,

SYMPHONY SEATS TO BE REGISTERED

The management of the Symphony Orchestra is this week taking the first step in the promised change of methods for disposing of the season tickets of the Symphony Concerts. As announced last September, the auctions are given up entirely, and beginning with next fall all the seats in the hall, both for the Friday and Saturday series, will be sold by subscription at fixed prices. Likewise the owners of seats for this season have an option until a given date, this date being March 4, on their seats for the coming season.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date__________________________

Es 1884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD

Varied Programme Offered Concertgoers in Carnegie Hall.

There could be no complaint of lack of variety in the programme which was offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

Brahms's third symphony, with its stately and exuberant measures, given a carefully smooth and spirited reading, was followed by Georges Enesco's "Rhapsodie Roumaine," Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "Island of the Dead," and the overture, "Le Carnaval Romain" of Berlioz.

Probably no greater contrast to Enesco's liveliness and gay spirits could be imagined than the solemn, oppressive "Todteninsel" of Rachmaninoff. To each of them the Boston men did full justice.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date__________________________

Estab

DR. KARL MUCK ILL.

Unable to Conduct Orchestra, but May Do So To-Day.

Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was unable to direct it at the concert which took place last night at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn. Arthur Brooke, flutist, announced that the director would be unable to appear because of an attack of the grip. Ernest Schmidt, a first violinist, took up the baton and directed the concert.

At the Gotham Hotel, where Mr. Muck is stopping, it was announced late last night that he was feeling must better and expected to wield his baton at the concert to be given this afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

to the heart. All three works

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Establis

SCHELLING AS STAR

Famous Virtuoso-Composer Plays Own Composition.

Presents Novelty Of Genuine Worth At Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Presenting for the first time in this city the "Impressions in the Form of Variations on an Original Theme" for orchestra and piano, by Ernest Schelling, the distinguished American virtuoso-composer, and with Mr. Schelling as the pianist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of the season at the Lyric last night under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck.

Mr. Schelling's composition is different from anything of the sort that has ever been presented in this city. While it exploits the piano, it cannot properly be called a solo piece, the parts scored for the instrument being component factors of the orchestration.

Commands Attention.

It is a novelty, and one that, because of its genuine musical worth and the real inspiration that infuses it, commands and holds attention. It was gratifying to note that it was well received and that Mr. Schelling was recalled a number of times.

Mr. Schelling sacrificed every opportunity to make the piano parts predominate, thereby proving himself an artist of high caliber.

Other Numbers Familiar.

The other numbers on the program were familiar. They included Strauss' "Tod und Verklarung," a work whose sublime, unearthly beauty becomes more and more apparent the more it is heard; Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier" and Haydn's E flat symphony, which sounded thin and primitive enough in comparison with the other things, despite its freshness and melodic charm.

The orchestra was in partic good form and played superbl evening. Dr. Muck's reading o Strauss tone-poem was espe clear and threw much illuminati the mystery of this wonderful

W. W

From
Address Brooklyn, N Y
Date 8 1916

Established: L

Boston Symphony Plays New Schelling Work

It is to be hoped that those subscribers to the Boston Symphony who have been "slamming" Dr. Muck so vigorously in The Eagle for his lack of skill in making up programmes were at the Academy last night. If so, they must have enjoyed the gentle satire of Ernest Schelling at Dr. Muck's precise and formal ways. It came in the second variation of Schelling's new composition, "Impressions of an Artist Life in Form of Variations." Brief programme notes go with the variations, indicating their quality, and some of them have initials following to connect them with some particular musician or organization. This canon is marked "Rather martial; precise in rhythm, incisive. K. M." If there were any doubt that "K. M." stood for Karl Muck it would have been dispelled by the sharp angularities of the pianoforte part, which seemed to correspond maliciously with the lines of Dr. Muck's face and to certain shoulder and elbow movements of his when conducting.

The likeness would have been plainer had Dr. Muck been there for comparison, but the conductor is in bed with the grip at the Hotel Gotham, Manhattan, and his place at the stand was taken by Ernest Schmidt, the assistant conductor. The announcement of the change was made by Arthur Brooke, the blond flute player of the orchestra, and Mr. Schmidt justified himself by an excellent performance of the monotonous "Symphony in E Flat," by Haydn, and of the gorgeous "Death and Transfiguration," by Strauss. This vivid and imaginative picture of a man's struggle with death long since won its way to the favor of our concert audiences. Its nobility and power plead eloquently in excuse for Strauss' later eccentricities in his operas, for the wind machine in "Don Quixote" and the squalling baby in the "Domestica." The man was a genius before he became a self-advertiser, and this work is the permanent evidence of his imaginative grasp. The performance was admirable and, although that may have been due to Dr. Muck's thoroughness in rehearsal, it certainly lost nothing by the substitution of Mr. S rformance.

with Carpenter. merely a prelude ions," the most ng new composition which has been offered to a Brooklyn audience for a long, long while, not forgetting Carpenter's "Perambulator" suite, which Mr. Damrosch played here, a few weeks ago. Except for the fact that both these young American composers are highly inventive, that they have something to say and have achieved a thorough mastery of the orchestra in saying it, they are far as the poles apart. Carpenter mingles humor and sentiment very deftly. Schelling's sentiment reaches up toward tragedy where the Chicago man's softens to humor, and in his war, his "Afghan" and his "Lutheran Choral" variations at the close, he rises to a power and sweep which are thrilling. There are twenty-one of these variations and they might easily have become tiresome, but they are all short and the immense variety of their development, with the contrasts obtained by using solo choirs of the orchestra in combination with the piano, keep the attention tense for every moment. The interest was greatly increased because Mr. Schelling played the piano part.

Quality of Schelling's Playing.

Schelling is a pianist of great spirit and of a variety of tonal color which suggests his teacher Paderewski, but he has written a work which reduces the piano to the place of one instrument in the orchestra, combining it in turn with solo instruments of the various choirs and sometimes using it to lead the full orchestra. As a result, he gets almost everything, from a suggestion of the kettledrums up through the harp to the singing tone of a violin and a suggestion of the mellowness of a clarinet or an English horn, from a keyboard which is sometimes regarded as inflexible. His was a wonderful performance and his is a remarkable composition. The enthusiastic recalls by the audience indicate that his "Impressions" will become a standard composition for orchestra. Other pianists may object to his frequent subordination of the instrument, but they can rest assured that the composer himself gets enough out of the piano part to satisfy the most exacting egoist.

The concert closed with a spirited "Rhapsodie Roumaine" by Georges Enesco, who is, or has been recently, an orchestra player in Manhattan. His rhapsody has the vigor and variety which make it useful for a short closing piece for a concert.

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City
Date

Established: L

MUSIC

Conducted by
Sigmund Spaeth

Ernest Schelling Appears as Composer and Pianist with Boston Orchestra—~~Katharine Goodson's Recital—Puccini's "Manon Lescaut."~~

It was Schumann who had the whim of putting the names and nicknames of his friends into his compositions. And it was Schumann also who said that it was easier to write good titles than good music.

Ernest Schelling, who is better known as a pianist than as a composer, and who is, in fact, scheduled for a recital at Aeolian Hall next Monday afternoon, has written a theme and variations for orchestra and pianoforte, and has put into his sub-titles the initials or names of numerous musicians, besides dates and places which influenced him in composing the music. He calls the entire composition "Impressions from an Artist's Life."

Mr. Schelling's theme and variations were played last evening by himself and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At a first hearing the outstanding feature of the music is its extraordinary difficulty. It gives constant opportunities for the display of brilliant virtuosity both by individuals and by the orchestra as a whole.

A Complicated Work.

Even the theme invented by Mr. Schelling as the basis of his variations is a complicated affair. It consists of disjointed phrases in a minor key, elaborately harmonized, with a suggestion of orientalism.

To give a detailed account of the personal and musical characteristics of the nineteen variations is impossible. Nearly all of them have some points of interest in rhythm, harmony or instrumentation.

Karl Muck himself is represented in the second variation, which is described by the composer as "a canon—rather martial—precise in rhythm—incisive." Georges Longy is honored with one of the most difficult oboe solos imaginable. Pavlowa appears in a Spanish dance, Paderewski is reflected in melancholy Polish strains, and Mrs. Schelling inspires a merry Irish reel.

Granados loses his national characteristics in a horn solo, while Gustav Mahler's memory is celebrated in a rough, noisy passage for full orchestra. Fritz Kreisler is relegated to a short viola solo.

There is a deliberately sordid, ugly picture of the outbreak of the war, with an effective use of drums and brass, and finally the Wartburg suggests the playing of the theme in a major key in the manner of a Lutheran choral.

Dr. Muck's orchestra not only gave a brilliant performance of the Schelling work, with valuable assistance from the composer, but also interpreted Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony and the "Sorcerer's Apprentice" of Paul Dukas with rare skill.

[85]

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Establis

SCHELLING AS STAR

Famous Virtuoso-Composer Plays Own Composition.

Presents Novelty Of Genuine Worth At Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Presenting for the first time in this city the "Impressions in the Form of Variations on an Original Theme" for orchestra and piano, by Ernest Schelling, the distinguished American virtuoso-composer, and with Mr. Schelling as the pianist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of the season at the Lyric last night under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck.

Mr. Schelling's composition is different from anything of the sort that has ever been presented in this city. While it exploits the piano, it cannot properly be called a solo piece, the parts scored for the instrument being component factors of the orchestration.

Commands Attention.

It is a novelty, and one that, because of its genuine musical worth and the real inspiration that infuses it, commands and holds attention. It was gratifying to note that it was well received and that Mr. Schelling was recalled a number of times.

Mr. Schelling sacrificed every opportunity to make the piano parts predominate, thereby proving himself an artist of high caliber.

Other Numbers Familiar.

The other numbers on the program were familiar. They included Strauss' "Tod und Verklarung," a work whose sublime, unearthly beauty becomes more and more apparent the more it is heard; Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier" and Haydn's E flat symphony, which sounded thin and primitive enough in comparison with the other things, despite its freshness and melodic charm.

The orchestra was in particularly good form and played superbly all evening. Dr. Muck's reading of the Strauss tone-poem was especially clear and threw much illumination on the mystery of this wonderful score.

W. W. B.

From
Address Brooklyn, N Y
Date JAN 8 1916

Established: L

Boston Symphony Plays New Schelling Work

It is to be hoped that those subscribers to the Boston Symphony who have been "slamming" Dr. Muck so vigorously in The Eagle for his lack of skill in making up programmes were at the Academy last night. If so, they must have enjoyed the gentle satire of Ernest Schelling at Dr. Muck's precise and formal ways. It came in the second variation of Schelling's new composition, "Impressions of an Artist Life in Form of Variations." Brief programme notes go with the variations, indicating their quality, and some of them have initials following to connect them with some particular musician or organization. This canon is marked "Rather martial; precise in rhythm, incisive. K. M." If there were any doubt that "K. M." stood for Karl Muck it would have been dispelled by the sharp angularities of the pianoforte part, which seemed to correspond maliciously with the lines of Dr. Muck's face and to certain shoulder and elbow movements of his when conducting.

The likeness would have been plainer had Dr. Muck been there for comparison, but the conductor is in bed with the grip at the Hotel Gotham, Manhattan, and his place at the stand was taken by Ernest Schmidt, the assistant conductor. The announcement of the change was made by Arthur Brooke, the blond flute player of the orchestra, and Mr. Schmidt justified himself by an excellent performance of the monotonous "Symphony in E Flat," by Haydn, and of the gorgeous "Death and Transfiguration," by Strauss. This vivid and imaginative picture of a man's struggle with death long since won its way to the favor of our concert audiences. Its nobility and power plead eloquently in excuse for Strauss' later eccentricities in his operas, for the wind machine in "Don Quixote" and the squalling baby in the "Domestica." The man was a genius before he became a self-advertiser, and this work is the permanent evidence of his imaginative grasp. The performance was admirable and, although that may have been due to Dr. Muck's thoroughness in rehearsal, it certainly lost nothing by the substitution of Mr. Schmidt in the performance.

Schelling Contrasted with Carpenter.

But this music was merely a prelude v ling "Variations," the most l interesting new composition which has been offered to a Brooklyn audience for a long, long while, not forgeting Carpenter's "Perambulator" suite, which Mr. Damrosch played here, a few weeks ago. Except for the fact that both these young American composers are highly inventive, that they have something to say and have achieved a thorough mastery of the orchestra in saying it, they are far as the poles apart. Carpenter mingles humor and sentiment very deftly. Schelling's sentiment reaches up toward tragedy where the Chicago man's softens to humor, and in his war, his "Afghan" and his "Lutheran Choral" variations at the close, he rises to a power and sweep which are thrilling. There are twenty-one of these variations and they might easily have become tiresome, but they are all short and the immense variety of their development, with the contrasts obtained by using solo choirs of the orchestra in combination with the piano, keep the attention tense for every moment. The interest was greatly increased because Mr. Schelling played the piano part.

Quality of Schelling's Playing.

Schelling is a pianist of great spirit and of a variety of tonal color which suggests his teacher Paderewski, but he has written a work which reduces the piano to the place of one instrument in the orchestra, combining it in turn with solo instruments of the various choirs and sometimes using it to lead the full orchestra. As a result, he gets almost everything, from a suggestion of the kettledrums up through the harp to the singing tone of a violin and a suggestion of the mellowness of a clarinet or an English horn, from a keyboard which is sometimes regarded as inflexible. His was a wonderful performance and his is a remarkable composition. The enthusiastic recalls by the audience indicate that his "Impressions" will become a standard composition for orchestra. Other pianists may object to his frequent subordination of the instrument, but they can rest assured that the composer himself gets enough out of the piano part to satisfy the most exacting egoist.

The concert closed with a spirited "Rhapsodie Roumaine" by Georges Enesco, who is, or has been recently, an orchestra player in Manhattan. His rhapsody has the vigor and variety which make it useful for a short closing piece for a concert.

EVE
New

I: L

MUSIC

Conducted by
Sigmund Spaeth

Ernest Schelling Appears as Composer and Pianist with Boston Orchestra—~~Katharine Goodson's Recital—Puccini's "Manon Lescaut."~~

It was Schumann who had the whim of putting the names and nicknames of his friends into his compositions. And it was Schumann also who said that it was easier to write good titles than good music.

Ernest Schelling, who is better known as a pianist than as a composer, and who is, in fact, scheduled for a recital at Aeolian Hall next Monday afternoon, has written a theme and variations for orchestra and pianoforte, and has put into his sub-titles the initials or names of numerous musicians, besides dates and places which influenced him in composing the music. He calls the entire composition "Impressions from an Artist's Life."

Mr. Schelling's theme and variations were played last evening by himself and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At a first hearing the outstanding feature of the music is its extraordinary difficulty. It gives constant opportunities for the display of brilliant virtuosity both by individuals and by the orchestra as a whole.

A Complicated Work.

Even the theme invented by Mr. Schelling as the basis of his variations is a complicated affair. It consists of disjointed phrases in a minor key, elaborately harmonized, with a suggestion of orientalism.

To give a detailed account of the personal and musical characteristics of the nineteen variations is impossible. Nearly all of them have some points of interest in rhythm, harmony or instrumentation.

Karl Muck himself is represented in the second variation, which is described by the composer as "a canon—rather martial—precise in rhythm—incisive." Georges Longy is honored with one of the most difficult oboe solos imaginable. Pavlowa appears in a Spanish dance, Paderewski is reflected in melancholy Polish strains, and Mrs. Schelling inspires a merry Irish reel.

Granados loses his national characteristics in a horn solo, while Gustav Mahler's memory is celebrated in a rough, noisy passage for full orchestra. Fritz Kreisler is relegated to a short viola solo.

There is a deliberately sordid, ugly picture of the outbreak of the war, with an effective use of drums and brass, and finally the Wartburg suggests the playing of the theme in a major key in the manner of a Lutheran choral.

Dr. Muck's orchestra not only gave a brilliant performance of the Schelling work, with valuable assistance from the composer, but also interpreted Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony and the "Sorcerer's Apprentice" of Paul Dukas with rare skill.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City

Date

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Schelling with Boston Orchestra.

Musical America has got ahead of musical Germany in at least one branch of composition—the art of writing interesting variations. The set of variations by Ernest Schelling played in Carnegie Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is far more entertaining than the several sets of variations heard here in recent years from the fertile pen of Max Reger. Reger holds the record in modern Germany. He can shake a dozen or two improvisations on any given theme out of his sleeves any day and every day of the year. Usually he winds up with an astonishingly brilliant fugue or other "stunt," on which the audience lavishes applause which seems to cover also the dull variations—but it does not.

Mr. Schelling is not obliged to resort to any such device. Like his friend and teacher, Paderewski, he is a far greater master of orchestral coloring and resources than Reger. His Variations—the full name of the composition is "Impressions (from an Artist's Life) in form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Piano"—constitute the most brilliant orchestral work ever composed by an American; and the ingenuity displayed in the instrumental combinations makes his composition extremely interesting. The audience liked it very much and gave its composer the most enthusiastic applause. He played the piano part, which is extremely difficult, himself, with contagious enthusiasm, and a pianistic art which few can match. The fiery introductory part introduces the pianist in a way that takes the hearer by storm and makes him eager to know what is to follow.

A simple schedule printed in the programme book made it easy for the audience to follow the individual variations, giving, at the same time, clues as to the composer's intention. Here are a f samples: II. A canon. Strings w pianoforte. Rather martial. III. Cla net ostinato. V. Full orchestra. Sic ano. VIII. Habanera Aragonese. Full orchestra. Erin. XIX. Concerni the first variation the composer sa "When I wrote it I heard but one tim in my ear, that of that of the Bos Symphony Orchestra; therefore B. S. O What he means by this he thus explai "The variations are impressions of p sonalities, of places, of happenings they happened to strike my imaginati I have usually written an initial o word to go with each variation. Som times these might be of interest to th listener; at other times not." Thus, variation VI (String Quartet and Horn Solo) has Flonzaley printed after it. IX, Strings alone. Polska is followed by the initials of Paderewski. Other initials refer to Kreisler, Dr. Muck, Pfitzner, Mahler, Anna Pavlowa, a Lagoon in North Carolina. Nor is the famous oboist of the orchestra, G. Longy, forgotten. He has a solo which tests even his skill; but then, the whole set of Variations was written avowedly to set forth the virtuosity of the leaders in the various families of this famous orchestra, which, be it said at once, was on its mettle and fully justified its fame. Richard Strauss himself could have hardly subjected it to a more severe test; and the players, like the pianist and Dr. Muck, evidently enjoyed this exhibition of their skill thoroughly; which was one reason why the audience enjoyed it.

The music is particularly fascinating in the Irish number X, and the Spanish number VIII, two fine specimens of rhythmic and melodic local color. It rises to a thrilling climax in XVII A, which is called "August, 1914," and is a reminiscence of the composer's exciting experiences, with his wife (to whom this piece is dedicated), at the outbreak of the war. Concerning the poetic content of this number, Mr. Schelling writes: "Called to arms—over a hill at dusk, legions are marching—marching on irresistibly, inexorably, nothing stopping them—not those who fall by the wayside, not those whose fate is written in the fiery and stormy skies. On they march to victory or disaster, with desolation, suffering, death! War without the glamour!" The music, with its cavalry drums, its blatant brass, and its intonation of the terror-inspiring "Dies Irae" is worthy of Berlioz or Liszt at their best; and splendidly imposing, also, is the concluding number appropriately named "Lutheran Choral. Wartburg, 1915."

To sum up: American music has been enriched by a masterwork. Mr. Schelling's composition was followed by the familiar piece of Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and preceded by Beethoven's more than familiar "Pastoral Symphony," which was played so well, on the whole, that the musicians and their conductor deserved all the applause they got. M. D'Indy, in his book on Beethoven, has pointed out that conductors usually take e Andante (which ends with the quaint itations of nightingale, quail, and ckoo) at too slow a pace, thereby deoying its poetry. This was the case t night, through insufficient attention the words "molto mosso" following the ndante." The thunderstorm was quite citing, though not as tempestuous as en Mahler or Safonoff hurled these mpestuous sounds at the audience.

E 84

AMERICAN
New York City
JAN 9 - 191

DR. MUCK'S NEW PROGRAMME IS REAL TRIUMPH

In a programme of cosmopolitan character Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra achieved a real triumph yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Much unfavorable comment has been directed toward Dr. Muck for the heavy, almost dolorous programmes that have been presented at his New York concerts.

He retrieved himself or should have done so to open-minded concert-goers, by his masterly rendering of the Austrian Brahm's melodious Symphony No. 3; the rich and highly-colored Roumanian rhapsodie by Enesco; the Russian, Rachmaninoff's poetic symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead;" and the French Berlioz's dramatic, picturesque "Roman Carnival."

The orchestra did its most significant work in the symphony. To many conservative music lovers this is Brahms's greatest composition. It was evident that the Bostonians considered it a giant and deserving of its most inspired efforts.

True appreciation of its many melodious measures; an artistic understanding of perfect proportion and balance; tonal color of ravishing beauty, and well-placed accentuation and shading in expression were [illegible] the most noticeable and

---

m EVENING GLOBE
lress: New York City

e

Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

ıblished:

People that shudder and yawn at the mention of Bruckner had a chance to listen to the "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the beginning of its concert in Carnegie Hall last evening. The great audience applauded heartily at the conclusion of the work and Dr. Muck went through the solemn farce of motioning his men to stand up and acknowledge with him the applause. That ceremony might mean something if it did not occur at every concert of the Boston orchestra and of our own Philharmonic Society.

Of Beethoven's "immortal nine" the "Pastoral" is probably the hardest to listen to to-day. Descriptive music has advanced immeasurably since Beethoven wrote it. To-day the "Pastoral" must rely on the sheer genius the composer put into it, as must every work of art whose manner is out of date, and Beethoven put rather less genius into it than into any of its sisters, save possibly the first and the second. Played as it was last night, however, with a perfection that beggars praise, all the melodic inspiration, all the beauty of workmanship, all the instrumental felicities appeared in their strongest light, and one thing is undeniable—that the andante, "Scene by the Brookside," is of the great Beethoven.

After Beethoven's "Pastoral" fancies the Boston men offered their patrons the first hearing in New York of "Impressions (from an Artist's Life) in form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte" by that accomplished pianist Ernest Schelling, which reminds me that I have quite forgotten the original theme. That is perhaps a negligible detail since I can truthfully attest that nineteen of the twenty-one variations were played. (The composer was the pianist.)

Like Elgar in his orchestral variations Mr. Schelling has dedicated richly. "The variations are impressions of personalities, of places, of happenings as they happened to strike my imagination. I have usually written an initial or a word to go with each variation. Sometimes these might be of interest to the listener; at other times not." Mr. Schelling himself avows that the original theme and the first variation are dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "Variation I. is for wood-wind alone. When I wrote it I heard but one timbre in my ear, that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; therefore B. S. O." How could the orchestra refuse to play it after that!

In the K. M. of Variation II., "rather material, precise in rhythm, incisive," it is easy to read Karl Muck. The fourth is openly "in memory of H. Pfitzner." Mr. Schelling's father, Dr. Felix Schelling, is obviously meant by the F. S. of the fifth. The sixth is marked "Flonzaley"—presumably the quartet. The seventh, for oboe and piano, is dedicated to a G. L., who must be Gustave Longy, the incomparable oboist of the Boston orchestra, and the oboist, needless to say, in this instance. A "Habanera Aragonese," marked A. P., may be a tribute to the Associated Press, or only to Adelina Patti, though some insist Anna Pavlowa is intended.

The following "Polska" is unmistakably dedicated to I. J. Paderewski, and so on.—E. G. might be Enrique Granados (Mr. Schelling plays from his "Goyescas" on Monday). N. C. suggests North Carolina. W. M. is perhaps Willem Mengelberg. Why Fritz Kreisler should be celebrated in a variation for viola solo with piano, rather than solo violin, is matter for argument, but at least the variation in question—the viola solo played by that fine artist, Mr. Ferir—is one of the best of the set. A war variation, "August, 1914," might mean the dusty and dejected futility of marching troops. Luther's hymn, "Wartburg, 1915," seems to end the thing in German victory.

At any rate, the audience had a guessing game, as well as the ingenuity and prettiness that appear in the variations, to make up for their length. It is to be hoped all those who hate Bruckner drained the joyous possibilities of this composition.

Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," long a battlehorse of the Boston band, closed a concert preponderantly merry.

PITTS SANBORN.

From SUN
Address: New York City

Date 1916

Establis

BOECKLIN PICTURE IN RUSSIAN MUSIC

Rachmaninov's "Island of the Dead" Played by Dr. Muck.

AND A BRAHMS SYMPHONY

In the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was food for many essays. But here shall be a record of a few facts, together with such passing comment as may be assimilated with a light breakfast. The programme set forth the F major symphony (No. 3) of Johannes Brahms, Enesco's "Rumanian Rhapsody," Sergei Rachmaninov's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," celebrating the familiar picture of Arnold Boecklin, the Swiss painter, and Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnival Romain."

Russian dancers are twinkling their Muscovite toes in every salon. Russian operas are ushered into Broadway with ceremonial trumpetings. Russian music of the Stravinsky type is practised by pianists and rehearsed by orchestras. Let us then approach with bared head the composition of Rachmaninov. He has undertaken to express in music emotions aroused within his sensitive soul by gazing upon the painting. In he showed more continence than H Huber, the Swiss composer, who trie one fell symphony in E minor to gl a small catalogue of Boecklin's c tions.

This Huber work was played in town on November 8, 1902, by the B ton orchestra, then under the ve hand of Wilhelm Gericke. In its movement alone it translates into mu these pictures: "The Sile of Ocean," "Prometheus Chained," " Fluting Nymth," "The Night," "Spor the Waves," "Hermit Fiddling Be Statue of Madonna," "Elysian Fiel "The Dawn of Love" and "Bacchana A considerable assault upon the art interpretation.

The Abbe Liszt, however, had already set the fashion. He had done Orcagna's "Triumph of Death" into "The Dance of Death," had composed Kaulbach's "Battle of the Huns" and hymned several other works. We do not recall that any one has undertaken to carve in marble a fugue of Bach, to paint the fifth symphony of Beethoven or to etch an etude of Chopin. But the futurists and impressionists may yet be driven to it.

Rachmaninov's "Island of the Dead" was performed here on January 27, 1910, by the Russian Symphony Orchestra, the composer conducting, and was repeated a little later by the Bostonians. It made an impression, interested both musicians and laymen, and was promptly laid away in order that the classics might have room.

Boecklin spent much time in the island of Corfu. On its eastern shore he found the broad lagoon of Lake Kalikiopulo, once the Portus Hyllæicus, where the great Ulysses was cast ashore and met the one Nausicaa. And just opposite the entrance to that harbor he saw what the Italians call the Scoglio di Ulisse and the Greeks Pontikinisi, or "Mouse Island." And that bit of land, with its steep rocks and spires of cypress, became the Island of the Dead. It is in full and instructive view of the Kaiser Wilhelm's villa, Achilleion, recently discovered to be a base for submarines.

Rachmaninov, as we have noted, has made no futile endeavor to chant Boecklin's painting. In publishing to us the emotions aroused by the picture in his own heart he has written his own symphony, quite capable of standing on its own feet as an independent musical work. It has moments of impressiveness, as in the insistent repetition of the first [illegible] its cantabile development has something almost noble, yet falling below the composer's manifest aim. But the chief defect of the composition is its length. Compression would have made it a noteworthy work. Its bare spots are now too large.

to the heart. All three works

The same fault mars Enesco's brilliant rhapsody, which is an orchestral virtuoso piece of no small merit. These two compositions were beautifully played and authoritatively conducted. Dr. Muck does not often advertise all the technical brilliancy of the orchestra, nor steep his spirit in such poignant utterance as that of Rachmaninov's best pages. He is apparently happier when singing the master songs of Brahms, as he did yesterday, with a lofty style and a profound feeling which make beauty stand before us in all her majesty.

From TIMES
Address: New York City

Date JAN 9 - 1916

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Music by Brahms, Enesco, Rachmaninoff, and Berlioz.

There was no solo performer at the afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck began his program yesterday with Brahms's third symphony, which has had a period of repose for several seasons past, while conductors have been diligently repeating the other three symphonies of Brahms, after the manner of conductors. It was a beautiful performance, of which the romantic spirit of the second movement and the poetic song of the third were brought forward with a special symphony. There was plenty of vigor in the first; but the playing of the orchestra in this was not quite on its highest level; the fire and trenchant rhythms of the last and the transfigured peace of its closing measures were superbly reproduced.

Es k, 1884

The other orchestral numbers were the first of Georges Enesco's three Rumanian rhapsodies, Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," and Berlioz's overture, the "Roman Carnival." Enesco's rhapsody was played here three years ago by the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Fiedler. It is of much less consequence as a musical composition than his symphony or his suite. It is a succession of lively tunes, dance tunes, apparently, of Rumania, to which the composer has done little or nothing except to write them down brilliantly for the orchestra. In doing this he has apparently accomplished all he attempted. They are good tunes, with character and native rhythms, and they rattled themselves into the good graces of the audience.

Rachmaninoff's tone poem had also been played here, first by the Russian Symphony Orchestra in 1910, under the composer's direction, and a few weeks later by the Boston Orchestra, under Mr. Fiedler. The piece is intended to voice a mood expressed by Arnold Böcklin's picture of the same title. The picture is known here only through reproductions; it may be doubted whether everybody in yesterday's audience had seen even reproductions of it. Did they who knew not the picture receive the full meaning of the music? Most other programs may be set before the anxious listener in some form or other; a description of a picture, even so eloquent as Mr. Hale's in the program notes, is only less unsatisfactory than a description of music. The composition has much that is impressive without an interpretation, but it is written at too great length, which becomes prolixity. The monotonous figure at the beginning suggests the lapping of the waves, and persists through much of the music. There is a fragment of the plain-song intonation of the "Dies Irae," also much repeated; the monotony is broken by a wildly passionate climax, like a lamentation; and then the mournful tranquility returns. A positive and unmistakable mood is established throughout the music, which is in its essence profoundly impressive. A pity that so much of the impressiveness is squandered by the excessive length to which the composer pursues his ideas. Dr. Muck's reading was one that gave the music its full signif-

---

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.

Date

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Die dritte Symphonie von Brahms kann man viel eher als die kürzlich geſpielte erſte zu den „Paradeſtücken" des unvergleichlichen Boſtoner Orcheſters rechnen. Die „durchbrochene Arbeit" und das feine Filigran der Mittelſtimmen kann in ſolcher vollendeten Plaſtik nur von einem Orcheſterkörper freigelegt werden, in dem jedes Glied, jede Gruppe auf gleicher Höhe ſteht. In der Wahl der Tempi, gegen die bei Brahms ſo viel und zwar immer nach der Seite des „zu ſchnell" gefehlt wird, war Herrn Dr. Mucks Leitung vorbildlich.

Estab 34

Die nächſte Programmnummer, eine der rumäniſchen Rhapſodien von Georges Enesco, iſt als leichtere Unterhaltungsmuſik, in der die Boſtoner alle Regiſter orcheſtraler Bravour ziehen konnten, eine willkommene Bekanntſchaft. Höhere muſikaliſche Anſprüche macht dieſe Paraphraſe rumäniſcher Volksmelodien, die zum Teil an die ungariſchen anklingen, indeſſen nicht.

Mit Rachmaninoffs „Toteninſel", einer ſymphoniſchen Dichtung „zum" Gemälde von Böcklin, waren wir wieder in einer Welt der tragiſchen Gefühle. Es iſt eine klangſchöne, nationale Beſonderheiten diskret verwendende Tondichtung, die zum Glück auch ohne die etwas vage Beziehung zu Böcklin ihren Wert behält und ſich in wirkungsvoller Steigerung aufbaut, obgleich die architektoniſche Dispoſition nicht leicht zu überblicken iſt. Der Komponiſt hat das Werk vor einigen Jahren hier ſelbſt dirigiert. An Berlioz' „Ouverture" zum „Römiſchen Carneval", die das Konzert beſchloß, hätten manche Hörer den Schlußteil vielleicht gern in einen mehr karnevalsartigen Taumel aus- [illegible]

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City

Date

MUSIC AND DRAM

Schelling with Boston Orches

Musical America has got ahead sical Germany in at least one of composition—the art of writing sting variations. The set of vari by Ernest Schelling played in Carn Hall last night by the Boston Symp Orchestra is far more entertaining the several sets of variations heard in recent years from the fertile p Max Reger. Reger holds the reco modern Germany. He can shake a en or two improvisations on any theme out of his sleeves any day every day of the year. Usually he w up with an astonishingly brilliant fi or other "stunt," on which the audience lavishes applause which seems to cover also the dull variations—but it does not.

Mr. Schelling is not obliged to resort to any such device. Like his friend and teacher, Paderewski, he is a far greater master of orchestral coloring and resources than Reger. His Variations—the full name of the composition is "Impressions (from an Artist's Life) in form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Piano"—constitute the most brilliant orchestral work ever composed by an American; and the ingenuity displayed in the instrumental combinations makes his composition extremely interesting. The audience liked it very much and gave its composer the most enthusiastic applause. He played the piano part, which is extremely difficult, himself, with contagious enthusiasm, and a pianistic art which few can match. The fiery introductory part introduces the pianist in a way that takes the hearer by storm and makes him eager to know what is to follow.

A simple schedule printed in the programme book made it easy for the audience to follow the individual variations, giving, at the same time, clues as to the composer's intention. Here are a few samples: II. A canon. Strings with pianoforte. Rather martial. III. Clarinet ostinato. V. Full orchestra. Siciliano. VIII. Habanera Aragonese. X. Full orchestra. Erin. XIX. Concerning the first variation the composer says: "When I wrote it I heard but one timbre in my ear, that of that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; therefore B. S. O." What he means by this he thus explains: "The variations are impressions of personalities, of places, of happenings as they happened to strike my imagination. I have usually written an initial or a word to go with each variation. Sometimes these might be of interest to the listener; at other times not." Thus, variation VI (String Quartet and Horn Solo) has Flonzaley printed after it. IX, Strings alone. Polska is followed by the initials of Paderewski. Other initials refer to Kreisler, Dr. Muck, Pfitzner, Mahler, Anna Pavlowa, a Lagoon in North Carolina. Nor is the famous oboist of the orchestra, G. Longy, forgotten. He has a solo which tests even his skill; but then, the whole set of Variations was written avowedly to set forth the virtuosity of the leaders in the various families of this famous orchestra, which, be it said at once, was on its mettle and fully justified its fame. Richard Strauss himself could have hardly subjected it to a more severe test; and the players, like the pianist and Dr. Muck, evidently enjoyed this exhibition of their skill thoroughly; which was one reason why the audience enjoyed it.

The music is particularly fascinating in the Irish number X, and the Spanish number VIII, two fine specimens of rhythmic and melodic local color. It rises to a thrilling climax in XVII A, which is called "August, 1914," and is a reminiscence of the composer's exciting experiences, with his wife (to whom this piece is dedicated), at the outbreak of the war. Concerning the poetic content of this number, Mr. Schelling writes: "Called to arms—over a hill at dusk, legions are marching—marching on irresistibly, inexorably, nothing stopping them—not those who fall by the wayside, not those whose fate is written in the fiery and stormy skies. On they march to victory or disaster, with desolation, suffering, death! War without the glamour!" The music, with its cavalry drums, its blatant brass, and its intonation of the terror-inspiring "Dies Irae" is worthy of Berlioz or Liszt at their best; and splendidly imposing, also, is the concluding number appropriately named "Lutheran Choral. Wartburg, 1915."

To sum up: American music has been enriched by a masterwork. Mr. Schelling's composition was followed by the familiar piece of Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and preceded by Beethoven's more than familiar "Pastoral Symphony," which was played so well, on the whole, that the musicians and their conductor deserved all the applause they got. M. D'Indy, in his book on Beethoven, has pointed out that conductors usually take the Andante (which ends with the quaint imitations of nightingale, quail, and cuckoo) at too slow a pace, thereby destroying its poetry. This was the case last night, through insufficient attention to the words "molto mosso" following the "andante." The thunderstorm was quite exciting, though not as tempestuous as when Mahler or Safonoff hurled these tempestuous sounds at the audience.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City JAN 9 - 1916

Date

Establis

DR. MUCK'S NEW PROGRAMME IS REAL TRIUMPH

In a programme of cosmopolitan character Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra achieved a real triumph yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Much unfavorable comment has been directed toward Dr. Muck for the heavy, almost dolorous programmes that have been presented at his New York concerts.

He retrieved himself or should have done so to open-minded concert-goers, by his masterly rendering of the Austrian Brahm's melodious Symphony No. 3; the rich and highly-colored Roumanian rhapsodie by Enesco; the Russian, Rachmaninoff's poetic symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead;" and the French Berlioz's dramatic, picturesque "Roman Carnival."

The orchestra did its most significant work in the symphony. To many conservative music lovers this is Brahms's greatest composition. It was evident that the Bostonians considered it a giant and deserving of its most inspired efforts.

True appreciation of its many melodious measures; an artistic understanding of perfect proportion and balance; tonal color of ravishing beauty, and well-placed accentuation and shading in expression were among the most noticeable and praiseworthy features of Dr. Muck's reading.

The usual crowded house attended and the usual discreet show of appreciation followed each selection.

Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

People that shudder and yawn at the mention of Bruckner had a chance to listen to the "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the beginning of its concert in Carnegie Hall last evening. The great audience applauded heartily at the conclusion of the work and Dr. Muck went through the solemn farce of motioning his men to stand up and acknowledge with him the applause. That ceremony might mean something if it did not occur at every concert of the Boston orchestra and of our own Philharmonic Society.

Of Beethoven's "immortal nine" the "Pastoral" is probably the hardest to listen to to-day. Descriptive music has advanced immeasurably since Beethoven wrote it. To-day the "Pastoral" must rely on the sheer genius the composer put into it, as must every work of art whose manner is out of date, and Beethoven put rather less genius into it than into any of its sisters, save possibly the first and the second. Played as it was last night, however, with a perfection that beggars praise, all the melodic inspiration, all the beauty of workmanship, all the instrumental felicities appeared in their strongest light, and one thing is undeniable—that the andante, "Scene by the Brookside," is of the great Beethoven.

After Beethoven's "Pastoral" fancies the Boston men offered their patrons the first hearing in New York of "Impressions (from an Artist's Life) in form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte" by that accomplished pianist Ernest Schelling, which reminds me that I have quite forgotten the original theme. That is perhaps a negligible detail since I can truthfully attest that nineteen of the twenty-one variations were played. (The composer was the pianist.)

Like Elgar in his orchestral variations Mr. Schelling has dedicated richly. "The variations are impressions of personalities, of places, of happenings as they happened to strike my imagination. I have usually written an initial or a word to go with each variation. Sometimes these might be of interest to the listener; at other times not." Mr. Schelling himself avows that the original theme and the first variation are dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "Variation I. is for wood-wind alone. When I wrote it I heard but one timbre in my ear, that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; therefore B. S. O." How could the orchestra refuse to play it after that!

In the K. M. of Variation II., "rather material, precise in rhythm, incisive," it is easy to read Karl Muck. The fourth is openly "in memory of H. Pfitzner." Mr. Schelling's father, Dr. Felix Schelling, is obviously meant by the F. S. of the fifth. The sixth is marked "Flonzaley"—presumably the quartet. The seventh, for oboe and piano, is dedicated to a G. L., who must be Gustave Longy, the incomparable oboist of the Boston orchestra, and the oboist, needless to say, in this instance. A "Habanera Aragonese," marked A. P., may be a tribute to the Associated Press, or only to Adelina Patti, though some insist Anna Pavlowa is intended.

The following "Polska" is unmistakably dedicated to I. J. Paderewski, and so on.—E. G. might be Enrique Granados (Mr. Schelling plays from his "Goyescas" on Monday). N. C. suggests North Carolina. W. M. is perhaps Willem Mengelberg. Why Fritz Kreisler should be celebrated in a variation for viola solo with piano, rather than solo violin, is matter for argument, but at least the variation in question—the viola solo played by that fine artist, Mr. Ferir—is one of the best of the set. A war variation, "August, 1914," might mean the dusty and dejected futility of marching troops. Luther's hymn, "Wartburg, 1915," seems to end the thing in German victory.

At any rate, the audience had a guessing game, as well as the ingenuity and prettiness that appear in the variations, to make up for their length. It is to be hoped all those who hate Bruckner drained the joyous possibilities of this composition.

Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," long a battlehorse of the Boston band, closed a concert preponderantly merry.

PITTS SANBORN.

From SUN
Address: New York City

Date 1916

Establis

BOECKLIN PICTURE IN RUSSIAN MUSIC

Rachmaninov's "Island of the Dead" Played by Dr. Muck.

AND A BRAHMS SYMPHONY

In the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was food for many essays. But here shall be a record of a few facts, together with such passing comment as may be assimilated with a light breakfast. The programme set forth the F major symphony (No. 3) of Johannes Brahms, Enesco's "Rumanian Rhapsody," Sergei Rachmaninov's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," celebrating the familiar picture of Arnold Boecklin, the Swiss painter, and Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnival Romain."

Russian dancers are twinkling their Muscovite toes in every salon. Russian operas are ushered into Broadway with ceremonial trumpetings. Russian music of the Stravinsky type is practised by pianists and rehearsed by orchestras. Let us then approach with bared head the composition of Rachmaninov. He has undertaken to express in music emotions aroused within his sensitive soul by gazing upon the painting. In this he showed more continence than Hans Huber, the Swiss composer, who tried in one fell symphony in E minor to glorify a small catalogue of Boecklin's creations.

This Huber work was played in this town on November 8, 1902, by the Boston orchestra, then under the velvet hand of Wilhelm Gericke. In its last movement alone it translates into music these pictures: "The Silence of the Ocean," "Prometheus Chained," "The Fluting Nymth," "The Night," "Sport of the Waves," "Hermit Fiddling Before Statue of Madonna," "Elysian Fields," "The Dawn of Love" and "Bacchanale." A considerable assault upon the art of interpretation.

The Abbe Liszt, however, had already set the fashion. He had done Orcagna's "Triumph of Death" into "The Dance of Death," had composed Kaulbach's "Battle of the Huns" and hymned several other works. We do not recall that any one has undertaken to carve in marble a fugue of Bach, to paint the fifth symphony of Beethoven or to etch an etude of Chopin. But the futurists and impressionists may yet be driven to it.

Rachmaninov's "Island of the Dead" was performed here on January 27, 1910, by the Russian Symphony Orchestra, the composer conducting, and was repeated a little later by the Bostonians. It made an impression, interested both musicians and laymen, and was promptly laid away in order that the classics might have room.

Boecklin spent much time in the island of Corfu. On its eastern shore he found the broad lagoon of Lake Kalikiopulo, once the Portus Hyllæicus, where the great Ulysses was cast ashore and met the one Nausicaa. And just opposite the entrance to that harbor he saw what the Italians call the Scoglio di Ulisse and the Greeks Pontikinisi, or "Mouse Island." And that bit of land, with its steep rocks and spires of cypress, became the Island of the Dead. It is in full and instructive view of the Kaiser Wilhelm's villa, Achilleion, recently discovered to be a base for submarines.

Rachmaninov, as we have noted, has made no futile endeavor to chant Boecklin's painting. In publishing to us the emotions aroused by the picture in his own heart he has written his own symphony, quite capable of standing on its own feet as an independent musical work. It has moments of impressiveness, as in the insistent repetition of [illegible] to the heart. All three works the first [illegible] its cantabile development has something almost noble, yet falling below the composer's manifest aim. But the chief defect of the composition is its length. Compression would have made it a noteworthy work. Its bare spots are now too large.

The same fault mars Enesco's brilliant rhapsody, which is an orchestral virtuoso piece of no small merit. These two compositions were beautifully played and authoritatively conducted. Dr. Muck does not often advertise all the technical brilliancy of the orchestra, nor steep his spirit in such poignant utterance as that of Rachmaninov's best pages. He is apparently happier when singing the master songs of Brahms, as he did yesterday, with a lofty style and a profound feeling which make beauty stand before us in all her majesty.

From TIMES
Address: New York City

Date JAN 9 - 1916

Est k, 1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Music by Brahms, Enesco, Rachmaninoff, and Berlioz.

There was no solo performer at the afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck began his program yesterday with Brahms's third symphony, which has had a period of repose for several seasons past, while conductors have been diligently repeating the other three symphonies of Brahms, after the manner of conductors. It was a beautiful performance, of which the romantic spirit of the second movement and the poetic song of the third were brought forward with a special symphony. There was plenty of vigor in the first; but the playing of the orchestra in this was not quite on its highest level; the fire and trenchant rhythms of the last and the transfigured peace of its closing measures were superbly reproduced.

The other orchestral numbers were the first of Géorges Enesco's three Rumanian rhapsodies, Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," and Berlioz's overture, the "Roman Carnival." Enesco's rhapsody was played here three years ago by the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Fiedler. It is of much less consequence as a musical composition than his symphony or his suite. It is a succession of lively tunes, dance tunes, apparently, of Rumania, to which the composer has done little or nothing except to write them down brilliantly for the orchestra. In doing this he has apparently accomplished all he attempted. They are good tunes, with character and native rhythms, and they rattled themselves into the good graces of the audience.

Rachmaninoff's tone poem had also been played here, first by the Russian Symphony Orchestra in 1910, under the composer's direction, and a few weeks later by the Boston Orchestra, under Mr. Fiedler. The piece is intended to voice a mood expressed by Arnold Böcklin's picture of the same title. The picture is known here only through reproductions; it may be doubted whether everybody in yesterday's audience had seen even reproductions of it. Did they who knew not the picture receive the full meaning of the music? Most other programs may be set before the anxious listener in some form or other; a description of a picture, even so eloquent as Mr. Hale's in the program notes, is only less unsatisfactory than a description of music. The composition has much that is impressive without an interpretation, but it is written at too great length, which becomes prolixity. The monotonous figure at the beginning suggests the lapping of the waves, and persists through much of the music. There is a fragment of the plain-song intonation of the "Dies Irae," also much repeated; the monotony is broken by a wildly passionate climax, like a lamentation; and then the mournful tranquility returns. A positive and unmistakable mood is established throughout the music, which is in its essence profoundly impressive. A pity that so much of the impressiveness is squandered by the excessive length to which the composer pursues his ideas. Dr. Muck's reading was one that gave the music its full signif-

---

STAATSZEITUNG
s: New York City.

cab 4

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Die dritte Symphonie von Brahms kann man viel eher als die kürzlich geſpielte erſte zu den „Paradeſtücken" des unvergleichlichen Boſtoner Orcheſters rechnen. Die „durchbrochene Arbeit" und das feine Filigran der Mittelſtimmen kann in ſolcher vollendeten Plaſtik nur von einem Orcheſterkörper freigelegt werden, in dem jedes Glied, jede Gruppe auf gleicher Höhe ſteht. In der Wahl der Tempi, gegen die bei Brahms ſo viel und zwar immer nach der Seite des „zu ſchnell" gefehlt wird, war Herrn Dr. Mucks Leitung vorbildlich.

Die nächſte Programmnummer, eine der rumäniſchen Rhapſodien von Georges Enesco, iſt als leichtere Unterhaltungsmuſik, in der die Boſtoner alle Regiſter orcheſtraler Bravour ziehen konnten, eine willkommene Bekanntſchaft. Höhere muſikaliſche Anſprüche macht dieſe Paraphraſe rumäniſcher Volksmelodien, die zum Teil an die ungariſchen anklingen, indeſſen nicht.

Mit Rachmanninoffs „Toteninſel", einer ſymphoniſchen Dichtung „zum" Gemälde von Böcklin, waren wir wieder in einer Welt der tragiſchen Gefühle. Es iſt eine klangſchöne, nationale Beſonderheiten diskret verwendende Tondichtung, die zum Glück auch ohne die etwas vage Beziehung zu Böcklin ihren Wert behält und ſich in wirkungsvoller Steigerung aufbaut, obgleich die architektoniſche Diſpoſition nicht leicht zu überblicken iſt. Der Komponiſt hat das Werk vor einigen Jahren hier ſelbſt dirigiert. An Berlioz' „Ouverture" zum „Römiſchen Carneval", die das Konzert beſchloß, hätten manche Hörer den Schlußteil vielleicht gern in einen mehr karnevalsartigen Taumel aus- [illegible]

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 8 - 1916

BOSTONIANS PLAY WITHOUT DR. MUCK

Conductor Ill With Grip and Ernst Schmidt Drops Violin for Baton.

BRINGS BACK OLD THRILL.

Schelling's Variations Triumph at First Hearing Here.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is to-day ill with grip at his apartments in the Hotel Gotham, Manhattan. He was suffering from a severe cold when he came to New York on Thursday to conduct the concert at Carnegie Hall and fulfilled his task that evening against the advice of his physician. But last night, when his orchestra gave the third concert of the Brooklyn subscription series at the Academy of Music, he was too ill to appear.

His place was taken by Ernst Schmidt, assistant conductor, and one of the first violinists of the orchestra for the past two years. The announcement of Dr. Muck's indisposition was made at the beginning of the concert by Arthur Brooke, the flutist.

Much Restraint Forgotten.

Mr. Schmidt rose to the occasion bravely and "the perfect orchestra" lost none of its perfection under his guidance. He "let her go" in the playing of the Strauss tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," with a result that brought an almost forgotten thrill to an audience which for the past few seasons has always had its feelings well restrained by Dr. Muck's precise readings. Not since the days of Mahler and Safonoff has the orchestra been allowed to burst out in such a tempest of glorious color as it was last night. It was as exciting as if Stransky had weilded the baton.

The concert opened with Haydn's symphony in E flat major, and if the listener closed his eyes he would be ready to swear that it was Dr. Muck who was conducting. All of the clean-cut ryhthm and delicacy of tone that make the indisposed leader's interpretations of the classics so distinctive were preserved.

Schilling's "Impressions."

The feature of the evening came after the Strauss number. It was the first performance in Brooklyn of "Impressions (from an Artist's Life)," by Ernest Schelling, the American pianist. It is composed in the form of variations on an original theme for orchestra and piano. The piano was played last night by Schelling himself. It had been the night before at Carnegie and met with a reception from critics that ranged from great thusiasm—one writer calling it most brilliant orchestral work composed by an American"—to lite surprise at the skill in or tration the composer had disp Ahe fas as last night s aud went, the most enthusiastic was the sort that the number ed. It was composed, Mr. Sch himself says, with the timbre Boston Symphony Orchestra ear. "Therefore the B. S. O. adds. Of course, after that, only fitting that the orchestra play it. In his explanatory notes, Mr. Schelling shows a fondness for intials. "K. M.' characterizes Dr. Karl Muck, in an incisive measure; "A. P." introduces Anna Pavlowa, with a graceful habanera; "G. L." is for G. Longwy, the famous oboist of the orchestra. And so he goes on with impressions of Paderewski, Mahler and other persons.

Climax Inspired by War.

There is also a lagoon in North Carolina, an Irish dance, and, best of all, a tremendous piece of descriptive writing in the climax, "August, 1914." This was inspired by Mr. Schelling's experience in Europe at that time, and it introduces drums in cavalry measures, brass marching on inexorably and fatalistic warnings from the strings. Throughout theer is intoned the awful despair of the "Dies Irae." The impressions end with a magnificent "Lutheran Choral"—Wartburg, 1915."

Every player of such a number must be a virtuoso, and every player in the Boston orchestra is, so it was superbly performed. Mr. Schelling, setting himself a difficult task at the piano, won chief honors, playing in a dazzling manner. He was recalled many times by the audience, and the band stood up to bow.

The concert concluded with Enesco's "Rhapsodie Roumaine."

At the concert in Carnegie Hall this afternoon it is very doubtful that Dr. Muck will be recovered sufficiently to conduct.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date

BAD MANNERS AT CONCERTS.

To the Editor of The World:

I don't know that I shall subscribe again for my two seats to the evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city. The reason for my abandonment of my holdings (if I so decide finally) is to be found not at all in Dr. Muck and his men, but in the audience—at least that portion sitting near me.

The inconceivable thing to me is that people can possibly be so rude!

I was brought up on these concerts in Boston when I lived there. In the old Music Hall on Winter Street, and later in Symphony Hall on Huntington Avenue, the moment the conductor raises his baton the great audience becomes absolutely quiet—and will remain so until the number shall end. Not a whisper—hardly a movement. To break this rule would be to declare one's self hopelessly ill-bred. But no one ever did break it, for the people who met there were present to hear the deligh music.

I have lived in New York for six seven years, and all that time I h attended these concerts in Carne Hall. One of them took place last e ning. People—both men and women in front of me and behind me, talke gazed about, arranged their hair a otherwise showed not only an appa ently total indifference to the wonder music, but also to the proprieties. Fu thermore, I am convinced that they w be astonished at this criticism of min and will be quite unable to understan how they have been in error in th least. Some of the women even wore broad and lofty headgear—totally unmindful of those behind them who might wish to note the rise and fall of the Muck baton.

What amazes me is that such peopl should spend their money to go to su a place. What can there possibly in it for them? No man or woma who, when a delightful passage is bein played by this incomparable orchestr totally ignores the performers and gaz up into the boxes or holds conver with a neighbor can be said to be ge ting value received from the music.

Now, don't anybody rise up and r ply to me that if I like Boston so mu better I'd better go there. Not at a New York suits me, speaking generall I'd rather live here than in any oth city that I ever saw—and I've seen few. But, all the same, when Bost people go to hear one of the world's greatest orchestras they know how to behave. They give the very closest attention—preserve intense silence—forget themselves absolutely in the presence of the greatest possible interpretation of Beethoven, Brahms, Bach and their giant compeers.

Good manners need not depend upon geography. OLD SUBSCRIBER.

New York, Jan. 7.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date JAN 9 - 1916

FOR DR. AND MRS. MUCK.

Mr. and Mrs. Irion Entertain for Conductor and His Wife.

Mr. Herman H. Irion and his wife, Mrs. Irion, who is known professionally as Mme. Yolanda Mero, pianist, gave a supper for Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Muck on last Thursday at their home at Euclid Hall. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. Josef Stransky, Mr. and Mrs. Fred T. Steinway, Mme. Melanie Kurt, Mr. and Mrs. Efrem Zimbalist, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Gaertner, Mme. Julia Culp, Mme. Clara Cabrilowitsch, Mrs. Samuel Untermyer, Mr. Robert E. Dowling, Mr. Alexander Steinert, Dr. H. A. Cassebeer and Mr. Paul Strauss.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City
Date JAN 8 - 1916

Dr. Karl Muck Is Ill.

Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was unable to direct it at the concert which took place at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn. Arthur Brooke, flutist, announced that the director would be unable to appear because of an attack of the grip. Ernest Schmidt, a first violinist, took up the baton and directed the concert.

At the Gotham Hotel, where Mr. Muck is stopping, it was announced late last night that he was feelingg much better and expected to wield his baton at the concert to be given this afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 7 - 1916

LECTURE RECITAL BY MACDOUGALL

Theme Is Symphony Programme for To-Night.

The programme that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play to-night at the Academy of Music was considered last evening in a lecture-recital by Professor Hamilton C. Macdougall, of Wellesley College, before a Brooklyn Institute audience assembled in the lecture hall. Professor Macdougall devoted the greater part of his discourse to the two biggest numbers on the programme, the tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," of Richard Strauss, and the Haydn symphony in E flat major.

This tone poem of Strauss' represents the second Strauss, he said, not the first Strauss, with classical tendencies. There are two ways of being original, he remarked—one, to do things that have never been done before; the other, to do old things in a new way—and that is what Strauss has done in this composition; he has taken something old and done something entirely new with it. Dr. Macdougall played the various motives, pointing out the curious, soft, disjointed notes, the baffling rythm of the death motive, the luscious harmonies of the melody of youth, the curious theme which some commentators call the fever theme. In the lovely chords at the last, he said, the orchestral instrument are so well distributed that a maximum sonority is gained.

Professor Macdougall discussed the propriety of programme music, practically all music written to-day having a title affixed to it. But no programme piece can express all of the story it denotes, the most that music can do is to express the general idea, especially emotions, he said. But one should not berate those who enjoy music as picture-making, he declared. In concluding his treatment of the Strauss tone poem, Professor Macdougall said that Strauss was clever, often diabolically clever, but never reverent.

Then he took up the Haydn symphony, which he said Dr. Muck has wisely put at the beginning of the programme, as it would sound tame and flat if produced after the wonderful tone color of Strauss. This symphony is a type of the lovely, graceful music toward which young people of the present day are often too blase. He played the introduction, with the beating notes of the kettledrum, the bubbling notes of the allegro, then parts of the andante, the pretty minuet and the simple theme of the beautiful finale. This surprise symphony of Haydn's, as it is called, is characterized by one marked Haydn peculiarity, long blocks of piano passages, contrasting with similarly long stretches of fortissimo parts.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date JAN 9 - 1916

DR. MUCK LEADS ORCHESTRA AGAIN

Conductor of Boston Symphony Recovers from Grip—Orchestra Not at Its Best.

Having recovered from his sudden attack of grip, Dr. Karl Muck, who had not been able to lead the Boston Symphony at its Brooklyn concert on Friday night, appeared at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon and conducted the orchestra through a concert that was applauded by a large audience.

It was by no means a flawless performance that the famous organization gave of Brahms' Third Symphony. There were slips on the part of the players, particularly in the first movement. The second movement was infinitely better played, but neither that section nor the remaining two movements were up to the standard of the Boston Symphony.

Then came a Roumanian Rhapsodie, opus 11, No. 1, written by Georges Enesco, in which Roumanian themes are cleverly employed and which is interesting, although it suffers from too frequent employment of the same material. Next was heard Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," a gloomy, rather tedious work save for its effectively reared climaxes.

Finally came the best playing of the afternoon, a really wonderful interpretation of Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" overture, which sent everybody away in good spirits. But for all that the Boston Orchestra has given much more interesting concerts and better exhibitions of playing than yesterday.

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date JAN

A programme of just the right length and just the right kind was played last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. There was the requisite symphony, Beethoven's "Pastoral," and the light bit at the end to send one home humming Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice." The feature of the concert was a most interesting composition by Ernest Schelling, the American pianist, with Mr. Schelling himself at the piano. The work is a series of variations on an original theme entitled "Impressions from an Artist's Life." The main theme is a vivid one, full of youth and nobility. On it are embroidered the impressions of persons, places and events, and these pictures are so full of variety, so characteristic, that one needs no programme notes to tell where the artist has remembered the colorful Orient, or returned in memory to Russia or Italy. Several variations are in memory of the composer's friends, and a fine military march and dirge points back to August, 1914.

The orchestration is brilliant throughout and there is something so spontaneous in the work that it makes instant appeal. The piano part, except in the opening, does not give the impression of having been written by a pianist, for often the piano is only an accompaniment to the beautiful solos for different instruments in the orchestra. When he did allow himself to show his skill, Mr. Schelling played with power and beauty, and with the poetry and imagination which show so plainly in his composition.

From EAGLE
Address klyn,
Date JAN 7 - 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY LECTURE.

Programme for Tonight's Concert Analyzed by Professor Macdougall.

The programme that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play tonight at the Academy of Music was considered last evening in a lecture-recital by Professor Hamilton C. Macdougall of Wellesley College, before an Institute audience in the lecture hall of the Academy. He dealt chiefly with the Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss, and the Haydn Symphony in E flat major. The Tone Poem, he said, represents the second, not the first, Strauss, with classical tendencies. Strauss did old things in a new way, in the composition. Dr. Macdougall played the motives, pointing out the curious, soft, disjointed notes, the baffling rythm of the death motive, and the luscious harmonies of the melody of youth, the theme which some commentators call the "fever" theme. In the lovely chords at the last, he said, the orchestral instruments are so well distributed that a maximum sonority is gained. The lecturer, alluding to the propriety of programme music, said that practically all music written to-day has a title affixed to it. But no programme piece can express all of the story it denotes; the most that music can do is to express the general idea, especially emotions. But one should not berate those who enjoy music as picture making, he declared. In the Strauss Tone Poem, Professor Macdougall said that Strauss was clever, often diabolically clever, but never reverent.

The Haydn Symphony, the speaker said, Dr. Muck has wisely put at the beginning of the programme, as it would sound tame and flat if produced after the wonderful tone color of Strauss. The symphony is a type of the lovely, graceful music, toward which young people of the present day are often too blase. He played the introduction, with the beating notes of the kettledrum; the bubbling notes of the Allegro; then parts of the Andante, the pretty Minuet and the simple theme of the beautiful finale. This "surprise" symphony, as it is called, is characterized by a marked Haydn peculiarity in long blocks of piano passages, contrasting with similarly long stretches of fortissimo parts.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 8 - 1916

BOSTONIANS PLAY WITHOUT DR. MUCK

Conductor Ill With Grip and Ernst Schmidt Drops Violin for Baton.

BRINGS BACK OLD THRILL.

Schelling's Variations Triumph at First Hearing Here.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is to-day ill with grip at his apartments in the Hotel Gotham, Manhattan. He was suffering from a severe cold when he came to New York on Thursday to conduct the concert at Carnegie Hall and fulfilled his task that evening against the advice of his physician. But last night, when his orchestra gave the third concert of the Brooklyn subscription series at the Academy of Music, he was too ill to appear.

His place was taken by Ernst Schmidt, assistant conductor, and one of the first violinists of the orchestra for the past two years. The announcement of Dr. Muck's indisposition was made at the beginning of the concert by Arthur Brooke, the flutist.

Much Restraint Forgotten.

Mr. Schmidt rose to the occasion bravely and "the perfect orchestra" lost none of its perfection under his guidance. He "let her go" in the playing of the Strauss tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," with a result that brought an almost forgotten thrill to an audience which for the past few seasons has always had its feelings well restrained by Dr. Muck's precise readings. Not since the days of Mahler and Safonoff has the orchestra been allowed to burst out in such a tempest of glorious color as it was last night. It was as exciting as if Stransky had weilded the baton.

The concert opened with Haydn's symphony in E flat major, and if the listener closed his eyes he would be ready to swear that it was Dr. Muck who was conducting. All of the clean-cut ryhthm and delicacy of tone that make the indisposed leader's interpretations of the classics so distinctive were preserved.

Schilling's "Impressions."

The feature of the evening came after the Strauss number. It was the first performance in Brooklyn of "Impressions (from an Artist's Life)," by Ernest Schelling, the American pianist. It is composed in the form of variations on an original theme for orchestra and piano. The piano was played last night by Schelling himself. It had been the night before at Carnegie and met with a reception from critics that ranged from great thusiasm—one writer calling it most brilliant orchestral work composed by an American"—to lite surprise at the skill in or tration the composer had disp

Ahe fas as last night s aud went, the most enthusiastic was the sort that the number ed. It was composed, Mr. Sch himself says, with the timbre Boston Symphony Orchestra ear. "Therefore the B. S. O. adds. Of course, after that, only fitting that the orchestra play it. In his explanatory notes, Mr. Schelling shows a fondness for intials. "K. M.' characterizes Dr. Karl Muck, in an incisive measure; "A. P." introduces Anna Pavlowa, with a graceful habanera; "G. L." is for G. Longwy, the famous oboist of the orchestra. And so he goes on with impressions of Paderewski, Mahler and other persons.

Climax Inspired by War.

There is also a lagoon in North Carolina, an Irish dance, and, best of all, a tremendous piece of descriptive writing in the climax, "August, 1914." This was inspired by Mr. Schelling's experience in Europe at that time, and it introduces drums in cavalry measures, brass marching on inexorably and fatalistic warnings from the strings. Throughout theer is intoned the awful despair of the "Dies Irae." The impressions end with a magnificent "Lutheran Choral"—Wartburg, 1915."

Every player of such a number must be a virtuoso, and every player in the Boston orchestra is, so it was superbly performed. Mr. Schelling, setting himself a difficult task at the piano, won chief honors, playing in a dazzling manner. He was recalled many times by the audience, and the band stood up to bow.

The concert concluded with Enesco's "Rhapsodie Roumaine."

At the concert in Carnegie Hall this afternoon it is very doubtful that Dr. Muck will be recovered sufficiently to conduct.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date

BAD MANNERS AT CONCERTS.

To the Editor of The World:

I don't know that I shall subscribe again for my two seats to the evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city. The reason for my abandonment of my holdings (if I so decide finally) is to be found not at all in Dr. Muck and his men, but in the audience—at least that portion sitting near me.

The inconceivable thing to me is that people can possibly be so rude!

I was brought up on these concerts in Boston when I lived there. In the old Music Hall on Winter Street, and later in Symphony Hall on Huntington Avenue, the moment the conductor raises his baton the great audience becomes absolutely quiet—and will remain so until the number shall end. Not a whisper—hardly a movement. To break this rule would be to declare one's self hopelessly ill-bred. But no one ever did break it, for the people who met there were present to hear the deligh music.

I have lived in New York for six seven years, and all that time I h attended these concerts in Carne Hall. One of them took place last e ning. People—both men and women in front of me and behind me, talk gazed about, arranged their hair a otherwise showed not only an appa ently total indifference to the wonder music, but also to the proprieties. Fu thermore, I am convinced that they w be astonished at this criticism of min and will be quite unable to understan how they have been in error in th least. Some of the women even wore broad and lofty headgear—totally unmindful of those behind them who might wish to note the rise and fall of the Muck baton.

What amazes me is that such peopl should spend their money to go to su a place. What can there possibly in it for them? No man or woma who, when a delightful passage is bei played by this incomparable orchestr totally ignores the performers and gaz up into the boxes or holds conver with a neighbor can be said to be ge ting value received from the music.

Now, don't anybody rise up and r ply to me that if I like Boston so mu better I'd better go there. Not at a New York suits me, speaking generall I'd rather live here than in any oth city that I ever saw—and I've seen few. But, all the same, when Bost people go to hear one of the world's greatest orchestras they know how to behave. They give the very closest attention—preserve intense silence—forget themselves absolutely in the presence of the greatest possible interpretation of Beethoven, Brahms, Bach and their giant compeers.

Good manners need not depend upon geography. OLD SUBSCRIBER.

New York, Jan. 7.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date JAN

DR. MUCK LEADS ORCHESTRA AGAIN

Conductor of Boston Symphony Recovers from Grip—Orchestra Not at Its Best.

Having recovered from his sudden attack of grip, Dr. Karl Muck, who had not been able to lead the Boston Symphony at its Brooklyn concert on Friday night, appeared at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon and conducted the orchestra through a concert that was applauded by a large audience.

It was by no means a flawless performance that the famous organization gave of Brahms' Third Symphony. There were slips on the part of the players, particularly in the first movement. The second movement was infinitely better played, but neither that section nor the remaining two movements were up to the standard of the Boston Symphony.

Then came a Roumanian Rhapsodie, opus 11, No. 1, written by Georges Enesco, in which Roumanian themes are cleverly employed and which is interesting, although it suffers from too frequent employment of the same material. Next was heard Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," a gloomy, rather tedious work save for its effectively reared climaxes.

Finally came the best playing of the afternoon, a really wonderful interpretation of Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" overture, which sent everybody away in good spirits. But for all that the Boston Orchestra has given much more interesting concerts and better exhibitions of playing than yesterday.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date JAN 9 - 1916

FOR DR. AND MRS. MUCK.

Mr. and Mrs. Irion Entertain for Conductor and His Wife.

Mr. Herman H. Irion and his wife, Mrs. Irion, who is known professionally as Mme. Yolanda Mero, pianist, gave a supper for Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Muck on last Thursday at their home at Euclid Hall. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. Josef Stransky, Mr. and Mrs. Fred T. Steinway, Mme. Melanie Kurt, Mr. and Mrs. Efrem Zimbalist, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Gaertner, Mme. Julia Culp, Mme. Clara Cabrilowitsch, Mrs. Samuel Untermyer, Mr. Robert E. Dowling, Mr. Alexander Steinert, Dr. H. A. Cassebeer and Mr. Paul Strauss.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City
Date JAN 8 - 1916

Dr. Karl Muck Is Ill.

Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was unable to direct it at the concert which took place at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn. Arthur Brooke, flutist, announced that the director would be unable to appear because of an attack of the grip. Ernest Schmidt, a first violinist, took up the baton and directed the concert.

At the Gotham Hotel, where Mr. Muck is stopping, it was announced late last night that he was feelingg much better and expected to wield his baton at the concert to be given this afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN

LECTURE RECITAL BY MACDOUGALL

Theme Is Symphony Programme for To-Night.

The programme that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play to-night at the Academy of Music was considered last evening in a lecture-recital by Professor Hamilton C. Macdougall, of Wellesley College, before a Brooklyn Institute audience assembled in the lecture hall. Professor Macdougall devoted the greater part of his discourse to the two biggest numbers on the programme, the tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," of Richard Strauss, and the Haydn symphony in E flat major.

This tone poem of Strauss' represents the second Strauss, he said, not the first Strauss, with classical tendencies. There are two ways of being original, he remarked—one, to do things that have never been done before; the other, to do old things in a new way—and that is what Strauss has done in this composition; he has taken something old and done something entirely new with it. Dr. Macdougall played the various motives, pointing out the curious, soft, disjointed notes. the baffling rythm of the death motive, the luscious harmonies of the melody of youth, the curious theme which some commentators call the fever theme. In the lovely chords at the last, he said, the orchestral instrument are so well distributed that a maximum sonority is gained.

Professor Macdougall discussed the propriety of programme music, practically all music written to-day having a title affixed to it. But no programme piece can express all of the story it denotes, the most that music can do is to express the general idea, especially emotions, he said. But one should not berate those who enjoy music as picture-making, he declared. In concluding his treatment of the Strauss tone poem, Professor Macdougall said that Strauss was clever, often diabolically clever, but never reverent.

Then he took up the Haydn symphony, which he said Dr. Muck has wisely put at the beginning of the programme, as it would sound tame and flat if produced after the wonderful tone color of Strauss. This symphony is a type of the lovely, graceful music toward which young people of the present day are often too blase. He played the introduction, with the beating notes of the kettledrum, the bubbling notes of the allegro, then parts of the andante, the pretty minuet and the simple theme of the beautiful finale. This surprise symphony of Haydn's, as it is called, is characterized by one marked Haydn peculiarity, long blocks of piano passages, contrasting with similarly long stretches of fortissimo parts.

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date JAN

A programme of just the right length and just the right kind was played last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. There was the requisite symphony, Beethoven's "Pastoral," and the light bit at the end to send one home humming Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice." The feature of the concert was a most interesting composition by Ernest Schelling, the American pianist, with Mr. Schelling himself at the piano. The work is a series of variations on an original theme entitled "Impressions from an Artist's Life." The main theme is a vivid one, full of youth and nobility. On it are embroidered the impressions of persons, places and events, and these pictures are so full of variety, so characteristic, that one needs no programme notes to tell where the artist has remembered the colorful Orient, or returned in memory to Russia or Italy. Several variations are in memory of the composer's friends, and a fine military march and dirge points back to August, 1914.

The orchestration is brilliant throughout and there is something so spontaneous in the work that it makes instant appeal. The piano part, except in the opening, does not give the impression of having been written by a pianist, for often the piano is only an accompaniment to the beautiful solos for different instruments in the orchestra. When he did allow himself to show his skill, Mr. Schelling played with power and beauty, and with the poetry and imagination which show so plainly in his composition.

From EAGLE
Address
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY LECTURE.

Programme for Tonight's Concert Analyzed by Professor Macdougall.

The programme that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play tonight at the Academy of Music was considered last evening in a lecture-recital by Professor Hamilton C. Macdougall of Wellesley College, before an Institute audience in the lecture hall of the Academy. He dealt chiefly with the Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss, and the Haydn Symphony in E flat major. The Tone Poem, he said, represents the second, not the first, Strauss, with classical tendencies. Strauss did old things in a new way, in the composition. Dr. Macdougall played the motives, pointing out the curious, soft, disjointed notes, the baffling rythm of the death motive, and the luscious harmonies of the melody of youth the theme which some commentators call the "fever" theme. In the lovely chords at the last, he said, the orchestral instruments are so well distributed that a maximum sonority is gained. The lecturer, alluding to the propriety of programme music, said that practically all music written today has a title affixed to it. But no programme piece can express all of the story it denotes; the most that music can do is to express the general idea, especially emotions. But one should not berate those who enjoy music as picture making, he declared. In the Strauss Tone Poem, Professor Macdougall said that Strauss was clever, often diabolically clever, but never reverent.

The Haydn Symphony, the speaker said, Dr. Muck has wisely put at the beginning of the programme, as it would sound tame and flat if produced after the wonderful tone color of Strauss. The symphony is a type of the lovely, graceful music, toward which young people of the present day are often too blase. He played the introduction, with the beating notes of the kettledrum; the bubbling notes of the Allegro; then parts of the Andante, the pretty Minuet and the simple theme of the beautiful finale. This "surprise" symphony, as it is called, is characterized by a marked Haydn peculiarity in long blocks of piano passages, contrasting with similarly long stretches of fortissimo parts.

[87]

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 8 - 1916

BOSTONIANS PLAY WITHOUT DR. MUCK

Conductor Ill With Grip and Ernst Schmidt Drops Violin for Baton.

BRINGS BACK OLD THRILL.

Schelling's Variations Triumph at First Hearing Here.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is to-day ill with grip at his apartments in the Hotel Gotham, Manhattan. He was suffering from a severe cold when he came to New York on Thursday to conduct the concert at Carnegie Hall and fulfilled his task that evening against the advice of his physician. But last night, when his orchestra gave the third concert of the Brooklyn subscription series at the Academy of Music, he was too ill to appear.

His place was taken by Ernst Schmidt, assistant conductor, and one of the first violinists of the orchestra for the past two years. The announcement of Dr. Muck's indisposition was made at the beginning of the concert by Arthur Brooke, the flutist.

Much Restraint Forgotten.

Mr. Schmidt rose to the occasion bravely and "the perfect orchestra" lost none of its perfection under his guidance. He "let her go" in the playing of the Strauss tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," with a result that brought an almost forgotten thrill to an audience which for the past few seasons has always had its feelings well restrained by Dr. Muck's precise readings. Not since the days of Mahler and Safonoff has the orchestra been allowed to burst out in such a tempest of glorious color as it was last night. It was as exciting as if Stransky had weilded the baton.

The concert opened with Haydn's symphony in E flat major, and if the listener closed his eyes he would be ready to swear that it was Dr. Muck who was conducting. All of the clean-cut ryhthm and delicacy of tone that make the indisposed leader's interpretations of the classics so distinctive were preserved.

Schilling's "Impressions."

The feature of the evening came after the Strauss number. It was the first performance in Brooklyn of "Impressions (from an Artist's Life)," by Ernest Schelling, the American pianist. It is composed in the form of variations on an original theme for orchestra and piano. The piano was played last night by Mr. Schelling himself. It had been done the night before at Carnegie Hall and met with a reception from the critics that ranged from great enthusiasm—one writer calling it "the most brilliant orchestral work ever composed by an American"—to polite surprise at the skill in orchestration the composer had displayed.

Ahe fas as last night s audience went, the most enthusiastic praise was the sort that the number merited. It was composed, Mr. Schelling himself says, with the timbre of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his ear. "Therefore the B. S. O.," he adds. Of course, after that, it was only fitting that the orchestra should play it. In his explanatory notes, Mr. Schelling shows a fondness for intials. "K. M.' characterizes Dr. Karl Muck, in an incisive measure; "A. P." introduces Anna Pavlowa, with a graceful habanera; "G. L." is for G. Longwy, the famous oboist of the orchestra. And so he goes on with impressions of Paderewski, Mahler and other persons.

Climax Inspired by War.

There is also a lagoon in North Carolina, an Irish dance, and, best of all, a tremendous piece of descriptive writing in the climax, "August, 1914." This was inspired by Mr. Schelling's experience in Europe at that time, and it introduces drums in cavalry measures, brass marching on inexorably and fatalistic warnings from the strings. Throughout theer is intoned the awful despair of the "Dies Irae." The impressions end with a magnificent "Lutheran Choral"—Wartburg, 1915."

Every player of such a number must be a virtuoso, and every player in the Boston orchestra is, so it was superbly performed. Mr. Schelling, setting himself a difficult task at the piano, won chief honors, playing in a dazzling manner. He was recalled many times by the audience, and the band stood up to bow.

The concert concluded with Enesco's "Rhapsodie Roumaine."

At the concert in Carnegie Hall this afternoon it is very doubtful that Dr. Muck will be recovered sufficiently to conduct.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date

BAD MANNERS AT CONCERTS.

To the Editor of The World:

I don't know that I shall subscribe again for my two seats to the evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city. The reason for my abandonment of my holdings (if I so decide finally) is to be found not at all in Dr. Muck and his men, but in the audience—at least that portion sitting near me.

The inconceivable thing to me is that people can possibly be so rude!

I was brought up on these concerts in Boston when I lived there. In the old Music Hall on Winter Street, and later in Symphony Hall on Huntington Avenue, the moment the conductor raises his baton the great audience becomes absolutely quiet—and will remain so until the number shall end. Not a whisper—hardly a movement. To break this rule would be to declare one's self hopelessly ill-bred. But no one ever did break it, for the people who met there were present to hear the delightful music.

I have lived in New York for six or seven years, and all that time I have attended these concerts in Carnegie Hall. One of them took place last evening. People—both men and women—in front of me and behind me, talked, gazed about, arranged their hair and otherwise showed not only an apparently total indifference to the wonderful music, but also to the proprieties. Furthermore, I am convinced that they will be astonished at this criticism of mine, and will be quite unable to understand how they have been in error in the least. Some of the women even wore broad and lofty headgear—totally unmindful of those behind them who might wish to note the rise and fall of the Muck baton.

What amazes me is that such people should spend their money to go to such a place. What can there possibly be in it for them? No man or woman who, when a delightful passage is being played by this incomparable orchestra, totally ignores the performers and gazes up into the boxes or holds converse with a neighbor can be said to be getting value received from the music.

Now, don't anybody rise up and reply to me that if I like Boston so much better I'd better go there. Not at all. New York suits me, speaking generally. I'd rather live here than in any other city that I ever saw—and I've seen a few. But, all the same, when Boston people go to hear one of the world's greatest orchestras they know how to behave. They give the very closest attention—preserve intense silence—forget themselves absolutely in the presence of the greatest possible interpretation of Beethoven, Brahms, Bach and their giant compeers.

Good manners need not depend upon geography. OLD SUBSCRIBER.

New York, Jan. 7.

IERALD
New York City
JAN

MUCK LEADS)RCHESTRA AGAIN

tor of Boston Symphony Rers from Grip—Orchestra Not at Its Best.

Having recovered from his sudden attack of grip, Dr. Karl Muck, who had not been able to lead the Boston Symphony at its Brooklyn concert on Friday night, appeared at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon and conducted the orchestra through a concert that was applauded by a large audience.

It was by no means a flawless performance that the famous organization gave of Brahms' Third Symphony. There were slips on the part of the players, particularly in the first movement. The second movement was infinitely better played, but neither that section nor the remaining two movements were up to the standard of the Boston Symphony.

Then came a Roumanian Rhapsodie, opus 11, No. 1, written by Georges Enesco, in which Roumanian themes are cleverly employed and which is interesting, although it suffers from too frequent employment of the same material. Next was heard Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," a gloomy, rather tedious work save for its effectively reared climaxes.

Finally came the best playing of the afternoon, a really wonderful interpretation of Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" overture, which sent everybody away in good spirits. But for all that the Boston Orchestra has given much more interesting concerts and better exhibitions of playing than yesterday.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Dat JAN - 1916

FOR DR. AND MRS. MUCK.

Mr. and Mrs. Irion Entertain for Conductor and His Wife.

Mr. Herman H. Irion and his wife, Mrs. Irion, who is known professionally as Mme. Yolanda Mero, pianist, gave a supper for Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Muck on last Thursday at their home at Euclid Hall. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. Josef Stransky, Mr. and Mrs. Fred T. Steinway, Mme. Melanie Kurt, Mr. and Mrs. Efrem Zimbalist, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Gaertner, Mme. Julia Culp, Mme. Clara Cabrilowitsch, Mrs. Samuel Untermyer, Mr. Robert E. Dowling, Mr. Alexander Steinert, Dr. H. A. Cassebeer and Mr. Paul Strauss.

EVENING TELEGRAM
ss: New York City
JAN 8 - 1916

Dr. Karl Muck Is Ill.

)r. Karl Muck, director of the Boston mphony Orchestra, was unable to direct at the concert which took place the Academy of Music in Brook- Arthur Brooke, flutist, announced t the director would be unable to appear ause of an attack of the grip. Ernest midt, a first violinist, took up the baton and directed the concert.

At the Gotham Hotel, where Mr. Muck is stopping, it was announced late last night that he was feelingg much better and expected to wield his baton at the concert to be given this afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

CITIZEN
ss: Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN

CTURE RECITAL Y MACDOUGALL

Theme Is Symphony Programme for To-Night.

The programme that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play to-night at the Academy of Music was considered last evening in a lecture-recital by Professor Hamilton C. Macdougall, of Wellesley College, before a Brooklyn Institute audience assembled in the lecture hall. Professor Macdougall devoted the greater part of his discourse to the two biggest numbers on the programme, the tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," of Richard Strauss, and the Haydn symphony in E flat major.

This tone poem of Strauss' represents the second Strauss, he said, not the first Strauss, with classical tendencies. There are two ways of being original, he remarked—one, to do things that have never been done before; the other, to do old things in a new way—and that is what Strauss has done in this composition; he has taken something old and done something entirely new with it. Dr. Macdougall played the various motives, pointing out the curious, soft, disjointed notes. the baffling rythm of the death motive, the luscious harmonies of the melody of youth, the curious theme which some commentators call the fever theme. In the lovely chords at the last, he said, the orchestral instrument are so well distributed that a maximum sonority is gained.

Professor Macdougall discussed the propriety of programme music, practically all music written to-day having a title affixed to it. But no programme piece can express all of the story it denotes, the most that music can do is to express the general idea, especially emotions, he said. But one should not berate those who enjoy music as picture-making, he declared. In concluding his treatment of the Strauss tone poem, Professor Macdougall said that Strauss was clever, often diabolically clever, but never reverent.

Then he took up the Haydn symphony, which he said Dr. Muck has wisely put at the beginning of the programme, as it would sound tame and flat if produced after the wonderful tone color of Strauss. This symphony is a type of the lovely, graceful music toward which young people of the present day are often too blase. He played the introduction, with the beating notes of the kettledrum, the bubbling notes of the allegro, then parts of the andante, the pretty minuet and the simple theme of the beautiful finale. This surprise symphony of Haydn's, as it is called, is characterized by one marked Haydn peculiarity, long blocks of piano passages, contrasting with similarly long stretches of fortissimo parts.

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date JAN

A programme of just the right length and just the right kind was played last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. There was the requisite symphony, Beethoven's "Pastoral," and the light bit at the end to send one home humming Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice." The feature of the concert was a most interesting composition by Ernest Schelling, the American pianist, with Mr. Schelling himself at the piano. The work is a series of variations on an original theme entitled "Impressions from an Artist's Life." The main theme is a vivid one, full of youth and nobility. On it are embroidered the impressions of persons, places and events, and these pictures are so full of variety, so characteristic, that one needs no programme notes to tell where the artist has remembered the colorful Orient, or returned in memory to Russia or Italy. Several variations are in memory of the composer's friends, and a fine military march and dirge points back to August, 1914.

The orchestration is brilliant throughout and there is something so spontaneous in the work that it makes instant appeal. The piano part, except in the opening, does not give the impression of having been written by a pianist, for often the piano is only an accompaniment to the beautiful solos for different instruments in the orchestra. When he did allow himself to show his skill, Mr. Schelling played with power and beauty, and with the poetry and imagination which show so plainly in his composition.

From EAGLE
Address
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY LECTURE.

Programme for Tonight's Concert Analyzed by Professor Macdougall.

The programme that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play tonight at the Academy of Music was considered last evening in a lecture-recital by Professor Hamilton C. Macdougall of Wellesley College, before an Institute audience in the lecture hall of the Academy. He dealt chiefly with the Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss, and the Haydn Symphony in E flat major. The Tone Poem, he said, represents the second, not the first, Strauss, with classical tendencies. Strauss did old things in a new way, in the composition. Dr. Macdougall played the motives, pointing out the curious, soft, disjointed notes, the baffling rythm of the death motive, and the luscious harmonies of the melody of youth, the theme which some commentators call the "fever" theme. In the lovely chords at the last, he said, the orchestral instruments are so well distributed that a maximum sonority is gained. The lecturer, alluding to the propriety of programme music, said that practically all music written to-day has a title affixed to it. But no programme piece can express all of the story it denotes; the most that music can do is to express the general idea, especially emotions. But one should not berate those who enjoy music as picture making, he declared. In the Strauss Tone Poem, Professor Macdougall said that Strauss was clever, often diabolically clever, but never reverent.

The Haydn Symphony, the speaker said, Dr. Muck has wisely put at the beginning of the programme, as it would sound tame and flat if produced after the wonderful tone color of Strauss. The symphony is a type of the lovely, graceful music, toward which young people of the present day are often too blase. He played the introduction, with the beating notes of the kettledrum; the bubbling notes of the Allegro; then parts of the Andante, the pretty Minuet and the simple theme of the beautiful finale. This "surprise" symphony, as it is called, is characterized by a marked Haydn peculiarity in long blocks of piano passages, contrasting with similarly long stretches of fortissimo parts.

[87]

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date JAN 9 - 1916

DR. KARL MUCK VIGILANT LEADER

Second Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra Delights Audience in Carnegie Hall.

PHILHARMONIC ALSO HEARD

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, chose a program which was a delight to music lovers for his second New York concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. It began with a Brahms symphony, the third in F major, op. 90, which Hans Richter characterized as the "Eroica" in contrast to his two first symphonies, known respectively as the "Appassionata," or "Pathetic," and the "Pastoral." Needless to say this masterful composition, received every advantage in its performance yesterday, for under the leadership of the appreciative and ever watchful Dr. Muck, the orchestra poured forth its volumes of exquisite tone with the artistic rendering and minute precision that one always associates with the words, "Boston Symphony."

Rachmaninoff's "The Island of the Dead," a symphonic poem for full orchestra to the picture by A. Bocklin, was another number on the program. The Russian composer has indeed caught the spirit and meaning of Bocklin's famous "dream picture," its awe, its mystery, its solemnity—a picture upon which we all love to gaze and meditate. For no matter how familiar we may be with the word "death" no matter what our idea may be of a future life, its realization is such a mystery to us that it all comes as a surprise, a shock, so little can we understand or grasp its meaning.

There were two other compositions played yesterday, Enesco's Rhapsodie Roumaine, No. 1, and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," both of which were well received.

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 1916

Music Notes.

Dr. Karl Muck Ill.

So the Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Heard With E. Schmidt Conducting; Schelling the Soloist.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was too ill to wield the baton at the Academy of Music concert last evening, and Assistant Conductor E. Schmidt, a first violin, acted in his stead. "A slight cold" was the official explanation of Dr. Muck's absence, but it was understood unofficially that he is in the grip of la grippe. Mr. Schmidt ascended the dais and guided the orchestra through a most difficult program without embarrassment or error. In truth, it was quite the same as though Dr. Muck had been in command, for the work of an orchestra leader is done at rehearsals rather than in concert. The characteristic brilliance of technique and flawless precision of the organization was as marked as ever last night. Announcement was made this afternoon at the Hotel Gotham that Dr. Muck is recovering rapidly and will be able to conduct th Carnegie Hall concert this evening.

Ernest Schelling's "Impressions from an Artist's Life," in the form of variations on a theme for piano and orchestra, with the composer at the piano, formed the outstanding novelty in a novel program. The composer has taken a single theme and develope nineteen variations from it, ranging from the simple jig tunes, labeled "Erin," to intricate melodramatic conceptions such as that styled "August, 1914," inspired by the war.

The brass, the strings, the wood winds, and the piano are all given soli, and the piano is subordinated, to the regret of the audience last night. A habanera inspired by Anna Pavlowa, a simple variation credited to a thought of Fritz Kreisler, a solo for harp and English horn charged to Petrograd, a number for the full orchestra in memory of Gustave Mahler, another inscribed to the composer's master, Paderewski, and a Lutheran Choral were the most pretentious of the rather tenuous series. The original theme, G sharp minor, 6-8 was based on a memory of a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert!

Haydn's Symphony in E flat major was the opening number, followed by Strauss' Tone Poem, Death and Transfiguration, and the Rhapsodie Roumaine of Enesco closed the concert.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 8 - 1916

DR. MUCK TOO ILL TO APPEAR HERE

Ernst Schmidt Takes His Place as Conductor.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS A BRILLIANT PROGRAMME

Ernest Schelling, Pianist, the Soloist, Renders for the First Time "Impressions from an Artist's Life."

At the beginning of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was announced by Arthur Brooke, flutist of the orchestra, that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, was suffering with a severe cold, and his place as conductor would be taken by Ernst Schmidt. Mr. Schmidt is one of the first violins and is assistant conductor, who has been with the orchestra two years. He gave a restrained and intellectual reading of the Haydn symphony, and, under his leadership, the playing of the Strauss tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," was marked by a wealth of color and great beauty of tone. He did not repress the orchestra, as Dr. Muck is prone to do, but rather "[illegible] them go."

Dr. Muck is really suffering from the grippe, which confines him to his apartments in the Hotel Gotham. He conducted at the concert given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening much against the advice of his physician, and last night was too ill to come to Brooklyn. It is doubtful if he will be able to conduct at the matinee performance in Manhattan to-day.

Haydn's symphony in E flat major, Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Opus 2[illegible] and "Rhapsodie Roumaine," A major, Op 11, No. 1, by Georges Enesco, comprised the programme, and, in addition, Ernest Schelling, pianist and composer, was the soloist, playing for the first time here his own "Impressions" (from an artist's life) in form of Variations on an Original Theme.

It is intimated by several of Mr. Schelling's notes that he had the Boston Orchestra much in mind when writing them and they exploit the orchestra and several of its individual players.

Most of the variation are impressions of personalities, places or events as they struck the artist's imagination, and many of them are marked with initials or a name.

Some of these are Dr. Muck, Mr. Longy, of the orchestra; Mr. Kreisler, Flonzaly, Gustav Mahler, one was suggested by a lagoon in North Carolina, another by the oncoming war in August, 1914, and so on.

The variations are fanciful in the extreme and of unequal musical value; his imagination has been allowed to run riot and extravagance is the result. The Lutheran choral, which closes the series, is impressive.

Mr. Schelling's performance and that of the orchestra was brilliant.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date

DR. MUCK NOT IN QUARREL.

All Persons Concerned Deny Disagreement with H. L. Higginson.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Friday.—Rumors that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had had a disagreement with Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, and that this was the reason why he did not conduct the orchestra in Brooklyn on last Friday night, were denied to-night. Dr. Muck is still ill of grip. Mrs. Muck said:—

"Any stories of disagreement between Dr. Muck and Mr. Higginson are ridiculous, absurd. Dr. Muck is ill, and his physician has ordered him to remain in bed."

Mr. Higginson also denied the rumors.

William H. Brennan, of the business management of the orchestra, said:—"Rot and nonsense. Dr. Muck is ill. There has been no disagreement."

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date JAN 16 1916

A MUSICAL COINCIDENCE.

Reminiscences Evoked by a Tribune Article.

To the Editor of The Tribune.

Sir: It does not often happen, as Mr. Krehbiel pointed out in last Saturday's issue of The Tribune, that a single community has the opportunity to hear two great symphonic orchestras play the same composition on the same day. For this reason I was much interested in his account of the two concerts of the Philharmonic and New York Symphony orchestras last Friday and their almost simultaneous performance of Dvorak's New World Symphony. It was possible, Mr. Krehbiel says, for an auditor, by rushing from one concert hall to the other, to hear these two performances and to compare the interpretation given by Mr. Stransky and his Philharmonic band with that offered by Mr. Walter Damrosch and his Symphony players.

It is doubtful, however, if anybody but the musical critics had sufficient knowledge of the unusual circumstances to arrange beforehand for such a taxicab adventure into the field of comparative music. Such an event, like a transit of Venus, occurs only once in a long period of time, and observers have to make their preparations well in advance.

It is nearly thirty years, so far as I know, since New Yorkers have had a similar opportunity to observe a transit of symphonic stars, if I may be permitted to continue the metaphor.

In 1886 or 1887—Mr. Krehbiel's collection of programmes will show the exact date—a friend who was a first rate amateur of music came to me one morning with a newspaper in his hand—we were employes in the same office—and said with some excitement:

"See here! Gericke and the Boston Orchestra play this afternoon at Steinway Hall and Theodore Thomas and his orchestra play at the Metropolitan Opera House this evening. They both have Goldmark's 'Sakuntala' overture on their programmes. Let's see how they do it. It's the chance of a lifetime!"

We got an afternoon off, not, however, by alleging that we had to attend a grandmother's funeral, although we were filled with as much enthusiasm as if we had been going to a championship game at the Polo Grounds. It was like seeing the Giants play the Cubs, or, better yet, like hearing Demosthenes in the afternoon and Gladstone in the evening.

Being clerks with a modest stipend, we sat not in the seats of the mighty but on the bleachers, to indulge in a metaphor again. No concert experience of later life has been so unusual or had a more delightful interest and I am obliged to Mr. Krehbiel for vividly recalling it by his article on the similar coincidence which has just occurred in the programmes and dates chosen by Mr. Stransky and Mr. Damrosch.

Thirty years is a long time to carry a distinct musical impression. But my recollection is that my friend and I agreed that Gericke, who was on his first visit to this country, played the great Goldmark overture with the greater vivacity of spirit and technical skill, while Thomas put into it the greater emotional sweep and abandon.

LAWRENCE F. ABBOTT.
Cornwall, N. Y., Jan. 10, 1916.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date JAN 9

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Dr. Muck Gives Brahm's Third Symphony and "The Island of the Dead."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert yesterday afternoon went to prove that when he wishes to Dr. Muck can come down from Parnassus and shake hands with Demos. It would be too much to expect him to remain with Demos for a whole afternoon, and so it was that to the Parnassians he devoted the first half of his programme—the Brahms Third Symphony. Yet the manner in which the great band gave the Brahms Third Symphony must have delighted even the dwellers on the plains, so exquisitely balanced was it, so vigorous, so expressive, so modulated to the most infinite wish of the conductor. It was a reading to delight all hearts.

The second half of the programme marked the descent. Here we had Enesco's Rhapsodie Roumaine, Op. 11, No. 1, a really fascinating work, built on various Rumanian folktunes and devoid of thematic development. It was played with spirit and incisive rhythm. Then came Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead." This composition, built on Arnold Böcklin's well known painting, is not unknown to New York. It very patently expresses the spirit of the picture, but for this very reason it becomes monotonous and pallid. The programme closed with the overture, "Le Carnival Romain," by Berlioz. Carnegie Hall was crowded, as usual. In popular appeal, as in artistic result, Major Higginson's orchestra knows no peer.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date JAN 9 - 1916

DR. KARL MUCK VIGILANT LEADER

Second Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra Delights Audience in Carnegie Hall.

PHILHARMONIC ALSO HEARD

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, chose a program which was a delight to music lovers for his second New York concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. It began with a Brahms symphony, the third in F major, op. 90, which Hans Richter characterized as the "Eroica" in contrast to his two first symphonies, known respectively as the "Appassionata," or "Pathetic," and the "Pastoral." Needless to say this masterful composition received every advantage in its performance yesterday, for under the leadership of the appreciative and ever watchful Dr. Muck, the orchestra poured forth its volumes of exquisite tone with the artistic rendering and minute precision that one always associates with the words, "Boston Symphony."

Rachmaninoff's "The Island of the Dead," a symphonic poem for full orchestra to the picture by A. Bocklin, was another number on the program. The Russian composer has indeed caught the spirit and meaning of Bocklin's famous "dream picture," its awe, its mystery, its solemnity—a picture upon which we all love to gaze and meditate. For no matter how familiar we may be with the word "death" no matter what our idea may be of a future life, its realization is such a mystery to us that it all comes as a surprise, a shock, so little can we understand or grasp its meaning.

There were two other compositions played yesterday, Enesco's Rhapsodie Roumaine, No. 1, and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," both of which were well received.

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN [illegible]

Music Notes.

Dr. Karl Muck Ill.

So the Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Heard With E. Schmidt Conducting; Schelling the Soloist.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was too ill to wield the baton at the Academy of Music concert last evening, and Assistant Conductor E. Schmidt, a first violin, acted in his stead. "A slight cold" was the official explanation of Dr. Muck's absence, but it was understood unofficially that he is in the grip of la grippe. Mr. Schmidt ascended the dais and guided the orchestra through a most difficult program without embarrassment or error. In truth, it was quite the same as though Dr. Muck had been in command, for the work of an orchestra leader is done at rehearsals rather than in concert. The characteristic brilliance of technique and flawless precision of the organization was as marked as ever last night. Announcement was made this afternoon at the Hotel Gotham that Dr. Muck is recovering rapidly and will be able to conduct th Carnegie Hall concert this evening.

Ernest Schelling's "Impressions from an Artist's Life," in the form of variations on a theme for piano and orchestra, with the composer at the piano, formed the outstanding novelty in a novel program. The composer has taken a single theme and developed nineteen variations from it, ranging from the simple jig tunes, labeled "Erin," to intricate melodramatic conceptions such as that styled "August, 1914," inspired by the war.

The brass, the strings, the wood winds, and the piano are all given soli, and the piano is subordinated, to the regret of the audience last night. A habanera inspired by Anna Pavlowa, a simple variation credited to a thought of Fritz Kreisler, a solo for harp and English horn charged to Petrograd, a number for the full orchestra in memory of Gustave Mahler, another inscribed to the composer's master, Paderewski, and a Lutheran Choral were the most pretentious of the rather tenuous series. The original theme, G sharp minor, 6-8 was based on a memory of a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert!

Haydn's Symphony in E flat major was the opening number, followed by Strauss' Tone Poem, Death and Transfiguration, and the Rhapsodie Roumaine of Enesco closed the concert.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 8 - 1916

DR. MUCK TOO ILL TO APPEAR HERE

Ernst Schmidt Takes His Place as Conductor.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS A BRILLIANT PROGRAMME

Ernest Schelling, Pianist, the Soloist, Renders for the First Time "Impressions from an Artist's Life."

At the beginning of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was announced by Arthur Brooke, flutist of the orchestra, that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, was suffering with a severe cold, and his place as conductor would be taken by Ernst Schmidt. Mr. Schmidt is one of the first violins and is assistant conductor, who has been with the orchestra two years. He gave a restrained and intellectual reading of the Haydn symphony, and, under his leadership, the playing of the Strauss tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," was marked by a wealth of color and great beauty of tone. He did not repress the orchestra, as Dr. Muck is prone to do, but rather "[illegible] them go."

Dr. Muck is really suffering from the grippe, which confines him to his apartments in the Hotel Gotham. He conducted at the concert given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening much against the advice of his physician, and last night was too ill to come to Brooklyn. It is doubtful if he will be able to conduct at the matinee performance in Manhattan to-day.

Haydn's symphony in E flat major, Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Opus 2[illegible] and "Rhapsodie Roumaine," A major, Op 11, No. 1, by Georges Enesco, comprised the programme, and, in addition, Ernest Schelling, pianist and composer, was the soloist, playing for the first time here his own "Impressions" (from an artist's life) in form of Variations on an Original Theme.

It is intimated by several of Mr. Schelling's notes that he had the Boston Orchestra much in mind when writing them and they exploit the orchestra and several of its individual players.

Most of the variation are impressions of personalities, places or events as they struck the artist's imagination, and many of them are marked with initials or a name.

Some of these are Dr. Muck, Mr. Longy, of the orchestra; Mr. Kreisler, Flonzaly, Gustav Mahler, one was suggested by a lagoon in North Carolina, another by the oncoming war in August, 1914, and so on.

The variations are fanciful in the extreme and of unequal musical value; his imagination has been allowed to run riot and extravagance is the result. The Lutheran choral, which closes the series, is impressive.

Mr. Schelling's performance and that of the orchestra was brilliant.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date

DR. MUCK NOT IN QUARREL.

All Persons Concerned Deny Disagreement with H. L. Higginson.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Friday.—Rumors that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had had a disagreement with Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, and that this was the reason why he did not conduct the orchestra in Brooklyn on last Friday night, were denied to-night. Dr. Muck is still ill of grip. Mrs. Muck said:—

"Any stories of disagreement between Dr. Muck and Mr. Higginson are ridiculous, absurd. Dr. Muck is ill, and his physician has ordered him to remain in bed."

Mr. Higginson also denied the rumors.

William H. Brennan, of the business management of the orchestra, said:—"Rot and nonsense. Dr. Muck is ill. There has been no disagreement."

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date JAN [illegible]

A MUSICAL COINCIDENCE.

Reminiscences Evoked by a Tribune Article.

To the Editor of The Tribune.

Sir: It does not often happen, as Mr. Krehbiel pointed out in last Saturday's issue of The Tribune, that a single community has the opportunity to hear two great symphonic orchestras play the same composition on the same day. For this reason I was much interested in his account of the two concerts of the Philharmonic and New York Symphony orchestras last Friday and their almost simultaneous performance of Dvorak's New World Symphony. It was possible, Mr. Krehbiel says, for an auditor, by rushing from one concert hall to the other, to hear these two performances and to compare the interpretation given by Mr. Stransky and his Philharmonic band with that offered by Mr. Walter Damrosch and his Symphony players.

It is doubtful, however, if anybody but the musical critics had sufficient knowledge of the unusual circumstances to arrange beforehand for such a taxicab adventure into the field of comparative music. Such an event, like a transit of Venus, occurs only once in a long period of time, and observers have to make their preparations well in advance.

It is nearly thirty years, so far as I know, since New Yorkers have had a similar opportunity to observe a transit of symphonic stars, if I may be permitted to continue the metaphor.

In 1886 or 1887—Mr. Krehbiel's collection of programmes will show the exact date—a friend who was a first rate amateur of music came to me one morning with a newspaper in his hand—we were employes in the same office—and said with some excitement:

"See here! Gericke and the Boston Orchestra play this afternoon at Steinway Hall and Theodore Thomas and his orchestra play at the Metropolitan Opera House this evening. They both have Goldmark's 'Sakuntala' overture on their programmes. Let's see how they do it. It's the chance of a lifetime!"

We got an afternoon off, not, however, by alleging that we had to attend a grandmother's funeral, although we were filled with as much enthusiasm as if we had been going to a championship game at the Polo Grounds. It was like seeing the Giants play the Cubs, or, better yet, like hearing Demosthenes in the afternoon and Gladstone in the evening.

Being clerks with a modest stipend, we sat not in the seats of the mighty but on the bleachers, to indulge in a metaphor again. No concert experience of later life has been so unusual or had a more delightful interest and I am obliged to Mr. Krehbiel for vividly recalling it by his article on the similar coincidence which has just occurred in the programmes and dates chosen by Mr. Stransky and Mr. Damrosch.

Thirty years is a long time to carry a distinct musical impression. But my recollection is that my friend and I agreed that Gericke, who was on his first visit to this country, played the great Goldmark overture with the greater vivacity of spirit and technical skill, while Thomas put into it the greater emotional sweep and abandon.

LAWRENCE F. ABBOTT.
Cornwall, N. Y., Jan. 10, 1916.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Dr. Muck Gives Brahm's Third Symphony and "The Island of the Dead."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert yesterday afternoon went to prove that when he wishes to Dr. Muck can come down from Parnassus and shake hands with Demos. It would be too much to expect him to remain with Demos for a whole afternoon, and so it was that to the Parnassians he devoted the first half of his programme—the Brahms Third Symphony. Yet the manner in which the great band gave the Brahms Third Symphony must have delighted even the dwellers on the plains, so exquisitely balanced was it, so vigorous, so expressive, so modulated to the most infinite wish of the conductor. It was a reading to delight all hearts.

The second half of the programme marked the descent. Here we had Enesco's Rhapsodie Roumaine, Op. 11, No. 1, a really fascinating work, built on various Rumanian folktunes and devoid of thematic development. It was played with spirit and incisive rhythm. Then came Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead." This composition, built on Arnold Böcklin's well known painting, is not unknown to New York. It very patently expresses the spirit of the picture, but for this very reason it becomes monotonous and pallid. The programme closed with the overture, "Le Carnival Romain," by Berlioz. Carnegie Hall was crowded, as usual. In popular appeal, as in artistic result, Major Higginson's orchestra knows no peer.

Fr

from WORLD
Address: New York City
Date DEC 9
Established:

TWO FACES.

To the Editor of The World:

They say there are five and a millions of people in this city.
of us can look into the faces of vast throng, yet each of us se hundreds of them every day—different.

Most faces are commonplace enough. How many of them are there that really make one think? Not many. I have seen but two in days at all recent.

Fritz Kreisler's is one of them. There was a great outburst of applause as he came upon the platform in Carnegie Hall last Thursday night. He did not limp as he did when I last saw him enter by that same door a year ago. Then he was fresh from the Austrian trenches, where he had suffered a wound.

As I looked at him the other night it was not his marvellous playing that held me—it was his face. There was an indescribable gravity about that unmoved countenance. It was not austerity, it was not mere professional reticence. Dr. Muck too was calm and unsmiling, but his face was not the Kreisler face. That of the Austrian violinist had drawn, tense, solemn lines. It seemed to say: "Yes, I am here, and I am playing to you, and you are listening and applauding, but what is all this? This is not real life; it is only a make-believe. I see through you and beyond you to where real life is—there in the trenches, where life meets death; there where horror is, that you do not know and that I do know."

This I saw in the unforgettable face of Fritz Kreisler.

And then there is the one other face—that of Paderewski, the Pole, on the same platform yesterday. Like him of the violin, the great pianist seems weighted with the mark of years beyond his age. Grayer than before, thinner, paler, more ascetic, and likewise marked with the great sorrow that says: "You have not seen it, but I have; and because I have seen that thing I can never forget the sight."

Paderewski's face is that of one who has witnessed his beloved Poland, as he says, become "a vast desert, an immense ruin, a colossal cemetery." He has seen more than a year of uninterrupted terror and anguish and pain imposed upon millions of innocent men and women and children—his countrymen. He has seen them dying from cold, from exposure and from starvation. His face is that which expresses in human features what was in his heart when he wrote:

"I will accuse nobody. I will make no complaint against any of the belligerents. We have been treated according to the logic of war, which is in itself cruelty and atrocity. My errand is not of hatred but of love. I do not intend to excite passion but to awaken compassion. Pray speak to your good, kind friends. Tell them that far away from your prosperous, opulent, happy country there is a great people in great need, suffering beyond the limits of human endurance. Tell them that these very people, in the days of your need, sent you Kosciusko and Pulaski. Some one may be moved by your words; some one may try to help us. God will bless them, as he will you."

These are the things that I have seen in the faces—the strong, grave, haunting faces—of this Austrian and this Pole. And what has marked them thus? It is war that has marked them! ARTHUR ELLIOT SPROUL.

New York, Dec. 8.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 9 - 1916
Establis

OPERATIC SOCIETY AND ITS FOUNDING

"Talks to Young People Are Almost Monopolized by Their Eager Elders.

FOOLISH DEMONSTRATION

Dr. Muck Showed No Disrespect When He Sat Down During Riotous Applause.

* * *

A great deal of foolish and unnecessary comment was aroused over the fact that Dr. Muck took a moment's rest during the outburst over Melba in the Academy of Music last Monday night. Laws have been made and enforced on the subject of encores, women's hats and various other nuisances at symphony concerts. Some rule regulating the number of times a soloist should respond to applause would be an appropriate and welcome move. The no-encore rule of the Boston Orchestra is well understood. No one expects encores. Why, then, after a soloist has been generously applauded and made to feel the appreciation and gratitude of the audience, should the silly and annoying habit of forcing a soloist to make eight or 10 trips to the stage to bow be permitted? Would it not be more sensible and convenient to provide a comfortable chair for the soloist to occupy until such time as the grotesque demonstrations deemed necessary should subside? In this way the enthusiasts could continue their foolish applause and at the same time save the victim a number of unnecessary trips back and forth. The Boston Orchestra following, it is claimed, is largely a different one from that patronizing the Philadelphia Orchestra concerts. This can well be credited. At the latter concerts we have famous soloists and much generous applause. It never degenerates into that type of demonstration that might well justify police interference. On more than one occasion the atmosphere of the Boston Orchestra concerts has become unbearable to those who go to enjoy the music, the leaders of the demonstrations evidently laboring under the impression that they were amusing the audience by their erratic outbreaks. Why should the conductor of the orchestra, a type of man whose dignity should render such behavior impossible, stand while the irrepressible emotions engendered by hearing Melba or any other soloist, continue to force the occupants of remote parts of the house into a condition of excitement bordering on the irresponsible? It would be much more to the point if the conductor would begin his work and thus force the hoodlum element into a semblance of becoming behavior, or else withdraw entirely from the stage until the uncertain and fitful applause died the death of fatigue. Certainly, if the conductor, who stands throughout the evening, elects to remain on the stage and subject himself to an exhibition of crudity and ignorance such as witnessed Monday evening, there can be no objection to him occupying a chair and exchanging remarks with the musicians. We can only hope he was not expressing his impression of Philadelphia audiences and their remarkable courtesy.

AGNES GORDON HOGAN.

IMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 5 - 1916
Established

MUSIC

Beautiful Playing and Novelty Characterize Boston Symphony Concert.

Beautiful playing, musical interest and novelty characterized the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon before the usual capacity audience that pays tribute to this orchestra. Two novelties presented were the rare orchestral reading of the Rachmaninoff symphony poem, "The Island of the Dead," written to the picture by Bocklin, and the first hearing in Washington of the variations for orchestra and piano by the American pianist, Ernest Schelling, with the composer at the piano.

The symphony was the Mozart E flat major. It was given with a warmth and body of tone, with phrases that were suave in their grace, and with that perfection of tone and nuance that makes this formal music in the hands of the Boston players a true delight. The blitheness of the allegro finale with its wealth of detail was particularly effective.

Rachmaninoff's "Toteninsel" is a vast tone painting of the impressionist type. It is a rich indefinite flow of sound that is yet surcharged with emotion and is full of atmosphere. One can assign a program to it also, for this tone picture of "The Island of the Dead" opens with a broad rhythmic sway as of the waters, through which is presently heard the insistent beat of a dirge that gathers intensity as it progresses. Varied muted instruments give touches of realism as Strauss would paint it, the wailing, a flutter as of birds; then a recapitulation which leads on to Elysian fields with big Wagnerian masses of orchestration and back again to the "Dead March," with its counter-assertion of rhythms all masterfully handled.

The flowing and pianistic playing of Ernest Schelling is full of charm, but only occasionally could it be appreciated in his amazing musical conception that he has called "Variations of personalities, of places, of happenings as they happened to strike my imagination." They are a strange medley of unrelated ideas numbering eighteen in all. There are some lovely moments, some piano cadenzas of real virtuosity, but most of the delineation is given the orchestra, much of it holds local color. But so vast a subject-matter needs must be cursory in treatment: "One timbre in my ear, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Paderewski: In memory of Mahler; the Flonzaleys: Petrograd; a Lagoon; August, 1914." With thematic material that is often reminiscent these variations begin and end an amazing creation.

The program closed with Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," with a truly lovely "bel canto" in the Italian serenade and an artistic building up to its scenic climax. J. MacB.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date
Establi 34

IMPRESSION AT AN IMPRESSIONISTIC CONCERT

Heard at the "impressionistic" concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night:

Lady and gentleman, after Strauss number, applauding vigorously. Lady: "Really, I do not understand it at all." Gentleman: "Frankly, neither do I."

"Isn't Dr. Muck charming?"

During the Schelling number, Scenes From an Artist's Life:

"What remarkable harmony, it is just like the country at night."

"That 'August, 1914,' is Germany going to war."

"Yes, I am on a diet of eggs and rice."

"Why, these 19 variations are not variations at all, the theme changes with every variation."

During the closing number, Sorcerer's Apprentice:

"This is marked Orchestral Scherzo, that means joke, doesn't it?"

The audience was very serious during the rendition of this number, but the orchestra members seemed to be enjoying themselves.

"Are they laughing at us?" one man said.

"Search me," the other replied.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 5 - 1916
E 1884

Boston Symphony Concert.

A feature of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, with Ernest Schelling, pianist, as the soloist, was the first performance in public in Washington of Mr. Schelling's own composition, "Impressions (From an Artist's Life) in Form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte," played by the composer with the orchestra. The other numbers of the program were Mozart's "Symphony in E Flat Major," Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," and Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnaval Romain." Dr. Karl Muck was the conductor of the orchestra.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date AN
Establis

◆

At the Boston Symphony concert at the National Theater yesterday the German ambassador occupied one of the boxes, having among his guests Miss Harriet Southerland.

Lady Spring-Rice, wife of the British ambassador, Thomas Spring-Rice, and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth were guests in Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's box. Brig. Gen. and Mrs. William Crozier had with them a party of visitors here in connection with the pan-American congress. Mrs. Norman Williams, Mme. Hauge, Mrs. Philip Sheridan, Mrs. Wesley Merritt and Miss Mary Sheridan were occupants of one of the stage boxes. Mrs. J. McMillan had a party in her box, including Mrs. Rollins Morse, Miss Patten, and Mrs. Preston Gibson. Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner also entertained a box party. Among others in the audience were Mrs. Wallace Radcliffe, Mrs. J. R. Mann, Mrs. Beverly Williamson, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Countess Gizycka, Miss Margaretta Symons, Mr. and Mrs. William Eaches Fendall, Bishop Harding, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Douglas, Mr. Arnold Hague, Mgr. Mackin, Mrs. Henry W. Fitch, Mrs. John P. Jackson, Mme. de Urcullu, Mrs. George Howard, Miss Perin, Mrs. Julian James, Mme. Ekengren, Mrs. Joseph Leiter, Mrs. Herbert Howard, Mrs. Arthur Willert, Mr. and Mrs. Larz Anderson, Mrs. Ben Hellen, Capt. and Mrs. John Gibbons, Mrs. Victor Kauffmann, Mrs. Lloyd Bowers, Mrs. John Rodgers, Mrs. Thomas Chatard, Miss Lee, Miss Flora Wilson, Miss Hickey, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Blagden, Dr. and Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mrs. Tanner, Mrs. Sinclair Bowen, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Walter Tuckerman, Myron Whitney, Mrs. Cuno Rudolph, Mrs. Frank Carpenter, Miss Carpenter, Mr. and Mrs. Christian Heurich, Mrs. Alexander Bentley, Mrs. Chauncey Hackett, Mrs. E. H. G. Slater, Mrs. S. C. Netle, Robert Shaw Oliver, Congressman and Mrs. Horace Towner, Mrs. Edmund Pendleton, Mrs. John Blair, Mr. and Mrs. George Eustis, Mrs. Charles McChord, Mrs. George H. Chase, Mrs. William H. Wilmer, the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, Miss Nancy Lane, Miss Gwynn, Mrs. Albert Mills, the Rev. and Mrs. F. Ward Denys, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Miss Beatrice Clover, and Miss Sargent.

◆

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date DEC 9
Established:

TWO FACES.

To the Editor of The World:

They say there are five and a millions of people in this city. of us can look into the faces of vast throng, yet each of us see hundreds of them every day—different.

Most faces are commonplace enough. How many of them are there that really make one think? Not many. I have seen but two in days at all recent.

Fritz Kreisler's is one of them. There was a great outburst of applause as he came upon the platform in Carnegie Hall last Thursday night. He did not limp as he did when I last saw him enter by that same door a year ago. Then he was fresh from the Austrian trenches, where he had suffered a wound.

As I looked at him the other night it was not his marvellous playing that held me—it was his face. There was an indescribable gravity about that unmoved countenance. It was not austerity, it was not mere professional reticence. Dr. Muck too was calm and unsmiling, but his face was not the Kreisler face. That of the Austrian violinist had drawn, tense, solemn lines. It seemed to say: "Yes, I am here, and I am playing to you, and you are listening and applauding, but what is all this? This is not real life; it is only a make-believe. I see through you and beyond you to where real life is—there in the trenches, where life meets death; there where horror is, that you do not know and that I do know."

This I saw in the unforgettable face of Fritz Kreisler.

And then there is the one other face—that of Paderewski, the Pole, on the same platform yesterday. Like him of the violin, the great pianist seems weighted with the mark of years beyond his age. Grayer than before, thinner, paler, more ascetic, and likewise marked with the great sorrow that says: "You have not seen it, but I have; and because I have seen that thing I can never forget the sight."

Paderewski's face is that of one who has witnessed his beloved Poland, as he says, become "a vast desert, an immense ruin, a colossal cemetery." He has seen more than a year of uninterrupted terror and anguish and pain imposed upon millions of innocent men and women and children—his countrymen. He has seen them dying from cold, from exposure and from starvation. His face is that which expresses in human features what was in his heart when he wrote:

"I will accuse nobody. I will make no complaint against any of the belligerents. We have been treated according to the logic of war, which is in itself cruelty and atrocity. My errand is not of hatred but of love. I do not intend to excite passion but to awaken compassion. Pray speak to your good, kind friends. Tell them that far away from your prosperous, opulent, happy country there is a great people in great need, suffering beyond the limits of human endurance. Tell them that these very people, in the days of your need, sent you Kosciusko and Pulaski. Some one may be moved by your words; some one may try to help us. God will bless them, as he will you."

These are the things that I have seen in the faces—the strong, grave, haunting faces—of this Austrian and this Pole. And what has marked them thus? It is war that has marked them! ARTHUR ELLIOT SPROUL.
New York, Dec. 8.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date
Establi

IMPRESSION AT AN IMPRESSIONISTIC CONCERT

Heard at the "impressionistic" concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night:

Lady and gentleman, after Strauss number, applauding vigorously. Lady: "Really, I do not understand it at all." Gentleman: "Frankly, neither do I."

"Isn't Dr. Muck charming?"

During the Schelling number, Scenes From an Artist's Life:

"What remarkable harmony, it is just like the country at night."

"That 'August, 1914,' is Germany going to war."

"Yes, I am on a diet of eggs and rice."

"Why, these 19 variations are not variations at all, the theme changes with every variation."

During the closing number, Sorcerer's Apprentice:

"This is marked Orchestral Scherzo, that means joke, doesn't it?"

The audience was very serious during the rendition of this number, but the orchestra members seemed to be enjoying themselves.

"Are they laughing at us?" one man said.

"Search me," the other replied.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 9 - 1916
Establis

OPERATIC SOCIETY AND ITS FOUNDING

"Talks to Young People Are Almost Monopolized by Their Eager Elders.

FOOLISH DEMONSTRATION

Dr. Muck Showed No Disrespect When He Sat Down During Riotous Applause.

* * *

A great deal of foolish and unnecessary comment was aroused over the fact that Dr. Muck took a moment's rest during the outburst over Melba in the Academy of Music last Monday night. Laws have been made and enforced on the subject of encores, women's hats and various other nuisances at symphony concerts. Some rule regulating the number of times a soloist should respond to applause would be an appropriate and welcome move. The no-encore rule of the Boston Orchestra is well understood. No one expects encores. Why, then, after a soloist has been generously applauded and made to feel the appreciation and gratitude of the audience, should the silly and annoying habit of forcing a soloist to make eight or 10 trips to the stage to bow be permitted? Would it not be more sensible and convenient to provide a comfortable chair for the soloist to occupy until such time as the grotesque demonstrations deemed necessary should subside? In this way the enthusiasts could continue their foolish applause and at the same time save the victim a number of unnecessary trips back and forth. The Boston Orchestra following, it is claimed, is largely a different one from that patronizing the Philadelphia Orchestra concerts. This can well be credited. At the latter concerts we have famous soloists and much generous applause. It never degenerates into that type of demonstration that might well justify police interference. On more than one occasion the atmosphere of the Boston Orchestra concerts has become unbearable to those who go to enjoy the music, the leaders of the demonstrations evidently laboring under the impression that they were amusing the audience by their erratic outbreaks. Why should the conductor of the orchestra, a type of man whose dignity should render such behavior impossible, stand while the irrepressible emotions engendered by hearing Melba or any other soloist, continue to force the occupants of remote parts of the house into a condition of excitement bordering on the irresponsible? It would be much more to the point if the conductor would begin his work and thus force the hoodlum element into a semblance of becoming behavior, or else withdraw entirely from the stage until the uncertain and fitful applause died the death of fatigue. Certainly, if the conductor, who stands throughout the evening, elects to remain on the stage and subject himself to an exhibition of crudity and ignorance such as witnessed Monday evening, there can be no objection to him occupying a chair and exchanging remarks with the musicians. We can only hope he was not expressing his impression of Philadelphia audiences and their remarkable courtesy.

AGNES GORDON HOGAN.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date
E 1884

Boston Symphony Concert.

A feature of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, with Ernest Schelling, pianist, as the soloist, was the first performance in public in Washington of Mr. Schelling's own composition, "Impressions (From an Artist's Life) in Form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte," played by the composer with the orchestra. The other numbers of the program were Mozart's "Symphony in E Flat Major," Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," and Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnaval Romain." Dr. Karl Muck was the conductor of the orchestra.

TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date AN 5 - 1916
Established

MUSIC

Beautiful Playing and Novelty Characterize Boston Symphony Concert.

Beautiful playing, musical interest and novelty characterized the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon before the usual capacity audience that pays tribute to this orchestra. Two novelties presented were the rare orchestral reading of the Rachmaninoff symphony poem, "The Island of the Dead," written to the picture by Bocklin, and the first hearing in Washington of the variations for orchestra and piano by the American pianist, Ernest Schelling, with the composer at the piano.

The symphony was the Mozart E flat major. It was given with a warmth and body of tone, with phrases that were suave in their grace, and with that perfection of tone and nuance that makes this formal music in the hands of the Boston players a true delight. The blitheness of the allegro finale with its wealth of detail was particularly effective.

Rachmaninoff's "Toteninsel" is a vast tone painting of the impressionist type. It is a rich indefinite flow of sound that is yet surcharged with emotion and is full of atmosphere. One can assign a program to it also, for this tone picture of "The Island of the Dead" opens with a broad rhythmic sway as of the waters, through which is presently heard the insistent beat of a dirge that gathers intensity as it progresses. Varied muted instruments give touches of realism as Strauss would paint it, the wailing, a flutter as of birds; then a recapitulation which leads on to Elysian fields with big Wagnerian masses of orchestration and back again to the "Dead March," with its counter-assertion of rhythms all masterfully handled.

The flowing and pianistic playing of Ernest Schelling is full of charm, but only occasionally could it be appreciated in his amazing musical conception that he has called "Variations of personalities, of places, of happenings as they happened to strike my imagination." They are a strange medley of unrelated ideas numbering eighteen in all. There are some lovely moments, some piano cadenzas of real virtuosity, but most of the delineation is given the orchestra, much of it holds local color. But so vast a subject-matter needs must be cursory in treatment: "One timbre in my ear, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Paderewski; In memory of Mahler; the Flonzaleys; Petrograd: a Lagoon; August, 1914." With thematic material that is often reminiscent these variations begin and end an amazing creation.

The program closed with Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," with a truly lovely "bel canto" in the Italian serenade and an artistic building up to its scenic climax. J. MacB.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date
Establis

—✤—

At the Boston Symphony concert at the National Theater yesterday the German ambassador occupied one of the boxes, having among his guests Miss Harriet Southerland.

Lady Spring-Rice, wife of the British ambassador, Thomas Spring-Rice, and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth were guests in Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's box. Brig. Gen. and Mrs. William Crozier had with them a party of visitors here in connection with the pan-American congress. Mrs. Norman Williams, Mme. Hauge, Mrs. Philip Sheridan, Mrs. Wesley Merritt and Miss Mary Sheridan were occupants of one of the stage boxes. Mrs. J. McMillan had a party in her box, including Mrs. Rollins Morse, Miss Patten, and Mrs. Preston Gibson. Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner also entertained a box party. Among others in the audience were Mrs. Wallace Radcliffe, Mrs. J. R. Mann, Mrs. Beverly Williamson, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Countess Gizycka, Miss Margaretta Symons, Mr. and Mrs. William Eaches Fendall, Bishop Harding, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Douglas, Mr. Arnold Hague, Mgr. Mackin, Mrs. Henry W. Fitch, Mrs. John P. Jackson, Mme. de Urcullu, Mrs. George Howard, Miss Perin, Mrs. Julian James, Mme. Ekengren, Mrs. Joseph Leiter, Mrs. Herbert Howard, Mrs. Arthur Willert, Mr. and Mrs. Larz Anderson, Mrs. Ben Hellen, Capt. and Mrs. John Gibbons, Mrs. Victor Kauffmann, Mrs. Lloyd Bowers, Mrs. John Rodgers, Mrs. Thomas Chatard, Miss Lee, Miss Flora Wilson, Miss Hickey, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Blagden, Dr. and Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mrs. Tanner, Mrs. Sinclair Bowen, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Walter Tuckerman, Myron Whitney, Mrs. Cuno Rudolph, Mrs. Frank Carpenter, Miss Carpenter, Mr. and Mrs. Christian Heurich, Mrs. Alexander Bentley, Mrs. Chauncey Hackett, Mrs. E. H. G. Slater, Mrs. S. C. Netle, Robert Shaw Oliver, Congressman and Mrs. Horace Towner, Mrs. Edmund Pendleton, Mrs. John Blair, Mr. and Mrs. George Eustis, Mrs. Charles McChord, Mrs. George H. Chase, Mrs. William H. Wilmer, the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, Miss Nancy Lane, Miss Gwynn, Mrs. Albert Mills, the Rev. and Mrs. F. Ward Denys, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Miss Beatrice Clover, and Miss Sargent.

—✤—

Fro

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date DEC 9 1915
Established:

TWO FACES.

To the Editor of The World:

They say there are five and a quarter millions of people in this city. No one of us can look into the faces of all this vast throng, yet each of us sees many hundreds of them every day—and all different.

Most faces are commonplace enough. How many of them are there that really make one think? Not many. I have seen but two in days at all recent.

Fritz Kreisler's is one of them. There was a great outburst of applause as he came upon the platform in Carnegie Hall last Thursday night. He did not limp as he did when I last saw him enter by that same door a year ago. Then he was fresh from the Austrian trenches, where he had suffered a wound.

As I looked at him the other night it was not his marvellous playing that held me—it was his face. There was an indescribable gravity about that unmoved countenance. It was not austerity, it was not mere professional reticence. Dr. Muck too was calm and unsmiling, but his face was not the Kreisler face. That of the Austrian violinist had drawn, tense, solemn lines. It seemed to say: "Yes, I am here, and I am playing to you, and you are listening and applauding, but what is all this? This is not real life; it is only a make-believe. I see through you and beyond you to where real life is—there in the trenches, where life meets death; there where horror is, that you do not know and that I do know."

This I saw in the unforgettable face of Fritz Kreisler.

And then there is the one other face—that of Paderewski, the Pole, on the same platform yesterday. Like him of the violin, the great pianist seems weighted with the mark of years beyond his age. Grayer than before, thinner, paler, more ascetic, and likewise marked with the great sorrow that says: "You have not seen it, but I have; and because I have seen that thing I can never forget the sight."

Paderewski's face is that of one who has witnessed his beloved Poland, as he says, become "a vast desert, an immense ruin, a colossal cemetery." He has seen more than a year of uninterrupted terror and anguish and pain imposed upon millions of innocent men and women and children—his countrymen. He has seen them dying from cold, from exposure and from starvation. His face is that which expresses in human features what was in his heart when he wrote:

"I will accuse nobody. I will make no complaint against any of the belligerents. We have been treated according to the logic of war, which is in itself cruelty and atrocity. My errand is not of hatred but of love. I do not intend to excite passion but to awaken compassion. Pray speak to your good, kind friends. Tell them that far away from your prosperous, opulent, happy country there is a great people in great need, suffering beyond the limits of human endurance. Tell them that these very people, in the days of your need, sent you Kosciusko and Pulaski. Some one may be moved by your words; some one may try to help us. God will bless them, as he will you."

These are the things that I have seen in the faces—the strong, grave, haunting faces—of this Austrian and this Pole. And what has marked them thus? It is war that has marked them! ARTHUR ELLIOT SPROUL.

New York, Dec. 8.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date
Establi

IMPRESSION AT AN IMPRESSIONISTIC CONCERT

Heard at the "impressionistic" concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night:

Lady and gentleman, after Strauss number, applauding vigorously. Lady: "Really, I do not understand it at all." Gentleman: "Frankly, neither do I."

"Isn't Dr. Muck charming?"

During the Schelling number, Scenes From an Artist's Life:

"What remarkable harmony, it is just like the country at night."

"That 'August, 1914,' is Germany going to war."

"Yes, I am on a diet of eggs and rice."

"Why, these 19 variations are not variations at all, the theme changes with every variation."

During the closing number, Sorcerer's Apprentice:

"This is marked Orchestral Scherzo, that means joke, doesn't it?"

The audience was very serious during the rendition of this number, but the orchestra members seemed to be enjoying themselves.

"Are they laughing at us?" one man said.

"Search me," the other replied.

ECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 9 - 1916

IC SOCIETY AND ITS FOUNDING

"Talks to Young People Are Almost Monopolized by Their Eager Elders.

FOOLISH DEMONSTRATION

Dr. Muck Showed No Disrespect When He Sat Down During Riotous Applause.

* * *

A great deal of foolish and unnecessary comment was aroused over the fact that Dr. Muck took a moment's rest during the outburst over Melba in the Academy of Music last Monday night. Laws have been made and enforced on the subject of encores, women's hats and various other nuisances at symphony concerts. Some rule regulating the number of times a soloist should respond to applause would be an appropriate and welcome move. The no-encore rule of the Boston Orchestra is well understood. No one expects encores. Why, then, after a soloist has been generously applauded and made to feel the appreciation and gratitude of the audience, should the silly and annoying habit of forcing a soloist to make eight or 10 trips to the stage to bow be permitted? Would it not be more sensible and convenient to provide a comfortable chair for the soloist to occupy until such time as the grotesque demonstrations deemed necessary should subside? In this way the enthusiasts could continue their foolish applause and at the same time save the victim a number of unnecessary trips back and forth. The Boston Orchestra following, it is claimed, is largely a different one from that patronizing the Philadelphia Orchestra concerts. This can well be credited. At the latter concerts we have famous soloists and much generous applause. It never degenerates into that type of demonstration that might well justify police interference. On more than one occasion the atmosphere of the Boston Orchestra concerts has become unbearable to those who go to enjoy the music, the leaders of the demonstrations evidently laboring under the impression that they were amusing the audience by their erratic outbreaks. Why should the conductor of the orchestra, a type of man whose dignity should render such behavior impossible, stand while the irrepressible emotions engendered by hearing Melba or any other soloist, continue to force the occupants of remote parts of the house into a condition of excitement bordering on the irresponsible? It would be much more to the point if the conductor would begin his work and thus force the hoodlum element into a semblance of becoming behavior, or else withdraw entirely from the stage until the uncertain and fitful applause died the death of fatigue. Certainly, if the conductor, who stands throughout the evening, elects to remain on the stage and subject himself to an exhibition of crudity and ignorance such as witnessed Monday evening, there can be no objection to him occupying a chair and exchanging remarks with the musicians. We can only hope he was not expressing his impression of Philadelphia audiences and their remarkable courtesy.

AGNES GORDON HOGAN.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN - 1916
E 1884

Boston Symphony Concert.

A feature of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, with Ernest Schelling, pianist, as the soloist, was the first performance in public in Washington of Mr. Schelling's own composition, "Impressions (From an Artist's Life) in Form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte," played by the composer with the orchestra. The other numbers of the program were Mozart's "Symphony in E Flat Major," Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," and Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnaval Romain." Dr. Karl Muck was the conductor of the orchestra.

TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 5 1916
Established

MUSIC

Beautiful Playing and Novelty Characterize Boston Symphony Concert.

Beautiful playing, musical interest and novelty characterized the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon before the usual capacity audience that pays tribute to this orchestra. Two novelties presented were the rare orchestral reading of the Rachmaninoff symphony poem, "The Island of the Dead," written to the picture by Bocklin, and the first hearing in Washington of the variations for orchestra and piano by the American pianist, Ernest Schelling, with the composer at the piano.

The symphony was the Mozart E flat major. It was given with a warmth and body of tone, with phrases that were suave in their grace, and with that perfection of tone and nuance that makes this formal music in the hands of the Boston players a true delight. The blitheness of the allegro finale with its wealth of detail was particularly effective.

Rachmaninoff's "Toteninsel" is a vast tone painting of the impressionist type. It is a rich indefinite flow of sound that is yet surcharged with emotion and is full of atmosphere. One can assign a program to it also, for this tone picture of "The Island of the Dead" opens with a broad rhythmic sway as of the waters, through which is presently heard the insistent beat of a dirge that gathers intensity as it progresses. Varied muted instruments give touches of realism as Strauss would paint it, the wailing, a flutter as of birds; then a recapitulation which leads on to Elysian fields with big Wagnerian masses of orchestration and back again to the "Dead March," with its counter-assertion of rhythms all masterfully handled.

The flowing and pianistic playing of Ernest Schelling is full of charm, but only occasionally could it be appreciated in his amazing musical conception that he has called "Variations of personalities, of places, of happenings as they happened to strike my imagination." They are a strange medley of unrelated ideas numbering eighteen in all. There are some lovely moments, some piano cadenzas of real virtuosity, but most of the delineation is given the orchestra, much of it holds local color. But so vast a subject-matter needs must be cursory in treatment: "One timbre in my ear, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Paderewski: In memory of Mahler; the Flonzaleys: Petrograd: a Lagoon: August, 1914." With thematic material that is often reminiscent these variations begin and end an amazing creation.

The program closed with Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," with a truly lovely "bel canto" in the Italian serenade and an artistic building up to its scenic climax. J. MacB.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN
Establis

◆

At the Boston Symphony concert at the National Theater yesterday the German ambassador occupied one of the boxes, having among his guests Miss Harriet Southerland.

Lady Spring-Rice, wife of the British ambassador, Thomas Spring-Rice, and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth were guests in Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's box. Brig. Gen. and Mrs. William Crozier had with them a party of visitors here in connection with the pan-American congress. Mrs. Norman Williams, Mme. Hauge, Mrs. Philip Sheridan, Mrs. Wesley Merritt and Miss Mary Sheridan were occupants of one of the stage boxes. Mrs. J. McMillan had a party in her box, including Mrs. Rollins Morse, Miss Patten, and Mrs. Preston Gibson. Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner also entertained a box party. Among others in the audience were Mrs. Wallace Radcliffe, Mrs. J. R. Mann, Mrs. Beverly Williamson, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Countess Gizycka, Miss Margaretta Symons, Mr. and Mrs. William Eaches Fendall, Bishop Harding, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Douglas, Mr. Arnold Hague, Mgr. Mackin, Mrs. Henry W. Fitch, Mrs. John P. Jackson, Mme. de Urcullu, Mrs. George Howard, Miss Perin, Mrs. Julian James, Mme. Ekengren, Mrs. Joseph Leiter, Mrs. Herbert Howard, Mrs. Arthur Willert, Mr. and Mrs. Larz Anderson, Mrs. Ben Hellen, Capt. and Mrs. John Gibbons, Mrs. Victor Kauffmann, Mrs. Lloyd Bowers, Mrs. John Rodgers, Mrs. Thomas Chatard, Miss Lee, Miss Flora Wilson, Miss Hickey, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Blagden, Dr. and Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mrs. Tanner, Mrs. Sinclair Bowen, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Walter Tuckerman, Myron Whitney, Mrs. Cuno Rudolph, Mrs. Frank Carpenter, Miss Carpenter, Mr. and Mrs. Christian Heurich, Mrs. Alexander Bentley, Mrs. Chauncey Hackett, Mrs. E. H. G. Slater, Mrs. S. C. Netle, Robert Shaw Oliver, Congressman and Mrs. Horace Towner, Mrs. Edmund Pendleton, Mrs. John Blair, Mr. and Mrs. George Eustis, Mrs. Charles McChord, Mrs. George H. Chase, Mrs. William H. Wilmer, the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, Miss Nancy Lane, Miss Gwynn, Mrs. Albert Mills, the Rev. and Mrs. F. Ward Denys, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Miss Beatrice Clover, and Miss Sargent.

◆

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 5 - 1916

The Boston Symphony concert at the National Theater yesterday afternoon brought together a large and interesting audience. The German Ambassador occupied one of the boxes, having among his guests Miss Harriet Southerland.

Lady Spring-Rice, wife of the British Ambassador, Mr. Thomas Spring-Rice, and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth were guests in Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's box. Gen. and Mrs. Crozier had with them a party of visitors here in connection with the pan-American congress. Mrs. Norman Williams, Mme. Hauge, Mrs. Philip Sheridan, Mrs. Wesley Merritt and Miss Mary Sheridan were occupants of one of the stage boxes. Mrs. James McMillan had a party in her box, including Mrs. Rollins Morse, Miss Patten, and Mrs. Preston Gibson. Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner also entertained a box party. Among others in the audience were Mrs. Wallace Radcliffe, Mrs. James R. Mann, Mrs. Beverly Williamson, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Countess Gizycka, Miss Margaretta Symons, Mr. and Mrs. William Eaches Fendall, Bishop Harding, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Douglas, Mr. Arnold Hague, Mgr. Mackin, Mrs. Henry W. Fitch, Mrs. John P. Jackson, Mme. de Urcullu, Mrs. George Howard, Miss Perin, Mrs. Julian James, Mme. Ekengren, Mrs. Joseph Leiter, Mrs. Herbert Howard, Mrs. Arthur Willert, Mr. and Mrs. Larz Anderson, Mrs. Ben Hellen, Capt. and Mrs. John Gibbons, Mrs. Victor Kauffmann, Mrs. Lloyd Bowers, Mrs. John Rodgers, Mrs. Thomas Chatard, Miss Lee, Miss Flora Wilson, Miss Hickey, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Blagden, Dr. and Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mrs. Tanner, Mrs. Sinclair Bowen, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Mr. Walter Tuckerman, Mr. Myron Whitney, Mrs. Cuno Rudolph, Mrs. Frank Carpenter, Miss Carpenter, Mr. and Mrs. Christian Heurich, Mrs. Alexander Bentley, Mrs. Chauncey Hackett, Mrs. E. H. G. Slater, Mrs. S. C. Neale, Mr. Robert Shaw Oliver, Representative and Mrs. Horace Towner, Mrs. Edmund Pendleton, Mrs. John Blair, Mr. and Mrs. George Eustis, Mrs. Charles McChord, Mrs. George H. Chase, Mrs. William H. Wilmer, the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, Miss Nancy Lane, Miss Gwynn, Mrs. Albert Mills, the Rev and Mrs. F. Ward Denys, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Miss Beatrice Clover and Miss Sargent.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY.

JANUARY 17, 1916

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE WRONG OF CURRENT GOSSIP ABOUT DR. MUCK

Malicious and Wholly Unfounded Tales That He Declined to Conduct for Mme. Melba and That He Compelled Mr. Schelling to Alter a Sub-Title of His Variations—Inventions Without Rhyme, Reason or Justification—New Chamber Pieces by Ravel and Mr. Hadley—Concerts in Prospect

WHILE the Symphony Orchestra was making its monthly journey to New York and other cities to the southward in the week before last, Dr. Muck was attacked with the prevailing influenza and with a return of an affection of the throat for which he underwent an operation a few years ago. That operation, it now appears, was not as complete in result as either the patient or the surgeons anticipated. Thus ill, Dr. Muck was unable to conduct in the concert of the orchestra in Brooklyn on Friday evening, Jan. 7 and he led, altogether "on his nerve," in the concert in New York on the following Saturday afternoon. Returning to Boston, he took to his bed and put aside all thoughts of conducting at the concerts of last Thursday in Cambridge and of last Friday and Saturday in Boston. As already set down in this place, Mr. Kelley, the composer of the "New England Symphony," then to be played for the first times here, was notified of the mischance and asked to decide between a performance of the music under Mr. Schmidt on the appointed days or the postponement of production until next season. He preferred immediate performance, even under an assistant conductor. The fact that Mme. Melba was to assist the orchestra at these concerts lessened rather than increased the sense of obligation toward them that haunted Dr. Muck, inasmuch as her numbers filled a considerable space in the programme and would, so to say, go of themselves.

It is necessary to enumerate these petty details, of little concern to the public, because of the equally petty and, in some instances, malignant gossip that for two or three days has traversed the town. According to it, Dr. Muck feigned illness in order that he need not accompany Mme. Melba, a British subject, prone to discourse to all and sundry about the war from her point of view. To attribute such motives and such conduct to Dr. Muck, who sets his obligations to his work above all else, who is honesty and loyalty themselves, and who takes no thought of partisanship in all that concerns the Symphony Concerts, is wofully far from the truth and more suggestive of the minds of the fomenters of this gossip than of conductor's own. He was much concer because he could not conduct in Mr. K ley's symphony, which, for a year, he h been holding for performance. He though of Mme. Melba only as an eminent singer who would suffice in herself for the audience.

Of a piece with this gossip is yet another potin—as the French call these malicious yarns—as to Mr. Schelling's set of variations played here a fortnight ago and repeated later in New York and in other cities. One of those variations the composer entitled, "August, 1914," and in it pictured troops going forth to "war without its glamor." As the yarn goes, Mr. Schelling intended to label the variation with some reference to the march of the German soldiery into Belgium: but Dr. Muck forbade him to do so, hinting at all sorts of pains and penalties to the music, if he did. It seems extraordinary that any human beings should believe that a conductor would so wreck a piece, virtually inscribed to him and to his orchestra, and that he had himself sought for performance—least of all human beings that for many a year have come to know Dr. Muck's integrity as man and conductor. The simple truth of the matter is that the variation was written as a picture of the beginnings of warfare in any or all of the nations that embarked upon it in the summer of 1914 and that Mr. Schelling, who by temperament, is fain to be all things to all men, was disposed to agree with any interpretation the partisans of any one of the warring countries might put upon it. Dr. Muck, as it happened, was concerned only with the music, but was superfluously sensitive to the alleged implications that certain experts in malignant gossip drew from it and cast at him.

Finally, to cap the climax, New York was entertained last week with the report that for ten days Dr. Muck had been feigning illness because he and Mr. Higginson were at odds, whereas within those same days Mr. Higginson had been authoritatively quoted as saying that so long as Dr. Muck chose to be conductor of the Symphony Orchestra he could remain in his present post. The management of the Symphony Concerts dignifies such preposterous surmise when it formally and sharply denies it: but it is not so well advised when it makes no announcement of Dr. Muck's inability to conduct because of illness until the audience has received the programme books on Friday afternoon, though it has known for days that he could not lead.

For eighteen months past, no man could have striven more zealously than has Dr. Muck to keep the Symphony Concerts clear of any differences that the war and partisanship over it has provoked. Had all Europe been at peace since August of 1914, the concerts would have run exactly the same course that they have followed, save that more novel music now unobtainable. would have been played at them and a change or two made in the personnel of the band. No man in public and responsible place has been more careful than Dr. Muck not to obtrude his own loyalties and judgments between nation and nation upon those who knew him only in his public capacity and whom they concern as little as their own predilections concern him And the reward of such sense of obligation steadfastly maintained has been the petty slanders here set down. Occasionally malice has prompted and spread them; oftenest the normal human liking for detrimental report of the eminent and the normal human belief that there is no honesty about anything that appertains to the theatre or the concert-room has spread them—which may be explanation but which is not excuse.

H. T. P.

ADVERTISER,

MORNING, JANUARY 22,

WELCOME DR. MUCK ON HIS RECOVERY

SYMPHONY CONCERT TERMED CONSERVATIVE

Work Played in Brilliant Manner, Even for Boston Orchestra

By LOUIS C. ELSON

Programme.

Berlioz—Overture, "Rob Roy."
Liszt—Symphonic poem, "Sur la Montagne."
Schumann—Symphony No. 1, B-flat.

The time was when Liszt and Berlioz were considered radical, but they belong to the conservatives today. We can recall the paleolithic days of John S. Dwight, when Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner were looked upon as the ascetic looks upon the world, the flesh and—so forth. That has been changed and the extreme left is now occupied by Schoenberg, Stravinsky and possibly Reger. Even Richard Strauss and Debussy have been out-dissonanced.

Dr. Muck was greeted with especial cordiality on his return to the conductor's stand, after his recent illness, of which there was no trace in his work. But we did not find any sufficient reason for the resuscitation of the "Rob Roy" overture, even after its excellent performance. It is one of Berlioz's early works and it juggles with Scottish music. It is a strange thing that Scotland should be brimful of splendid folk-songs and yet never have produced a native composer who could weld these into a symphonic or large orchestral form. But, as if to make up for this, all the other nations have come under the spell of Gaelic music and numerous are the applications of it in European Boieldieu ("La Dame Blanche"), Franz (songs), Beethoven (songs), Volkmann ("Richard III." overture), Schumann (songs), Mendelssohn (symphony), Bruch (cantata and concerto), are but a few of those who have built upon this foundation, and they have all, except Mendelssohn, un-Scotched their themes. And Berlioz has un-Scotched "Scots wha hae," in this overture. We do not mind his dallying with the speed of the melody, for Scotch themselves did that when they took it very slowly and metamorphosed it into "I'm wearin' awa, Jean," but Berlioz frequently serves it up in slices (a phrase at a time) like cold veal. It is very interesting figure treatment, but it kills the spirit of the great old melody.

The subordinate theme of this work is another old friend. It is the expressive "Childe Harold" theme, only given to the English horn instead of the Viola. Both of these are melancholic instruments, so the brooding character of the melody is well-preserved, but the theme is far less impressively treated in this overture than it was handled later on, in the great symphony. There is a great deal of intellectual figure development in this symphony, but nothing really exciting. We cannot imagine Rob Roy settling down as a teacher of counterpoint in Paris, as seems to be the case in this overture.

But possibly Dr. Muck had the idea that he would teach his audience how the modern programme-music, tone-coloring school began, for just as "Rob Roy" is an early work of Berloiz, the "Mountain Symphony" is the very beginning of the symphonic poems of Liszt. It was rather a bit of hill-climbing to go at once from the Scottish highlands to the Lisztian Alps. Another conjecture is that our conductor desired to console us for the fact that we are not to have Strauss' new Alpine Symphony this year, because we cannot supply the extra brasses which the composer calls for, and therefore gave us plenty of other mountain music.

In this connection let us say a word about a very unjust New York criticism of our orchestra. They have boasted over there that they can easily get the extra instruments for the New York performances of the Alpine Symphony, and satirize Boston with being hindered by such a small matter. Is it necessary to tell them that our orchestra is not in the Musicians' Union? If we were within the fold we could get a whole band of extra horns without any trouble whatever, and the new symphony would be given at once.

Liszt's "Bergsymphonie" (as the Germans call it) was well worth resuscitating. Although somewhat fragmentary, it is wholly a different proposition from Berlioz's Parisian Scotchman. Victor Hugo's poem, on which the work is founded, is a lofty picture of the perfection of Nature as contrasted with the troubles of Man. It is lofty, but untrue, since antagonism and war run through all animate oreation as well as through the human race. But the contrast of the calm of the mountain with the fever of the human creature is an effective one.

"The world is perfect everywhere,
Whenever fev'rish man is absent there"

Dr. Muck interpreted the graphic picture nobly. First, the portrayal of Nature in Solitude. Out of the muttering of the kettle-drums (a basso ostinato) there evolve themselves the sounds of rippling waters, the rush of winds and contending elements, and an oboe melody which pictures pastoral calm. Then one hears the voice of the Sea, and then the troubled clamor of Man. After this it is a constant struggle between the peace of Nature and the misery of Man. The latter gains the upper hand and all tranquility is gone. There is now a most tumultous Allegro, which the orchestra gave with magnificent fury; a gnashing, shrieking, cursing struggle, that went far beyond a similar picture which Beethoven drew in the introduction to the Finale of his Ninth symphony. There were terrific explosions that intimated that the "Mountain" was a Volcano.

Then follows, not Peace but Exhaustion, in an impressive silence broken only (and made more oppressive) by two soft strokes upon the gong, portentously evil.

The trembling question — Why? What Remedy?—is answered at first by the suggestion of Nature's beauty, the former theme, but Man seems not to be satisfied with this, and the question is asked again and again. At last, after an impressive pause, the Abbe Liszt, the devout Catholic (not then an Abbe, however), departs from Victor Hugo and gives the answer in an Andante Religioso, in which, with great skill, the dissonant and opposing themes are contrapuntally united. The brasses finally give the religious theme with absolute conviction, a new melody of Faith is introduced, and Liszt has solved the entire problem of the Universe!

Whether in this year of disgrace, 1916, the doubts are all thus summarily settled, may be questioned by some, but it is a striking work even if it does not attain the beauty of "Les Preludes," where somewhat similar questions are discussed. But it was followed by a less grandiose but more appealing work, Schumann's first symphony. Love, Spring and Happiness, came as poultices to the tonal wounds that had been inflicted. Less inflated, more sympathetic, it did not astonish as the Liszt work had done, but it went more directly to the heart. All three works were played in a brilliant manner, even for our orchestra. The enthusiasm of the audience was continuous, and Dr. Muck and the orchestra reached their highest standard in each number of this memorable concert.

BOSTON POST,

JANUARY 22.

TRIBUTE TO LISZT THE YOUTH PAID

His First Tone Poem Performed by Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

A programme of uncommon interest was presented by Dr. Muck yesterday afternoon at the 12th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck, having recovered from his recent severe indisposition, was again at the helm.

MUSIC OF THE 30S

The first performance at these concerts of the first of the 12 symphonid poems with which Liszt revolutionized modern music, "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne," proved a matter of far more than merely historical interest, and the seldom played overture of Berlioz, "Rob Roy," prefaced happily the remarkable score of Liszt. This in spite of inequalities of workmanship and because of the youth and romanticism of the writing. This overture was first performed in 1833. The first sketches of Liszt's symphonic poem were made in the same year. The first performance of Schumann's "Spring" symphony, which brought the concert to an end, took place in 1841. A "romantic" programme, a revival of the gorgeous music of the '30s.

Liszt's symphonic poem is startling in its eloquence, color and impetuosity, and its astonishing prophecy of later scores. Shades of Zarathustra! The famous enigmatical conclusion of Strauss' tone suddenly smote our ears.

Was it with deliberate intent that Dr. Muck thus unmasked a composer whom he is far from admiring in toto? For there in the concluding measures of Liszt, large as life were the wavering tonalities, the plucking of double basses—Liszt varies the effect, very interestingly, with the kettle-drums—there is the mystic and philosophical mood, so completely depicted that we almost wondered whether the final page of Strauss had been tacked to the score of the early symphonic poem of Liszt. There should be a foot-note in Strauss' score in this place, after the symphonic poem, "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne!" A feature of Zarathustra which Strauss' partisans and commentators have ignored! Nor has the composer, apparently, taken the pains to enlighten them.

But this symphonic poem is notable for other things than a forshading of a special effect by Strauss. The writing is exceptionally vigorous and sincere. Few of the scores of Liszt have so much richness of color, although there are scores which present finer tone-color to the ear. Taken as a whole, the work is full of inspiration, and must have seemed at the time of its first performance in 1847 a heaven-storming piece of audacity. The themes are not transformed as freely and as cleverly as they are in other compositions by Liszt; the final section of the tone-poem is too long, and you have the spectacle of a composer endeavoring assiduously to life himself up by the bootstraps. "Ahem, ahem"—somehow, the great roll, the thundering sentence, will not come. But, except this place and workmanship which makes up in directness and audacity what it lacks of mature skill—tolerate, if you can, the bombast of the earlier Liszt, and you have a piece of music aglow with ideas and enthusiasms that seem very young and more than half convincing today.

Berlioz' overture has precisely these same qualities, although the employment of the tune "Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled" is rather naive than effectual, but the romantic flavor of that must recompense for occasional weaknesses of workmanship. But it is a brave piece of music, and there is the quotation, the most beautiful page in the work, of the viola solo from Harold in Italy, a theme which obsessed the composer's imagination and haunted him through many years.

These two performances were of exceptional brilliancy, but in no wise more remarkable than the performance of Schumann's symphony. All that a great musician could do to aid a composer who was none too expert with the orchestra was done, until the symphony glowed with unbelievable color and the passion of spring. Symphony or not, as some say of this work, it held a worthy place on the programme yesterday, and at the hands of Dr. Muck, Schumann received his righteous reward.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 5 - 1916

The Boston Symphony concert at the National Theater yesterday afternoon brought together a large and interesting audience. The German Ambassador occupied one of the boxes, having among his guests Miss Harriet Southerland.
Esta

Lady Spring-Rice, wife of the British Ambassador, Mr. Thomas Spring-Rice, and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth were guests in Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's box. Gen. and Mrs. Crozier had with them a party of visitors here in connection with the pan-American congress. Mrs. Norman Williams, Mme. Hauge, Mrs. Philip Sheridan, Mrs. Wesley Merritt and Miss Mary Sheridan were occupants of one of the stage boxes. Mrs. James McMillan had a party in her box, including Mrs. Rollins Morse, Miss Patten, and Mrs. Preston Gibson. Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner also entertained a box party. Among others in the audience were Mrs. Wallace Radcliffe, Mrs. James R. Mann, Mrs. Beverly Williamson, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Countess Gizycka, Miss Margaretta Symons, Mr. and Mrs. William Eaches Fendall, Bishop Harding, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Douglas, Mr. Arnold Hague, Mgr. Mackin, Mrs. Henry W. Fitch, Mrs. John P. Jackson, Mme. de Urcullu, Mrs. George Howard, Miss Perin, Mrs. Julian James, Mme. Ekengren, Mrs. Joseph Leiter, Mrs. Herbert Howard, Mrs. Arthur Willert, Mr. and Mrs. Larz Anderson, Mrs. Ben Hellen, Capt. and Mrs. John Gibbons, Mrs. Victor Kauffmann, Mrs. Lloyd Bowers, Mrs. John Rodgers, Mrs. Thomas Chatard, Miss Lee, Miss Flora Wilson, Miss Hickey, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Blagden, Dr. and Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mrs. Tanner, Mrs. Sinclair Bowen, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Mr. Walter Tuckerman, Mr. Myron Whitney, Mrs. Cuno Rudolph, Mrs. Frank Carpenter, Miss Carpenter, Mr. and Mrs. Christian Heurich, Mrs. Alexander Bentley, Mrs. Chauncey Hackett, Mrs. E. H. G. Slater, Mrs. S. C. Neale, Mr. Robert Shaw Oliver, Representative and Mrs. Horace Towner, Mrs. Edmund Pendleton, Mrs. John Blair, Mr. and Mrs. George Eustis, Mrs. Charles McChord, Mrs. George H. Chase, Mrs. William H. Wilmer, the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, Miss Nancy Lane, Miss Gwynn, Mrs. Albert Mills, the Rev and Mrs. F. Ward Denys, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Miss Beatrice Clover and Miss Sargent.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY,
JANUARY 17, 1916

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE WRONG OF CURRENT GOSSIP ABOUT DR. MUCK

Malicious and Wholly Unfounded Tales That He Declined to Conduct for Mme. Melba and That He Compelled Mr. Schelling to Alter a Sub-Title of His Variations—Inventions Without Rhyme, Reason or Justification—New Chamber Pieces by Ravel and Mr. Hadley—Concerts in Prospect

WHILE the Symphony Orchestra was making its monthly journey to New York and other cities to the southward in the week before last, Dr. Muck was attacked with the prevailing influenza and with a return of an affection of the throat for which he underwent an operation a few years ago. That operation, it now appears, was not as complete in result as either the patient or the surgeons anticipated. Thus ill, Dr. Muck was unable to conduct in the concert of the orchestra in Brooklyn on Friday evening, Jan. 7 and he led, altogether "on his nerve," in the concert in New York on the following Saturday afternoon. Returning to Boston, he took to his bed and put aside all thoughts of conducting at the concerts of last Thursday in Cambridge and of last Friday and Saturday in Boston. As already set down in this place, Mr. Kelley, the composer of the "New England Symphony," then to be played for the first times here, was notified of the mischance and asked to decide between a performance of the music under Mr. Schmidt on the appointed days or the postponement of production until next season. He preferred immediate performance, even under an assistant conductor. The fact that Mme. Melba was to assist the orchestra at these concerts lessened rather than increased the sense of obligation toward them that haunted Dr. Muck, inasmuch as her numbers filled a considerable space in the programme and would, so to say, go of themselves.

It is necessary to enumerate these petty details, of little concern to the public, because of the equally petty and, in some instances, malignant gossip that for two or three days has traversed the town. According to it, Dr. Muck feigned illness in order that he need not accompany Mme. Melba, a British subject, prone to discourse to all and sundry about the war from her point of view. To attribute such motives and such conduct to Dr. Muck, who sets his obligations to his work above all else, who is honesty and loyalty themselves, and who takes no thought of partisanship in all that concerns the Symphony Concerts, is wofully far from the truth and more suggestive of the minds of the fomenters of this gossip than of conductor's own. He was much concern because he could not conduct in Mr. K ley's symphony, which, for a year, he h been holding for performance. He though of Mme. Melba only as an eminent singer who would suffice in herself for the audience.

Of a piece with this gossip is yet another potin—as the French call these malicious yarns—as to Mr. Schelling's set of variations played here a fortnight ago and repeated later in New York and in other cities. One of those variations the composer entitled, "August, 1914," and in it pictured troops going forth to "war without its glamor." As the yarn goes, Mr. Schelling intended to label the variation with some reference to the march of the German soldiery into Belgium: but Dr. Muck forbade him to do so, hinting at all sorts of pains and penalties to the music, if he did. It seems extraordinary that any human beings should believe that a conductor would so wreck a piece, virtually inscribed to him and to his orchestra, and that he had himself sought for performance—least of all human beings that for many a year have come to know Dr. Muck's integrity as man and conductor. The simple truth of the matter is that the variation was written as a picture of the beginnings of warfare in any or all of the nations that embarked upon it in the summer of 1914 and that Mr. Schelling, who by temperament, is fain to be all things to all men, was disposed to agree with any interpretation the partisans of any one of the warring countries might put upon it. Dr. Muck, as it happened, was concerned only with the music, but was superfluously sensitive to the alleged implications that certain experts in malignant gossip drew from it and cast at him.

Finally, to cap the climax, New York was entertained last week with the report that for ten days Dr. Muck had been feigning illness because he and Mr. Higginson were at odds, whereas within those same days Mr. Higginson had been authoritatively quoted as saying that so long as Dr. Muck chose to be conductor of the Symphony Orchestra he could remain in his present post. The management of the Symphony Concerts dignifies such preposterous surmise when it formally and sharply denies it: but it is not so well advised when it makes no announcement of Dr. Muck's inability to conduct because of illness until the audience has received the programme books on Friday afternoon, though it has known for days that he could not lead.

For eighteen months past, no man could have striven more zealously than has Dr. Muck to keep the Symphony Concerts clear of any differences that the war and partisanship over it has provoked. Had all Europe been at peace since August of 1914, the concerts would have run exactly the same course that they have followed, save that more novel music now unobtainable, would have been played at them and a change or two made in the personnel of the band. No man in public and responsible place has been more careful than Dr. Muck not to obtrude his own loyalties and judgments between nation and nation upon those who knew him only in his public capacity and whom they concern as little as their own predilections concern him. And the reward of such sense of obligation steadfastly maintained has been the petty slanders here set down. Occasionally malice has prompted and spread them; oftenest the normal human liking for detrimental report of the eminent and the normal human belief that there is no honesty about anything that appertains to the theatre or the concert-room has spread them—which may be explanation but which is not excuse.

H. T. P.

ADVERTISER,
MORNING, JANUARY 22,

WELCOME DR. MUCK ON HIS RECOVERY

SYMPHONY CONCERT TERMED CONSERVATIVE

Work Played in Brilliant Manner, Even for Boston Orchestra

By LOUIS C. ELSON

Programme.

Berlioz—Overture, "Rob Roy."
Liszt—Symphonic poem, "Sur la Montagne."
Schumann—Symphony No. 1, B-flat.

The time was when Liszt and Berlioz were considered radical, but they belong to the conservatives today. We can recall the paleolithic days of John S. Dwight, when Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner were looked upon as the ascetic looks upon the world, the flesh and—so forth. That has been changed and the extreme left is now occupied by Schoenberg, Stravinsky and possibly Reger. Even Richard Strauss and Debussy have been out-dissonanced.

Dr. Muck was greeted with especial cordiality on his return to the conductor's stand, after his recent illness, of which there was no trace in his work. But we did not find any sufficient reason for the resuscitation of the "Rob Roy" overture, even after its excellent performance. It is one of Berlioz's early works and it juggles with Scottish music. It is a strange thing that Scotland should be brimful of splendid folk-songs and yet never have produced a native composer who could weld these into a symphonic or large orchestral form. But, as if to make up for this, all the other nations have come under the spell of Gaelic music and numerous are the applications of it in European music.

Boieldieu ("La Dame Blanche"), Franz (songs), Beethoven (songs), Volkmann ("Richard III." overture), Schumann (songs), Mendelssohn (symphony), Bruch (cantata and concerto), are but a few of those who have built upon this foundation, and they have all, except Mendelssohn, un-Scotched their themes. And Berlioz has un-Scotched "Scots wha hae," in this overture. We do not mind his dallying with the speed of the melody, for Scotch themselves did that when they took it very slowly and metamorphosed it into "I'm wearin' awa Jean," but Berlioz frequently serves it up in slices (a phrase at a time) like cold veal. It is very interesting figure treatment, but it kills the spirit of the great old melody.

The subordinate theme of this work is another old friend. It is the expressive "Childe Harold" theme, only given to the English horn instead of the Viola. Both of these are melancholic instruments, so the brooding character of the melody is well-preserved, but the theme is far less impressively treated in this overture than it was handled later on, in the great symphony. There is a great deal of intellectual figure development in this symphony, but nothing really exciting. We cannot imagine Rob Roy settling down as a teacher of counterpoint in Paris, as seems to be the case in this overture.

But possibly Dr. Muck had the idea that he would teach his audience how the modern programme-music, tone-coloring school began, for just as "Rob Roy" is an early work of Berlioz, the "Mountain Symphony" is the very beginning of the symphonic poems of Liszt. It was rather a bit of hill-climbing to go at once from the Scottish highlands to the Lisztian Alps. Another conjecture is that our conductor desired to console us for the fact that we are not to have Strauss' new Alpine Symphony this year, because we cannot supply the extra brasses which the composer calls for, and therefore gave us plenty of other mountain music.

In this connection let us say a word about a very unjust New York criticism of our orchestra. They have boasted over there that they can easily get the extra instruments for the New York performances of the Alpine Symphony, and satirize Boston with being hindered by such a small matter. Is it necessary to tell them that our orchestra is not in the Musicians' Union? If we were within the fold we could get a whole band of extra horns without any trouble whatever, and the new symphony would be given at once.

Liszt's "Bergsymphonie" (as the Germans call it) was well worth resuscitating. Although somewhat fragmentary, it is wholly a different proposition from Berlioz's Parisian Scotchman. Victor Hugo's poem, on which the work is founded, is a lofty picture of the perfection of Nature as contrasted with the troubles of Man. It is lofty, but untrue, since antagonism and war run through all animate creation as well as through the human race. But the contrast of the calm of the mountain with the fever of the human creature is an effective one.

"The world is perfect everywhere,
Whenever fev'rish man is absent there"

Dr. Muck interpreted the graphic picture nobly. First, the portrayal of Nature in Solitude. Out of the muttering of the kettle-drums (a basso ostinato) there evolve themselves the sounds of rippling waters, the rush of winds and contending elements, and an oboe melody which pictures pastoral calm. Then one hears the voice of the Sea, and then the troubled clamor of Man. After this it is a constant struggle between the peace of Nature and the misery of Man. The latter gains the upper hand and all tranquility is gone. There is now a most tumultous Allegro, which the orchestra gave with magnificent fury; a gnashing, shrieking, cursing struggle, that went far beyond a similar picture which Beethoven drew in the introduction to the Finale of his Ninth symphony. There were terrific explosions that intimated that the "Mountain" was a Volcano.

Then follows, not Peace but Exhaustion, in an impressive silence broken only (and made more oppressive) by two soft strokes upon the gong, portentously evil.

The trembling question — Why? What Remedy?—is answered at first by the suggestion of Nature's beauty, the former theme, but Man seems not to be satisfied with this, and the question is asked again and again. At last, after an impressive pause, the Abbe Liszt, the devout Catholic (not then an Abbe, however), departs from Victor Hugo and gives the answer in an Andante Religioso, in which, with great skill, the dissonant and opposing themes are contrapuntally united. The brasses finally give the religious theme with absolute conviction, a new melody of Faith is introduced, and Liszt has solved the entire problem of the Universe!

Whether in this year of disgrace, 1916, the doubts are all thus summarily settled, may be questioned by some, but it is a striking work even if it does not attain the beauty of "Les Preludes," where somewhat similar questions are discussed. But it was followed by a less grandiose but more appealing work, Schumann's first symphony. Love, Spring and Happiness, came as poultices to the tonal wounds that had been inflicted. Less inflated, more sympathetic, it did not astonish as the Liszt work had done, but it went more directly to the heart. All three works were played in an astonishingly brilliant manner, even for our orchestra. The enthusiasm of the audience was continuous, and Dr. Muck and the orchestra reached their highest standard in each number of this memorable concert.

BOSTON POST,
JANUARY 22,

TRIBUTE TO LISZT THE YOUTH PAID

His First Tone Poem Performed by Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

A programme of uncommon interest was presented by Dr. Muck yesterday afternoon at the 12th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck, having recovered from his recent severe indisposition, was again at the helm.

MUSIC OF THE 30S

The first performance at these concerts of the first of the 12 symphonic poems with which Liszt revolutionized modern music, "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne," proved a matter of far more than merely historical interest, and the seldom played overture of Berlioz, "Rob Roy," prefaced happily the remarkable score of Liszt. This in spite of inequalities of workmanship and because of the youth and romanticism of the writing. This overture was first performed in 1833. The first sketches of Liszt's symphonic poem were made in the same year. The first performance of Schumann's "Spring" symphony, which brought the concert to an end, took place in 1841. A "romantic" programme, a revival of the gorgeous music of the '30s.

Liszt's symphonic poem is startling in its eloquence, color and impetuosity, and its astonishing prophecy of later scores. Shades of Zarathustra! The famous enigmatical conclusion of Strauss' tone suddenly smote our ears.

Was it with deliberate intent that Dr. Muck thus unmasked a composer whom he is far from admiring in toto? For there in the concluding measures of Liszt, large as life were the wavering tonalities, the plucking of double basses—Liszt varies the effect, very interestingly, with the kettle-drums—there is the mystic and philosophical mood, so completely depicted that we almost wondered whether the final page of Strauss had been tacked to the score of the early symphonic poem of Liszt. There should be a foot-note in Strauss' score in this place, after the symphonic poem, "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne!" A feature of Zarathustra which Strauss' partisans and commentators have ignored! Nor has the composer, apparently, taken the pains to enlighten them.

But this symphonic poem is notable for other things than a forshading of a special effect by Strauss. The writing is exceptionally vigorous and sincere. Few of the scores of Liszt have so much richness of color, although there are scores which present finer tone-color to the ear. Taken as a whole, the work is full of inspiration, and must have seemed at the time of its first performance in 1847 a heaven-storming piece of audacity. The themes are not transformed as freely and as cleverly as they are in other compositions by Liszt; the final section of the tone-poem is too long, and you have the spectacle of a composer endeavoring assiduously to life himself up by the bootstraps. "Ahem, ahem"—somehow, the great roll, the thundering sentence, will not come. But, except this place and workmanship which makes up in directness and audacity what it lacks of mature skill—tolerate, if you can, the bombast of the earlier Liszt, and you have a piece of music aglow with ideas and enthusiasms that seem very young and more than half convincing today.

Berlioz' overture has precisely these same qualities, although the employment of the tune "Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled" is rather naive than effectual, but the romantic flavor of that must recompense for occasional weaknesses of workmanship. But it is a brave piece of music, and there is the quotation, the most beautiful page in the work, of the viola solo from Harold in Italy, a theme which obsessed the composer's imagination and haunted him through many years.

These two performances were of exceptional brilliancy, but in no wise more remarkable than the performance of Schumann's symphony. All that a great musician could do to aid a composer who was none too expert with the orchestra was done, until the symphony glowed with unbelievable color and the passion of spring. Symphony or not, as some say of this work, it held a worthy place on the programme yesterday, and at the hands of Dr. Muck, Schumann received his righteous reward.

[90]

BOSTON HERALD.

JAN 22

SYMPHONY GIVES SEASON'S 12TH CONCERT

Berlioz's Overture to "Rob Roy," Liszt's "What One Hears on the Mountain," and Symphonic Poem No. 1 and Schumann Composition Make up Program.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Berlioz, overture to "Rob Roy"; Liszt, "What One Hears on the Mountain," Symphonic Poem No. 1 (after Victor Hugo); Schumann, Symphony in B flat major No. 1.

Some have wondered why Buelow was partial to Berlioz's overture "The Corsair." He praised it in his letters; he delighted in conducting it. It might be asked by those who are so unfortunate as not to appreciate the genius of Berlioz, why do conductors put his overture to "Rob Roy" on programs, especially as it is an early work and Berlioz burned the score, forgetting that he had sent a manuscript copy to the Academy of Fine Arts in Paris. It will be remembered that this overture was not published until 1900 when the second performance took place, and that was in London. The suggestion has been made that Berlioz destroyed the score because he had used one of the themes, the one that resembles curiously Offenbach's "Voici le Sabre," in his "Harold" symphony.

The answer to the questioners is that conductors and many other musicians find that the overture to "Rob Roy" has more than a historical interest. There is a Scottish atmosphere, and not merely by reason of the theme founded on "Scots Wha Hae Wi' Wallace Bled." The horn fanfares, the melody for English horn accompanied by the harp, the suggestion of the bagpipes; in a word, the prevailing mood of the overture is Scottish. We know that Berlioz, as other men of the romantic period were admirers of Sir Walter, whose influence was then great and unmistakable in many ways. Berlioz wrote an overture, "Waverley"; why not one suggested by "Rob Roy"?

There are other reasons for liking this overture. Composed in 1832, it is surprisingly fresh, ingenious, vigorous in its instrumentation. Grant that the themes and some formulas are of an old pattern, they are still expressive, and they are developed and treated for the orchestra by the master of orchestration, from whom all following him have learned and are still learning, though no one has yet succeeded in obtaining such striking effect with apparently simple means.

Liszt's symphonic poem was played here for the first time, although it was remodelled by the composer nearly 60 years ago. The poem of the same title in Hugo's "Autumn Leaves" inspired the music. The poem itself is characteristic of the Hugo described by Mr. George Moore as a cross between an Italian improvisator and a metaphysical German student. In it we find the familiar "splendor of imagery and thunder of syllables." The poet puts himself on a mountain by the sea. He hears two voices: one singing superbly the beauty and the harmony of creation—the voice of Nature; the other, the voice of Humanity, is swollen with sighs, groans, sobs, cries of revolt, blasphemies. The poet then asks, why are we here? What is the end of all this? He hears no answer.

Liszt gives full and varied musical expression to these voices, but does not end with Hugo. He finds the answers in prayer, in the hope, comfort, assurance of religion. After the development of the contrasting themes, with a wealth of subsidiary details, the answer to the terrible doubt and vain questioning, the answer to Nature herself, is the final Hymn of Faith.

No wonder this symphonic poem frightened and appalled conductors, players, critics and audiences 50 years ago. Some today may regard the main contents as bombastic, yet accept and praise the solemn Hymn given first to the trombones. To us the music is remarkable in many ways, remarkable even as coming after the more important achievements of Berlioz. No modern composer, not even Debussy or Rimsky-Korsakoff has been more successful in suggesting the murmur of waves, the surge of the ocean. No ultra-modern composer, not even the Strauss of the later years, has expressed more dramatically and convincingly in music cries of anguish and despair. Liszt's use of dissonances is a revelation even in these days of dissonances, when common chords have a certain piquancy.

It is true that there are pages that might be spared. The final section is too long-drawn out. There is repetition that lessens the effect. Yet this section as a whole has majestic beauty and in it we observe Wagner gaily appropriating music for his "Parsifal," as elsewhere in the poem he found measures for his "Ring." How he and others after him have plundered the storehouse of Liszt!

The performance was impressive. After this music the Symphony of [illegible] seemed [illegible]

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week, for the orchestra will make a western trip. The program for Feb. 4-5 will include Beethoven's Symphony No. 2; Carpenter's "Adventures in a Perambulator" (repeated by request), and a short piece to be announced. Miss Geraldine Farrar will sing Elsa's Dream from "Lohengrin" and the Romance from "The Damnation of Faust."

MONITOR, BOSTON,

JANUARY 22, 1916

"MOUNTAIN" TONE POEM DISCLOSES LISZT'S METHOD

SYMPHONY HALL—Twelfth program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of Jan. 21: Berlioz, "Rob Roy" overture; Liszt, symphonic poem No. 1, "On the Mountain"; Schumann, symphony No. 1 in B-flat major, op. 38.

The present conductor of the Symphony orchestra is the first one to put the "Mountain" symphony into the repertory. In producing the piece he has enlarged his reputation, already great, as a Liszt interpreter and he has widened the public knowledge of a type of composition that is none too generally understood, though it was invented three quarters of a century ago. In seizing the opportunity his predecessors have neglected he has doubtless added more to his influence than he could have by bringing forward any newly-composed work whatsoever. His placing such a number on his program is one of those enterprises by which the conservatism of the institution which he directs is justified.

The music had a genuine effect of novelty. It greatly aroused the attention of the listeners. It could hardly have done so more if instead of being a mid-nineteenth century composition, a document of the maturing romantic period, it had been the latest product of the school of today which discards melodic line and harmonic color and thinks only in terms of cacophonic cubes.

And yet, fresh as was the "Mountain" symphony's sound, and of the morning as were its themes, there was no mistaking the composer. The music was the "Tasso" symphonic poem, the "Faust" symphony and the piano concerto in E flat all over again. For the piece represents, if not in complete and finished manner, at least in essentials, the Liszt who in the forties remodeled orchestral writing, making possible the structure of large works from a few simple elements of melody, and making possible the expression of all passions and moods without formal grouping of them into fast and slow movements.

The conductor gave his audience a valuable music lesson and himself a tremendous task in the sorting out of styles when he put together on one program selections by Liszt, Schumann and Berlioz. It must have been hard for many hearers to believe that all three of these composers could have been active at the same time. And it could not have been of much help to them to stop and think that the successors of the three, namely, Strauss, Reger and Debussy, are all influential in the concert world now. Dr. Muck made a conspicuous success of Liszt and Berlioz. The severe beat of his baton seemed requisite to the interpretation of both the "Mountain" symphony and the "Rob Roy" overture; but not so to the interpretation of the Schumann piece. It found, all listeners must admit, the precise value of every syncopation. The players, except with the utmost carelessness, could not have lost their way in any measure of their music. But where was the Schumann sentiment? Where that most cherished thing in romanticism, which Schumann best after Schubert expresses—that pensive gayety? Missing.

But let nobody imagine that the symphony in B flat was altogether a study in the mechanics of time-beating. Indeed the portrait delineated was nearly three fourths true to the original. The scherzo and not a little that immediately preceded it, and all that followed it was the very speech of the tenderest-hearted of the romanticists.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

JANUARY 22, 1916.

Symphony Seats Next Season

The management of the Symphony orchestra is taking the first step in the promised change of methods for disposing of the season tickets of the Symphony concerts. The first step in this new process is to have owners of seats for the present season register their seats, their names and addresses, so that the management will have a complete record of the seats that are held. The registration will be at Symphony Hall between the hours of 10 and 1 on Thursday, Friday and Saturday of each week up to and including March 4, and during the concerts on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. Cards have been provided wherein owners of seats may properly register and the data on these cards will be then transferred to books especially prepared for the purpose.

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 22,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A FULL PROGRAMME OF ROMANTIC MUSIC

Orchestra and Conductor at the Top of Their Bent Through a Stirring Afternoon—The Resurrection of Liszt's Puissant Tone-Poem of the Mountain—Schumann's "Spring" Symphony and an Overture of Berlioz

ROMANTIC music filled the programme of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon—all written in the full tide of the ardent years that drew Berlioz to Scott; Liszt to Hugo; and Schumann to the poetized sights and sounds and moods of the German spring. As it was written in the overture to "Rob Roy," in the tone-poem, "Ce qu' on Entend sur la Montagne," and in the symphony in B-flat major No. 1, as the formal titles go, so Dr. Muck and the orchestra played it. There are occasional and also inevitable days when the band falls away into relatively dull routine as it did a week ago; there are many more when it holds to the level of its alert and eloquent self; and there are surprisingly many—if memory runs back over the long course of the concerts—when it mounts well above that plane and sustains itself in this higher flight. Of such was the concert of Friday, and the audience unmistakably thrilled to it and by more and subtler tokens than outpoured applause. Seldom has the tone of the orchestra been more rich, warm and glowing than it was in Berlioz's overture, more songful of instrumental melody, more vivid of rhythm, more graphic of contrast. Seldom has the band gained such force and variety of characterizing and significant voice as it sustained through the manifold delineation and suggestion of Liszt's tone-poem; and seldom has it irradiated and vitalized music, as though it were playing it in re-creative rhapsody—yet with what control of means!—as it did Schumann's symphony of the spring. Strange that there are those, especially in the West, who believe that the orchestra lets fire wait upon finesse. Rather, when ardor and energy are the word, as they are in much of this romantic music, it can summon them as readily and truly as it does the elegance it bestows upon Mozart or Mendelssohn or the felicities of detail and implication with which it graces Debussy or Ravel. There are times when the Symphony Orchestra is a glorious orchestra and when the audience—often more routine than the players—feels and knows it as such. It was so yesterday.

The source and cause of these things was not far to seek. Dr. Muck was again in his place and in the full usage of his familiar powers upon his music, his forces and his audience. Upon the music, he exercised that sense of characterizing differentiation that gave to all three pieces the romantic ardor of invention, creation and final accomplishment, the romantic fulness and richness of speech, the romantic freedom of voice, the romantic intensity of mood and purpose that are life and soul within them. At the same time he distinguished the large rhetoric of Berlioz—for the overture to "Rob Roy" is or ought to be music of the theatre—from the warm and relatively intimate tonal poetry of Schumann; seized the significance within the spectacle of Liszt's tone-poem; drew from it that quality of excitement upon those that hear, which again is intrinsic in romantic music. Upon his forces, he exercised simultaneously the control that leaves not to chance so much as one progression, one modulation, one accent or one shading; while at the same time he infused into them his own sense of that which vitalized and characterized the music in hand and which the imagination and the projection of the conductor must discover and enforce beyond any indication of the engraved page. His audience in turn felt that power of transmitting and stimulating personality of which Dr. Muck seems the more unconscious the more his hearers know its spell. A great conductor in more than the usual flush of his abilities led a glorious orchestra through as exciting a concert as the season has brought.

Yet to the composers—dead and gone these many years but more alive in their music than many a writer of the day before yesterday—belongs the lion's share of the reward, since the conductor and the orchestra did but serve them, and most of all to the Liszt of the tone-poem, hitherto unheard in Boston, though it was put to paper more than sixty years ago. It is quite true that more than one of Liszt's sym[illegible] plenty in current orchestral repertories, hardly deserves its discovery and restoration to it. They are an uneven succession of pieces; there is one and another of them in which there is little body thinly clad. It is also quite true that it is much easier to play "Tasso" one year; "The Preludes" the next; maybe "Orpheus" the third and then make the round again than to go questing through the scores of the rest as Dr. Muck insistently does. If one of his discoveries among them, "Hungaria," hardly repaid revival, "Mazeppa" of a season or two back and especially "The Mountain Symphony" of yesterday richly deserved it. The wonder was that it had been overlooked for so long and that the conductor himself had sometimes hesitated over the resurrection of it—not from regard for convention, a consideration that little sways him—but from fear lest music so much of its own romantic time and fashion might not fall sixty years after upon responsive ears.

"Ce qu' on Entend sur la Montagne" is indeed romantic in the full blaze of the adjective that is presumed to illuminate Hugo when his voice and vision are biggest and most resounding; Hoffmann when he is most fantastic; Berlioz when he is at once grandiose and graphic, and Delacroix and his fellow-painters when they stretch their broadest canvas and heap it with bold design, flaming color and sombre shadow. That is to say, Liszt's music has the shortcomings—or what another generation has elected to call the shortcomings—of its species and of the talents and the temperament that wrought in it. There are passages in the tone-poem that seem to many ears superfluous repetition that Liszt wrote in excess of ardor for his vision and for the musical means by which he was bodying it forth; but these are the inevitable complement of the intensity of imagination and spirit that conceived the one and gave it voice, vitality and illusion with the other. There are passages that the reticent and the adroit in music call turgid; but they are of the grandiose style which was of Liszt's temperament and which was the unquestioned manner of romanticism in all the arts in his time. There are occasional passages—but much fewer than in many another of the symphonic poems—in which the music merely fills a halt until imagination and ardor glow again, but the compensation is disproportionately abundant in the ease of invention, the readiness of means and the fulness of illusion with which Liszt writes the music in which the two voices of Nature and of Man are in simultaneous play, or in which he blends them in the Andante designed to reconcile and to fuse their conflict and their questionings.

On the other hand, "The Mountain Symphony" is richly and glowingly alive with not a few of the virtues of such romantic music and of the composer who burned with an unquenchable desire to write it to the full and who left time to bear testimony to the delineative, the psychological and the tonal power of his music. It has borne two: the testimony whereby the best of the symphonic poems of Liszt have added a new and established form to music and seem now part and parcel of the music that endures from generation to generation; and the testimony whereby he seems often to be anticipating the composers of our time not only when they deliberately imitate him but when his visioning, his purpose and his means seem at one with theirs.

Liszt in this very music was questioning poignantly in tones and leaving the riddle of destiny, of man and of the material world unsolved in empty and dissonant intervals before the Strauss, who does likewise in "Zarathustra" to the general admiration, was born into that same world. Even the Wagner of "Parsifal" does not hesitate to borrow from the instrumental panoply of "Ce qu' on Entend sur la Montagne." Our contemporary music is much concerned with delineation; but who that writes it has surpassed Liszt in the tonal suggestion of the outspread and slowly swaying sea. Composers to right of us and composers to left of us would carry music to higher intensities; yet when Liszt sets the suffering and the frenzies of man over against the calm and the strength of nature, the music agonizes with the sharp stress of the conflict and the contrast. Those same composers search their minds and spirits for music of atmosphere. In relatively few measures at the beginning of "The Mountain Symphony," Liszt leads his poet to the mountain top, sets his voices of vision vibrating and stirs his hearers to excited and suspensive interest.

These pictorial and atmospheric qualities; that high heat of mood; that largeness and intensity of vision and answering emotion; that impinging suggestion of strangeness and suspense; that commanding voice, that mingling of exaltation and actuality, of the ideal, the natural and the human in one transporting illusion are the very life and soul of romantic music that makes it search and thrill when the mere superficial aspects of it are no more than a vanished fashion. Of such is "Ce qu' on Entend sur la Montagne," not merely resurrected yesterday, but in this unheeding Boston and among conventionally neglectful conductors, actually buried alive for more than sixty years.

Berlioz's overture, so far as it goes in frank and animated employ of a familiar Scotsmen's tune in warm harmonic vesture and spirited rhythmic march seems no more than well-developed romantic music from a happily chosen source beside such a piece as Liszt's "Mountain Symphony." Indeed the overture becomes a work of the imagination only when it summons and develops a melody that is all Berlioz's own and yet is curiously suggestive of the wistful and melancholy mood that Scottish landscape, Scottish light, air and solitude and maybe the Scottish temperament, when it sets to folk-poetry or folk-song, stirs in them that see and hear. Perhaps much reading and much joy of Sir Walter, then at the zenith of romantic fashion, gave Berlioz this divination; but more plausibly imagination in music knows no borders and Berlioz, as it afterward happened, was quite ready to shift that same motive to his melancholy Harold when he bore that wanderer into Italian solitudes.

[91]

By the same token Schumann's symphony of the spring is universal in appeal, even if it evokes that quick-coming spring which the more fortunate North knows in annual and shining flood and that is strange to our middle—and mediocre—latitudes. Moreover, it is the sights and sounds of the spring in Germany, in the Rhine country, and the mood and the delight of human beings—German or any other—under them that stirred Schumann to his music and gave it ardor, beauty and enduring freshness of instrumental song. Now all the world—except the dull-witted English who have long misliked the symphony—hears it gladly, and might even hear it each year because it is music that quickens the ear, enlivens the fancy and awakes cheerful emotion even as do the stirrings and the glamors of the spring itself.

The very ardor of Schumann made him break the bonds that usually chafed him when he worked in the symphonic form. The very inspiration that possessed him made him modulate, harmonize and lay on his instrumental color as by effective intuition. The call of the trumpets and the horns at the beginning and all that flows out of this motive through the first movement are the sparks of genius rather than the mere strokes of invention and imagination. The fancy of the Scherzo shines hardly less brightly. The song of the Andante runs deep with the tranquil joy of the spring and then sets the restlessness that it breeds to gentle ruffling of the music. And the dance-tune of the end is a dance of nature with the poet's spirit rhythmed to it. No wonder Schumann wrote his symphony in four days when such flowing inspiration possessed him. As the outcome in Liszt's tone-poem was the power of romantic music so the outcome in Schumann's symphony is its beauty. The power intensifies human sensations and emotions, giving them new and strange exaltation and poignancy; the beauty clothes them in as novel and rare a loveliness. Because romantic music loved external pomps, some have believed it superficial. By the universal answer to it, it really goes deep.

H. T. P.

BOSTON AMERICAN

JANUARY 22, 1916.

LISZT NOVELTY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

By FRED J. McISAAC.

Berlioz's overture to "Rob Roy," Liszt's tone poem, "What One Hears on a Mountain," and Schumann's symphony in B-flat major No. 1, op. 39, composed the program at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday.

Berlioz's overture was inspired by Scott's novels. Its chief theme is "Scots wha hea," an ancient melody to which Robert Burns set inspiring words. After hearing the first performance of his overture Berlioz went home and burned the manuscript. He used much of its thematic material in "Childe Harold" afterwards. Nevertheless it is agreeable music to those of us who have Scottish sympathies.

Liszt's tone poem received its first Boston performance yesterday, although it is nearly seventy years old. It was inspired by a poem by Victor Hugo, whom Liszt greatly admired. It is a musical description of the conflict between the forces of nature and humanity. It is couched in the sonorous and impressive phraseology of Liszt, but it falls far behind his other tone poems in inspiration and descriptive powers. Much of it is tedious, and much only noisy. It is easy to understand why no conductor felt moved to produce it here until Dr. Muck put it on as a novelty.

The Schumann Spring symphony is always gay, happy and charming, and it was delightfully played. The orchestra will be on tour next week. The soloist at the concert two weeks hence will be Geraldine Farrar.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

JANUARY 22,

"MOUNTAIN" TONE POEM DISCLOSES LISZT'S METHOD

SYMPHONY HALL—Twelfth program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of Jan. 21: Berlioz, "Rob Roy" overture; Liszt, symphonic poem No. 1, "On the Mountain"; Schumann, symphony No. 1 in B-flat major, op. 38.

The present conductor of the Symphony orchestra is the first one to put the "Mountain" symphony into the repertory. In producing the piece he has enlarged his reputation, already great, as a Liszt interpreter and he has widened the public knowledge of a type of composition that is none too generally understood, though it was invented three quarters of a century ago. In seizing the opportunity his predecessors have neglected he has doubtless added more to his influence than he could have by bringing forward any newly-composed work whatsoever. His placing such a number on his program is one of those enterprises by which the conservatism of the institution which he directs is justified.

The music had a genuine effect of novelty. It greatly aroused the attention of the listeners. It could hardly have done so more if instead of being a mid-nineteenth century composition, a document of the maturing romantic period, it had been the latest product of the school of today which discards melo- [illegible] line and harmonic color and thinks only in terms of cacophonic cubes.

And yet, fresh as was the "Mountain" symphony's sound, and of the morning as were its themes, there was no mistaking the composer. The music was the "Tasso" symphonic poem, the "Faust" symphony and the piano concerto in E flat all over again. For the piece represents, if not in complete and finished manner, at least in essentials, the Liszt who in the forties remodeled orchestral writing, making possible the structure of large works from a few simple elements of melody, and making possible the expression of all passions and moods without formal grouping of them into fast and slow movements.

The conductor gave his audience a valuable music lesson and himself a tremendous task in the sorting out of styles when he put together on one program selections by Liszt, Schumann and Berlioz. It must have been hard for many hearers to believe that all three of these composers could have been active at the same time. And it could not have been of much help to them to stop and think that the successors of the three, namely, Strauss, Reger and Debussy, are all influential in the concert world now. Dr. Muck made a conspicuous success of Liszt and Berlioz. The severe beat of his baton seemed requisite to the interpretation of both the "Mountain" symphony and the "Rob Roy" overture; but not so to the interpretation of the Schumann piece. It found, all listeners must admit, the precise value of every syncopation. The players, except with the utmost carelessness, could not have lost their way in any measure of their music. But where was the Schumann sentiment? Where that most cherished thing in romanticism, which Schumann best after Schubert expresses—that pensive gayety? Missing.

But let nobody imagine that the symphony in B flat was altogether a study in the mechanics of time-beating. Indeed the portrait delineated was nearly three fourths true to the original. The scherzo and not a little that immediately preceded it, and all that followed it was the very speech of the tenderest-hearted of the romanticists.

BOSTON GLOBE—

JANUARY 22,

REMARKABLE "NEW" LISZT TONE POEM

Amazingly Prophetic Work 68 Years Old.

A symphonic poem by Liszt performed for the first time in Boston! The thought might seem anomalous as that of a man born too late, strangely out of tune with his time, a sere page of the past, uncovered to be forgotten.

But not so with the "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne" of Liszt after one of Victor Hugo's poems in his "Leaves of Autumn." Here is an amazingly prophetic work. The chief interest is not that now, at a symphony concert 68 years after its composition, the Orchestra plays it for the first time. Irrespective of time or period the score arrests the mind and stimulates feeling by its freshness, vigor, dramatic force, by the resourceful, and to modern ears, remarkable anticipation of modern methods of large dramatic expression—in invention of characterizing themes, in harmonic color apt and eloquent, in the contrast of ideas and moods as of orchestral choirs, to all of which the element of personality and identity attache, and finally in the interpretative and seizing use of dissonance.

Where was its model in the year 1848? Wagner shortly before had produced his "Tannhauser" in Dresden, and was soon to be expelled, not as an iconoclast in tones but in politics. Weber had completed his operas in a new romantic vein, and his life, a score of years before, but he had little to offer as inspiration.

The only likely name is not to be found in the German side of the house. It was a historically significant, as well as a gracious and courteous, act upon Dr Muck's part to precede the Liszt tone poem with a work by Berlioz. Remarkable seer of things to come was this turbulent, frenetic, morbidly sensitive Frenchman. The debt which the whole line of tonal romanticists, colorists, verists, dramatists from Liszt and Wagner down to Strauss and the new apostle of life in tone—Strawinsky—owe to Berlioz probably never can be wholly measured. It is true that music far more worthy of Berlioz and more fairly representative could be found than this "Rob Roy" overture. But in such a score as the Fantastic Symphony upon phases of an artist's life, he could have found the principle which was to evolve into a new art form, at once as precise and elastic if less composite than that new force in romanticism soon to be disclosed to the eye and ear by the Diaghileff ballet.

Liszt prefaced his score with this argument: "The poet hears two voices; one immense, magnificent, ineffable; singing the beauty and the harmony of creation; the other swollen with sighs, groans, sobs, cries of revolt and blasphemies. The one said Nature and the other Humanity." As in Hugo's poem "The one came from the sea, song of glory! a happy hymn! The other that came up from our earth was sad. Twas the murmur of mankind. Hid in this grand concert of song, day and night, each wave, each man, had a voice."

With the world in groans and tears in the vortex of this atrocious war, [illegible] grim and timely, in the present performance of this music, until now passed by, which no hour since Hugo penned his poem or Liszt his music could have supplied with such terrible emphasis.

There were obvious reasons why this old work, strangely new, would not have been undertaken by an orchestra without cool calculation and perhaps enlightening attempts. It is formidable and difficult. The demands upon the brass and particularly the first trumpet are herculean. They were met triumphantly yesterday. Liszt's use of the brass choir in glorifying hymnology were transporting. The entire orchestra reveled in the making of a flood of gorgeous, golden tone, a sonority which would transfigure far less worthy pages. None can deny passages of conventional Lisztian clap-trap, the melodramatic flourishes and sensational recourse to rhythm as a last resort. These places were made to sound. The noble pages of the beneficent song of nature and of the troubled and tragic song of man—and they far predominate—were played superbly.

The first symphony of Schumann continued the dramatic scheme. It carried on a chapter of less daring, if more minutely imaginative, development of the romantic thought, an unfolding in idea and in feeling to the eclipse of the manner merely. It was a performance executed with love and appreciation.

Dr Muck was given a welcome at his return. There will be no concerts next week.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address: New York City

Date JAN 11 1916

DEAR BEAU BROADWAY—I have just been to the Boston Symphony concert, and I have come away sadly puzzled and mystified.

I noticed with pain, sorrow and deep humiliation Dr. Karl Muck's contemptuous air toward his New York audience. Can you explain this to me? And, too, why does he despise us so? Why doesn't he deign even to look at us, and why is it he refuses to acknowledge our hearty applause, save by mere cold and disdainful nods? Doesn't he approve of us? Doesn't he think we are serious enough? Does he think we are giddy and light-headed because we are sometimes a trifle late and a little too voluble? Is he trying to reform us? Does he treat his Boston audiences as he treats us, despite the fact that they regard going to a performance of their beloved orchestra as some sort of a religious ceremony?

DOESN'T Dr. Muck realize that if we didn't enjoy the Boston Symphony, and that if we didn't appreciate his splendid work, he wouldn't have crowded houses every time he comes to New York? Or that if we didn't love music and long to hear it, we shouldn't have three symphony societies here at one time?

You understand, Beau Broadway, I admire Dr. Muck intensely, and I look forward eagerly, from one month to another, to his splendid orchestra and to his delightful programs. He is an artist of the first rank, and I realize it, and that is perhaps why I feel all the more keenly his evident contempt and his marked scorn for us.

I WANT you to explain all this to me, as perhaps you may find I am oversensitive and imaginative. Perhaps, too he treats all his admirers in the same way, and that wou be a little consolation at last. Yours expectantly,

One of the New York Audience.

From EVENING POST

Address: New York City

Date JAN 10 1916

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Orchestral Concerts.

At the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, Dr. Muck opened the programme with Brahms's Third Symphony in F major. Dr. Muck's devotion to the Bayreuth cause has not prevented his doing full justice to the apostle of austerity; he conducted the symphony con amore, and brought out all its good points. This work, in the opinion of many, ranks among the Brahms symphonies next to his second in merit. The second and third movements have much charm, and Dr. Muck and his forces exhibited them in their best light.

Estal 84

There was no soloist. The second number on the programme was a Rumanian Rhapsody by Georges Enesco. This is full of bright, lively melody, and in one or two places suggests Strauss (Johann, not Richard). The men had to rise in acknowledgment of the applause at its close. "The Island of the Dead," an impressive symphonic poem by Rachmaninoff, was next played. It is full of sombre, lugubrious color, and is a fine reproduction of the spirit of Böcklin's famous painting. It was impressively played too, so much so that there was a hushed silence at its close which was much more of a tribute to composition and performance than applause would have been. That came later, to be sure, but the pause was full of meaning.

The programme closed with Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival," brilliantly played. The whole programme, barring a slip among the first violins in the Brahms symphony, was played in the "B. S. O.'s" best style.

Four concerts in eight days to crowd-

[92]

From GERMAN HEROLD
Address: New York City
AN 3 - 1916
Date

Dr. Muck iſt krank.

Dr. Carl Muck, der Leiter des Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſters, iſt erkrankt und konnte das letzte Concert in der Brooklyner Academy of Muſic nicht leiten. Concertmeiſter Erneſt Schmidt übernahm die Leitung.

Establis

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City
Date

Esta 1884

3 ORCHESTRAS IN CONCERTS OF WEEK-END

Dr. Karl Muck for the second of the January pair of Boston Symphony concerts at Carnegie Hall not only subserved his electicism but also indulged graciously in what the late William J. Gaynor might have called an outward ornamentation of neutrality. There were on Dr. Muck's Saturday programme the Austrian-tinged Teutonism of Brahms's Third Symphony; the Parisian-tinged Rumanianism of George's Enesco's first rhapsody on the folk melodies of his native inspiration; the German-tinged Slavism of the Russian, Rachmaninoff's "Toteninsel" and the Italo-tinged Gallicism of the Frenchman, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture.

Thus was neutrality in musical art quadruply expounded and quadruply confounded. The entente of the beautiful, in a word, is universal and even as when the beautiful happens to be merely national. For there were elements of beauty in all of this music and far more than elements in some of it. Even in times of critical and other belligerency the outer ornamentation of neutrality on the hither borders of the troubled seas thus appears to be only an imaginary unguent to troubled critical hepaticisms.

It should not need to be said that neither Dr. Muck nor the Boston Orchestra was in any wise troubled by considerations such as the foregoing in playing Brahms, Enesco, Rachmaninoff and Berlioz. They played the Brahms symphony with a seductive beauty, a truly uplifted poetic spirit. The ingenuities of Rachmaninoff were presented as a coherent mood and the folksong insistencies of the Rumanian were made interesting.

NEW YORK

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date JAN 3

Establis

The fifth concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday week, Feb. 8, at 8:15. Owing to the failure of Mme. van Endert to come to America this year, her place in the Providence series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be taken by Kathleen Howard, who will appear with the orchestra at its next concert, Tuesday evening, Feb. 8. Miss Howard is an American contralto, who has had a notable career and stands very high in the ranks of her profession. A Canadian by birth, the greater part of her musical education was had in the United States. She sung for several years with much success in Germany and then had two seasons at the Royal Opera, Covent Garden, and came to this country as a member of the Century Opera Company of New York.

The programme that Dr. Muck has arranged calls for Mozart's Symphony in E-flat Major, Handel's concerto for string orchestra and two wind choirs, Dvorak's overture, "Husitska." Miss Howard will sing twice. Her first number will be the great aria of Adriano from Wagner's opera, "Rienzi." Her second number will be the familiar aria from "Samson and Delilah," "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice."

Mr. Leo Ormstein, the famous young Russian pianist, who has gained widespread notice because of his futurist style of playing and his advanced ideas regarding the interpretation of modern and classic music, is to appear here again in concert in Churchill House on Wednesday evening, Feb. 16. At this time he will give a brilliant programme, including compositions from Mendels- Schumann, Liszt, Leschetizky; Debussy and Grieg. He will also a half dozen Chopin numbers.

N. B. PETTIS.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
JAN 1916
Date

Esta 384

Praise for One New York Audience.

To the Editor of The World:

I ought to supplement my recent letter to The World, in which I spoke of the bad manners of some who attend the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Carnegie Hall, by commenting in quite a different manner upon another very large audience that regularly assembles in this city to listen to good music.

I now make reference to the 2,000 or 2,500 people who are to be found every Sunday afternoon during the season filling the seats of the Great Hall at City College, where Prof. Baldwin gives a free organ concert.

This audience includes a notable proportion of young people—even children. But they are so totally devoid of self-consciousness, and are so obviously there to enjoy the music and for no other purpose, that I have often remarked with great satisfaction the notably decorous behavior of the great assemblage. There is the silence and rapt attention that should always characterize the audience at such a place, and that come unconsciously when conditions are natural.

OLD SYMPHONY SUBSCRIBER.
New York, Jan. 18.

From
Address
Date

Est 884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The outstanding feature of the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, on Friday evening, February 18, will be Josef Joachim's "Concerto in D Major," for violin and orchestra, in Hungarian style. This work is seldom heard, owing chiefly to the stupendous difficulties that confront the musician who attempts to play it. It is regarded as the most difficult of all concertos for violin. The soloist will be Anton Witek, the accomplished concertmaster of the orchestra. The symphony will be Schumann's delightful "Spring," in B flat major, No. 1.

CLEVELAND LEADER, SATURDAY, JANUARY 29,

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN IDEAL CONCERT

BY ARCHIE BELL.

The best orchestra in America and one of the best in the world gave a concert at Grays' armory last evening before an audience that was representative of what is best in the intellectual, artistic and social life of Cleveland. And to carry the superlatives further, it was one of the best programs that one of the best among living conductors ever built for us.

Needless to add, it was the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Dr. Karl Muck was the man with the baton in his hand.

Any attempt to "criticize" such a concert would be impertinent and merited praise might appear to be fulsome; thus it seems to be the chronicler's duty simply to write down that the playing of the organization from the opening measures to the last tone was about as near perfection as any audience in the world is likely to hear.

Not so many years ago, a conductor would not have offered such a program before a Cleveland audience. There were the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, the concerto for strings and two wind orchestras by Handel that is rarely heard anywhere, Richard Strauss' splendid tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration" and the Berlioz "Roman Carnival."

This was a program that ranged through about every tonal gamut possible and then emerged from the fiery test in a manner that defies a critical singing of wings.

And to think that such a concert as this would be possible in Cleveland not once a year, but twice a week—if Cleveland had a Henry Lee Higginson. There are plenty of instrumentalists in the world and enough conductors to supply the demand. All that is needed is the money, and judging from the patronage of music during the past week in this city, most of the money would be returned to the hand that was generous enough to donate it.

San Francisco decided last summer that it had been without the Boston orchestra as long as it should be, as a matter of self-respect. It took a guarantee of $65,000 to take the orchestra to the coast city. This $65,000 was back in the hands of guarantors before the last two concerts were given, and there were profits of something like $10,000.

Dr. Muck was in particularly fine fettle last night. He stood at the desk almost motionless as a statue. He had done his work at rehearsals—something that lesser conductors seem to fail to do—but of course he had the supreme advantage of having to deal with a large company of concert soloists upon various instruments, who prefer this ensemble perfection to the pathos of isolation on the concert platform.

The next concert in the series will be given the evening of February 18, when the New York Symphony orchestra will play under the direction of Walter Damrosch and Giovanni Martinelli will be the soloist.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

FEBRUARY 5,

GERALDINE FARRAR SOLOIST AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Geraldine Farrar as soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon drew a sold out house, the "No tickets" sign being hung up long before the concert began. The program was: Orchestral pieces, Beethoven Symphony No. 2; Carpenter, Suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator" (by request); Wagner, overture to "The Flying Dutchman." Miss Geraldine Farrar sang Elsa's Dream from "Lohengrin" and Marguerite's air, "L'amour, l'ardente flamme," from "La Damnation de Faust."

Miss Farrar was in good voice and entered into the spirit of her songs like a true artist. She was, however, rather more successful in her second number. The singer was cordially received and several times recalled. The orchestral accompaniments, notably the playing of the Eng'ish horn, were excellent. However, Miss Farrar is first of all an opera singer, and one misses the operatic surroundings.

BOSTON HERALD.

FEBRUARY 5,

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES 13TH CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE.

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The orchestral pieces were these: Beethoven Symphony No. 2; Carpenter, Suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator (by request); Wagner, overture to "The Flying Dutchman." Miss Geraldine Farrar sang Elsa's Dream from "Lohengrin" and Marguerite's air, D'amour l'ardente flamme" from "La Damnation de Faust."

The symphony and overture are familiar. Mr. Carpenter's Suite was played at these concerts late in December and by the New York Symphony Orchestra in the preceding month. There need, then, be no extended comment on these compositions. The performance of the symphony was conspicuous by the manner in which the Larghetto was sung—with admirable suavity and euphony; by the elasticity, capriciousness and delicacy with which the Scherzo was interpreted, and by the playfulness of the Finale. Whether it is necessary for the musical salvation of the town that a certain number of Beethoven's symphonies should be heard every year with the three overtures of Weber, and other "standbys" is a question that need not now be discussed.

Mr. Carpenter's Suite again gave pleasure. Again the "Hurdy Gurdy," "The Lake" and "Dreams" seemed the most important of the movements. "The Policeman" is not without humor. It has been suggested that the Policeman here pictured in tones is not distinctively American; least of all a Chicagoan guardian of the peace;; tht h is French. How the policemen of different nations are to be distinguished musically is a question that should exercise the ingenuity of our young lions of musical periodicals. Would the objectors to Mr. Carpenter's policeman as "un-American" have him whistle "Dixie" or "Yankee Doodle" in the course of his amorous conversation with the nurse?

This Suite is not only an ingenious work; it has true fancy, true humor, pages of truly poetic feeling. Mr. Carpenter displays imagination; witness his glorification of the lake that supplies Chicago with water. But even his imagination was dormant at the thought of the Chicago river. An unflinching realist would have introduced the child's visit to the stockyards and slaughter houses. The composer yesterday was one of the audience.

Miss Farrar sang Elsa's Dream as though she were still under the spell of the vision. Not too ecstatically, not too enthusiastically, nor did she at the end explode in passion, as many of her German colleagues on the operatic stage have felt it their duty to do in the effort to be emotional. The singer's conception was romantic, and the interpretation was artistic. Unfortunately the music is too often above the natural voice of this singer.

The pathetic air of Marguerite was more favorable to her. Here the fulness and beauty of her lower and middle tones were revealed. The interpretation, however, was too virginal. Marguerite in this scene is no longer the maiden returning from church. She is in her chamber, remembering the lover and his embraces; longing for his return. The text and the music demand a more passionate expression than Miss Farrar saw fit to give.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concert next week, will be as follows: Beethoven, Overture, "Leonora No. 1"; Joachim, Concerto in the Hungarian style for violin (Mr. Witek, violinist); Strauss, "Don Quixote."

Journal
Sat. Feb 5th

FARRAR STAR OF SUPERB CONCERT

It is as a dramatic singer that Geraldine Farrar shines with particular brilliancy among the artistes of the day. The questionable effects of her adventures outside the lyric field are almost entirely obliterated by the spell she can weave on the concert stage—as she wove yesterday, for instance, at the Symphony concert, when she sang "Elsa's Dream," from "Lohengrin," and the rarely heard "D'amour l'ardente flamme," the song sung by Marguerite in the fourth part of Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust."

The widely differing moods of Elsa and Marguerite, one dreaming of a lover who appears to her as a knight of glorious men and who will be her champion sent from Heaven, and the other musing passionately of a hero for whom she would gladly die in a delirium of love, were expressed with a power seldom projected so impressively, yet are tistically, through the cool, conventional atmosphere of the concert hall. But great is the warmth as well as the charm of the emotional singer's art. The huge audience that heard Miss Farrar yesterday was well rewarded for its loyal interest in one of the country's most gifted singers.

A gala air prevailed through the entire concert, which was due primarily to the extraordinarily brilliant performance of Beethoven's second symphony. the first number on the program. After this performance Dr. Muck and the orchestra received an ovation yesterday. John Alden Carpenter's suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," a work abounding in fancy, humor and true poetic feeling, was repeated by request. In this case the request could not have come from music-lovers interested in mere harmonic puzzles. Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture completes one of the choicest programs of the season.

Next week's program will present Beethoven's first "Leonora" overture, Strauss' "Don Quixote" and the Joachim violin concerto in D major, with Anton Witek as soloist.

5th

SYMPHONY MEN PLAY EARLY WORK OF BEETHOVEN

SYMPHONY HALL—Thirteenth program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck conductor; afternoon of Feb. 4. The program: Beethoven, second symphony, in D major; Wagner, Elsa's dream from "Lohengrin" (Miss Geraldine Farrar, soloist); Carpenter, "Perambulator" suite; Berlioz, romance from "Damnation of Faust" (Miss Farrar); Wagner, overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

The question might be raised whether Beethoven ever made an essential addition to his orchestral statement of himself after writing the second symphony, unless it was when he wrote the "Leonora" overture, No. 3. Not but that he broadened his style in a conspicuous way in the "Eroica" symphony; not but that, also, he displayed increased power of thematic organization in the fourth; not but that, furthermore, he exercised such mastery of sentiment and satire in the fifth as was never equaled by himself or any other composer before, and as has hardly been matched since. Yet, after all the points are argued, the case for the second symphony, as representing the whole vision of the man, is a pretty good one. For the listener who has grasped this work must find little difficulty in seizing the main idea of everything that follows it up at least to the finale of the ninth symphony. He might, admittedly, be at a loss to account for the "Pastoral" symphony, but only because of his difficulty to understand how the composer's inspiration could have got at so low an ebb. And as for the "Ode to Joy" variations at the end of the ninth symphony, they are a study in vocal expression, detachable, as it were, from their context; and complete in their own effect, if not independent in their purpose.

He who would hold for the preeminence of the second symphony over all that the composer wrote for orchestra after it would, of course, have to be a daring champion. He would have to break spears with so many heroes of criticism that he might never get done with his enterprise. But aggressiveness aside, anybody who would rank this composition first might win a good number of listeners to his opinion. After all, the seed of an idea is, in a way, more interesting and more valuable, too, than the leaf and flower of it. A few notes of a morning song may contain more eloquence than a whole psalm meditated at noon.

Even without argument the majority would perhaps grant that the symphony in D major shows the genius of Beethoven in its best color, if not in its full manifestation. And if a minority remains unpersuaded let them try looking at the work from the backward light of the symphony in C minor. Let them ask themselves where is the cyclic work of any period and of any composer which is such a unit as this one. Let them ask whether in the seventh and eighth symphonies there are to be found moods contrasted as strikingly as here and at the same time with as little premeditation. Let them ask whether it is more natural and agreeable to have developments of theme begin at the beginning and end at the ending, as in this work, or to pursue interminable paths and bypaths, as in the third and fourth symphonies.

The second symphony could conceivably be brought out as a dutiful repertory revival, without exciting any question about its characteristics. But the conductor and the players who presented it on this occasion did so with extraordinary zeal and with uncommon interpretative power. It seems doubtful now whether any other of their performances, when the season's work comes to be summed up, will outshine it. Nothing else on the program could compare with the reading of the Beethoven work in force and charm, even though one of the most brilliant sopranos of the day assisted as soloist. The "Perambulator" suite of Carpenter more than ever before sounded like half a composition, entertaining for its orchestration in the first three divisions and perfunctory in all particulars in the second three. The "Flying Dutchman" overture, whether regarded as meteorological realism or as romantic bombast, was disturbing and unpleasant in the neighborhood of the second symphony.

Miss Farrar brought much beauty of tone and a deeply-considered execution to her task in the "Lohengrin" and the "Damnation of Faust" solos. Like Miss Marcella Craft, she is one of the rare singers who know how to make their voices strike through the instrumental sonorities in a way to enhance the whole symphonic appeal. The playing of a great violinist could have meant no more to the purely musical value of the concert than her singing.

BOSTON GLOBE—
FEBRUARY 5.

"PERAMBULATOR" SUITE REPEATED

Carpenter's Music Again Gives Great Pleasure.

Miss Farrar Sings With Emotional Beauty of Voice.

Carpenter's fanciful suite "Adventures in a Perambulator" were repeated at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. Amused enjoyment was evident in its reception, particularly after the movement called "The Hurdy-Gurdy." The humor is gracious and the pictorial composition skillful and imaginative impressionism.

The suite as a whole gives pleasure at a second hearing. There is no attempt at photographic realism, nor is there any effort to spell out a specific idiom of childhood. Laborious naivete would have been boresome to whatever degree the copious psychological observations of the infant are taken as a programmatic basis.

Few adult humans would credit such fertility of brain in offsprings other than their own. Some of these "first impressions of life" are amusing, some clever. Some are stupid nonsense, however allegorically taken, that has little place with the fineness of perception, the graceful imagination, the lightness of touch of the score, all highly expressive of a play spirit without thought of age, which is neither puerile nor affected.

The French influence in Mr Carpenter's workmanship is unquestioned. It has taught him to hear keenly, to listen well to the tints of his woodwinds, to keep his score transparent without being thin. But he has not been unmindful of Puccini. "The Lake" quotes almost verbatim the ascending figure in broken rhythm heard in the orchestra in the first act of "The Girl of the Golden West," beginning Minnie's scene of her Sunday school class, and much is made of it. Meanwhile beside other reminiscences of "La Boheme," Musetta's brittle, ironical laugh is heard again in the piccolo.

Sang Elsa's Prayer.

Miss Geraldine Farrar sang "Elsa's prayer from "Lohengrin" and Marguerite's soliloquy in Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust," part 4, beginning "D'amour l'ardente flamme." Berloiz' setting of the Faust legend, although attempted in operatic form by the redoubtable Raoul Gunsbourg at Monte Carlo, and by Mr Hammerstein with Renaud in New York, has missed the favor which sprang up about that of his successor and countryman a dozen and more years later.

And yet, search the well-worn pages of Gounod's opera, for one scene or passage in which Marguerite confesses the secrets of her soul with the simplicity, the poignancy and depth of feeling that are heard in these pages. The English horn pitches the emotional key in a prelude of haunting, piteous despair and prepares the way for the voice.

The song of the singer is one of quiet grief, of thrills at remembered happiness, at relived rapture, of pretty, pathetic fancies of treasured memories. Those who find Berlioz only a madman, a maker of noise and hysteria, should consider well the calm resignation of the opening measures, the gradations by which they grow and the proportion of the whole dramatic scheme.

Range of Color Remarkable.

Miss Farrar sang with good control of breath, with depth and fullness of tonal beauty, emotional and moving. In the medium and low voice her range of color was remarkable, and scarcely less in the upper in a closed vowel.

Using this beautiful instrument, she sang with quiet conviction, expressing the mystical ecstacy of Wagner's dream maiden and the suppressed passion of the woman in Berlioz' music who communes with the past.

Dr Muck made the orchestra part of the Berlioz aria a thing of individual beauty—thanks also to Mr Mueller and his solo playing—and again kept the charm and lightness foremost in Carpenter's sento.

Beethoven's second symphony was played in a manner that made due contrast between the scherzo in the Haydn manner and the prophetic finale. Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman" completed the program.

DAILY ADVERTISER,
FEBRUARY 5, 1916

FARRAR SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

PROGRAMME PRESENTED WAS WITHOUT NOVELTIES

Vocalist Was at Her Best in Pathetic Song of Marguerite

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAMME

Beethoven, Symphony No 2..........D major
Wagner........"Elsa's Dream." "Lohengrin"
Soloist, Miss Geraldine Farrar.
Carpenter, Suite......................
"Adventures of a Perambulator"
Berlioz................"My Heart is Heavy."
"Damnation de Faust"
Miss Farrar.
Wagner ....
"The Flying Dutchman" overture

There was nothing new in this programme, although by this we do not mean to intimate that Miss Farrar is old. Yet we must reiterate our often-expressed opinion that Miss Farrar is not an entire success upon the concert stage. She is a very intelligent singing actress, but she requires the footlights far more than Sembrich, or Gadski, or Schumann-Heink do.

This was made evident in the first number, in which the "voix blanche" which should characterize Wagner's most phlegmatic heroine was not markedly present. Yet one may pay tribute to her breadth and purity of tone.

Miss Farrar was more in her best vein in the pathetic song of Marguerite as Gallicized by Berlioz. This Romance is one of the gems of "The Damnation of Faust," and certainly portrays the brooding sadness of the deserted one more vividly than any other setting. Just as Berlioz heightens the effect of Goethe's work by damning Faust instead of saving him, so he strews adjuncts around this Romance which greatly advance its dramatic flavor. He adds an obbligato upon that instrument of dreamy melancholy, the English Horn, which is in itself a picture, and was nobly played. If one heard this song with its context, the hurly-burly of street life, the 2-4 song of the students against the 6-8 effects of the singing soldiery, one would have one of the finest and most fitting contrasts of music.

But even without this, the power of the number appealed to Miss Farrar strongly, since she is dramatic to the finger-tips and all of Berlioz's points were made with artistic acumen. Both in mezzo-voce and in broad passages her work was commendable, and it was self-abnegatory to sing this Romance, since it is rather above the full comprehension of the general public. Yet Miss Farrar was heartily recalled twice after each number.

But there was also an orchestra heard in this concert. We are always a little out of sympathy with a prima donna in these concerts. It seems the right thing in the wrong place. It disturbs the symphonic feeling altogether, when one knows that the crowd is waiting for the singer and the orchestral numbers are regarded as Preludes, Interludes and Postludes to her vocalism. This "Vox et preterea Nihil" feeling is not conducive to the full appreciation of our great band.

Nevertheless the second symphony had a full meed of applause. It is right that Dr. Muck, in making up these programmes, should take cognizance of the fact that there is a new generation growing up which needs to become familiar with the old masterpieces. The chief points to notice in the second symphony, as compared with its sisters, is the fact that here we get the first symphonic Scherzo ever written. Beethoven had grown tired of the everlasting Minuet as third movement, with its undeveloped themes, its dance rhythm, its square-cut style. Nevertheless it is curious to see how close he steered in this innovation, to the Minuet which he intended to replace by it. This Scherzo of the second symphony is more in Minuet spirit than the Minuet of the first symphony.

Another reform which begins in this symphony is the resolute and broad character of the finale, of which Dr. Muck made the utmost. It was customary in the old Cycle forms (Suite, Partita, Symphony) to reward the auditor for long attention by giving him a rollicking and jolly movement as Finale. There is such an one in the Beethoven first symphony. But in this present work the composer perceives that the finale should be a climax, not a recreation, and he sets out on the path which led to the great finales of the fifth, seventh and ninth symphonies.

Therefore, in this second symphony, the curtain is first lifted upon the symphonic reformer, even if the reforms were not made as sweeping as a modern Conservatory student would feel obliged to make them. The symphony won much appreciation, although the slow movement is too long and exhibits Beethoven as a decided repeater.

We were not sorry to hear Carpenter's Suite again, although there are other American works kept waiting. We need Chadwick's "Tam O'Shanter," and it might have been fairer to have repeated Kelley's "New England Symphony," which might have read differently under Dr. Muck than under Conductor Schmidt. It is very timely that, in the January number of the "Harvard Musical Review," Mr. Robert P. Casey gives an article containing some new facts regarding this American composer. He says, in part:—

"In 1893 he came to Harvard, where he took all the courses offered by the music department under Prof. Paine. While here he composed music for the Hasty Pudding Club, and was president of the Glee Club.

"An amusing incident is related of him at this period. Rushing away from a tea, in town, at a Glee Club concert which he was to conduct, Mr. Carpenter discovered, to his dismay, that he had forgotten his evening clothes. A hasty search had to be made through the chorus for a person of Mr. Carpenter's build; and the discomfited man was obliged to strip off his finery and to be clad in the president's afternoon "frock." Mr. Carpenter graduated from Harvard in 1897 with highest honors in music, and the following fall entered his father's firm as vice-president.

His musical education began under the tutelage of his mother when he was eight years old: he studied piano for four years with Miss Amy Fay, sister-in-law of the late Theodore Thomas, and from 1890-93 he was a pupil in piano composition under the late W. C. Seeboeck. Of this instruction Mr. Carpenter modestly remarked, "I had done some puttering in composition before that time, but my first definite instructions were from him."

Shortly after his graduation from Harvard, he went abroad and studied with Sir Edward Elgar in Rome. In 1908 he became acquainted, through Mr. Frederick A. Stock, director of the Chicago Orchestra, with Bernard Ziehn. Mr. Carpenter says of him, "I studied with Ziehn until his death about three years ago. In the short period that I worked with him I learned more and received more inspiration than from all other previous sources. He was, undoubtedly, a very great figure in the world of theoretical music. He was so recognized in Europe and was just beginning to be appreciated in this country at the time of his death."

There is nothing new to be said about the Carpenter Suite except that it gains on repetition. The obvious points, the wheeling Perambulator, the stolid policeman, the aggressive street-organ, were easily grasped at once, but the delicacy of "The Lake" and "Dreams" unfolded new beauties.

Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture is of the salt, salt sea. It was brilliantly played, as Dr. Muck always gives it. But if our conductor wants to give the public a fine object lesson some day, let him play Debussy's "La Mer" and follow it with this composition, and perhaps precede the French work with Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overture. It would be a useful bit of comparison, even if rather continuously marine, and "La Mer" would be crushed between the upper and the nether millstone.

[94]

FEBRUARY 12,

BOSTON POST,

SYMPHONY'S VIRTUOSITY ON PARADE

Memorable Performance of Remarkable Programme

BY OLIN DOWNES

The First Leonore overture of Beethoven, which is seldom heard in the concert room, and practically never when the opera, "Fidelio," is performed; the Joachim violin concerto, played by Anton Witek, concertmaster, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Quixote," made the programme of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

WITEK'S ARTISTRY

The First Leonore overture, so-called, in reality the third overture that Beethoven wrote for a prelude to his opera, might be oftener played in the theatre. It is by no means such a symphonically complete work as the Third Leonore overture, but it has more the character of a curtain raiser than any of the other of the four overtures Beethoven wrote for his opera. The First Leonore overture is not only dramatic—most of the music Beethoven wrote for "Fidelio" is thrillingly dramatic, yet misses fire in the theatre—but it is theatrical in the best and most effective sense of the word.

But the outstanding features of this memorable concert were Mr. Witek's performance of Joachim's concerto, and the interpretation of Strauss' tone-poem. 'When Mr. Witek first undertook his duties as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony some five seasons ago, and played the Beethoven concerto for his first solo appearance, he proved himself as great a musician as he was a virtuoso. The Joachim concerto, presenting technical problems far more arresting than those of the concerto of Beethoven, is just as thoroughly in the palm of his hand. Yet it was not the technical quality of this performance which made it so impressive.

Like an Improvisator

The mechanical question is only mentioned because for the first time in the last 15 seasons of Symphony concerts in this city the violinist was such a master of his instrument that physical obstacles did not exist for him, or for the hearer. Interpretation was the only fact of the moment, and in interpreting this admirable work, Mr. Witek surpassed himself. He was no longer the purely objective interpreter of a classic masterpiece, but rather a player who wielded his bow like an improvisator, with an eloquence, authority and romantic fire that made every page of Joachim's masterpiece a joy to the ear and the understanding.

We had before a prodigious respect for this lengthy and admirably-built composition, but the respect was tempered with an awe that was hardly affection. Yesterday afternoon Mr. Witek's engrossing performance, while it did not rob the music of its symphonic proportions and character, gave it a conciseness and directness of emotional appeal, a degree of color and warm emotional expression that it had not had before for the ears of this generation. The concerto was interpreted by one of the few violinists in the world capable of doing it justice. No wonder that the audience applauded Mr. Witek through a good part of the intermission that followed his performance. No wonder that there was affection as well as respect in the recognition extended this concertmaster by Dr. Muck, as he threw an arm over Mr. Witek's shoulder.

Strauss' "Don Quixote"

The fitting climax to all this was the "Don Quixote." If, as Ernest Newman has observed, Strauss, in this perfect flowering of his style, has achieved a nervous, plastic, incisive utterance that is as musical prose, it is also true that he has intensified the meaning and the beauty of his prose in a manner only possible by means of music! Time was when the majority either laughed or sneered at the man who set out to portray in tones the psychology and the adventures of the dreaming idealist, the Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance, the fat and unctuous apostle of the obvious, Sancho Panza. Today we know better, and await the next step in the development of the art of music. After "Don Quixote"—what?

Strauss has produced nothing since "Don Quixote" which equals it, either in finish and subtlety of style, or in emotional intensity. It is undoubtedly music of the very zenith of his powers. It is the music when his sardonic humor is tempered by his recognition of humanity, by the pity of the strong for the weak. The Strauss of earlier works—the "Don Juan," "Till Eulenspiegel," "Zarathustra," is a ma contemptuous and intolerant of the multitude.

Its Grotesque Pathos

The Strauss of "Don Quixote" is a man to whom life has taught the lesson of charity. Where is there a figure equal in its grotesque pathos to his "Don Quixote"? Perhaps one—Stepan Stepanovitch in Dostoievsky's "The Possessed"! As for character drawing, laughter, stupidity in the person of Sancho and the country wench, irony, tragedy, the echoes of the last moment that makes all men, great and small, the doers and failures, of the same stature in the presence of the same terror—it seems that here Strauss has surpassed, even, the idealism and the poignancy of the concluding pages of his "Death and Transfiguration." The transparency of his style, the breath-taking virtuosity with which he writes his most complicated score, and yet subordinates this virtuosity to purely expressive purposes—these things are now recognized.

It is not necessary, any longer, to fight for the recognition of the Strauss of the tone-poems of which "Don Quixote" is unquestionably the climax. What he began in "Till Eulenspiegel" he completed here. And before our very eyes there seems to pass the Don, going mad as he reads his books of chivalry, setting out on his quest of adventure and the ideal, jousting with his windmills, slaying his sheep, keeping his crazy vigil through the night of hallucinations when the vision of Dulcinea descends upon him, finally meeting defeat, disillusion, riding homeward and taking leave of the world in gentleness and humility and understanding. Of what avail to point out this or that passage in the score? Either the music speaks to the hearer, or it does not, according to measure of Don Quixote or Sancho Panza within him.

Bleating of the Sheep

The performance was thrice admirable, in its extravagance and tenderness, in its outrageous humor and fantasy, to say nothing of its technical finish. The episode of the flock of sheep was not passed over lightly. Dr. Muck made his horns bleat more realistically than any of his predecessors, but in so doing he emphasized the extravagance of this episode as the composer would have had it emphasized. Similarly with the ride through the sky. Nothing more preposterous, more hallucinatory, than the imitation of the whirring of the wind and the impossible leaps and flights of the themes of the don and his squire could possibly have been put on paper or presented to the ear. But these passages did not destroy the perspective of the picture. They, appropriately, were justly considered as graphic and humorous episodes, not as principal features of the score, and episodes which threw into the greater relief the eloquence of the knight's utterances on chivalry and the ideal.

BOSTON GLOBE-

FEBRUAP 12.

FIDELIO OVERTURE.

Beethoven Work Played by Symphony Orchestra.

Of the four overtures which Beethoven wrote for his opera — originally called "Leonore," revised by "Fidelio"—the No. 1, played by Dr Muck yesterday afternoon, is the least known. Its history is curious. When the overture known as "Leonore" No. 2 was played at the first performance of the opera, its length and difficult string or wind parts, or both, were criticised. One of the reviews of the day might have served for a modernist of any epoch:

"The most grotesque modulations, in truly ghastly harmony, follow one another throughout the piece. The few trivial ideas that there are, which are carefully guarded from anything like nobility, . . . complete the disagreeable and deafening impression."

Following this No. 2 overture, composed in 1805, Beethoven wrote the more familiar Leonore No. 3, a dramatic poem in itself. To the complaints that this was too difficult and tragic for a prelude to the opera, he wrote the No. 1, begun in 1807, published posthumously as Beethoven's last opus unmber, 138, and finally the "Fidelio" overture in 1814.

The last two differ greatly from the first in their light and buoyant nature. Out of the material of the two earlier and more serious ones, he kept only the theme from Florestan's air, "In des Lebens Fruehlingstagen." The overture in C, played yesterday, touches scarcely at all upon the dramatic, tragic character of the often-heard No. 3. It gives the impression of a prelude to its dramatic character of the opera rather than an independent tonal picture of it.

Mr Witek, the concert master, relieved Joachim's concerto, op 11 (in the Hungarian manner) of much of its tedium and gave to the more rewarding pages true distinction. The first movement is too often pedantic with formulas of the classroom worn thread bare by sequence, but the romance is warm, emotional, songful with a gypsy flavor, and the last movement rhythmically stimulating. Mr Witek's treatment of the opening recitative on the G string, his poetic playing of the slow movement, his virile sense of rhythm in the last were features of the musicianship with which he employed his ample technic. Had a visiting virtuoso given such a performance his fame would have acclaimed with sensation. The audience was warmly appreciative.

Strauss' "Don Quixote" does not wear as well as certain other of the tone poems. After Strawinsky's illuminating descriptive powers with musical figures, harmonic grouping and orchestral timbres, this tinny bleating of sheep, the wind machine and all the rest of the ponderous apparatus to say what the Russian probably could say with more economy and also more point—seems

---

FEBRUARY 12.

BOSTON HERALD.

14TH SYMPHO CONCERT SEASON GI

Beethoven's "Leonore" Ov No. 1 and Strauss's Quixote" Played — Mr Warnke and Ferir in La Solo Parts—Mr. Witek I in Joachim's Hungarian C certo.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 1, op. 138; Joachim, Concerto in the Hungarian manner for violin; Strauss, "Don Quixote." Mr. Witek was the solo violinist. The solo 'cello and violin parts in Strauss's tone poem were played by Mr. Warnke and Mr. Ferir respectively.

Although the "Leonore" overture played yesterday is numbered the first, it was the third in order of composition. Perhaps it is well that it should be heard occasionally, for it not only is interesting as showing how the c poser could vary his subject, bu contains a few engrossing passages. an overture to the opera it has the vantage over the other two of no ticipating the one great dramatic ment in the opera—the trumpet call announces the governor. Some said, and justly, that the overture 3 is the whole opera in a condensed form, more dramatic, more emotional than the opera itself; for this reason it should never be played in the theatre as a prelude. Viewed merely as a concert overture, No. 1 falls far below the other two. And what possessed Beethoven to write his "Fidelio" overture to the same opera, an overture that is not dramatic and is wholly unconnected with the text?

At long intervals some violinist, greatly daring, plays Joachim's Hungarian concerto. A less audacious person contents himself with the first movement, which is long enough; but by so doing he does not give a sop to the audience by playing the Romanze, with its obvious melody, its obvious embroidery, its obvious sentiment. Mr. Listemann played the whole of the concerto at a Symphony concert in 1881. Mr. Kneisel played the first movement in 1886; Mr. Winternitz did likewise in 1902. The indefatigable Willy Hess, not having the slightest consideration for a well disposed audience, played the whole concerto twice, in 1904 and in 1909.

Joachim was a celebrated violinist and quartet player. He was an impotent conductor, nor do we speak from hearsay. As a composer he had little talent. Nothing can be more laboriously contrived than his overtures, except this Hungarian concerto. It is so singularly ungrateful to the violinist that the question comes up: Why does any one take the trouble to play it? Perhaps the inherent difficulty of the task is tempting. A violinist may wish to have the concerto in his repertory to show his technical ability.

With the exception of the Romanze, music of amiable sentiment, the concerto is not one to enlist the sympathy of an audience. To quote the saying of Mozart: "Music should sound." That is, it should be euphonious. This concerto does not sound. It is painfully put together, manufactured. The solo instrument is not favored. If the composer by accident hits upon an agreeable phrase, he at once kills the effect by pitting an oboe, or a horn, against it, without rhyme or reason. Mr. Witek's abilities are well known. It was not necessary for him to utter this challenge. He played the concerto yesterday as though he really liked it. The hearers, recognizing his proficiency, paid him the customary tribute.

There are beautiful and stately things in Strauss's "Don Quixote." The introduction, with its romantic, chivalric spirit, with the whirring thoughts that finally turn the Knight's brain; the matter of fact comments of Sancho Panza as the two are in quest of adventures; the noble measures in which the Knight discourses on honor, glory and the ideal; the music that portrays the death scene—all these pages are of a supreme talent, if they are not the work of a genius. It is to be feared, however, that many hearers are more interested in the eccentricities of the tone-poem, in the sensationalism, as the variations that picture the sheep and the ride through the air. These variations are amusing; they are clever; but they are not the pages that make the composition remarkable. A less gifted composer, with the trick of clever instrumentation, can do surprising things; but his imagination would fail him if he should attempt to carry the hearer with Don Quixote high in the realm of the ideal. The performance was vivid and eloquent. Messrs. Warne and Ferir played with the finest understanding of the music allotted to Knight and follower. The concert will be repeated tonight.

There will be no concerts next week. The program of the concerts Feb. 25, 26 will be as follows: Goldmark, Overture "Sappho"; Brahms, Concerto in B flat major No. 2 for piano (Mr. Bauer, pianist); MacDowell, Suite op. 42.

BOSTON JOURNAL

FEBRUARY 12

SYMPHONY PLAYS UNUSUAL PROGRAM

Two infrequently played works have places on this week's Symphony program, the Joachim violin concerto in Hungarian style and Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote;" and these rarities, combined with the appearance of the popular and accomplished concert-master, Anton Witek, as soloist, drew the usual large audience.

'The Joachim number was played here yesterday for the first time in seven years. It has been a favorite with the concert-masters, but not with the visiting virtuosi; and this week Mr. Witek is playing it for the first time in Boston. There is some point to the old remark that the concerto should be played exclusively by Hungarians, men of ebullient enthusiasm and profound sympathy. However, there was much brilliancy in Mr. Witek's performance yesterday, as well as touching tenderness in the delivery of the romance; and the result was a long series of recalls for the soloist when the gypsy-like finale was over.

"Don Quixote" was last heard in the midst of the season of 1910-11. Dr. Muck never had it on one of his Boston programs before, but novelties are scarcer than ever and many folks move restlessly if too many classics are heard. They want "something different" once in a while. They get it in "Don Quixote," which has a few finely spiritual moments, but which is admired most of all on account of its melodramatic realism—the sheep bleats, the big drum-thump that marks the solar plexus blow delivered by the windmill encountered by the knight-errant, and the whistling wind-machine that marks the imaginary flight on the wooden horse. These realistic effects—which, by the way, are too few altogether, considering the opportunities at the composer's disposal—stirred the audience, not with admiration so much as with amusement.

Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture, a classic diversion played in classic style, introduces the present concerts.

The orchestra will be down South next week. The week after next the program will be as follows: "Sappho" overture, Goldmark; concerto in B flat major, No. 2, for piano, Brahms; suite, op. 42, MacDowell. Harold Bauer will be the soloist.

From POST

Address: Washington, D. C. JAN 17 1916

Date ....

Musical Taste.

As a relief from the excitement to be found on the battle front, some of the British writers lately have been considering the effect of the European war upon the standards of music. After an exhaustive review of various bits of evidence one English writer concludes that "the war is leading to a general deterioration of taste in musical performance and a slackening of vigilance in criticism."

The consensus of opinion among the critics seems to be that the large number of charity concerts held in Europe these days is partly answerable. In a rather severe way the critic points out that "wretched music has been dug up and foisted on long-suffering audiences in the name of patriotism; orchestras have been reduced in size; singers and players have been allowed to appear who, purely on their merits, had no right to expect a hearing. Criticism has kept a silent tongue in its head in part because it did not wish to say anything that might discourage the patriotism of willing amateurs in the sacred work of charity."

Fortunately the United States can match this rather lugubrious discussion with one of her own on the merits of ragtime. Dr. Carl Muck, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, recently denounced in unmeasured terms the present trend of our popular music. Not only does he not "believe in popular music," but he will not even admit that there is "such a thing as good popular music." Ragtime, he says, is poison.

Another writer, however, gallantly leads a charge against Dr. Muck with the remark that "a person who does not open his heart to ragtime, somehow, is not human." He says that nine out of ten musicians, if caught unaware, will like this music "until they remember that they shouldn't."

Between these two extreme positions most sensible Americans will remain neutral, refusing to commit themselves, but continuing to keep step to ragtime music, enjoying it secretly, while confining their conversation to deep appreciations of Wagner and Beethoven.

FEBRUARY 12.

BOSTON POST,

SYMPHONY'S VIRTUOSITY ON PARADE

Memorable Performance of Remarkable Programme

BY OLIN DOWNES

The First Leonore overture of Beethoven, which is seldom heard in the concert room, and practically never when the opera, "Fidelio," is performed; the Joachim violin concerto, played by Anton Witek, concertmaster, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Quixote," made the programme of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

WITEK'S ARTISTRY

The First Leonore overture, so-called, in reality the third overture that Beethoven wrote for a prelude to his opera, might be oftener played in the theatre. It is by no means such a symphonically complete work as the Third Leonore overture, but it has more the character of a curtain raiser than any of the other of the four overtures Beethoven wrote for his opera. The First Leonore overture is not only dramatic—most of the music Beethoven wrote for "Fidelio" is thrillingly dramatic, yet misses fire in the theatre—but it is theatrical in the best and most effective sense of the word.

But the outstanding features of this memorable concert were Mr. Witek's performance of Joachim's concerto, and the interpretation of Strauss' tone-poem. When Mr. Witek first undertook his duties as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony some five seasons ago, and played the Beethoven concerto for his first solo appearance, he proved himself as great a musician as he was a virtuoso. The Joachim concerto, presenting technical problems far more arresting than those of the concerto of Beethoven, is just as thoroughly in the palm of his hand. Yet it was not the technical quality of this performance which made it so impressive.

Like an Improvisator

The mechanical question is only mentioned because for the first time in the last 15 seasons of Symphony concerts in this city the violinist was such a master of his instrument that physical obstacles did not exist for him, or for the hearer. Interpretation was the only fact of the moment, and in interpreting this admirable work, Mr. Witek surpassed himself. He was no longer the purely objective interpreter of a classic masterpiece, but rather a player who wielded his bow like an improvisator, with an eloquence, authority and romantic fire that made every page of Joachim's masterpiece a joy to the ear and the understanding.

We had before a prodigious respect for this lengthy and admirably-built composition, but the respect was tempered with an awe that was hardly affection. Yesterday afternoon Mr. Witek's engrossing performance, while it did not rob the music of its symphonic proportions and character, gave it a conciseness and directness of emotional appeal, a degree of color and warm emotional expression that it had not had before for the ears of this generation. The concerto was interpreted by one of the few violinists in the world capable of doing it justice. No wonder that the audience applauded Mr. Witek through a good part of the intermission that followed his performance. No wonder that there was affection as well as respect in the recognition extended this concertmaster by Dr. Muck, as he threw an arm over Mr. Witek's shoulder.

Strauss' "Don Quixote"

The fitting climax to all this was the "Don Quixote." If, as Ernest Newman has observed, Strauss, in this perfect flowering of his style, has achieved a nervous, plastic, incisive utterance that is as musical prose, it is also true that he has intensified the meaning and the beauty of his prose in a manner only possible by means of music! Time was when the majority either laughed or sneered at the man who set out to portray in tones the psychology and the adventures of the dreaming idealist, the Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance, the fat and unctuous apostle of the obvious, Sancho Panza. Today we know better, and await the next step in the development of the art of music. After "Don Quixote"—what?

Strauss has produced nothing since "Don Quixote" which equals it, either in finish and subtlety of style, or in emotional intensity. It is undoubtedly music of the very zenith of his powers. It is the music when his sardonic humor is tempered by his recognition of humanity, by the pity of the strong for the weak. The Strauss of earlier works—the "Don Juan," "Till Eulenspiegel," "Zarathustra," is a man contemptuous and intolerant of the multitude.

Its Grotesque Pathos

The Strauss of "Don Quixote" is a man to whom life has taught the lesson of charity. Where is there a figure equal in its grotesque pathos to his "Don Quixote"? Perhaps one—Stepan Stepanovitch in Dostoievsky's "The Possessed"! As for character drawing, laughter, stupidity in the person of Sancho and the country wench, irony, tragedy, the echoes of the last moment that makes all men, great and small, the doers and failures, of the same stature in the presence of the same terror—it seems that here Strauss has surpassed, even, the ideal ism and the poignancy of the concluding pages of his "Death and Transfiguration." The transparency of his style, the breath-taking virtuosity with which he writes his most complicated score, and yet subordinates this virtuosity to purely expressive purposes—these things are now recognized.

It is not necessary, any longer, to fight for the recognition of the Strauss of the tone-poems of which "Don Quixote" is unquestionably the climax. What he began in "Till Eulenspiegel" he completed here. And before our very eyes there seems to pass the Don, going mad as he reads his books of chivalry, setting out on his quest of adventure and the ideal, jousting with his windmills, slaying his sheep, keeping his crazy vigil through the night of hallucinations when the vision of Dulcinea descends upon him, finally meeting defeat, disillusion, riding homeward and taking leave of the world in gentleness and humility and understanding. Of what avail to point out this or that passage in the score? Either the music speaks to the hearer, or it does not, according to measure of Don Quixote or Sancho Panza within him.

Bleating of the Sheep

The performance was thrice admirable, in its extravagance and tenderness, in its outrageous humor and fantasy, to say nothing of its technical finish. The episode of the flock of sheep was not passed over lightly. Dr. Muck made his horns bleat more realistically than any of his predecessors, but in so doing he emphasized the extravagance of this episode as the composer would have had it emphasized. Similarly with the ride through the sky. Nothing more preposterous, more hallucinatory, than the imitation of the whirring of the wind and the impossible leaps and flights of the themes of the don and his squire could possibly have been put on paper or presented to the ear. But these passages did not destroy the perspective of the picture. They, appropriately, were justly considered as graphic and humorous episodes, not as principal features of the score, and episodes which threw into the greater relief the eloquence of the knight's utterances on chivalry and the ideal.

BOSTON GLOBE-

FEBRUAR 12.

FIDELIO OVERTURE.

Beethoven Work Played by Symphony Orchestra.

Of the four overtures which Beethoven wrote for his opera—originally called "Leonore," revised by "Fidelio"—the No. 1, played by Dr Muck yesterday afternoon, is the least known. Its history is curious. When the overture known as "Leonore" No. 2 was played at the first performance of the opera, its length and difficult string or wind parts, or both, were criticised. One of the reviews of the day might have served for a modernist of any epoch:

"The most grotesque modulations, in truly ghastly harmony, follow one another throughout the piece. The few trivial ideas that there are, which are carefully guarded from anything like nobility, . . . complete the disagreeable and deafening impression"

Following this No. 2 overture, composed in 1805, Beethoven wrote the more familiar Leonore No. 3, a dramatic poem in itself. To the complaints that this was too difficult and tragic for a prelude to the opera, he wrote the No. 1, begun in 1807, published posthumously as Beethoven's last opus unmber, 138, and finally the "Fidelio" overture in 1814.

The last two differ greatly from the first in their light and buoyant nature. Out of the material of the two earlier and more serious ones, he kept only the theme from Florestan's air, "In des Lebens Fruehlingstagen." The overture in C, played yesterday, touches scarcely at all upon the dramatic, tragic character of the often-heard No. 3. It gives the impression of a prelude to its dramatic character of the opera rather than an independent tonal picture of it.

Mr Witek, the concert master, relieved Joachim's concerto, op 11 (in the Hungarian manner) of much of its tedium and gave to the more rewarding pages true distinction. The first movement is too often pedantic with formulas of the classroom worn thread bare by sequence, but the romance is warm, emotional, songful with a gypsy flavor, and the last movement rhythmically stimulating. Mr Witek's treatment of the opening recitative on the G string, his poetic playing of the slow movement, his virile sense of rhythm in the last were features of the musicianship with which he employed his ample technic. Had a visiting virtuoso given such a performance his fame would have acclaimed with sensation. The audience was warmly appreciative.

Strauss' "Don Quixote" does not wear as well as certain other of the tone poems. After Strawinsky's illuminating descriptive powers with musical figures, harmonic grouping and orchestral timbres, this tinny bleating of sheep, the wind machine and all the rest of the ponderous apparatus to say what the Russian probably could say with more economy and also more point—seems obsolete and forced. There are pages

---

FEBRUARY 12.
BOSTON HERALD.

14TH SYMPHO CONCERT SEASON GI

Beethoven's "Leonore" Ov No. 1 and Strauss's Quixote" Played — Mr Warnke and Ferir in La Solo Parts—Mr. Witek H in Joachim's Hungarian C certo.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 1, op. 138; Joachim, Concerto in the Hungarian manner for violin; Strauss, "Don Quixote." Mr. Witek was the solo violinist. The solo 'cello and violin parts in Strauss's tone poem were played by Mr. Warnke and Mr. Ferir respectively.

Although the "Leonore" overture played yesterday is numbered the first, it was the third in order of composition. Perhaps it is well that it should be heard occasionally, for it not only is interesting as showing how the composer could vary his subject, but contains a few engrossing passages. an overture to the opera it has the vantage over the other two of no ticipating the one great dramatic ment in the opera—the trumpet call announces the governor. Some said, and justly, that the overture 3 is the whole opera in a condensed form, more dramatic, more emotional than the opera itself; for this reason it should never be played in the theatre as a prelude. Viewed merely as a concert overture, No. 1 falls far below the other two. And what possessed Beethoven to write his "Fidelio" overture to the same opera, an overture that is not dramatic and is wholly unconnected with the text?

At long intervals some violinist, greatly daring, plays Joachim's Hungarian concerto. A less audacious person contents himself with the first movement, which is long enough; but by so doing he does not give a sop to the audience by playing the Romanze, with its obvious melody, its obvious embroidery, its obvious sentiment. Mr. Listemann played the whole of the concerto at a Symphony concert in 1881. Mr. Kneisel played the first movement in 1886; Mr. Winternitz did likewise in 1902. The indefatigable Willy Hess, not having the slightest consideration for a well disposed audience, played the whole concerto twice, in 1904 and in 1909.

Joachim was a celebrated violinist and quartet player. He was an impotent conductor, nor do we speak from hearsay. As a composer he had little talent. Nothing can be more laboriously contrived than his overtures, except this Hungarian concerto. It is so singularly ungrateful to the violinist that the question comes up: Why does any one take the trouble to play it? Perhaps the inherent difficulty of the task is tempting. A violinist may wish to have the concerto in his repertory to show his technical ability.

With the exception of the Romanze, music of amiable sentiment, the concerto is not one to enlist the sympathy of an audience. To quote the saying of Mozart: "Music should sound." That is, it should be euphonious. This concerto does not sound. It is painfully put together, manufactured. The solo instrument is not favored. If the composer by accident hits upon an agreeable phrase, he at once kills the effect by pitting an oboe, or a horn, against it, without rhyme or reason. Mr. Witek's abilities are well known. It was not necessary for him to utter this challenge. He played the concerto yesterday as though he really liked it. The hearers, recognizing his proficiency, paid him the customary tribute.

There are beautiful and stately things in Strauss's "Don Quixote." The introduction, with its romantic, chivalric spirit, with the whirring thoughts that finally turn the Knight's brain; the matter of fact comments of Sancho Panza as the two are in quest of adventures; the noble measures in which the Knight discourses on honor, glory and the ideal; the music that portrays the death scene—all these pages are of a supreme talent, if they are not the work of a genius. It is to be feared, however, that many hearers are more interested in the eccentricities of the tone-poem, in the sensationalism, as the variations that picture the sheep and the ride through the air. These variations are amusing; they are clever; but they are not the pages that make the composition remarkable. A less gifted composer, with the trick of clever instrumentation, can do surprising things; but his imagination would fail him if he should attempt to carry the hearer with Don Quixote high in the realm of the ideal. The performance was vivid and eloquent. Messrs. Warne and Ferir played with the finest understanding of the music allotted to Knight and follover. The concert will be repeated tonight.

There will be no concerts next week. The program of the concerts Feb. 25, 26 will be as follows: Goldmark, Overture "Sappho"; Brahms, Concerto in B flat major No. 2 for piano (Mr. Bauer, pianist); MacDowell, Suite op. 42.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
FEBRUARY 12.

SYMPHONY PLAYS UNUSUAL PROGRAM

Two infrequently played works have places on this week's Symphony program, the Joachim violin concerto in Hungarian style and Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote;" and these rarities, combined with the appearance of the popular and accomplished concert-master, Anton Witek, as soloist, drew the usual large audience.

The Joachim number was played here yesterday for the first time in seven years. It has been a favorite with the concert-masters, but not with the visiting virtuosi; and this week Mr. Witek is playing it for the first time in Boston. There is some point to the old remark that the concerto should be played exclusively by Hungarians, men of ebullient enthusiasm and profound sympathy. However, there was much brilliancy in Mr. Witek's performance yesterday, as well as touching tenderness in the delivery of the romance; and the result was a long series of recalls for the soloist when the gypsy-like finale was over.

"Don Quixote" was last heard in the midst of the season of 1910-11. Dr. Muck never had it on one of his Boston programs before, but novelties are scarcer than ever and many folks move restlessly if too many classics are heard. They want "something different" once in a while. They get it in "Don Quixote," which has a few finely spiritual moments, but which is admired most of all on account of its melodramatic realism—the sheep bleats, the big drum-thump that marks the solar plexus blow delivered by the windmill encountered by the knight-errant, and the whistling wind-machine that marks the imaginary flight on the wooden horse. These realistic effects—which, by the way, are too few altogether, considering the opportunities at the composer's disposal—stirred the audience, not with admiration so much as with amusement.

Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture, a classic diversion played in classic style, introduces the present concerts.

The orchestra will be down South next week. The week after next the program will be as follows: "Sappho" overture, Goldmark; concerto in B flat major, No. 2, for piano, Brahms; suite, op. 42, MacDowell. Harold Bauer will be the soloist.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.

Date ....

Musical Taste.

As a relief from the excitement to be found on the battle front, some of the British writers lately have been considering the effect of the European war upon the standards of music. After an exhaustive review of various bits of evidence one English writer concludes that "the war is leading to a general deterioration of taste in musical performance and a slackening of vigilance in criticism."

The consensus of opinion among the critics seems to be that the large number of charity concerts held in Europe these days is partly answerable. In a rather severe way the critic points out that "wretched music has been dug up and foisted on long-suffering audiences in the name of patriotism; orchestras have been reduced in size; singers and players have been allowed to appear who, purely on their merits, had no right to expect a hearing. Criticism has kept a silent tongue in its head in part because it did not wish to say anything that might discourage the patriotism of willing amateurs in the sacred work of charity."

Fortunately the United States can match this rather lugubrious discussion with one of her own on the merits of ragtime. Dr. Carl Muck, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, recently denounced in unmeasured terms the present trend of our popular music. Not only does he not "believe in popular music," but he will not even admit that there is "such a thing as good popular music." Ragtime, he says, is poison.

Another writer, however, gallantly leads a charge against Dr. Muck with the remark that "a person who does not open his heart to ragtime, somehow, is not human." He says that nine out of ten musicians, if caught unaware, will like this music "until they remember that they shouldn't."

Between these two extreme positions most sensible Americans will remain neutral, refusing to commit themselves, but continuing to keep step to ragtime music, enjoying it secretly, while confining their conversation to deep appreciations of Wagner and Beethoven.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date FEB 2[illegible] 19[illegible]

Reversing Mahomet, who "went to his mountain," it appears the latest musical upheaval of Ossa on Pelion is to come to New York. Last Friday the Boston Symphony Orchestra revived in its home town Liszt's symphonic poem with the odd title, "What One Hears on the Mountain." So far as could be found out, the music had only been played once in America, at a Philharmonic Society concert in New York in 1869.

Finished in 1847, and dating back as early as 1833, the "novelty" had a remarkable success in Boston. Now Dr. Muck has placed it on the programme of his next matinee in Carnegie Hall, on a Saturday three weeks away.

W. B. CHASE.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City [illegible] 1916
Date

A Man to Reckon With

COMMENTING on the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston, of Edgar Stillman Kelley's New England Symphony, Olin Downes writes in Musical America:

The symphony is a work which will occupy a significant position in the history of American music. It is the accomplishment of a composer of the older generation of Americans, whose musical workmanship is that of a master of his means, and who has been perhaps the most progressive in spirit of the group of men who were the first to give the American composer an honorable and important position in his art. Years ago, when symphonic poems and French impressionism were not bywords and standbys, Mr. Kelley was writing music so individual and daring that it must have seemed impudent, indeed, to the pedants of the period. His "Aladdin" music is a case in point. That score is a matter of wonder on account of its qualities of individual humor and fantasy, its astonishing technical workmanship, its modern tendency. An American capable of producing this score, at any period, is a man to reckon with. The orchestral coloring of the New England Symphony is austere and is in excellent conformance with the subject and the ideals of the work.

The second movement is warm and beautiful music. The bird songs are not employed too literally, but always in a suggestive and artistic manner. In this movement the nature coloring, the vernal moods, are the more ingratiating because of what has preceded and what is to come. Mr. Kelley thinks very highly of the funeral hymn, which he believes fit to rank in beauty and nobility with the German chorale, and with which he opens his third movement. We like the hymn too, and for a different reason. We like its drone, its snivel, its nasal, God-fearing bareness. It is in place. To-day the variation form is becoming outmoded and so to-day we may feel that there is a variation too much, but these variations are interesting, continuous, and cumulative in their effect. At the end of the final movement the funeral hymn, with new orchestral dress, is heard in an impressive version.

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 29 1916

The Boston Orchestra.

The outstanding feature of the fourth concert of the Bost[illegible] Symphony Orchestra in the Aca[illegible] of Music Friday evening, Febr[illegible] 18, will be Josef Joachim's Con[illegible] in D Major for violin and orche[illegible] in Hungarian style. The soloist [illegible] be Anton Witek, the concert-master of the orchestra. The Symphony will be Schumann's "Spring" Symphony.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City JAN [illegible] 1916
Date

Dr. Muck and Liszt

A WEEK ago Friday and Saturday, in Boston, Dr. Muck revived Liszt's symphonic poem, "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne," which, so far as could be found out, had been played only once in America, at a Philharmonic Society concert in New York in 1869. This is the first of the series of symphonic poems that Liszt wrote, and while it was not finished until 1847, the idea of writing it came to him at least as early as 1833. The poem had a remarkable success in Boston, and Dr. Muck has placed it on the programme of his fourth matinée [illegible] Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon, F[illegible]ruary 19. The two leading items on [illegible] Thursday evening programme, Febr[illegible] 17, are Debussy's "La Mer" and Rich[illegible] Strauss's "Don Quixote."

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 30 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S FOURTH CONCERT

Two works of unusual interest stand on the program of the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Lyric Wednesday evening, February 16. These are Josef Joachim's concerto for violin and orchestra in Hungarian style and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne." The Joachim concerto is very seldom heard and is a work of stupendous difficulties. It will be played by Anton Witek, the concert-master of the orchestra. Liszt's symphonic poem is the first of the series of revolutionary works in that form which he wrote. Until it was played in Boston January 21 and 22, so far as can be found out, its only performance in America was in New York in 1869. Dr. Muck, a great believer in the work, revived it and his judgment was vindicated by the extraordinary success it had.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date

Continuing a literary cycle of "Lisztiana" from the pen of W. E. Walter comes news to-day that the last visit but one of the Boston Symphony over to New York this season will include at next week's Saturday matinee a work unheard since it was played by the Philharmonic under Bergmann in 1869. The symphonic poem "What One Hears on the Mountain" was the first of a series that Liszt wrote. In the early '80s, when Karl Muck was more occupied as a piano virtuoso than a conductor, the present Boston leader was soloist at a festival in northern Germany, where this music was played. He was "quite a lad" at the time. Liszt was there and was exceedingly dissatisfied with the interpretation. On the evening following the concert he put Muck at one piano, took the other himself, and played it through, giving his ideas as to how it should go. As this was one of the very few times that Dr. Muck met Liszt it made a vivid impression upon him and he feels that he is now interpreting the poem as Liszt desired. Its recent revival had great success in Boston.

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

KARL MUCK AND LISZT

Dr. Karl Muck tells an interesting incident concerning Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne," which is the principal work on the fourth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Although this symphonic poem was begun by Liszt as long ago as 1833, and really finished in 1847, until Dr. Muck played it in Boston a fortnight ago, so far as is known, it had only one performance in America and that was in 1869. Dr. Muck himself had only heard it once.

When a lad, fresh from the Conservatory of Leipzig, and a piano virtuoso, Muck was playing at a music festival in Northern Germany. "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne" was one of the works on the program played by the orchestra. It had been hurriedly prepared with one rehearsal, and Liszt was greatly dissatisfied with the performance. After the concert Muck was at the same house where Liszt was being entertained, and began to talk with Liszt about this symphonic poem, which interested Muck greatly. Liszt at the time had with him a transcription for four hands and he had Muck play the work through with him, giving his ideas as to its interpretation. Dr. Muck says that Liszt's remarks about the work are as fresh in his mind as if they were made a year ago instead of over 30 years ago.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date

THE climax of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's last season in Boston was, by universal consent, the production of Liszt's "Faust" symphony. Four performances of it were given to crowded audiences, and the newspapers had columns of praise of this inspired music and about the enthusiasm of the audiences.

This season, again, Liszt has scored. Dr. Muck exhumed the first of Liszt's symphonic poems, "What One Hears on the Mountain," and again made a sensation. This work, in the words of Olin Downes, was found "extremely brilliant and romantic." "And by all the sayings of Zarathustra, if there is not the very conclusion of Strauss's magnificent tone-poem, stuck here in the last page of an obscure score of Liszt . . . Strauss helped himself, as many others helped themselves, where Liszt was concerned, with both hands."

Saint-Saëns, in his latest volume of reminiscences and comments ("L'Ecole Buissonnière"), gives his opinion that this same work, "Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne," "is perhaps the most admirable of these famous symphonic poems. Liszt was inspired by the poem of Victor Hugo, and has reproduced its spirit marvellously in his music. When will this characteristic work be included in our orchestral programmes?"

Philip Hale, noted for his antiquarian industry, as well as his wit and wisdom, could not find a record of any performance of this work in America before Dr. Muck's, except one in New York, given by the Philharmonic under Bergmann in 1869. But Mr. Humiston remembers one given several years ago by the Chicago Orchestra in Chicago.

The press agent of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, W. E. Walter, relates that in the very early eighties, when Dr. Muck was more famous as a piano virtuoso than a conductor, he was soloist at a festival in northern Germany, where this was played. He was quite a lad at the time. Liszt was there, but was exceedingly dissatisfied with the interpretation, and on the evening following the concert he put Muck at one piano, took the other himself, and played it through, giving his ideas as to how it should go. As this was one of the very few times that Dr. Muck met Liszt, it made a vivid impression upon him, and he feels that he is now interpreting the poem as Liszt desired.

It will be played under him in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, the other pieces listed being Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" symphony and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture. The Thursday evening programme includes a Haydn symphony, Debussy's "The Sea," and R. Strauss's "Don Quixote."

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FEB 13 1916

The fourth and last but one of the concerts given each season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Feb. 18, at 8:15. The programme which Dr. Muck has arranged, presents two points of great interest. These are Joachim's Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra (in the Hungarian style), and Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, No. 1.

Joachim's great concerto seldom appears on modern programmes, for as skilled as the violin virtuoso is to-day—which is saying much—there are few artists who will undertake and are able to overcome the stupendous difficulties which Joachim has placed in this work. One of the few virtuosi able to do this is Anton Witek, the concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and he has just played it in Boston with remarkable success. In writing this concerto Joachim seems deliberately to have piled difficulty upon difficulty, and although when played by Witek it sounds comparatively simple, only a master of his instrument dare undertake it.

The B flat Symphony of Schumann is popularly known as the "Spring" Symphony. It might well be called the "Bridal" Symphony, for Schumann wrote it in the first flush of success in winning, as his bride, after manw difficulties, Clara Wieck. It is the one symphony of the four which Schumann wrote, in which the composer was unusually happy with his treatment of the orchestra. With the other three Schumann symphonies it is a fair criticism that they are pianistic instead of orchestral, for they sound quite as well in an arrangement for four hands, if indeed they do not sound better so than when played by an orchestra. But in the B-flat major symphony, Schumann has written a clear, lucid score, and the music simply bubbles with the joy and happiness of the composer. The programme, in full, is as follows:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 1, Op. 138 (Beethoven); Concerto in D major, Opus 11, in the Hungarian style) (Joachim); Symphony [illegible]

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date FEB 6 - 1916

Pre-eminent among the musical attractions of the coming week will be the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening. Music lovers throughout this city and State look forward, always with the keenest anticipations, to the occasional concerts by this great musical organization, famous throughout the country, and a Boston Symphony concert is always an event in the musical life of the city.

A programme of unusual attractiveness and charm is this fourth concert, which promises to be one of the best of the very fine series that Dr. Muck has been giving here this season. Kathleen Howard, the soloist, as is now generally known, is one of the foremost contraltos of this country. The greater part of her career has bene spent in Germany and in London and she would be in Germany to-day were it not for the war.

She will sing two numbers. The first is the great aria from Wagner's "Rienzi," sung by Adriano; "Gerechter Gott" and the second is the very familiar and always popular, "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice," from Saint-Saens's "Samson and Delilah."

The orchestral part of the programme is rather light and decidedly pleasing. The symphony will be the immortal one in E-flat of Mozart, one of the three masterpieces that this supreme genius gave to the world in the course of a few months, its fellows being the Symphony in C-major, called "The Jupiter," and the one in G-minor.

In the second part wil come the fascinating concerto for strings and two-wind choirs by Handel, which shows purely 18th century music in one of its most pleasing aspects. Incidentally, it is admirable for the display of virtuosity in the celebrated wind choirs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The final number on the programme is the stirring "Husitska" overture of Dvorak. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in E-flat major.........Mozart
Arie, "Gerechter Gott" from "Rienzi"... .... Wagner
Concerto in F-major for strings and two-wind orchestras ....Handel
Aria, "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix" from "Samson and Delilah"........... .... Saint-Saens
Overture, "Husitska"..............Dvorak

Following the symphony concert other concerts of note are scheduled for the near future.

Francis Macmillen, the famous American violinist, who will be heard in the Strand Theatre, Feb. 13 at 3:30 p. m., this season, under the direction of T. R. Goodwin, is the exception that proves the rule. One is almost always startled to have greatness or genius pointed out in one's neighbor or playfellow.

Therefore, when a violinist, acknowledged to be the peer of any of the four or five greatest virtuosos on that king of instruments, happens to be an American, or what is more startling still, happens to come from one's own State, and is truly a neighbor if not actually a former playmate, it is certainly rare to find that artist a profit in his own home.

Macmillen is proud of his Americanism and never overlooks an opportunity to make the fact known. Most of all he loves his native State, Ohio. In all his travels abroad he never fails to make mention of the fact to the interviewer that he was born at Marietta, O., and that the few boyhood days he had time to enjoy, as his has been a life of work, were spent there, and in his second home, Springfield, O.

Since those days, Macmillen, aside from five American tours, consisting in the aggregate of about 400 concerts, has been heard in nearly every country in Europe, where he has toured and retoured, always with the same great success that greeted his London debut, when he was fresh from his student days and final triumph at the Brussels Conservatoire.

He has played as soloist with nearly every important orchestra in Europe, and without exception, in this country, he has been the star attraction, not once, but several times, with every great orchestral society.

by Chevalier Rodolfo Fornari, tenor, and Karel Havlicek, violin, assisted by Carmelita Wilkes, soprano, and Malvina Ehrlich, piano.

The name Carmelita Wilkes, one of the soloists, is well known to the music lovers of the West and Middle West. Lyric sopranos of wide range and skillful technique are not plentiful and therefore Miss Wilkes' voice will be more appreciated by those who have the good fortune to listen to her numbers. The most noticeable feature of this singer is her complete surrender of self to the mood of the theme of her song. She wins her audiences by the purity of tone, the grace of her method and the exquisite melodiousness of her vocalization.

Karel Havlicek, violinist, another of the soloists, is a Bohemian by birth and came to America for the second time in the spring of 1915. Such was his mastery of the violin that immediately upon his arrival he was engaged by Mr. Witek, the maestro of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to play for that organization for the balance of the season. Since playing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Havlicek has given concerts in 100 cities in America.

From WORLD

KATHLEEN HOWARD.
Soloist with the Boston Symphon Orchestra in Infantry Hall Nex Tuesday Evening.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date [illegible]

Boston Symphony.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall this week, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Two works of the ultra-modern school are placed on the Thursday evening programme—Debussy's three symphonique sketches entitled "The Sea," and Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote." In Don Quixote the 'cello solo will be played by Henri Warnke, the principal cellist of the orchestra, while Mr. Ferir will play the viola solo obligato. The third number of the programme will be Haydn's little Symphony in B flat major, No. 1.

Dr. Muck has placed on the programme for the Saturday matinee Liszt's first Symphonique Poem, "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne." According to Philip Hale, annotator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra programme book, the only time this work was played in America, so far as he can find out, until Dr. Muck revived it three years ago, was in New York by the New York Philharmonic Society under Bergmann in 1869. The symphonique poem is the first of the series that Liszt wrote. The idea goes back at least as far as 1833, and it had its first performance in 1847.

In the very early eighties, when Dr. Muck was more famous as a piano virtuoso than a conductor, he was soloist at the festival in Northern Germany, where this was played. He was quite a lad at the time. Liszt was there and was exceedingly dissatisfied with the interpretation, and on the evening following the concert he put Muck at one piano, took the other himself and played it through giving his ideas as to how it should go. As this was one of the very few times that Dr. Muck met Liszt it made a vivid impression upon him and he feels that he is now interpreting the poem as Liszt desired. The programme for Saturday afternoon in full comprises.

"Antar," op. 15. Rimsky Korsakoff's Symphony No. 2
"Ce qu'on entend sur la Montague"........Liszt
Overture, "The Flying Dutchman"......Wagner

Russian Symphony Society

BROOKLYN EDIT
From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date FEB 1 3 1916

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

THE fourth and last but one of the concerts given each season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music under Institute auspices next Friday evening. The programme which Dr. Muck has arranged presents two points of great interest. These are Joachim's Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra—in the Hungarian style—and Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, No. 1.

Joachim's great concerto seldom appears on modern programmes for, skilled as the violin virtuoso is—which is saying much—there are few artists who will undertake and are able to overcome the stupendous difficulties which Joachim has placed in this work. One of the few virtuosi able to do this is Anton Witek, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and he has just played it in Boston with remarkable success. In writing this concerto Joachim seems deliberately to have piled difficulty upon difficulty, and although when played by Witek it sounds comparatively simple only a master of his instrument dare undertake it.

The B flat symphony of Schumann is popularly known as the "Spring" Symphony. It might well be called the "Bridal" Symphony, for Schumann wrote it in the first flush of success in winning, after many difficulties, as his bride, Clara Wieck. It is the one symphony of the four which Schumann wrote in which the composer was unusually happy with his treatment of the orchestra. With the other three Schumann symphonies it is a fair criticism that they are pianistic instead of orchestral, for they sound quite as well in an arrangement for four hands, if indeed they do not sound better so than when played by an orchestra. But in the B flat major symphony Schumann has written a clear, lucid score, and the music simply bubbles with the joy and happiness of the composer. The programme in full is as follows:—

Overture—"Leonora" No 1, opus 138...Beethoven
Concerto in D major, opus 11 (in the Hungarian style) ....Joachim
Symphony in B flat major, No. 1, opus 38. Schumann

TRANSCRIPT,
FEBRUARY 12,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

"DON QUIXOTE" AND A TEDIOUS CONCERTO

Even Mr. Witek Fails to Atone for the Dulness of Joachim's Piece—An Overlooked and Interesting Overture of Beethoven—The Contrasts of Strauss's Tone-Poem and the Moments in Which He Excels Himself

LIKE the wedding-guests in the parable, whenever the violinists play Joachim's Hungarian Concerto, with one accord they begin to make excuse. The "literature" of their instrument offers them so little that is really desirable for symphony concerts. If they alternate Beethoven's and Brahms's concertos from year to year, they are likely to surfeit their audiences. Bruch's and Tschaikovsky's—the next in their favor—will not bear too much repetition. Mendelssohn's is old-fashioned; Goldmark's prolix; and Saint-Saëns's merely elegant. What is a poor violinist to do, especially if he happens to be a violinist who follows German ways and masters, but play Joachim in the Hungarian manner? Mr. Kneisel has played him at the Symphony Concerts; Mr. Hess has played him there, twice over, and so precedent was not lacking for Mr. Witek to do likewise yesterday afternoon. For a week his friends have been making the usual excuses over the revival of the concerto and clinching them with a semi-triumphant "What would you have him play?" At one extreme, Mr. Witek might have played a concerto of the seventeenth or the eighteenth century, as composers like Bach or Mozart, as violinists like Tartini and Viotti, have written them, and on that score both Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Ysaye have set him illustrious example. At the other extreme, he might have made known a novel concerto by a contemporary composer, like Elgar's or Weingartner's. Whatever the shortcomings, they are interesting enough to deserve a single hearing and they tax the powers of the violinist to the utmost.

As it was, Mr. Witek played Joachim in the Hungarian manner, and there is much testimony in print and by word of mouth that it is the true and pure Hungarian manner in the content and the contour of the melodic ideas and in the harmonic and the rhythmic treatment of them. In like fashion and by as much testimony, distilled water is the purest and the truest of water; but how flavorless it is to the palate that pines for the impure admixture to which it has been enjoyably used. Even so upon the ear falls Joachim's concerto. Liszt's Hungarian pieces may be full of impurities and infidelities, but to this day they are stirring to hear because he has mixed into them imaginative, romantic and transmitting fire. Joachim, on the other hand, makes his music as dry, mechanical, muddling and stupid, as wholly respectable and nearly as wholly dull, as though he was actually born of the Britons who were all that were left in his final years to give him ear. Of course the music tests the violinist's skill—as it also tests forty minutes of his and of the audience's endurance; of course—but in rather less degree than many an ancient piece—it enables him to show his command of many a superfluous and difficult feat of fiddling; and of course Mr. Witek was equal to every exaction that the music laid upon him. Steadily indeed he glorified it by his edgeless, lustrous and undulating tone; by his felicities in transition, emphasis and measured cumulation; by the beauty of his transparent coloring; by the rhythmic deftness and brightness with which he gave a pseudo-life to this moribund musical skeleton. It is a cheering hope that he has preached thus eloquently the funeral sermon at the Symphony Concerts of Joachim in the Hungarian manner.

Fortunately for the audience there were Beethoven and Strauss to save and to heighten the interest of the day, and the piece from Beethoven was almost unknown Beethoven. Now that the publishers of music in Europe have nearly ceased to publish, and scores already engraved make precarious journeys from Paris and Berlin to New York and Boston, the conductors are discovering under the dust of years on the shelves of their orchestral libraries a new sort of "novelties"—the overlooked but deserving pieces of the eminent composers, with whom they are usually too ready to follow the well-worn routine of repertory. The other day, for example, Dr. Muck so resurrected Liszt's tone-poem, "Ce qu'on Entend sur la Montagne," and music and performance thrilled his hearers. Yesterday he similarly disinterred the least-known of all the four overtures that Beethoven wrote to his opera of "Fidelio," and if it did not stir the audience as did Liszt's rediscovered music, it warmly interested it. The books call the overture "Leonora, No. 1," and they say that it was written for a projected but unaccomplished performance of "Fidelio" at Prague in 1807. By long habit the hearer's standard with these overtures is the familiar "Leonora, No. 3," which epitomizes the dramatic content and course of the opera in a fashion that such preluding, even from Wagner's hand, has still to equal in unfolding and concentrating eloquence. Schooled in it, the average audience before a "Leonora" overture expects the tonal characterization and the tonal suspense of the beginning; the hints of the scene in the prison; the thrill of the saving trumpet call; the wild and reiterated rejoicing of the end.

As it happens, Beethoven was otherwise minded when he wrote the new overture for Prague. In it he puts the dramatic side of the opera behind him and elects to muse, as it were, over the music that is the tonal and spiritual embodiment of the devoted and high-hearted love of Leonora and the youthful longings of the imprisoned Florestan. There is no trumpet call: no hint of the cruel Pizzaro; little suspense; and beside the great voice of "Leonora No. 3," relatively little climax and rejoicing. The whole impression is of music that would summon for preluding the beauty of illusion in which Beethoven would clothe the loyalties and the perils of Leonora and the longings and the despair of Florestan. He is lyric rather than dramatic in the overture in which he has enshrined this music; he has written it with an ear to flowing loveliness of idea, treatment and detail rather than to large and sharp effect: he sees in imagination an ideal woman, as he saw it when he invented the so-called feminine theme of the overture to "Coriolan"; he feels the charm of wistful youth—that seldom stirred him or that he seldom expressed—in the music of Florestan; the end is the rejoicing of released spirits rather than of thundering choruses of freed and bodily prisoners. By every token of this overture, there are beauty and eloquence yet to be discovered—or to be made familiar—in the overlooked pages of Beethoven. Why, for example, should we not hear from Dr. Muck the ballet of "Prometheus"?

Similarly "Don Quixote" is not of the Staruss to which the average ear has become long habituated in the concert-room. There is no "great climax" in the fantastic variations," like that which upswells, for example, at the end of "Death and Transfiguration." There are no passages of unrolling and over-luscious orchestral song, like that of the creating and impassioned "man" of the "Sinfonia Domestica." There are fewer pages of intricate and arbitrary and mob always "sunding" polyphony than in "Zardhustra" and "Ein Heldenleben." There is little of the pictorial and narrating sweep that fills "Don Juan," or of the bitter and mocking grotesquerie of "Til Eulenspiegel." In a word, "Don Quixote" is unique among the tone-poems of Strauss, yet in its very differences from the rest it is highly characteristic of him in the early noon of his powers. It is his cast of mind that chooses to blend in it comic, fantastic, serio-comic and pathetic elements in a fashion strange to music. It is his cast of mind that spares not a musical means in the delineative suggestion of the variations of the adventurer, as though a so-called "realism" in tones were his only goal, and then lavishes highly idealistic music upon the episodes in which the knight reasons high of honor and faith, of works and their glory; keeps rapt vigil beside his arms, or makes a good end of this world and this flesh. It is this cast of mind that gives the music its twofold voice, as of a composer objectively fashioning his invention and imagination upon Don Quixote and at the same time writing not a little subjectively out of his own spirit and its susceptibility to the tragi-comedy of men and things. Finally, it is this cast of mind that makes "Don Quixote" often a music of finesse and elated delineation; whereas when he so chooses Strauss can write, as it were, in outflung tonal fresco. Somehow a hearer can come to believe that when Strauss set to "fantastic variations on a knightly theme" he looked oftener in his heart than in his mind as he wrote. They say in Munich that he has "a certain fondness" for the piece.

Because Strauss so looked into his own heart, it may be that in the music of Don Quixote's heart, rather than in that of his merely external adventures the tone-poems gains and sustains a beauty that melts the hearts of those that hear. The "realistic" variations are amusing enough in their graphic fashion. By this time every one takes it for granted that music under the delineative imagination and resource of Strauss can suggest a group of country-folk trooping along the road; the whistling winds of sides in mid-air; the clash of combat; and even those super-celebrated bleatings of the flock of sheep that the Knight of Cervantes saw as "the host of the great Emperor, Alifonfaron." Every-one is also agreed that from such a mind and such a hand as Strauss's, similar music may hint for an instant at the neighboring convent, at Sancho and Don Quixote giving pious thanks, at the motion of the enchanted bark; at the snores even of the esquire—and doing these things and keep its form and continuity as an ordered speech of tones. By this time yet again, Strauss's power of musical design and coördination is well-established enough to leave not a doubt that he makes the motive of Don Quixote in various forms and treatments hold all these episodes and details of episodes in a diversified unity. It is all very ingenuous work; it is all work that asks a certain sort of imagination and fecundity; the outcome can be asas marvellously graphic in tones as Dr. Muck and the orchestra made it yesterday, studious youth cones these variations with technical profit; audiences hear them entertained and a little wondering. A few fancy that in the music of the Strauss has kept a suggestion of fantastical tones which is a feat of subtle and sustained invention. After the fashion of ironic comedy, they address the mind. They are foil to the beauty that dwells elsewhere in the tone-poem. In them the composer is his full self but not above himself.

The Strauss of "Don Quixote," who, like the Malvolio in the play, "speaks nobly of the soul," is the Strauss who writes the variations of the discourse with Sancho and of the nocturnal vigil and of the finale in which the Knight, illumined if still haunted by the kindly phantoms of his delusions, dies "so mildly, so quietly, so Christianly." The Strauss who can still rise to beautiful and moving invention is the Strauss who found the motive that embodies the Knight and the Strauss whose imagination can search out the things of reality is the Strauss of the introduction wherein the hallucinations steal upon Don Quixote and possess him. Alike in introduction, finale and the two specified variations music is doing its unique office in the imparting of spritual sensations more finely, more fully and more movingly than can any other medium. In similar fashion Strauss rises to the opportunity that he is making. Now may he look into his mind and heart and into the mind and heart of Don Quixote and blend in his music their twofold image and promptings.

What a motive is that which symbolizes the don, but symbolizes him very subtly and illusively as the radiant figure of chivalry, the perfect knight, faring forth in high heart to high adventure that he imagined himself to be! And as it quite fanciful to catch also in that motive, so bright and warm of color, so clear and direct of substance a hint of the simple goodness that shone out of Don Quixote's heart or to find in its quick and vivid motion a hint of that unstable and self-deceiving temper that was his bane. Of course, strauss can fertilize and transform this theme into all sorts of suggestion of mood and feeling and circumstance and equal, if not excel, Wganer in such feats. But when he dwells upon one or another of these transmutations and when he uses them as the exalted medium of high emotion and high illusion, he writes music of a beauty and power that is little short of genius.

Beside his arms, the knight keeps his vigil and the beauty of the music with which Strauss mantles him is the beauty of the visioned ideal that no man may know but that all men may pursue. With Sancho, the knight discourses of honor and of arms, of full living and full doing, of the glories of conflict and of loyalty and the music glows with a noble passion and a noble fortitude of the soul—the striving and the devotion that are life against the snug and smug content that is worse than death. The old legends of the saints tell how, when one and another of them made his good end, a radiant light hung over his death bed and before his eyes floated wisps of radiant vision. So does Strauss's music halo the dying knight and so in it do the old iridescent phantoms flutter and flicker before his spirit. They arer idealized now and not as they were when clouding and crowding, whirring and whirling, they descend upon him in the broken measures of the introduction and leave him distraught. But end and beginning are alike of invention and imagination in music, when they run high and deep. They weo heed only the variations of the adventures know little of the real tone-poem in which they are but passing incidents and foil. That is written in the introduction, the theme, the finale and the variations of the discourse and the vigil. These are the dayr, when no longer marvelling at Strauss, ear and mind dwell upon what may pass for the routine of his music. There is that in it, besides—and in these very parts of "Don Quixote"—that our time may not elsewhere match.

H. T. P.

MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS.

FEBRUARY 12,

VARIATIONS OF STRAUSS PLAYED BY ORCHESTRA

SYMPHONY HALL—Fourteenth program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of Feb. 11. The program: Beethoven, overture to "Leonora," No. 1, op. 138; Joachim, concerto in Hungarian style for violin and orchestra, op. 11 (Anton Witek, soloist); Strauss, "Don Quixote" variations, op. 35 (Heinrich Warnke, solo violoncellist, and Emil Ferir, solo viola player).

The Beethoven and Strauss numbers were performed with as much care as if the reputation and, one might say, the artistic existence of the orchestra depended on the outcome. Needless to remark, the works repaid all the effort put on them. The fragile beauty of the first "Leonora" overture might well have suffered under the large string choir a the augmented wind choir emplo But no. The reading was light and liant to the last degree, notwithstand the full volume of tone. And it aboun with sentiment too. It was strong, deed, in all respects; and it surpassec possible, the reading given the see symphony a week ago. In the inter tation of Beethoven the conductor players are reaching a point of eloqu even beyond that touched 15 years when this composer's works were main consideration in these concert

The general accepted opinion is the three "Leonoras" take artistic rank in inverse order of their numbering. And it is not to be imagined that any performance could change the usual valuation and give No. 1 a look of superiority over Nos. 2 and 3. Rather the tendency was to cause listeners to cease thinking of comparisons. They had to regard No. 1 on its own merits. In what a rare mood of gentleness it represents the composer! It explains the character of a man whose friends liked him and wanted to be near him, in spite of his inflicting every kind of abuse on them. It is one of those works which make the progress of the romantic movement from Beethoven to Schubert easy to understand. There could, of course, be more contrast in the overture; a little outbreak of egotism here and there would be exhilarating. But there could hardly be more delightful orchestral writing in the range of moods covered.

Some years ago a perfunctory reading of a classic overture would have been condoned on the day a Strauss tone poem was played. But that does not have to be done now. "Leonora" of the pure melodic line and "Don Quixote" of the glowing tone color can be together on a program and can each have its qualities properly shown without harm to the other. Perhaps this is because the two works are not so much unlike as problems of expression and execution as they were formerly thought to be. If the leader insists on his men's performing their parts in a straightforward, musicianly spirt, without too much effort at evoking epochs and realizing styles, the result may take care of itself. The Strauss variations were of course quite different in effect from the Beethoven overture. But they were just the same in one thing, that their notes were played with all the conscience, heart and intelligence of the men.

"Don Quixote," like many other works which the Symphony conductor has brought out of late, assumed more interest as a piece of formal composition than as an exploit in orchestral narration and description. The magic horse and the enchanted boat proved useful for some of the early departing subscribers to get out of the hall on, but except when the audience thus took part, the music was not greatly unlike a concerto of the old school for violoncello. The fantastic variations, op. 35, were presented like any other work in the variation form; and the subject treated in them was the abstract conflict of idealism and realism, with pictures of woful knight, sorry nag and ponderous squire, left out. If any listeners protest that they heard sheep bleat and the wind whistle, they must remember that modern composers are what Samuel Johnson found the Greeks to be, a barbarous people. Let them not suppose that the charm of this work is in any literary quality or that the hearing of Strauss will do them instead of reading Cervantes. The pleasure of it is in the purely musical handling of the theme by solo instrument and orchestra, in the contrast of colors, in the shading and in the recurring rhythm of serious and humorous moments, all of which would be there in just about the same proportions and in the same sequence, had Strauss taken any other hero of romance or any other subject whatever for his focus of contemplation.

The "Hungarian" concerto of Joachim was just the kind of composition for a concertmaster to present. It is an interesting historic document, an attractive problem for the violin scholar, an invigorating study for an audience. It is a rather dreary work in the first half and a highly pleasing one in the last half. Keeping up appearances as a composer of first movements was a litle too much for Joachim here; and cutting a figure as a master of orchestration, altogether too much. He was more in his element as a serenader or when singing the songs of the road. The romance and the finale in gypsy style are the vital portions of his work.

Mr. Witek did not let his solo responsibility interfere with his routine duties of the day in the orchestra. He gave a masterful performance of the concerto and justified anew his important position as leader of the Symphony violins. And while the matter of soloists is up, the playing of Mr. Warnke as violoncellist in the Strauss variations deserves the warmest praise. That of Mr. Ferir as solo viola player in that number, less exacting, was of the artist's usual excellence

---

From Bulletin

Address Prov

Date FEB 9 - 1916

Establish

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS FOURTH IN CONCERT SERIES

Kathleen Howard, Former Leading Contralto of Century Opera Company, Makes First Appearance Here as Soloist.—Dr. Muck Conducts.

In its fourth concert of the present season last evening in Infantry Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, introduced a soloist new to these Plantations, and presented a programme pleasing to the audience. The soloist was Miss Kathleen Howard, lately leading contralto of the erstwhile Century Opera Company, and the programme, which had a fine flavor of an earlier generation, was given in the following order:

Mozart........Symphony, E-flat major (K. 543)
I. Adagio; Allegro
II. Andante
III. Minuetto; Trio
IV. Finale; Allegro
Wagner......................Scene, "Just God"
And aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from "Rienzi," Act. III., No. 9.
Handel..................Concerto in F-major
For Strings and Two Wind Orchestras. (Edition of Gustav F. Kogel).
I. Pomposo
II Allegro
III. A tempo ordinario
IV. Largo
V. Allegro
Saint-Saens...."My Heart at Thy Dear Voice"
From "Samson and Delilah."
Dvorak..Dramatic overture, "Husitska," op. 6

Last evening was not by any mea an idle one for the orchestra; the thre numbers devoted exclusively to tha body employing its attention and skill a marked degree, the soloist also requi ing its assistance in her two alternatin numbers.

The programme opened cheerfully wi Mozart's Symphony in E-flat, and to t imagination that wandered into the pa there was food for thought. Such performance of a symphony, a centu and a quarter after its composition for smaller body of players, must compel miration, both for the vitality of music, and the skill able to direct an orchestra of such proportion in the production of its various movements that nothing be lost of the delicate beauty of its structure.

CHARM MARKS WORK.

The graceful adagio, the measured andante, the melodious minuetto familiar to "household pianists" and the fanciful finale with its carnival spirit were all given with the charm that is expected of the Boston orchestra; especial bits, like the trio dominated by the clarinets in the minuetto, still clinging to the memory.

Of still more ancient lineage is the concerto by Handel, which in its present arrangement by Kogel for strings and two wind choirs, was first performed in Boston less than a decade ago. It is a composition characteristic of the Prussian composer, interesting, varied, and as given last evening, singularly beautiful in tone, and at times exceedingly suggestive of organ harmonies. After all, there is still much to be enjoyed even by ears attuned to the bewildering compositions of the present, in the solid, substantial fundamental music of the past.

Preceding and following the concerto came two solos by Miss Howard, who created an agreeable impression with her scene and aria, from "Rienzi," which deepened with her second appearance in the solo, "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice" from "Samson and Delilah," by Saint-Saens.

EDUCATED HERE.

Miss Howard, a Canadian by birth, who has received most of her education in this country, and won wide experience in Germany and London, has a pleasing personality without affectation. Her voice, a rich contralto, with a surprising command of altitude, seemed a bit uneven in quality, but of much beauty in many respects, and her performance was exceedingly artistic, although the force of the orchestra came near to overshadowing it once or twice. She won the recognition dear to every artist, the applause recalling her to the stage several times.

The climax was reached in the final number, Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," which was a brilliant performance of the martial amplification of the Hussite hymn, taxing to the utmost the energies of conductor and orchestra alike, and stimulating the aroused imagination to suggestions of the future instead of the past. It did not require the programme to interpret its melancholy or its fanticism, while viewed from the musical standpoint only it was a masterly performance.

The enjoyment of the concert was enhanced by the installation of the new lights, a change which has been in process following a criticism in the Journal and executed since the previous Symphony concert. Further plans for the use of lower-powered lights will, when carried out, increase the appreciation expressed by several in the audience last evening.

The fifth concert in the series will be given on Tuesday evening, March 7, when the soloist will be Ernest Schelling, pianist.

A. W. C.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date FEB 13 1916

Es 1884

Three Great Numbers in Boston Symphony Programme.

The fourth and last but one of the concerts given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music, under institute auspices, on Friday evening next, at 8:15 o'clock. The programme, arranged by Dr. Muck, has two points of great interest, in Joachim's Concerto in D. Major for Violin and Orchestra (in the Hungarian style) and Schumann's Symphony in B Flat Major, No. 1. Joachim's great concerto seldom appears on modern programmes, as there are few artists who will undertake and are able to overcome the stupendous difficulties in this work. One of the few virtuosi able to do this is Anton Witek, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; he recently played it in Boston with success. Joachim seems to have deliberately piled difficulty upon difficulty, but when played by Witek, it sounds comparatively simple. The B Flat Symphony of Schumann is known as the "Spring" Symphony, but it might well have been called the "Bridal" Symphony, for Schumann wrote it after winning as his bride, Clara Wieck. It is the one symphony of the four which Schumann wrote in which the composer was unusually happy with his treatment of the orchestra. With the other three Schumann symphonies it is a fair criticism that they are pianistic instead of orchestral, for they sound quite as well in an arrangement for four hands, if indeed they do not sound better so than when played by an orchestra. But in the B Flat Major Symphony, Schumann has written a clear, lucid score and the music simply bubbles with the joy and happiness of the composer. The programme includes the Beethoven overture, "Leonora" No. 1, Opus 138.

From STANDARD UNION

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date FEB 14 1916

Estab 14

The fourth and last but one of the concerts given each season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Feb. 18. The programme which Dr. Muck has arranged presents two points of great interest. These are Joachim's concerto in D major for violin and orchestra (in the Hungarian style) and Schumann's symphony in B flat major, No. 1. Joachim's great concerto seldom appears on modern programmes for as skilled as the violin virtuoso is to-day, which is saying much, there are few artists who will undertake and are able to overcome the stupendous difficulties which Joachim has placed in this work. One of the few virtuosi able to do this is Anton Witek, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and he has just played it in Boston with remarkable success. In writing this concerto Joachim seems deliberately to have piled difficulty upon difficulty and, although when played by Witek, it sounds comparatively simple, only a master of his instrument dare undertake it. The B flat symphony of Schumann is popularly known as the "Spring" symphony. It might well be called the "Bridal" symphony, for Schumann wrote it in the first flush of success in winning, after many difficulties, as his bride, Clara Wieck. It is the one symphony of the four which Schumann wrote in which the composer was unusually happy with his treatment of the orchestra. With the other three Schumann symphonies it is a fair criticism that they are pianistic instead of orchestral, for they sound quite as well in an arrangement for four hands, if, indeed, they do not sound better so than when played by an orchestra. But in the B flat major symphony Schumann has written a clear, lucid score, and the music simply bubbles with the joy and happiness of the composer.

variations are amusing enough in their graphic fashion. By this time every one takes it for granted that music under the delineative imagination and resource of Strauss can suggest a group of countryfolk trooping along the road; the whistling winds of sides in mid-air; the clash of combat; and even those super-celebrated bleatings of the flock of sheep that the Knight of Cervantes saw as "the host of the great Emperor, Alifonfaron." Everyone is also agreed that from such a mind and such a hand as Strauss's, similar music may hint for an instant at the neighboring convent, at Sancho and Don Quixote giving pious thanks, at the motion of the enchanted bark; at the snores even of the esquire—and doing these things and keep its form and continuity as an ordered speech of tones. By this time yet again, Strauss's power of musical design and coördination is well-established enough to leave not a doubt that he makes the motive of Don Quixote in various forms and treatments hold all these episodes and details of episodes in a diversified unity. It is all very ingenuous work; it is all work that asks a certain sort of imagination and fecundity; the outcome can be asas marvellously graphic in tones as Dr. Muck and the orchestra made it yesterday, studious youth cones these variations with technical profit; audiences hear them entertained and a little wondering. A few fancy that in the music of the Strauss has kept a suggestion of fantastical tones which is a feat of subtle and sustained invention. After the fashion of ironic comedy, they address the mind. They are foil to the beauty that dwells elsewhere in the tone-poem. In them the composer is his full self but not above himself.

The Strauss of "Don Quixote," who, like the Malvolio in the play, "speaks nobly of the soul," is the Strauss who writes the variations of the discourse with Sancho and of the nocturnal vigil and of the finale in which the Knight, illumined if still haunted by the kindly phantoms of his delusions, dies "so mildly, so quietly, so Christianly." The Strauss who can still rise to beautiful and moving invention is the Strauss who found the motive that embodies the Knight and the Strauss whose imagination can search out the things of reality is the Strauss of the introduction wherein the hallucinations steal upon Don Quixote and possess him. Alike in introduction, finale and the two specified variations music is doing its unique office in the imparting of spritual sensations more finely, more fully and more movingly than can any other medium. In similar fashion Strauss rises to the opportunity that he is making. Now may he look into his mind and heart and into the mind and heart of Don Quixote and blend in his music their twofold image and promptings.

What a motive is that which symbolizes the don, but symbolizes him very subtly and illusively as the radiant figure of chivalry, the perfect knight, faring forth in high heart to high adventure that he imagined himself to be! And as it quite fanciful to catch also in that motive, so bright and warm of color, so clear and direct of substance a hint of the simple goodness that shone out of Don Quixote's heart or to find in its quick and vivid motion a hint of that unstable and self-deceiving temper that was his bane. Of course, strauss can fertilize and transform this theme into all sorts of suggestion of mood and feeling and circumstance and equal, if not excel, Wganer in such feats. But when he dwells upon one or another of these transmutations and when he uses them as the exalted medium of high emotion and high illusion, he writes music of a beauty and power that is little short of genius.

Beside his arms, the knight keeps his vigil and the beauty of the music with which Strauss mantles him is the beauty of the visioned ideal that no man may know but that all men may pursue. With Sancho, the knight discourses of honor and of arms, of full living and full doing, of the glories of conflict and of loyalty and the music glows with a noble passion and a noble fortitude of the soul—the striving and the devotion that are life against the snug and smug content that is worse than death. The old legends of the saints tell how, when one and another of them made his good end, a radiant light hung over his death bed and before his eyes floated wisps of radiant vision. So does Strauss's music halo the dying knight and so in it do the old iridescent phantoms flutter and flicker before his spirit. They arer idealized now and not as they were when clouding and crowding, whirring and whirling, they descend upon him in the broken measures of the introduction and leave him distraught. But end and beginning are alike of invention and imagination in music, when they run high and deep. They weo heed only the variations of the adventures know little of the real tone-poem in which they are but passing incidents and foil. That is written in the introduction, the theme, the finale and the variations of the discourse and the vigil. These are the dayr, when no longer marvelling at Strauss, ear and mind dwell upon what may pass for the routine of his music. There is that in it, besides—and in these very parts of "Don Quixote"—that our time may not elsewhere match.

H. T. P.

MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS.

FEBRUARY 12,

VARIATIONS OF STRAUSS PLAYED BY ORCHESTRA

SYMPHONY HALL—Fourteenth program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of Feb. 11. The program: Beethoven, overture to "Leonora," No. 1, op. 138; Joachim, concerto in Hungarian style for violin and orchestra, op. 11 (Anton Witek, soloist); Strauss, "Don Quixote" variations, op. 35 (Heinrich Warnke, solo violoncellist, and Emil Ferir, solo viola player).

The Beethoven and Strauss numbers were performed with as much care as if the reputation and, one might say, the artistic existence of the orchestra depended on the outcome. Needless to remark, the works repaid all the effort put on them. The fragile beauty of the first "Leonora" overture might well have suffered under the large string choir and the augmented wind choir employed. But no. The reading was light and brilliant to the last degree, notwithstanding the full volume of tone. And it abounded with sentiment too. It was strong, indeed, in all respects; and it surpassed, if possible, the reading given the second symphony a week ago. In the interpretation of Beethoven the conductor and players are reaching a point of eloquence even beyond that touched 15 years ago, when this composer's works were the main consideration in these concerts.

The general accepted opinion is that the three "Leonoras" take artistic rank in inverse order of their numbering. And it is not to be imagined that any performance could change the usual valuation and give No. 1 a look of superiority over Nos. 2 and 3. Rather the tendency was to cause listeners to cease thinking of comparisons. They had to regard No. 1 on its own merits. In what a rare mood of gentleness it represents the composer! It explains the character of a man whose friends liked him and wanted to be near him, in spite of his inflicting every kind of abuse on them. It is one of those works which make the progress of the romantic movement from Beethoven to Schubert easy to understand. There could, of course, be more contrast in the overture; a little outbreak of egotism here and there would be exhilarating. But there could hardly be more delightful orchestral writing in the range of moods covered.

Some years ago a perfunctory reading of a classic overture would have been condoned on the day a Strauss tone poem was played. But that does not have to be done now. "Leonora" of the pure melodic line and "Don Quixote" of the glowing tone color can be together on a program and can each have its qualities properly shown without harm to the other. Perhaps this is because the two works are not so much unlike as problems of expression and execution as they were formerly thought to be. If the leader insists on his men's performing their parts in a straightforward, musicianly spirt, without too much effort at evoking epochs and realizing styles, the result may take care of itself. The Strauss variations were of course quite different in effect from the Beethoven overture. But they were just the same in one thing, that their notes were played with all the conscience, heart and intelligence of the men.

"Don Quixote," like many other works which the Symphony conductor has brought out of late, assumed more interest as a piece of formal composition than as an exploit in orchestral narration and description. The magic horse and the enchanted boat proved useful for some of the early departing subscribers to get out of the hall on, but except when the audience thus took part, the music was not greatly unlike a concerto of the old school for violoncello. The fantastic variations, op. 35, were presented like any other work in the variation form; and the subject treated in them was the abstract conflict of idealism and realism, with pictures of woful knight, sorry nag and ponderous squire, left out. If any listeners protest that they heard sheep bleat and the wind whistle, they must remember that modern composers are what Samuel Johnson found the Greeks to be, a barbarous people. Let them not suppose that the charm of this work is in any literary quality or that the hearing of Strauss will do them instead of reading Cervantes. The pleasure of it is in the purely musical handling of the theme by solo instrument and orchestra, in the contrast of colors, in the shading and in the recurring rhythm of serious and humorous moments, all of which would be there in just about the same proportions and in the same sequence, had Strauss taken any other hero of romance or any other subject whatever for his focus of contemplation.

The "Hungarian" concerto of Joachim was just the kind of composition for a concertmaster to present. It is an interesting historic document, an attractive [illegible] problem for the violin scholar, an invigorating study for an audience. It is a rather dreary work in the first half and a highly pleasing one in the last half. Keeping up appearances as a composer of first movements was a litle too much for Joachim here; and cutting a figure as a master of orchestration, altogether too much. He was more in his element as a serenader or when singing the songs of the road. The romance and the finale in gypsy style are the vital portions of his work.

Mr. Witek did not let his solo responsibility interfere with his routine duties of the day in the orchestra. He gave a masterful performance of the concerto and justified anew his important position as leader of the Symphony violins. And while the matter of soloists is up, the playing of Mr. Warnke as violoncellist in the Strauss variations deserves the warmest praise. That of Mr. Ferir as solo viola player in that number, less exacting, was of the artist's usual excellence

---

Bulletin

[illegible]

ess

FEB 9 - 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS FOURTH IN CONCERT SERIES

Kathleen Howard, Former Leading Contralto of Century Opera Company, Makes First Appearance Here as Soloist. — Dr. Muck Conducts.

In its fourth concert of the present season last evening in Infantry Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, introduced a soloist new to these Plantations, and presented a programme pleasing to the audience. The soloist was Miss Kathleen Howard, lately leading contralto of the erstwhile Century Opera Company, and the programme, which had a fine flavor of an earlier generation, was given in the following order:

Mozart........Symphony, E-flat major (K. 543)
  I. Adagio; Allegro
  II. Andante
  III. Minuetto; Trio
  IV. Finale; Allegro
Wagner....................Scene, "Just God"
And aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from "Rienzi," Act. III., No. 9.
Handel...................Concerto in F-major
For Strings and Two Wind Orchestras.
(Edition of Gustav F. Kogel).
  I. Pomposo
  II Allegro
  III. A tempo ordinario
  IV. Largo
  V. Allegro
Saint-Saens...."My Heart at Thy Dear Voice" From "Samson and Delilah."
Dvorak..Dramatic overture, "Husitska," op. 67

Last evening was not by any means an idle one for the orchestra; the three numbers devoted exclusively to that body employing its attention and skill to a marked degree, the soloist also requiring its assistance in her two alternating numbers.

The programme opened cheerfully with Mozart's Symphony in E-flat, and to the imagination that wandered into the past there was food for thought. Such a performance of a symphony, a century and a quarter after its composition for a smaller body of players, must compel admiration, both for the vitality of the music, and the skill able to direct an orchestra of such proportion in the production of its various movements that nothing be lost of the delicate beauty of its structure.

CHARM MARKS WORK.

The graceful adagio, the measured andante, the melodious minuetto familiar to "household pianists" and the fanciful finale with its carnival spirit were all given with the charm that is expected of the Boston orchestra; especial bits, like the trio dominated by the clarinets in the minuetto, still clinging to the memory.

Of still more ancient lineage is the concerto by Handel, which in its present arrangement by Kogel for strings and two wind choirs, was first performed in Boston less than a decade ago. It is a composition characteristic of the Prussian composer, interesting, varied, and as given last evening, singularly beautiful in tone, and at times exceedingly suggestive of organ harmonies. After all, there is still much to be enjoyed even by ears attuned to the bewildering compositions of the present, in the solid, substantial fundamental music of the past.

Preceding and following the concerto came two solos by Miss Howard, who created an agreeable impression with her scene and aria, from "Rienzi," which deepened with her second appearance in the solo, "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice" from "Samson and Delilah," by Saint-Saens.

EDUCATED HERE.

Miss Howard, a Canadian by birth, who has received most of her education in this country, and won wide experience in Germany and London, has a pleasing personality without affectation. Her voice, a rich contralto, with a surprising command of altitude, seemed a bit uneven in quality, but of much beauty in many respects, and her performance was exceedingly artistic, although the force of the orchestra came near to overshadowing it once or twice. She won the recognition dear to every artist, the applause recalling her to the stage several times.

The climax was reached in the final number, Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," which was a brilliant performance of the martial amplification of the Hussite hymn, taxing to the utmost the energies of conductor and orchestra alike, and stimulating the aroused imagination to suggestions of the future instead of the past. It did not require the programme to interpret its melancholy or its fanticism, while viewed from the musical standpoint only it was a masterly performance.

The enjoyment of the concert was enhanced by the installation of the new lights, a change which has been in process following a criticism in the Journal and executed since the previous Symphony concert. Further plans for the use of lower-powered lights will, when carried out, increase the appreciation expressed by several in the audience last evening.

The fifth concert in the series will be given on Tuesday evening, March 7, when the soloist will be Ernest Schelling, pianist.

A. W. C.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

E 1884

From

Address

Date [illegible] 1916

Three Great Numbers in Boston Symphony Programme.

The fourth and last but one of the concerts given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music, under institute auspices, on Friday evening next, at 8:15 o'clock. The programme, arranged by Dr. Muck, has two points of great interest, in Joachim's Concerto in D. Major for Violin and Orchestra (in the Hungarian style) and Schumann's Symphony in B Flat Major, No. 1. Joachim's great concerto seldom appears on modern programmes, as there are few artists who will undertake and are able to overcome the stupendous difficulties in this work. One of the few virtuosi able to do this is Anton Witek, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; he recently played it in Boston with success. Joachim seems to have deliberately piled difficulty upon difficulty, but when played by Witek, it sounds comparatively simple. The B Flat Symphony of Schumann is known as the "Spring" Symphony, but it might well have been called the "Bridal" Symphony, for Schumann wrote it after winning as his bride, Clara Wieck. It is the one symphony of the four which Schumann wrote in which the composer was unusually happy with his treatment of the orchestra. With the other three Schumann symphonies it is a fair criticism that they are pianistic instead of orchestral, for they sound quite as well in an arrangement for four hands, if indeed they do not sound better so than when played by an orchestra. But in the B Flat Major Symphony, Schumann has written a clear, lucid score and the music simply bubbles with the joy and happiness of the composer. The programme includes the Beethoven overture, "Leonora" No. 1, Opus 138.

STANDARD UNION

Brooklyn, N. Y.

FEB 14 1916

fourth and last but one of the rts given each season by the n Symphony Orchestra will take in the Academy of Music next y evening, Feb. 18. The pro- ne which Dr. Muck has ar- d presents two points of great st. These are Joachim's con- in D major for violin and or- a (in the Hungarian style) and ann's symphony in B flat major, No. 1. Joachim's great concerto seldom appears on modern programmes for as skilled as the violin virtuoso is to-day, which is saying much, there are few artists who will undertake and are able to overcome the stupendous difficulties which Joachim has placed in this work. One of the few virtuosi able to do this is Anton Witek, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and he has just played it in Boston with remarkable success. In writing this concerto Joachim seems deliberately to have piled difficulty upon difficulty and, although when played by Witek, it sounds comparatively simple, only a master of his instrument dare undertake it. The B flat symphony of Schumann is popularly known as the "Spring" symphony. It might well be called the "Bridal" symphony, for Schumann wrote it in the first flush of success in winning, after many difficulties, as his bride, Clara Wieck. It is the one symphony of the four which Schumann wrote in which the composer was unusually happy with his treatment of the orchestra. With the other three Schumann symphonies it is a fair criticism that they are pianistic instead of orchestral, for they sound quite as well in an arrangement for four hands, if, indeed, they do not sound better so than when played by an orchestra. But in the B flat major symphony Schumann has written a clear, lucid score, and the music simply bubbles with the joy and happiness of the composer.

From TRIBUNE
Address: P

Date____

Established

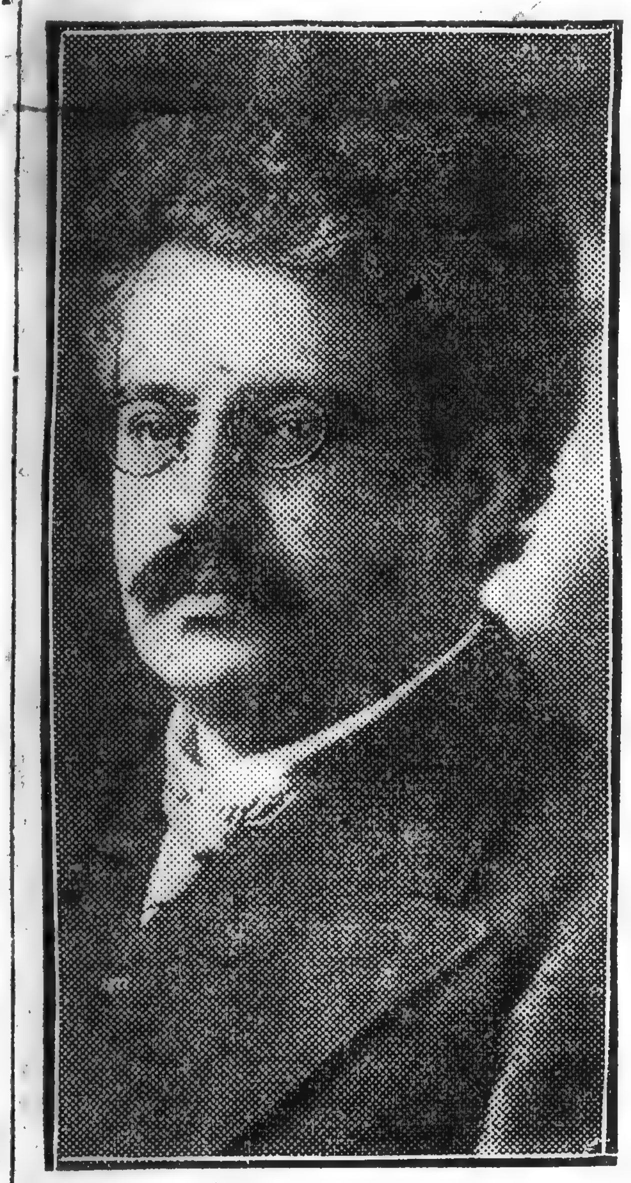
From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date FEB 1 3 1916

Establ

WITEK AS SOLOIST IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

THE fourth and last but one of the concerts given each season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Lyric next Wednesday



ANTON VITEK,
Soloist, Boston Symphony.

evening, February 16, at 8.15 o'clock. The program which Dr. Muck has arranged presents two points of particular interest. These are Joachim's Concerto in D Major for violin and orchestra, entitled "In the Hungarian Style," and Liszt's first symphonic poem, "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne."

Joachim's great concerto seldom appears on modern programs, for as skilled as the violin virtuoso is today—which is saying much—there are few artists who will undertake and are able to overcome the stupendous difficulties which Joachim has placed in this work. One of the few virtuosi able to do this is Antom Witek, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and he has just played it in Boston with remarkable success. In writing this concerto Joachim seems deliberately to have piled difficulty upon difficulty, and although when played by Witek it sounds comparatively simply; only a master of his instrument dare undertake it.

To Dr. Muck falls the credit of reviving in this country what in many respects is the most remarkable of the series of symphonic poems by which Liszt practically revolutionized the music of his day and of the days t followed him. Until Dr. Muck pla it in Boston three weeks ago the o performance in America on record in New York by the Philharmonic city under Bergmann in 1869. It astonishing and speaks well for Lis genius that, although this poem conceived in 1833 and actually playe 1847, it is more modern in thou and feeling than much of the m that is made today. Moreover, liste to it the auditor familiar with mod literature of music is not unlike youth who said he liked to go to Sha peare's plays because they were so of familiar quotations. Liszt's so law, Wagner, dipped most deeply this work as he did into many of Lis other works for material for his m dramas. Richard Strauss was fami with it and had it decidedly in his mind when he wrote the finale of his "Zarathustra." It is interesting to see how closely Strauss followed Liszt in ending his great tone poem. "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne" contains much of Liszt's best and most characteristic writing, and undoubtedly Dr. Muck's very successfuul revival of it means new life to the poem. The program in its proper order is as follows:

Overture—"Leonora" No. 1, Opus 138, Beethoven
Concerto in D Major, Opus 11 (in the Hungarian style)............Joachim
"Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne" ("What one hears upon the mountain"), Symphonic Poem No. 1 (after Victor Hugo)............Liszt

---

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date FEB 1 3 1916

Establ 884

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The fourth and last but one of the concerts given each season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, February 16, at 8:15. The program which Dr. Muck has arranged presents at least two points of surpassing interest. These are Joachim's Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra, entitled In the Hungarian Style, and Liszt's first symphonic poem, Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne.

Joachim's great concerto seldom appears on modern programs, for as skilled as the violin virtuoso is today—which is saying much—there are few artists who will undertake and are able to overcome the stupendous difficulties which Joachim has placed in this work.

Beethoven—Overture, Leonora No. Opus 138. Joachim—Concerto in [illegible] Opus 11 (In the Hungarian

---

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Establisl

* *

The way in which, with the best disposition in the world to be fair, people will sometimes jump to an erroneous conclusion, was illustrated at the concert of the Boston Symphony under Doctor Muck, when Melba was the soloist. Many persons took it for granted that Doctor Muck intended a deliberate affront to the soloist when the applause was longdrawn and the conductor signaled to a 'cellist and sat down in the promptly vacated chair. As a matter of fact, Doctor Muck was barely able to appear at all on the evening in question. He was coming down with an attack of the grip, and his temperature was 100. Subsequently he had to surrender the baton to other hands at a Brooklyn concert, and for five days had to remain in bed. Doctor Muck and the soloist, to whom he was supposed to have been rude, are the best of friends, and on the occasion of the Boston concerts, when she was soloist, they were to have been the dinner guests together of Mrs. "Jack" Gardner, but Doctor Muck's illness prevented his attendance.

* * *

The fourth and last but one of the Boston Symphony series takes place in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, at 8:15. Doctor Muck has divided the program between the ultra-moderns and the best of the eighteenth century; in other words, the first half of the program is devoted to works by Debussy and Schelling, while the last half of the program is given to Mozart's symphony in E flat major, K. 543.

Debussy will be represented by his symphonic sketches entitled "The Sea." These sketches, which are three in number, entitled, respectively, "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of the Waves" "and "Dialogues of the Wind and the Sea," are just 10 years old, having had their first performance at a Lamoureaux concert in Paris, October 15, 1905. Doctor Muck gave the first performance of these sketches in America at a Boston Symphony Concert, in Boston, March 2 and 3, 1907.

The novelty of the concert will be Ernest Schelling's variations for orchestra and piano which had its first performances in Boston December 31 and January 1 last. The title is "Impressions from an Artist's Life," in the form or variations on an original theme, for orchestra and pianoforts. Mr. Schelling, whose ties in Philadelphia are very close and whose talent has long been recognized here, in this work shows himself as a composer of extraordinary skill and fancy. He uses a theme which may be regarded as exotic in character and on this he has built 21 variations of widely different forms. Most of these variations are dedicated to various persons. The first two are dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the second to Doctor Muck. The fourth is in commemoration of Pfitzner, Schelling's teacher in composition. the seventh, an oboe solo, is dedicated to Georges Longy, first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. the eighth to Pavlowa, the ninth to Paderewski, the remaining ones to Gustav Mahler, Fritz Kreisler and others. One of the most impressive of the variations is entitled "August, 1914," and depicts the Mr. Schelling will play the piano

---

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Established: Lon

MUSIC OF THE WEEK

Sunday Afternoon.
Philadelphia Orchestra Concert—Metropolitan Opera House.

Sunday Evening.
Complimentary Concert "The Jewish World"—Metropolitan Opera House.

Monday Evening.
Boston Symphony Orchestra—Academy of Music.

Tuesday Afternoon.
Musical Talk for Young People—Little Theatre.

Tuesday Evening.
Lyric Quartet Recital—Little Theatre.
Hyperion Music School Concert—Musical Fund Hall.

Wednesday Evening.
Schmidt Quartet Concert—Witherspoon Hall.

Thursday Evening.
Edwin Evans Recital—Witherspoon Hall.
Catholic Choral Club Concert—Academy of Music.
Fabri Opera Co. Presents "The Bat"—Little Theatre.

Friday Afternoon.
Philadelphia Orchestra Concert—Academy of Music.

Saturday Evening.
Philadelphia Orchestra Concert—Academy of Music.

The fourth and last but one of the series of concerts given here each season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, February 14. Dr. Muck has divided the program between the ultra-moderns and the best of the eighteenth century. In other words, the first half of the program is devoted to works by Debussy and Schelling, while the last half of the program is given to Mozart's Symphony in E flat Major.

Debussy will be represented by his symphonic sketches entitled "The Sea." Dr. Muck gave the first performances of these sketches in America at a Boston symphony concert in Boston, March 2 and 3, 1907.

The novelty of the concert will be Ernest Schelling's variations for orchestra and piano, which had its first performances in Boston December 31 and January 1 last. The title is "Impressions from an artists's life, in the form of variations on an original theme for orchestra and pianoforte." Mr. Schelling, whose ties in Philadelphia are very close and whose talent has long been recognised here, in this work shows himself as a composer of extraordinary skill and fancy. He uses a theme which may be regarded as exotic in character, and on this he has built twenty-one variations of widely different forms. Most of these variations are dedicated to various persons. The first two are dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the second to Dr. Muck. The fourth is in commemoration of Pfitner, Schelling's teacher in composition; the seventh, an oboe solo, is dedicated to Georges Longy, first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the eighth to Pavlowa, the ninth to Paderewski and others to Gustav Mahler, Fritz Kreisler, etc. Mr. Schelling will play his own compositions.

---

The program in its proper order is as follows:—

Debussy.."La Mer." Three Symphonic Sketches
Schelling,
Impressions (from an "Artist's Life") in Form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte. First time here.
Mozart....Symphony in E-flat Major (K. 543)

---

loists in This We

ERNEST SCHELLING © HILL

Ernest Schelling will be the pianist, with the Boston Symphony to-morrow evening

---

From SUN
Address: New York City

Date

Established

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FOURTH CONCERT

Dr. Muck Offers Programme That Displays Fine Resources of His Players.

The fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Carnegie Hall last night. The music offered by Dr. Muck was entirely orchestral, and while it included no novelty in scope it might be said to have comprised the extremes in programmatic selection. The works played were Debussy's three symphonic sketches, "La Mer," Strauss's tone poem "Don Quixote" and Haydn's E flat major symphony.

In the performance of Debussy's sea pieces unusual opportunity was afforded the orchestra to display both as a united body and as individual solo players its splendid resources in producing almost every imaginable tint in the realm of tone color. Tone pictures, as the poems no doubt are of the sea in its ever changing phases, from the darkness and calm of the fading night through the light of dawn and into the glory of a shining day over which there in time comes and passes the tumult of possible storm and the wind, they were one by one presented to the listener last night with an orchestral skill which was for the most part amazing. Possibly it could be said that the delivery lacked something of that illusiveness in subtle atmosphere characterizing Debussy's music, but even so there remained plenty with which delight was afforded in the superb showing of tonal art and the sentiment with which the composition was played.

The "Don Quixote" of Strauss, which consists of an introduction and theme "of knightly character" and ten "fantastic variations," with a finale is a long composition, through the mazes and intricacies of which Dr. Muck is wont to lead his orchestra with master hand. Artistic discretion in the employment of the splendors of tonal colors, fine balance and remarkable shading, all of which means he has so opulently at command, are features united in full measure in his handling of the great difficulties presented by the score. Last night, the cello solo in the number

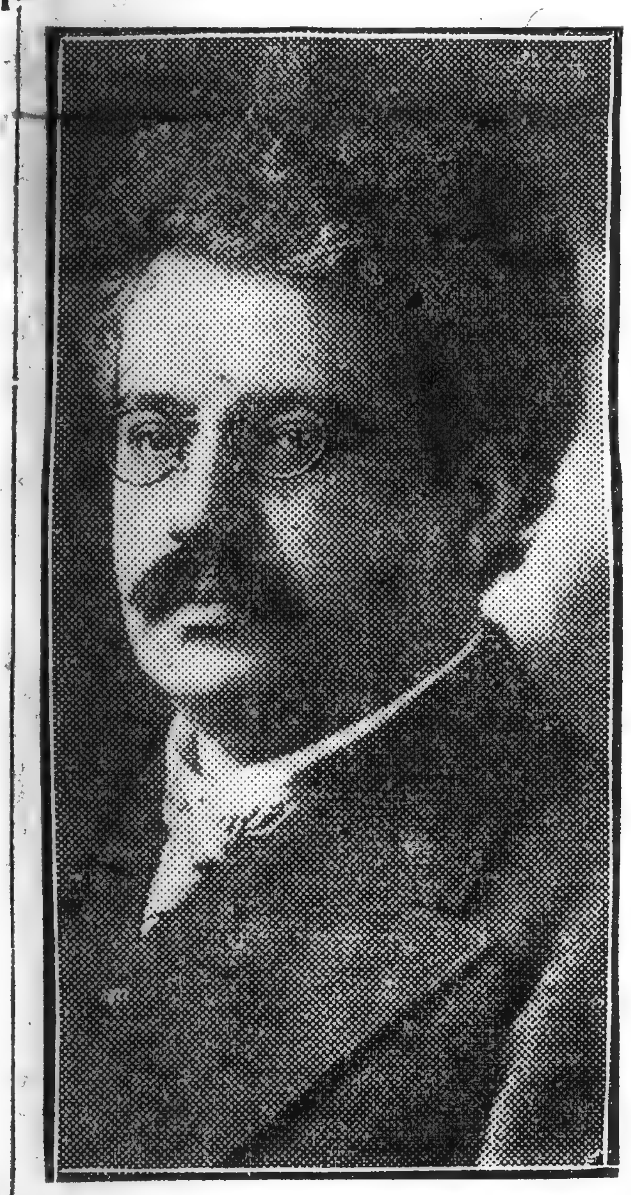
From TRIBUNE
Address: P
Date

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date FEB 1 3 1916

Established

WITEK AS SOLOIST IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

THE fourth and last but one of the concerts given each season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Lyric next Wednesday evening, February 16, at 8.15 o'clock. The program which Dr. Muck has arranged presents two points of particular interest. These are Joachim's Concerto in D Major for violin and orchestra, entitled "In the Hungarian Style," and Liszt's first symphonic poem, "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne."



ANTON VITEK,
Soloist, Boston Symphony.

Joachim's great concerto seldom appears on modern programs, for as skilled as the violin virtuoso is today—which is saying much—there are few artists who will undertake and are able to overcome the stupendous difficulties which Joachim has placed in this work. One of the few virtuosi able to do this is Antom Witek, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and he has just played it in Boston with remarkable success. In writing this concerto Joachim seems deliberately to have piled difficulty upon difficulty, and although when played by Witek it sounds comparatively simply; only a master of his instrument dare undertake it.

To Dr. Muck falls the credit of reviving in this country what in many respects is the most remarkable of the series of symphonic poems by which Liszt practically revolutionized the music of his day and of the days that followed him. Until Dr. Muck played it in Boston three weeks ago the only performance in America on record was in New York by the Philharmonic Socity under Bergmann in 1869. It is astonishing and speaks well for Liszt's genius that, although this poem was conceived in 1833 and actually played in 1847, it is more modern in thought and feeling than much of the music that is made today. Moreover, listening to it the auditor familiar with modern literature of music is not unlike the youth who said he liked to go to Shakespeare's plays because they were so full of familiar quotations. Liszt's son-in-law, Wagner, dipped most deeply into this work as he did into many of Liszt's other works for material for his music dramas. Richard Strauss was familiar with it and had it decidedly in his mind when he wrote the finale of his "Zarathustra." It is interesting to see how closely Strauss followed Liszt in ending his great tone poem. "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne" contains much of Liszt's best and most characteristic writing, and undoubtedly Dr. Muck's very successfuul revival of it means new life to the poem. The program in its proper order is as follows:

Overture—"Leonora" No. 1, Opus 138, Beethoven
Concerto in D Major, Opus 11 (in the Hungarian style)............Joachim
"Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne" ("What one hears upon the mountain"), Symphonic Poem No. 1 (after Victor Hugo)............Liszt

---

N
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date FEB 1 3 1916

Establ 884

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The fourth and last but one of the concerts given each season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, February 16, at 8:15. The program which Dr. Muck has arranged presents at least two points of surpassing interest. These are Joachim's Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra, entitled In the Hungarian Style, and Liszt's first symphonic poem, Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne.

Joachim's great concerto seldom appears on modern programs, for as skilled as the violin virtuoso is today—which is saying much—there are few artists who will undertake and are able to overcome the stupendous difficulties which Joachim has placed in this work.

Beethoven—Overture, Leonora No. Opus 138. Joachim—Concerto in [illegible] Opus 11 (In the Hungarian

---

PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

* *

The way in which, with the best disposition in the world to be fair, people will sometimes jump to an erroneous conclusion, was illustrated at the concert of the Boston Symphony under Doctor Muck, when Melba was the soloist. Many persons took it for granted that Doctor Muck intended a deliberate affront to the soloist when the applause was long-drawn and the conductor signaled to a 'cellist and sat down in the promptly vacated chair. As a matter of fact, Doctor Muck was barely able to appear at all on the evening in question. He was coming down with an attack of the grip, and his temperature was 100. Subsequently he had to surrender the baton to other hands at a Brooklyn concert, and for five days had to remain in bed. Doctor Muck and the soloist, to whom he was supposed to have been rude, are the best of friends, and on the occasion of the Boston concerts, when she was soloist, they were to have been the dinner guests together of Mrs. "Jack" Gardner, but Doctor Muck's illness prevented his attendance.

* * *

The fourth and last but one of the Boston Symphony series takes place in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, at 8:15. Doctor Muck has divided the program between the ultra-moderns and the best of the eighteenth century; in other words, the first half of the program is devoted to works by Debussy and Schelling, while the last half of the program is given to Mozart's symphony in E flat major, K. 543.

Debussy will be represented by his symphonic sketches entitled "The Sea." These sketches, which are three in number, entitled, respectively, "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of the Waves" "and "Dialogues of the Wind and the Sea," are just 10 years old, having had their first performance at a Lamoureaux concert in Paris, October 15, 1905. Doctor Muck gave the first performance of these sketches in America at a Boston Symphony Concert, in Boston, March 2 and 3, 1907.

The novelty of the concert will be Ernest Schelling's variations for orchestra and piano which had its first performances in Boston December 31 and January 1 last. The title is "Impressions from an Artist's Life," in the form of variations on an original theme, for orchestra and pianoforts. Mr. Schelling, whose ties in Philadelphia are very close and whose talent has long been recognized here, in this work shows himself as a composer of extraordinary skill and fancy. He uses a theme which may be regarded as exotic in character and on this he has built 21 variations of widely different forms. Most of these variations are dedicated to various persons. The first two are dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the second to Doctor Muck. The fourth is in commemoration of Pfitzner, Schelling's teacher in composition. the seventh, an oboe solo, is dedicated to Georges Longy, first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. the eighth to Pavlowa, the ninth to Paderewski, the remaining ones to Gustav Mahler, Fritz Kreisler and others. One of the most impressive of the variations is entitled "August, 1914," and depicts the war. Mr. Schelling will play the piano score.

---

delphia, Pa.

ished: Lon

MUSIC OF THE WEEK

Sunday Afternoon.
Philadelphia Orchestra Concert—Metropolitan Opera House.

Sunday Evening.
Complimentary Concert "The Jewish World"—Metropolitan Opera House.

Monday Evening.
Boston Symphony Orchestra—Academy of Music.

Tuesday Afternoon.
Musical Talk for Young People—Little Theatre.

Tuesday Evening.
Lyric Quartet Recital—Little Theatre.
Hyperion Music School Concert—Musical Fund Hall.

Wednesday Evening.
Schmidt Quartet Concert—Witherspoon Hall.

Thursday Evening.
Edwin Evans Recital—Witherspoon Hall.
Catholic Choral Club Concert—Academy of Music.
Fabri Opera Co. Presents "The Bat"—Little Theatre.

Friday Afternoon.
Philadelphia Orchestra Concert—Academy of Music.

Saturday Evening.
Philadelphia Orchestra Concert—Academy of Music.

The fourth and last but one of the series of concerts given here each season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, February 14. Dr. Muck has divided the program between the ultra-moderns and the best of the eighteenth century. In other words, the first half of the program is devoted to works by Debussy and Schelling, while the last half of the program is given to Mozart's Symphony in E flat Major.

Debussy will be represented by his symphonic sketches entitled "The Sea." Dr. Muck gave the first performances of these sketches in America at a Boston symphony concert in Boston, March 2 and 3, 1907.

The novelty of the concert will be Ernest Schelling's variations for orchestra and piano, which had its first performances in Boston December 31 and January 1 last. The title is "Impressions from an artists's life, in the form of variations on an original theme for orchestra and pianoforte." Mr. Schelling, whose ties in Philadelphia are very close and whose talent has long been recognised here, in this work shows himself as a composer of extraordinary skill and fancy. He uses a theme which may be regarded as exotic in character, and on this he has built twenty-one variations of widely different forms. Most of these variations are dedicated to various persons. The first two are dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the second to Dr. Muck. The fourth is in commemoration of Pfitner, Schelling's teacher in composition; the seventh, an oboe solo, is dedicated to Georges Longy, first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the eighth to Pavlowa, the ninth to Paderewski and others to Gustav Mahler, Fritz Kreisler, etc. Mr. Schelling will play his own compositions.

---

The program in its proper order is as follows:—

Debussy.."La Mer," Three Symphonic Sketches
Schelling,
Impressions (from an "Artist's Life") in Form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte. First time here.
Mozart....Symphony in E-flat Major (K. 543)

---

loists in This We

ERNEST SCHELLING © HILL

Ernest Schelling will be the pianist, with the Boston Symphony to-morrow evening

---

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date

Established

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FOURTH CONCERT

Dr. Muck Offers Programme That Displays Fine Resources of His Players.

The fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Carnegie Hall last night. The music offered by Dr. Muck was entirely orchestral, and while it included no novelty in scope it might be said to have comprised the extremes in programmatic selection. The works played were Debussy's three symphonic sketches, "La Mer," Strauss's tone poem "Don Quixote" and Haydn's E flat major symphony.

In the performance of Debussy's sea pieces unusual opportunity was afforded the orchestra to display both as a united body and as individual solo players its splendid resources in producing almost every imaginable tint in the realm of tone color. Tone pictures, as the poems no doubt are of the sea in its ever changing phases, from the darkness and calm of the fading night through the light of dawn and into the glory of a shining day over which there in time comes and passes the tumult of possible storm and the wind, they were one by one presented to the listener last night with an orchestral skill which was for the most part amazing. Possibly it could be said that the delivery lacked something of that illusiveness in subtle atmosphere characterizing Debussy's music, but even so there remained plenty with which delight was afforded in the superb showing of tonal art and the sentiment with which the composition was played.

The "Don Quixote" of Strauss, which consists of an introduction and theme "of knightly character" and ten "fantastic variations," with a finale is a long composition, through the mazes and intricacies of which Dr. Muck is wont to lead his orchestra with master hand. Artistic discretion in the employment of the splendors of tonal colors, fine balance and remarkable shading, all of which means he has so opulently at command, are features united in full measure in his handling of the great difficulties presented by the score. Last night, the cello solo in the number was

[99]

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date FEB 15 1916

Estab

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND SCHELLING HERE

Fourth Concert Brings Paderewski to Hear Pupil Play Own Composition

PROGRAM.

"La Mer," three symphonic sketches..Debussy
Impressions from an Artist's Life....Schelling
Symphony, E flat major..............Mozart

The least satisfactory portion of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Doctor Muck, at the Academy last evening, was the series of three symphonic sketches by Debussy, tone-poems grouped under the title of "The Sea," which opened the program. Assuredly, there was "the sea's chime made audible" in the music; one was conscious of sun-kissed and moon-blanched spaces of water, heaving or tranquil, the Homeric, "innumerable laughter" of the waves, or their fiercer argument when tempest-roiled.

But one was too conscious of the virtuosity of the players and the preciosity of the composer. One longed to find an idea carried a distance, whether anything great was done with it or not. The work was played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Mr. Pohlig, in January, 1911, for the first time in Philadelphia, and its merits were made salient in the interpretation at that time.

But last night it seemed of rather a thin, pale substance as compared with the close-woven texture of the highly interesting Impressions by Mr. Schelling, and the great symphony of Mozart that balanced the modernity of the fore part of the program.

Paderewski was present to hear the performance of his gifted pupil, who played the piano part in his own work. The full title of Mr. Schelling's composition is "Impressions (from an artist's life) in Form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte."

It was played for the first time here. The composer explains that while writing it he thought in terms of the timbre of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Therefore it is not surpising to find him labeling the first of the 19 variations with the initials "B. S. O." The second, "K. M.," is obviously for Karl Muck; and so on.

The soul of Mr. Paderewski must have swelled within him at the ninth, wearing the caption "I. J. P.," a dirge of mournful sweep for the strings alone which speaks for the woe of Poland. Notable were the oboe solo of the seventh; the Habanera Aragonese with all the swingeing rhythm of the dagger-dance that (save the mark!) was the best thing in Herbert's "Natoma"; the lit of the sod of Old Erin in the tenth variation; the beautiful viola-voice of Emil Ferir in the sixteenth; the gathering storm-cloud till the air is surcharged with the turmoil of "August, 1914," in the seventeenth; and the magnificent blare at last of the Lutheran Choral, as true to type as the playing of those full-blown amateur trombones in the belfry at the Bach festivals in Bethlehem.

Mr. Schelling set forth at the keyboard moods and tenses of the mind of a poet at the piano. The instrument stood at the left, as the audience faced the orchestra, so that the "soloists," to use the term which should be carefully qualified in this instance, was brought nearly abreast of the rear row of the first violins, instead of close to the dais and Doctor Muck's directing arm, as would have been the case if the piano had been set down in its usual place on the right of the audience.

This meant that the pianist in a peculiar degree became one among many instead of one out of many. He built his participation into the ensemble; he played and he listened to his colleagues. When he was not actually performing, he sat evidently thinking of his associates and partly facing them.

The audience meant to him simply a unified receptivity, not potential admiration and acclaim. The element of personal displayed vanished utterly.

That is part of the reason why the strong, vital, melodious music, calling upon the full technical resources and the mentality of the interpreters, pleased the hearers so thoroughly. They applauded the artist to the echo; they recalled him often, while the orchestra stood.

Mr. Schelling shook hands a second time with Doctor Muck and dragged him forward; then the composer shook hands with Concertmeister Anton Witek, and still there were plaudits. It was a tribute to merit and modesty commingled—a signal recognition of a memorable achievement.

The Mozart symphony was played superbly, the first notes seeming to say that the audience might sit back and drink in the full enjoyment of the music without fear of mishap, and all that followed redeeming that promise of delight.

The finale read at a surft pace reaped more than sound and fury from the whirlwind, and rounded the conclusion of a program of incisive contrasts.

F. L. W.

From
Address
Date FEB

Establis 4

SCHELLING PLAYS HIS "VARIATIONS"

Boston Symphony Gives Fourth Concert and Soloist Presents His Own Composition.

PROGRAM.

"La Mer"—Three symphonic sketches, Debussy
Impressions (from an artist's life) in form of variations on an original theme for orchestra and piano (first time here) ....Schelling
Ernest Schelling.
Symphony in E flat major........Mozart
Conductor ...... Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist ....Ernest Schilling

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their fourth concert of the season, at the Academy of Music, last evening. It was the most important of the four in having as soloist Ernest Schelling, the pianist, and in the double capacity, also the composer. Mr. Schelling is looked upon almost as a Philadelphian, having been born in the adjoining State of New Jersey. His artistic qualities have always been recognized here, but last night more than ever before, the double side of his art making his visit of unusual importance.

The Academy was crowded with a most appreciative audience, including many notable musicians, among others the eminent Polish pianist Paderewski, who occupied a parquet box, during most of the concert, with Mme. Paderewski, and Mrs. Schelling. Paderewski was a one-time teacher of Schelling on the piano, and naturally was very much interested in his former pupil's appearance in the dual role of soloist and composer.

Schelling's Many "Impressions."

Mr. Schelling gave, for the first time in this city, his "Impressions in Form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Piano." These impressions are arranged in an unusual form, representing a variety of personality and incidents. There are twenty-one in all, the first being an impression, for wood-wind alone, of the orchestra that last evening presented his work. It would not be possible even to mention the entire list, but a few of the many subjects upon which Schelling gives musical expression, are Dr. Karl Muck, the Flonzaley Quartet, Paderewski, Gustave Mahler, Fritz Kreisler, and from personalities he wanders away into martial music of the present European conflict, ending with a hymnus dated Wartburg, 1915.

The composition does not give the pianist any striking opportunity for the display of his great breadth as a pianist, and in only a few of the impressions does the soloist make his instrument stand out above the orchestration. It is, as a whole, really a greater effort on the part of Schelling, the composer, than Schelling the pianist. He has, in each instance, however, fully met the character of his musical portrayal, and in this he is deserving of the very best of praise. It came to him, and in full measure, when he had finished. He was recalled time and again. Three times he shook the hand of the conductor in token of his own appreciation, to which the audience fully agreed, and finally he requested the orchestra to stand and share with him the triumph of which they were so important a part.

The opening number was Claude Debussy's "La Mer," a symphonic composition, arranged in three sections, descriptive of a morning at sea, the frolic of the waves, and the combined dialogue of wind and sea. It is modern in its construction, and was admirably presented by Dr. Muck and his men.

The Mozart Symphony.

The best work of the orchestra, however, was in the final number, Mozart's Symphony in E flat major. The E flat is the most popular of Moztra's big works, next to his "Jupiter." Its presentation last evening was with that same finish and elegance of style, that is characteristic of Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony. In fact, in its great breadth of harmony, musical finesse, and everything that tends to perfect orchestra playing, nothing more satisfying has ever been heard here. Last evening's concert had the stamp of greatness in every part of it, and it will long remain in the memory of those who were fortunate enough to be present.

◆

ORCHESTRA'S FINAL

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

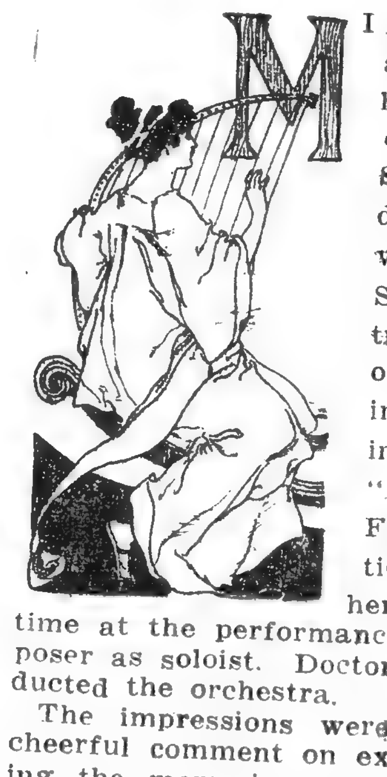
Date

Establisl

SCHELLING IS SOLOIST WITH BOSTON PLAYERS

Pianist Scores a Triumph in His 'Impressions in Form of Variations'

MANY EVENTS ECHOED



MINGLING melody and technique in his interpretation of life, Ernest Schelling scored a distinct triumph with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening. Mr. Schelling's composition, "Impressions in Form of Variations," was heard here for the first time at the performance, with the composer as soloist. Doctor Carl Muck conducted the orchestra.

The impressions were Mr. Schelling's cheerful comment on existence, embodying the memories of a lifetime of experience. In them were spun the echoes of other musicians, events and places. Beginning with the original theme, in G sharp minor, reminiscent of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the variations number nineteen, and close with a Lutheran Choral, dated Wartburg, 1915. The ending is conventional, with the full deluge of orchestral sound.

But between are movements so fragile as to elude description, and those contrastingly bold. The seventh variation for oboe solo and pianoforte, was an exquisite bit of melody and themes for full orchestra were equally good. One variation, dated August, 1914, is reminiscent of the opening of the war; but it is a philosopher's picture of war, and Schelling does not permit it to obscure the sunshine which runs through his composition.

The variations were a pleasing reaction from "La Mer," by Debussy, the preceding number. The third passage of the symphony, "Dialogue of Wind and Waves," as interpreted by Doctor Muck and his orchestra, was painful in its intensity and tragic import. Chords of the harp beat gently against the measures of the second part, "The Frolic of the Waves." The closing number was Mozart's Symphony in E flat.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Establishe

SCHELLING VARIATIONS

Paderewski an Interested Auditor When His Pupil Plays.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in the Academy of Music last night, was distinguished by a first performance in this city of a set of variations on an original theme called "Impressions," by the American pianist and composer, Ernest Schelling. The variations consist of 19 separate sketches, supposed to represent persons, places and impressions. The composer has given each variation an annotation in the form of initials and sometimes a word, that suggests the idea prominent in his mind when developing his theme. As, for instance, the variation for string quartet and horn solo, inscribed to the Flonzaleys; the one for full orchestra to Gustave Mahler; the ninth for strings alone, a Polska, followed by the initials I. J. P., which even the novice in matters musical would connect with the famous Polish pianist, Ignace Jan Paderewski, who, by the way, occupied a box and was an interested observer of Schelling's reception. It will be remembered that Schelling was for some time a pupil of the great Pole, and reflects in his beautiful playing many of the traits of his master.

The entire set of variations is full of originality, color and cohesion, and displays an astonishing acquaintance with the various orchestral instruments and their possibilities, as well as their limitations. A few were omitted, but the most distinctive were done. The piano part played by Schelling is not as conspicuous as might have been expected coming from a pianist. The piano is utilized more as an instrument of the orchestra, becoming slightly ornamental at times, but for the most part playing the role of a leading instrument. The audience was demonstrative, compelling Schelling to appear repeatedly and applauding until all the men in the orchestra had risen and the first violinist, violaist, etc., who did solo parts, were singled out for individual attention. Schelling's work is so delightfully original, both in conception and treatment, so striking in its rhythmic fidelity, and so altogether worthwhile, that it deserves the highest praise and was entitled to every bit of applause and more than was bestowed.

The Debussy sea pictures, "La Mer," were wonderfully done by the orchestra, while the Mozart E Flat Major Symphony brought the keenest delig

From TRIBUNE
Address

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in

Date

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, P

Date

Establis

MUSIC AT THE AC

Composition by Schelling F
Boston Orchestra's Programme

The feature of the programme presented last evening at the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra before the large audience which its appearance never fails to attract was a set of variations by Ernest Schelling, who might almost be called a son of Philadelphia, of such long standing and so intimate have his relations with this city been. To these variations, which are for the orchestra and piano, the composer has given the name of "Impressions From an Artist's Life" from which it will be correctly inferred that they are of a personal character and that they are predominantly devoted to the interpretation of subjective sentiment.

Variations are apt to become tiresome, but these are not open to that criticism. Thanks to the skillfulness of their construction and to the ingratiating quality of the material which they employ they easily hold the interested and unwavering attention of the intelligently appreciative listener and there is no doubt that the audience was greatly pleased. The part for the obligato instrument was admirably played, with a superb brilliancy of execution and the utmost eloquence of expression, by Mr. Schelling, who has developed into one of the great pianists of the day, and Mr. Muck supplied an elastic and illuminative accompaniment.

Other things on the list were Debussy's atmospheric and evanescent tone pictures of the sea, which are supposed to portray "From Dawn Till Noon Upon the Ocean," "Frolics of the Waves" and "Dialogue of the Wind and Sea," which sounded less exotic and extraordinary than they did when they were first heard here a few years ago, and which were played with a wonderful delicacy and finesse. The symphony which came last was the one by Mozart in E-flat, whose recent performance under Mr. Stokowski's direction concert-goers will recall. It was, of course, beautifully done, but under the circumstances probably most of those who heard it would have preferred something else.

How these frequent coincidences of choice occur remains an unsolved mystery, but it seems safe to suppose that most music lovers wish they didn't. Conductors who assume the existence of any great desire for an opportunity to compare their interpretation of familiar masterpieces with that of others, or who imagine that the public entertains any irrepressible curiosity in this connection, misconceive the fact. The next and last for the season of these concerts will take place on Monday evening, March 13.

DISCUSS "DEAD BEATS"

Internat

From Music & [illegible]
Address: New York City
FEB 5 - 1916
Date

Established: Lon

The Problem of Sympathy Programs

The feeling of dread which sensitive subscribers to the Boston Symphony Concerts experience before its distinguished conductor makes up his next "surprise" for New York has, after four years of torture, gradually given way to a calm resignation to their fate.

We are no longer in terror of what the amiable "Doctor" from Boston (and Berlin) will next prescribe for us. We will take our medicine and remember that medicine should properly be bitter. We will permit ourselves to be educated rather than entertained, even if the agonies sometimes seem beyond human endurance.

Is it a diabolical sense of humor or a complete absence of it, which induces Dr. Muck to inflict THREE symphonies of the same period on ONE helpless afternoon audience? If we are to be punished, why not keep within the (narrow) limits of international law and serve one "American" composer as the last number of the final program of the season?

We are somewhat better served by the local orchestras, but in going over the programs of three months, it seems to me that much of what "we were privileged to hear" could have been spared to us, and more important works which have not been played for a decade substituted.

We would surely not lose much if, instead of Fibich's "Evening" and Dvořak "Scherzo Capriccioso" some such neglected composer like "Vincent D'Indy" would be given a hearing. There are more important works of Sibelius than his "Die Okeaniden," for instance, his four symphonies none of which have appeared on the programs of the season.

There is also Rimsky-Korsakoff, who wrote "Schéhérazade," but who wrote other music, too, for example, "Antar" which has not been heard here in an age.

It may furthermore not be amiss to point out that Richard Strauss has written other symphonic poems besides "Don Juan," "Death and Transfiguration" and "A Hero's Life." I may point out "Thus Spake Zarathustra," "Don Quiquote," "Synphonie Domestica," everyone of which seems too fermidable a task for our conductors to tackle.

I will admit that an honest effort to accomplish more than the ordinary routine work has been attempted by Mr. Stransky, by his recent Strauss festival (if one can call it so), and by the introduction of two novelties by important contemporaneous composers.

I refer to Reger's "Variations On a Theme of Mozart" and Schoenberg's "Pelleas et Melisande." However grateful we ought to be for the effort, as the sum and substance of a season of a hundred concerts the result seems meagre.

There may be a dearth of good novelties, but there is a wealth of good old music of which we are unnecessarily deprived. How long is it since we have heard Brahm's lovely "Variations On a Theme of Haydn?" To be sure it requires a good deal of elegance of style to play this work as effectively as the Boston Orchestra did some seasons ago under Dr. Muck, but it is hardly beyond the powers of our local orchestras.

In conclusion, I may say that it would, perhaps, not be a bad thing to give a little room to Italian composers in the making up of the programs.

There is a Symphony by Martucci which was to have figured on a program of Italian music some years ago, but was replaced by Mendelsohn's "Italian" Symphony.

JEAN-CHRISTOPHE.

world

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date FEB 1 6 1916

Establi

Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter.

Für das geſtrige Abendkonzert hatte Herr Dr. Muck ein ſo vielſeitiges und reichhaltiges Programm zuſammengeſtellt, das nur ſeine erſtaunliche Elaſtizität und Jugendfriſche ſo erfolgreich durchführen konnte.

Der erſte Teil war Debuſſys dreiteilige, ſymphoniſche Dichtung „Das Meer". Jean d'Udine ſagt im Hinblick auf ſie: „Debuſſy beſitzt durch ein Wunder das gefährliche Privilegium, imſtande zu ſein, die phantaſtiſcheſten Spiele von Licht und flüſſigen Wirbelwinden zu erfaſſen. Er iſt ein Verwandter des Zauberers und Taſchenſpielers, und ſeine Kunſt beruht faſt ganz auf der Aſſoziation muſikaliſcher Gedanken, deren Beziehungen nur in einem Zuſtand von halbem Bewußtſein aufgefaßt werden können und unter der Bedingung, daß man nicht darüber nachdenkt. Es iſt eine ausſchließlich ſenſuelle Kunſt, faſt außerhalb aller Zeit liegend, die im Raume dahinflutet mit einer verwirrenden Abweſenheit von Rhythmus, eine erſtaunlich franzöſiſche Kunſt."

Kann es für einen in allen Teilen ſo vollkommenen und verfeinerten Tonkörper wie das Boſtoner Orcheſter eine verführeriſchere Aufgabe geben als die Wiedergabe dieſer impreſſioniſtiſchen Kunſt? Tatſächlich ſcheint Dr. Muck ſich bewußt zu ſein, daß kein amerikaniſches Orcheſter ſo wie das ſeine berufen iſt, die verborgenen Schätze dieſer Sybaritenkunſt aufzuſpüren. Er hat das „Meer" zum erſten Mal hier und ſeit 1907 noch zwei weitere Male in Boſton vorgeführt. Auch die geſtrige Aufführung war ein Triumph für den Dirigenten und ſeine Schaar.

Nach dieſem Ausdruck einer abgeklärten, müden, wenn man will etwas dekadenten Kultur wirkt Richard Strauß mit ſeinem „Don Quichote" kräftig, tumultuariſch, hoffnungsvoll, aber auch oft etwas trivial.

Von dieſem Werk heißt es, es reflektiere das damalige Bewußtſein des Komponiſten von der Tragi-Komödie ſeines maßloſen Ueber-Idealismus und ſeine Selbſtironie. Von dem Ueber-Idealismus ſeiner früheſten Künſtlerepoche iſt der Tonſetzer ſeitdem ſo gründlich geheilt worden, daß, wenn man ſeinem „Don Quichote" einen Anteil an der Heilung zuſchreiben wollte, man dieſe Symphonie als die erfolgreichſte Arbeit des Autors anſehen müßte.

Ueber die Aufführung ſei nur ſoviel geſagt, daß ſie eine muſikaliſche Glanzleiſtung des Boſtoner Orcheſters war, daß insbeſondere die unterhaltenden Klang- und Orcheſtrationsſpielereien, mit denen das Werk zur Zeit ſeiner Entſtehung Furore machte, mit einer verwegenen Bravour herauskamen und daß die beiden Soliſten, der Celliſt Warnke und der Bratſchiſt Férir meiſterhaft ſpielten.

Nach dieſen beiden Werken wäre Haydn's Es dur-Symphonie auch in einer weniger vollendeten Wiedergabe ſchon durch die Kontraſtwirkung ein Labſal geweſen. Sie gehört aber ebenfalls zu den ſchon früher gewürdigten Paradenummern der Boſtoner. In dem mit echt Wieneriſchen derben Humor vorgetragenen Andante trat das Geigen-Solo von Anton Witch vorteilhaft hervor. Das Ganze wurde mit fein abgewogener dynamiſcher Grade und doch großzügig, ohne alle kleinliche Schattierung geſpielt. Wir wünſchten, Herr Saint-Saens hätte zuhören können, der den Boſtonern zu ſtarke Kontraſte und zu feine Nuancen vorwarf, unter denen ſeine Dirigentenkunſt freilich nie gelitten hat.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
1916
Date

Es

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Ernest Schelling as Pianist and Composer is Feature.

It was quite an Ernest Schelling night at the Academy last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck conducting, gave the fourth concert of the present season. The appearance of Schelling as soloist with any organization is always sufficient to bring out a large audience, for he has in this city hosts of personal friends as well as artistic admirers, but last night he appeared both as virtuoso and composer, and the combination served to make him the undisputed feature of the program. Even the sight of the great Paderewski in a box with Mrs. Schelling did not serve to distract public attention from the only man who can entirely surround a grand piano.

Schelling's composition, which was given for the first time here, was a suite of variations on an original theme under the title "Impressions from an Artist's Life." It is a work full of color, redolent of Bohemian atmosphere and scored for pianoforte and orchestra with a mastery of tonal effects that raises it far above the level of mediocrity. Schelling as a composer presents a safe ground for universal admiration no matter what may be the differences of opinion regarding his over-indulgence in the sonority of the keyboard under his hands.

Dr. Muck chose for his orchestral selections the mystically beautiful Debussy suite, "The Sea," which has been heard here before—but never with more exquisite rendition of its poesy—and Mozart's E flat major symphony, which was played here too recently to make its repetition at this time altogether desirable. Yet these musicians from Boston form an organization so undoubtedly authoritative in their presentation of any work they undertake that their programs are always of interest to the music-lover if for nothing more than to give him the viewpoint of scholarly and serious interpretation and impeccable technic.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date FEB 1 6 1916

Es 1884

RUSSIAN MUSIC GIVEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Faultless Interpretation of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Work Rendered at Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conducting, yesterday at the National Theater gave a faultless interpretation of the "Antar" symphony by Rimsky-Korsakoff, the modern Russian composer.

The symphony opens with a soft slow minor movement, largo, with an oriental melody running through it, and recurring throughout the entire work. The second movement is heroic in character, full of rugged harmonies by the entire orchestra. Martial strains comprise the third movement which closes with the development of a subtle romantic melody. The largo theme reappears in the last movement and the symphony ends with an effective pianissimo.

This composition was somewhat doubtfully received by the audience, and the applause was testimony of appreciation to the gifted conductor rather than enthusiasm for the Russian composition.

The concetro in A minor by Saint-Saens was wonderfully interpreted by Joseph Malkin, 'cellist, the soloist of the afternoon. This concerto is extremely difficult and not particularly melodious. There are two main themes developing alternately with the orchestra and the 'cello. Mr. Malkin plays with a remarkable quality of tone and enthusiasm for his work. The audience was especially pleased by his artistic performance and he was warmly applauded.

Owing to the illness of one of the oboe artists, the Handel concerto, oboe, the final number, could not be played and Haydn's Symphony, No. 1, was given in its place. This was a disappointment to many in the audience who considered the lovely Handel concerto the gem of the program. The Haydn Symphony was given in the perfect style of this organization of artists and Dr. Muck was compelled to return to the stage to acknowledge the hearty plaudits, of the music lovers.

In the audience were Miss Margaret Wilson, who occupied the stage box and had as her guests Mrs. Lansing and Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Gen. and Mrs. Crozier, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mrs. A. Lisner and Mrs. Isaac T. Mann, all of whom entertained box parties; the Italian Ambassador and Countess di Cellere, Lady Spring-Rice, Chief Justice and Mrs. White, Mrs. Wesley Merritt, Mrs. Norman Williams, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, Rear Admiral Clover and Miss Clover, Rear Admiral O'Neale, Miss Patten, Mrs. Ernest Howe, Miss Wilson, Mrs. William A. Hill, the Misses Sedgeley, Miss Stanton, Miss Seibert, Mrs. Peter Goelet Gerry, Mr. and Mrs. George Eustis, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mrs. William Manning Irwin, Mrs. Francis Newlands, Mr. and Mrs. John S. Larcomb, Miss Noyes, Mrs John W. Weeks, Mrs. John W. Davidge, Miss Todd, Miss Davis, Mrs. A. P. Gardner, Dr. and Mrs. Chatard, Mr and Mrs. Walter Tuckerman and Miss Sargent.

M. J. S.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date FEB 1 6 1916

1884

Miss Margaret Wilson entertained a box party at the Boston Symphony concert at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. Her guests were Mrs. Robert Lansing, Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, Mrs. William Hitz, Miss Bones and Miss Benham. The German Ambassador was host in the adjoining box, his guests including Mme. Hauge, Mrs. Wesley Merritt and Miss Harriet Southerland. The Italian Ambassador and Countess Macchi de Cellere were guests in the box of Gen. and Mrs. William Crozier. Mrs. Peter Gerry, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mrs. William Slater and Miss Patten were among the occupants of one of the stage boxes. Mrs. James McMillan entertained a box party, with Mrs. Preston Gibson among the guests. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mr. and Mrs. Abram Lisner and Mrs. Isaac T. Mann also entertained guests in their box. Among others in the audience were the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane; Mrs. David F. Houston, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. B. Rush Wendell, Mrs. Israel Putnam, Mrs. James Harlan, Miss Laura Harlan, Mme. Ekengren, Chief Justice White, Representative and Mrs. Longworth, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, Mrs. Clarence Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. William Eaches Fendall, Mr. and Mrs. George Peabody Eustis, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Reeside, Mrs. Frederick Chapin, Miss Flora Wilson, Miss Ethel Bagley, Mrs. Carl Vrooman, Mrs. Matthew T. Scott, Mrs. Thomas H. Carter, Mrs. Robert Taylor, Mrs. Beverly Williamson, Mrs. Oscar W. Underwood, Mrs. Victor Kauffmann, Mrs. William Cline Borden, Mrs. Robert Chew, Mrs. Alexander Stewart, Miss Helen Stewart, Miss Maury, Miss Todd, Mrs. Henry Brown, Miss Frances Noyes, Miss Ruth Wilson, Admiral Clover, Miss Clover, Mrs. J. W. Weeks, Mrs. J. W. Davidge, Mrs. Peyton Russell, Mrs. Charles Hamlin, Mrs. Rollins Morse, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins and Mr. and Mrs. James Parmelee.

From TRIBUNE
Address
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in
Date

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, P
Date

MUSIC AT THE AC

Composition by Schelling F
Boston Orchestra's Programme

The feature of the programme presented last evening at the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra before the large audience which its appearance never fails to attract was a set of variations by Ernest Schelling, who might almost be called a son of Philadelphia, of such long standing and so intimate have his relations with this city been. To these variations, which are for the orchestra and piano, the composer has given the name of "Impressions From an Artist's Life" from which it will be correctly inferred that they are of a personal character and that they are predominantly devoted to the interpretation of subjective sentiment.

Variations are apt to become tiresome, but these are not open to that criticism. Thanks to the skillfulness of their construction and to the ingratiating quality of the material which they employ they easily hold the interested and unwavering attention of the intelligently appreciative listener and there is no doubt that the audience was greatly pleased. The part for the obligato instrument was admirably played, with a superb brilliancy of execution and the utmost eloquence of expression, by Mr. Schelling, who has developed into one of the great pianists of the day, and Mr. Muck supplied an elastic and illuminative accompaniment.

Other things on the list were Debussy's atmospheric and evanescent tone pictures of the sea, which are supposed to portray "From Dawn Till Noon Upon the Ocean," "Frolics of the Waves" and "Dialogue of the Wind and Sea," which sounded less exotic and extraordinary than they did when they were first heard here a few years ago, and which were played with a wonderful delicacy and finesse. The symphony which came last was the one by Mozart in E-flat, whose recent performance under Mr. Stokowski's direction concert-goers will recall. It was, of course, beautifully done, but under the circumstances probably most of those who heard it would have preferred something else.

How these frequent coincidences of choice occur remains an unsolved mystery, but it seems safe to suppose that most music lovers wish they didn't. Conductors who assume the existence of any great desire for an opportunity to compare their interpretation of familiar masterpieces with that of others, or who imagine that the public entertains any irrepressible curiosity in this connection, misconceive the fact. The next and last for the season of these concerts will take place on Monday evening, March 13.

DISCUSS "DEAD BEATS"

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Ernest Schelling as Pianist and Composer is Feature.

It was quite an Ernest Schelling night at the Academy last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck conducting, gave the fourth concert of the present season. The appearance of Schelling as soloist with any organization is always sufficient to bring out a large audience, for he has in this city hosts of personal friends as well as artistic admirers, but last night he appeared both as virtuoso and composer, and the combination served to make him the undisputed feature of the program. Even the sight of the great Paderewski in a box with Mrs. Schelling did not serve to distract public attention from the only man who can entirely surround a grand piano.

Schelling's composition, which was given for the first time here, was a suite of variations on an original theme under the title "Impressions from an Artist's Life." It is a work full of color, redolent of Bohemian atmosphere and scored for pianoforte and orchestra with a mastery of tonal effects that raises it far above the level of mediocrity. Schelling as a composer presents a safe ground for universal admiration no matter what may be the differences of opinion regarding his over-indulgence in the sonority of the keyboard under his hands.

Dr. Muck chose for his orchestral selections the mystically beautiful Debussy suite, "The Sea," which has been heard here before—but never with more exquisite rendition of its poesy—and Mozart's E flat major symphony, which was played here too recently to make its repetition at this time altogether desirable. Yet these musicians from Boston form an organization so undoubtedly authoritative in their presentation of any work they undertake that their programs are always of interest to the music-lover if for nothing more than to give him the viewpoint of scholarly and serious interpretation and impeccable technic.

From Musical America
Address: New York City
FEB 5 - 1916
Date
Established: Lon

The Problem of Sympathy Programs

The feeling of dread which sensitive subscribers to the Boston Symphony Concerts experience before its distinguished conductor makes up his next "surprise" for New York has, after four years of torture, gradually given way to a calm resignation to their fate.

We are no longer in terror of what the amiable "Doctor" from Boston (and Berlin) will next prescribe for us. We will take our medicine and remember that medicine should properly be bitter. We will permit ourselves to be educated rather than entertained, even if the agonies sometimes seem beyond human endurance.

Is it a diabolical sense of humor or a complete absence of it, which induces Dr. Muck to inflict THREE symphonies of the same period on ONE helpless afternoon audience? If we are to be punished, why not keep within the (narrow) limits of international law and serve one "American" composer as the last number of the final program of the season?

We are somewhat better served by the local orchestras, but in going over the programs of three months, it seems to me that much of what "we were privileged to hear" could have been spared to us, and more important works which have not been played for a decade substituted.

We would surely not lose much if, instead of Fibich's "Evening" and Dvořak "Scherzo Capriccioso" some such neglected composer like "Vincent D'Indy" would be given a hearing. There are more important works of Sibelius than his "Die Okeaniden," for instance, his four symphonies none of which have appeared on the programs of the season.

There is also Rimsky-Korsakoff, who wrote "Schéhérazade," but who wrote other music, too, for example, "Antar" which has not been heard here in an age.

It may furthermore not be amiss to point out that Richard Strauss has written other symphonic poems besides "Don Juan," "Death and Transfiguration" and "A Hero's Life." I may point out "Thus Spake Zarathustra," "Don Quiquote," "Synphonie Domestica," everyone of which seems too fermidable a task for our conductors to tackle.

I will admit that an honest effort to accomplish more than the ordinary routine work has been attempted by Mr. Stransky, by his recent Strauss festival (if one can call it so), and by the introduction of two novelties by important contemporaneous composers.

I refer to Reger's "Variations On a Theme of Mozart" and Schoenberg's "Pelleas et Melisande." However grateful we ought to be for the effort, as the sum and substance of a season of a hundred concerts the result seems meagre.

There may be a dearth of good novelties, but there is a wealth of good old music of which we are unnecessarily deprived. How long is it since we have heard Brahm's lovely "Variations On a Theme of Haydn?" To be sure it requires a good deal of elegance of style to play this work as effectively as the Boston Orchestra did some seasons ago under Dr. Muck, but it is hardly beyond the powers of our local orchestras.

In conclusion, I may say that it would, perhaps, not be a bad thing to give a little room to Italian composers in the making up of the programs.

There is a Symphony by Martucci which was to have figured on a program of Italian music some years ago, but was replaced by Mendelsohn's "Italian" Symphony.

JEAN-CHRISTOPHE.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

RUSSIAN MUSIC GIVEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Faultless Interpretation of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Work Rendered at Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conducting, yesterday at the National Theater gave a faultless interpretation of the "Antar" symphony by Rimsky-Korsakoff, the modern Russian composer.

The symphony opens with a soft slow minor movement, largo, with an oriental melody running through it, and recurring throughout the entire work. The second movement is heroic in character, full of rugged harmonies by the entire orchestra. Martial strains comprise the third movement which closes with the development of a subtle romantic melody. The largo theme reappears in the last movement and the symphony ends with an effective pianissimo.

This composition was somewhat doubtfully received by the audience, and the applause was testimony of appreciation to the gifted conductor rather than enthusiasm for the Russian composition.

The concetro in A minor by Saint-Saens was wonderfully interpreted by Joseph Malkin, 'cellist, the soloist of the afternoon. This concerto is extremely difficult and not particularly melodious. There are two main themes developing alternately with the orchestra and the 'cello. Mr. Malkin plays with a remarkable quality of tone and enthusiasm for his work. The audience was especially pleased by his artistic performance and he was warmly applauded.

Owing to the illness of one of the oboe artists, the Handel concerto, oboe, the final number, could not be played and Haydn's Symphony, No. 1, was given in its place. This was a disappointment to many in the audience who considered the lovely Handel concerto the gem of the program. The Haydn Symphony was given in the perfect style of this organization of artists and Dr. Muck was compelled to return to the stage to acknowledge the hearty plaudits, of the music lovers.

In the audience were Miss Margaret Wilson, who occupied the stage box and had as her guests Mrs. Lansing and Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Gen. and Mrs. Crozier, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mrs. A. Lisner and Mrs. Isaac T. Mann, all of whom entertained box parties; the Italian Ambassador and Countess di Cellere, Lady Spring-Rice, Chief Justice and Mrs. White, Mrs. Wesley Merritt, Mrs. Norman Williams, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, Rear Admiral Clover and Miss Clover, Rear Admiral O'Neale, Miss Patten, Mrs. Ernest Howe, Miss Wilson, Mrs. William A. Hill, the Misses Sedgeley, Miss Stanton, Miss Seibert, Mrs. Peter Goelet Gerry, Mr. and Mrs. George Eustis, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mrs. William Manning Irwin, Mrs. Francis Newlands, Mr. and Mrs. John S. Larcomb, Miss Noyes, Mrs John W. Weeks, Mrs. John W. Davidge, Miss Todd, Miss Davis, Mrs. A. P. Gardner, Dr. and Mrs. Chatard, Mr and Mrs. Walter Tuckerman and Miss Sargent.

M. J. S.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date
, 1884

Miss Margaret Wilson entertained a box party at the Boston Symphony concert at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. Her guests were Mrs. Robert Lansing, Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, Mrs. William Hitz, Miss Bones and Miss Benham. The German Ambassador was host in the adjoining box, his guests including Mme. Hauge, Mrs. Wesley Merritt and Miss Harriet Southerland. The Italian Ambassador and Countess Macchi de Cellere were guests in the box of Gen. and Mrs. William Crozier. Mrs. Peter Gerry, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mrs. William Slater and Miss Patten were among the occupants of one of the stage boxes. Mrs. James McMillan entertained a box party, with Mrs. Preston Gibson among the guests. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mr. and Mrs. Abram Lisner and Mrs. Isaac T. Mann also entertained guests in their box. Among others in the audience were the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane; Mrs. David F. Houston, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. B. Rush Wendell, Mrs. Israel Putnam, Mrs. James Harlan, Miss Laura Harlan, Mme. Ekengren, Chief Justice White, Representative and Mrs. Longworth, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, Mrs. Clarence Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. William Eaches Fendall, Mr. and Mrs. George Peabody Eustis, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Reeside, Mrs. Frederick Chapin, Miss Flora Wilson, Miss Ethel Bagley, Mrs. Carl Vrooman, Mrs. Matthew T. Scott, Mrs. Thomas H. Carter, Mrs. Robert Taylor, Mrs. Beverly Williamson, Mrs. Oscar W. Underwood, Mrs. Victor Kauffmann, Mrs. William Cline Borden, Mrs. Robert Chew, Mrs. Alexander Stewart, Miss Helen Stewart, Miss Maury, Miss Todd, Mrs. Henry Brown, Miss Frances Noyes, Miss Ruth Wilson, Admiral Clover, Miss Clover, Mrs. J. W. Weeks, Mrs. J. W. Davidge, Mrs. Peyton Russell, Mrs. Charles Hamlin, Mrs. Rollins Morse, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins and Mr. and Mrs. James Parmelee.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date FEB 1 0

Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter.

Für das geſtrige Abendkonzert hatte Herr Dr. Muck ein ſo vielſeitiges und reichhaltiges Programm zuſammengeſtellt, das nur ſeine erſtaunliche Elaſtizität und Jugendfriſche ſo erfolgreich durchführen konnte.

Der erſte Teil war Debuſſys dreiteilige, ſymphoniſche Dichtung „Das Meer". Jean d'Udine ſagt im Hinblick auf ſie: „Debuſſy beſitzt durch ein Wunder das gefährliche Privilegium, imſtande zu ſein, die phantaſtiſcheſten Spiele von Licht und flüſſigen Wirbelwinden zu erfaſſen. Er iſt ein Verwandter des Zauberers und Taſchenſpielers, und ſeine Kunſt beruht faſt ganz auf der Aſſoziation muſikaliſcher Gedanken, deren Beziehungen nur in einem Zuſtand von halbem Bewußtſein aufgefaßt werden können und unter der Bedingung, daß man nicht darüber nachdenkt. Es iſt eine ausſchließlich ſenſuelle Kunſt, faſt außerhalb aller Zeit liegend, die im Raume dahinflutet mit einer verwirrenden Abweſenheit von Rhythmus, eine erſtaunlich franzöſiſche Kunſt."

Kann es für einen in allen Teilen ſo vollkommenen und verfeinerten Tonkörper wie das Boſtoner Orcheſter eine verführeriſchere Aufgabe geben als die Wiedergabe dieſer impreſſioniſtiſchen Kunſt? Tatſächlich ſcheint Dr. Muck ſich bewußt zu ſein, daß kein amerikaniſches Orcheſter ſo wie das ſeine berufen iſt, die verborgenen Schätze dieſer Sybaritenkunſt aufzuſpüren. Er hat das „Meer" zum erſten Mal hier und ſeit 1907 noch zwei weitere Male in Boſton vorgeführt. Auch die geſtrige Aufführung war ein Triumph für den Dirigenten und ſeine Schaar.

Nach dieſem Ausdruck einer abgeklärten, müden, wenn man will etwas dekadenten Kultur wirkt Richard Strauß mit ſeinem „Don Quichote" kräftig, tumultuariſch, hoffnungsvoll, aber auch oft etwas trivial. Von dieſem Werk heißt es, es reflektiere das damalige Bewußtſein des Komponiſten von der Tragi-Komödie ſeines maßloſen Ueber-Idealismus und ſeine Selbſtironie. Von dem Ueber-Idealismus ſeiner früheſten Künſtlerepoche iſt der Tonſetzer ſeitdem ſo gründlich geheilt worden, daß, wenn man ſeinem „Don Quichote" einen Anteil an der Heilung zuſchreiben wollte, man dieſe Symphonie als die erfolgreichſte Arbeit des Autors anſehen müßte.

Ueber die Aufführung ſei nur ſoviel geſagt, daß ſie eine muſikaliſche Glanzleiſtung des Boſtoner Orcheſters war, daß insbeſondere die unterhaltenden Klang- und Orcheſtrationsſpielereien, mit denen das Werk zur Zeit ſeiner Entſtehung Furore machte, mit einer verwegenen Bravour herauskamen und daß die beiden Soliſten, der Celliſt Warnke und der Bratſchiſt Férir meiſterhaft ſpielten.

Nach dieſen beiden Werken wäre Haydn's Es dur-Symphonie auch in einer weniger vollendeten Wiedergabe ſchon durch die Kontraſtwirkung ein Labſal geweſen. Sie gehört aber ebenfalls zu den ſchon früher gewürdigten Paradenummern der Boſtoner. In dem mit echt Wieneriſchen derben Humor vorgetragenen Andante trat das Geigen-Solo von Anto Witch vorteilhaft hervor. Das Ganze wurde mit fein abgewogener dynamiſcher Grade und doch großzügig, ohne alle kleinliche Schattierung geſpielt. Wir wünſchten, Herr Saint-Saens hätte zuhören können, der den Boſtonern zu ſtarke Kontraſte und zu feine Nuancen vorwarf, unter denen ſeine Dirigentenkunſt freilich nie gelitten hat.

From TRIBUNE
Address

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

Date

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, P
Date FEB 5

Establis

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY

Composition by Schelling Feature of Boston Orchestra's Programme

The feature of the programme presented last evening at the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra before the large audience which its appearance never fails to attract was a set of variations by Ernest Schelling, who might almost be called a son of Philadelphia, of such long standing and so intimate have his relations with this city been. To these variations, which are for the orchestra and piano, the composer has given the name of "Impressions From an Artist's Life" from which it will be correctly inferred that they are of a personal character and that they are predominantly devoted to the interpretation of subjective sentiment.

Variations are apt to become tiresome, but these are not open to that criticism. Thanks to the skillfulness of their construction and to the ingratiating quality of the material which they employ they easily hold the interested and unwavering attention of the intelligently appreciative listener and there is no doubt that the audience was greatly pleased. The part for the obligato instrument was admirably played, with a superb brilliancy of execution and the utmost eloquence of expression, by Mr. Schelling, who has developed into one of the great pianists of the day, and Mr. Muck supplied an elastic and illuminative accompaniment.

Other things on the list were Debussy's atmospheric and evanescent tone pictures of the sea, which are supposed to portray "From Dawn Till Noon Upon the Ocean," "Frolics of the Waves" and "Dialogue of the Wind and Sea," which sounded less exotic and extraordinary than they did when they were first heard here a few years ago, and which were played with a wonderful delicacy and finesse. The symphony which came last was the one by Mozart in E-flat, whose recent performance under Mr. Stokowski's direction concert-goers will recall. It was, of course, beautifully done, but under the circumstances probably most of those who heard it would have preferred something else.

How these frequent coincidences of choice occur remains an unsolved mystery, but it seems safe to suppose that most music lovers wish they didn't. Conductors who assume the existence of any great desire for an opportunity to compare their interpretation of familiar masterpieces with that of others, or who imagine that the public entertains any irresistible curiosity in this connection, misconceive the fact. The next and last for the season of these concerts will take place on Monday evening, March 13.

DISCUSS "DEAD BEATS"

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Ernest Schelling as Pianist and Composer is Feature.

It was quite an Ernest Schelling night at the Academy last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck conducting, gave the fourth concert of the present season. The appearance of Schelling as soloist with any organization is always sufficient to bring out a large audience, for he has in this city hosts of personal friends as well as artistic admirers, but last night he appeared both as virtuoso and composer, and the combination served to make him the undisputed feature of the program. Even the sight of the great Paderewski in a box with Mrs. Schelling did not serve to distract public attention from the only man who can entirely surround a grand piano.

Schelling's composition, which was given for the first time here, was a suite of variations on an original theme under the title "Impressions from an Artist's Life." It is a work full of color, redolent of Bohemian atmosphere and scored for pianoforte and orchestra with a mastery of tonal effects that raises it far above the level of mediocrity. Schelling as a composer presents a safe ground for universal admiration no matter what may be the differences of opinion regarding his over-indulgence in the sonority of the keyboard under his hands.

Dr. Muck chose for his orchestral selections the mystically beautiful Debussy suite, "The Sea," which has been heard here before—but never with more exquisite rendition of its poesy—and Mozart's E flat major symphony, which was played here too recently to make its repetition at this time altogether desirable. Yet these musicians from Boston form an organization so undoubtedly authoritative in their presentation of any work they undertake that their programs are always of interest to the music-lover if for nothing more than to give him the viewpoint of scholarly and serious interpretation and impeccable technic.

From Music & Drama
Address: New York City
FEB 5 - 1916
Date

The Problem of Sympathy Programs

The feeling of dread which sensitive subscribers to the Boston Symphony Concerts experience before its distinguished conductor makes up his next "surprise" for New York has, after four years of torture, gradually given way to a calm resignation to their fate.

We are no longer in terror of what the amiable "Doctor" from Boston (and Berlin) will next prescribe for us. We will take our medicine and remember that medicine should properly be bitter. We will permit ourselves to be educated rather than entertained, even if the agonies sometimes seem beyond human endurance.

Is it a diabolical sense of humor or a complete absence of it, which induces Dr. Muck to inflict THREE symphonies of the same period on ONE helpless afternoon audience? If we are to be punished, why not keep within the (narrow) limits of international law and serve one "American" composer as the last number of the final program of the season?

We are somewhat better served by the local orchestras, but in going over the programs of three months, it seems to me that much of what "we were privileged to hear" could have been spared to us, and more important works which have not been played for a decade substituted.

We would surely not lose much if, instead of Fibich's "Evening" and Dvořak "Scherzo Capriccioso" some such neglected composer like "Vincent D'Indy" would be given a hearing. There are more important works of Sibelius than his "Die Okeaniden," for instance, his four symphonies none of which have appeared on the programs of the season.

There is also Rimsky-Korsakoff, who wrote "Schéhérazade," but who wrote other music, too, for example, "Antar" which has not been heard here in an age.

It may furthermore not be amiss to point out that Richard Strauss has written other symphonic poems besides "Don Juan," "Death and Transfiguration" and "A Hero's Life." I may point out "Thus Spake Zarathustra," "Don Quiquote," "Synphonie Domestica," everyone of which seems too fermidable a task for our conductors to tackle.

I will admit that an honest effort to accomplish more than the ordinary routine work has been attempted by Mr. Stransky, by his recent Strauss festival (if one can call it so), and by the introduction of two novelties by important contemporaneous composers.

I refer to Reger's "Variations On a Theme of Mozart" and Schoenberg's "Pelleas et Melisande." However grateful we ought to be for the effort, as the sum and substance of a season of a hundred concerts the result seems meagre.

There may be a dearth of good novelties, but there is a wealth of good old music of which we are unnecessarily deprived. How long is it since we have heard Brahm's lovely "Variations On a Theme of Haydn?" To be sure it requires a good deal of elegance of style to play this work as effectively as the Boston Orchestra did some seasons ago under Dr. Muck, but it is hardly beyond the powers of our local orchestras.

In conclusion, I may say that it would, perhaps, not be a bad thing to give a little room to Italian composers in the making up of the programs.

There is a Symphony by Martucci which was to have figured on a program of Italian music some years ago, but was replaced by Mendelsohn's "Italian" Symphony.

CHRISTOPHE.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date FEB 1 6 191

Es 1884

144

RUSSIAN MUSIC GIVEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Faultless Interpretation of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Work Rendered at Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conducting, yesterday at the National Theater gave a faultless interpretation of the "Antar" symphony by Rimsky-Korsakoff, the modern Russian composer.

The symphony opens with a soft slow minor movement, largo, with an oriental melody running through it, and recurring throughout the entire work. The second movement is heroic in character, full of rugged harmonies by the entire orchestra. Martial strains comprise the third movement which closes with the development of a subtle romantic melody. The largo theme reappears in the last movement and the symphony ends with an effective pianissimo.

This composition was somewhat doubtfully received by the audience, and the applause was testimony of appreciation to the gifted conductor rather than enthusiasm for the Russian composition.

The concetro in A minor by Saint-Saens was wonderfully interpreted by Joseph Malkin, 'cellist, the soloist of the afternoon. This concerto is extremely difficult and not particularly melodious. There are two main themes developing alternately with the orchestra and the 'cello. Mr. Malkin plays with a remarkable quality of tone and enthusiasm for his work. The audience was especially pleased by his artistic performance and he was warmly applauded.

Owing to the illness of one of the oboe artists, the Handel concerto, oboe, the final number, could not be played and Haydn's Symphony, No. 1, was given in its place. This was a disappointment to many in the audience who considered the lovely Handel concerto the gem of the program. The Haydn Symphony was given in the perfect style of this organization of artists and Dr. Muck was compelled to return to the stage to acknowledge the hearty plaudits, of the music lovers.

In the audience were Miss Margaret Wilson, who occupied the stage box and had as her guests Mrs. Lansing and Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Gen. and Mrs. Crozier, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mrs. A. Lisner and Mrs. Isaac T. Mann, all of whom entertained box parties; the Italian Ambassador and Countess di Cellere, Lady Spring-Rice, Chief Justice and Mrs. White, Mrs. Wesley Merritt, Mrs. Norman Williams, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, Rear Admiral Clover and Miss Clover, Rear Admiral O'Neale, Miss Patten, Mrs. Ernest Howe, Miss Wilson, Mrs. William A. Hill, the Misses Sedgeley, Miss Stanton, Miss Seibert, Mrs. Peter Goelet Gerry, Mr. and Mrs. George Eustis, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mrs. William Manning Irwin, Mrs. Francis Newlands, Mr. and Mrs. John S. Larcomb, Miss Noyes, Mrs John W. Weeks, Mrs. John W. Davidge, Miss Todd, Miss Davis, Mrs. A. P. Gardner, Dr. and Mrs. Chatard, Mr and Mrs. Walter Tuckerman and Miss Sargent.

M. J. S.

---

om POST
ldress: Washington, D. C.
FEB 1 6 19
ite

, 1884

Miss Margaret Wilson entertained a ox party at the Boston Symphony conrt at the National Theater yesterday fternoon. Her guests were Mrs. Rob-t Lansing, Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, Mrs. Villiam Hitz, Miss Bones and Miss enham. The German Ambassador was ost in the adjoining box, his guests including Mme. Hauge, Mrs. Wesley Merritt and Miss Harriet Southerland. The Italian Ambassador and Countess Macchi de Cellere were guests in the box of Gen. and Mrs. William Crozier. Mrs. Peter Gerry, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mrs. William Slater and Miss Patten were among the occupants of one of the stage boxes. Mrs. James McMillan entertained a box party, with Mrs. Preston Gibson among the guests. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mr. and Mrs. Abram Lisner and Mrs. Isaac T. Mann also entertained guests in their box. Among others in the audience were the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane; Mrs. David F. Houston, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. B. Rush Wendell, Mrs. Israel Putnam, Mrs. James Harlan, Miss Laura Harlan, Mme. Ekengren, Chief Justice White, Representative and Mrs. Longworth, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, Mrs. Clarence Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. William Eaches Fendall, Mr. and Mrs. George Peabody Eustis, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Reeside, Mrs. Frederick Chapin, Miss Flora Wilson, Miss Ethel Bagley, Mrs. Carl Vrooman, Mrs. Matthew T. Scott, Mrs. Thomas H. Carter, Mrs. Robert Taylor, Mrs. Beverly Williamson, Mrs. Oscar W. Underwood, Mrs. Victor Kauffmann, Mrs. William Cline Borden, Mrs. Robert Chew, Mrs. Alexander Stewart, Miss Helen Stewart, Miss Maury, Miss Todd, Mrs. Henry Brown, Miss Frances Noyes, Miss Ruth Wilson, Admiral Clover, Miss Clover, Mrs. J. W. Weeks, Mrs. J. W. Davidge, Mrs. Peyton Russell, Mrs. Charles Hamlin, Mrs. Rollins Morse, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins and Mr. and Mrs. James Parmelee.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date FEB 1 0

Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter.

Für das geſtrige Abendkonzert hatte Herr Dr. Muck ein ſo vielſeitiges und reichhaltiges Programm zuſammengeſtellt, aß nur ſeine erſtaunliche Elaſtizität und endfriſche ſo erfolgreich durchführen e.

Der erſte Teil war Debuſſys dreiteilige, ſymphoniſche Dichtung „Das Meer". Jean d'Udine ſagt im Hinblick auf ſie: „Debuſſy beſitzt durch ein Wunder das gefährliche Privilegium, imſtande zu ſein, die phantaſtiſcheſten Spiele von Licht und flüſſigen Wirbelwinden zu erfaſſen. Er iſt ein Verwandter des Zauberers und Taſchenſpielers, und ſeine Kunſt beruht faſt ganz auf der Aſſoziation muſikaliſcher Gedanken, deren Beziehungen nur in einem Zuſtand von halbem Bewußtſein aufgefaßt werden können und unter der Bedingung, daß man nicht darüber nachdenkt. Es iſt eine ausſchließlich ſenſuelle Kunſt, faſt außerhalb aller Zeit liegend, die im Raume dahinflutet mit einer verwirrenden Abweſenheit von Rhythmus, eine erſtaunlich franzöſiſche Kunſt."

Kann es für einen in allen Teilen ſo vollkommenen und verfeinerten Tonkörper wie das Boſtoner Orcheſter eine verführeriſchere Aufgabe geben als die Wiedergabe dieſer impreſſioniſtiſchen Kunſt? Tatſächlich ſcheint Dr. Muck ſich bewußt zu ſein, daß kein amerikaniſches Orcheſter ſo wie das ſeine berufen iſt, die verborgenen Schätze dieſer Sybaritenkunſt aufzuſpüren. Er hat das „Meer" zum erſten Mal hier und ſeit 1907 noch zwei weitere Male in Boſton vorgeführt. Auch die geſtrige Aufführung war ein Triumph für den Dirigenten und ſeine Schaar.

Nach dieſem Ausdruck einer abgeklärten, müden, wenn man will etwas dekadenten Kultur wirkt Richard Strauß mit ſeinem „Don Quichote" kräftig, tumultuariſch, hoffnungsvoll, aber auch oft etwas trivial. Von dieſem Werk heißt es, es reflektiere das damalige Bewußtſein des Komponiſten von der Tragi-Komödie ſeines maßloſen Ueber-Idealismus und ſeine Selbſtironie. Von dem Ueber-Idealismus ſeiner früheſten Künſtlerepoche iſt der Tonſetzer ſeitdem ſo gründlich geheilt worden, daß, wenn man ſeinem „Don Quichote" einen Anteil an der Heilung zuſchreiben wollte, man dieſe Symphonie als die erfolgreichſte Arbeit des Autors anſehen müßte.

Ueber die Aufführung ſei nur ſoviel geſagt, daß ſie eine muſikaliſche Glanzleiſtung des Boſtoner Orcheſters war, daß insbeſondere die unterhaltenden Klang- und Orcheſtrationsſpielereien, mit denen das Werk zur Zeit ſeiner Entſtehung Furore machte, mit einer verwegenen Bravour herauskamen und daß die beiden Soliſten, der Celliſt Warnke und der Bratſchiſt Férir meiſterhaft ſpielten.

Nach dieſen beiden Werken wäre Haydn's Es dur-Symphonie auch in einer weniger vollendeten Wiedergabe ſchon durch die Kontraſtwirkung ein Labſal geweſen. Sie gehört aber ebenfalls zu den ſchon früher gewürdigten Paradenummern der Boſtoner. In dem mit echt Wieneriſchen derben Humor vorgetragenen Andante trat das Geigen-Solo von Anton Witch vorteilhaft hervor. Das Ganze wurde mit fein abgewogener dynamiſcher Grade und doch großzügig, ohne alle kleinliche Schattierung geſpielt. Wir wünſchten, Herr Saint-Saens hätte zuhören können, der den Boſtonern zu ſtarke Kontraſte und zu feine Nuancen vorwarf, unter denen ſeine Dirigentenkunſt freilich nie gelitten hat.

From TRIBUNE
Address

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in

Date

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, P

Date

Establisl

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY

Composition by Schelling Feature of Boston Orchestra's Programme

The feature of the programme presented last evening at the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra before the large audience which its appearance never fails to attract was a set of variations by Ernest Schelling, who might almost be called a son of Philadelphia, of such long standing and so intimate have his relations with this city been. To these variations, which are for the orchestra and piano, the composer has given the name of "Impressions From an Artist's Life" from which it will be correctly inferred that they are of a personal character and that they are predominantly devoted to the interpretation of subjective sentiment.

Variations are apt to become tiresome, but these are not open to that criticism. Thanks to the skillfulness of their construction and to the ingratiating quality of the material which they employ they easily hold the interested and unwavering attention of the intelligently appreciative listener and there is no doubt that the audience was greatly pleased. The part for the obligato instrument was admirably played, with a superb brilliancy of execution and the utmost eloquence of expression, by Mr. Schelling, who has developed into one of the great pianists of the day, and Mr. Muck supplied an elastic and illuminative accompaniment.

Other things on the list were Debussy's atmospheric and evanescent tone pictures of the sea, which are supposed to portray "From Dawn Till Noon Upon the Ocean," "Frolics of the Waves" and "Dialogue of the Wind and Sea," which sounded less exotic and extraordinary than they did when they were first heard here a few years ago, and which were played with a wonderful delicacy and finesse. The symphony which came last was the one by Mozart in E-flat, whose recent performance under Mr. Stokowski's direction concert-goers will recall. It was, of course, beautifully done, but under the circumstances probably most of those who heard it would have preferred something else.

How these frequent coincidences of choice occur remains an unsolved mystery, but it seems safe to suppose that most music lovers wish they didn't. Conductors who assume the existence of any great desire for an opportunity to compare their interpretation of familiar masterpieces with that of others, or who imagine that the public entertains any irrepressible curiosity in this connection, misconceive the fact. The next and last for the season of these concerts will take place on Monday evening, March 13.

DISCUSS "DEAD BEATS"

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Es

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Ernest Schelling as Pianist and Composer is Feature.

It was quite an Ernest Schelling night at the Academy last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck conducting, gave the fourth concert of the present season. The appearance of Schelling as soloist with any organization is always sufficient to bring out a large audience, for he has in this city hosts of personal friends as well as artistic admirers, but last night he appeared both as virtuoso and composer, and the combination served to make him the undisputed feature of the program. Even the sight of the great Paderewski in a box with Mrs. Schelling did not serve to distract public attention from the only man who can entirely surround a grand piano.

Schelling's composition, which was given for the first time here, was a suite of variations on an original theme under the title "Impressions from an Artist's Life." It is a work full of color, redolent of Bohemian atmosphere and scored for pianoforte and orchestra with a mastery of tonal effects that raises it far above the level of mediocrity. Schelling as a composer presents a safe ground for universal admiration no matter what may be the differences of opinion regarding his over-indulgence in the sonority of the keyboard under his hands.

Dr. Muck chose for his orchestral selections the mystically beautiful Debussy suite, "The Sea," which has been heard here before—but never with more exquisite rendition of its poesy—and Mozart's E flat major symphony, which was played here too recently to make its repetition at this time altogether desirable. Yet these musicians from Boston form an organization so undoubtedly authoritative in their presentation of any work they undertake that their programs are always of interest to the music-lover if for nothing more than to give him the viewpoint of scholarly and serious interpretation and impeccable technic.

Internati

From Musical America
Address: New York City
FEB 5 - 1916
Date

Lon

The Problem of Sympathy Programs

The feeling of dread which sensitive subscribers to the Boston Symphony Concerts experience before its distinguished conductor makes up his next "surprise" for New York has, after four years of torture, gradually given way to a calm resignation to their fate.

We are no longer in terror of what the amiable "Doctor" from Boston (and Berlin) will next prescribe for us. We will take our medicine and remember that medicine should properly be bitter. We will permit ourselves to be educated rather than entertained, even if the agonies sometimes seem beyond human endurance.

Is it a diabolical sense of humor or a complete absence of it, which induces Dr. Muck to inflict THREE symphonies of the same period on ONE helpless afternoon audience? If we are to be punished, why not keep within the (narrow) limits of international law and serve one "American" composer as the last number of the final program of the season?

We are somewhat better served by the local orchestras, but in going over the programs of three months, it seems to me that much of what "we were privileged to hear" could have been spared to us, and more important works which have not been played for a decade substituted.

We would surely not lose much if, instead of Fibich's "Evening" and Dvořak "Scherzo Capriccioso" some such neglected composer like "Vincent D'Indy" would be given a hearing. There are more important works of Sibelius than his "Die Okeaniden," for instance, his four symphonies none of which have appeared on the programs of the season.

There is also Rimsky-Korsakoff, who wrote "Schéhérazade," but who wrote other music, too, for example, "Antar" which has not been heard here in an age.

It may furthermore not be amiss to point out that Richard Strauss has written other symphonic poems besides "Don Juan," "Death and Transfiguration" and "A Hero's Life." I may point out "Thus Spake Zarathustra," "Don Quiquote," "Synphonie Domestica," everyone of which seems too fermidable a task for our conductors to tackle.

I will admit that an honest effort to accomplish more than the ordinary routine work has been attempted by Mr. Stransky, by his recent Strauss festival (if one can call it so), and by the introduction of two novelties by important contemporaneous composers.

I refer to Reger's "Variations On a Theme of Mozart" and Schoenberg's "Pelleas et Melisande." However grateful we ought to be for the effort, as the sum and substance of a season of a hundred concerts the result seems meagre.

There may be a dearth of good novelties, but there is a wealth of good old music of which we are unnecessarily deprived. How long is it since we have heard Brahm's lovely "Variations On a Theme of Haydn?" To be sure it requires a good deal of elegance of style to play this work as effectively as the Boston Orchestra did some seasons ago under Dr. Muck, but it is hardly beyond the powers of our local orchestras.

In conclusion, I may say that it would, perhaps, not be a bad thing to give a little room to Italian composers in the making up of the programs.

There is a Symphony by Martucci which was to have figured on a program of Italian music some years ago, but was replaced by Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony.

JEAN-CHRISTOPHE.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.

Date

Es 1884

RUSSIAN MUSIC GIVEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Faultless Interpretation of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Work Rendered at Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conducting, yesterday at the National Theater gave a faultless interpretation of the "Antar" symphony by Rimsky-Korsakoff, the modern Russian composer.

The symphony opens with a soft slow minor movement, largo, with an oriental melody running through it, and recurring throughout the entire work. The second movement is heroic in character, full of rugged harmonies by the entire orchestra. Martial strains comprise the third movement which closes with the development of a subtle romantic melody. The largo theme reappears in the last movement and the symphony ends with an effective pianissimo.

This composition was somewhat doubtfully received by the audience, and the applause was testimony of appreciation to the gifted conductor rather than enthusiasm for the Russian composition.

The concetro in A minor by Saint-Saens was wonderfully interpreted by Joseph Malkin, 'cellist, the soloist of the afternoon. This concerto is extremely difficult and not particularly melodious. There are two main themes developing alternately with the orchestra and the 'cello. Mr. Malkin plays with a remarkable quality of tone and enthusiasm for his work. The audience was especially pleased by his artistic performance and he was warmly applauded.

Owing to the illness of one of the oboe artists, the Handel concerto, oboe, the final number, could not be played and Haydn's Symphony, No. 1, was given in its place. This was a disappointment to many in the audience who considered the lovely Handel concerto the gem of the program. The Haydn Symphony was given in the perfect style of this organization of artists and Dr. Muck was compelled to return to the stage to acknowledge the hearty plaudits, of the music lovers.

In the audience were Miss Margaret Wilson, who occupied the stage box and had as her guests Mrs. Lansing and Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Gen. and Mrs. Crozier, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mrs. A. Lisner and Mrs. Isaac T. Mann, all of whom entertained box parties; the Italian Ambassador and Countess di Cellere, Lady Spring-Rice, Chief Justice and Mrs. White, Mrs. Wesley Merritt, Mrs. Norman Williams, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, Rear Admiral Clover and Miss Clover, Rear Admiral O'Neale, Miss Patten, Mrs. Ernest Howe, Miss Wilson, Mrs. William A. Hill, the Misses Sedgeley, Miss Stanton, Miss Seibert, Mrs. Peter Goelet Gerry, Mr. and Mrs. George Eustis, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mrs. William Manning Irwin, Mrs. Francis Newlands, Mr. and Mrs. John S. Larcomb, Miss Noyes, Mrs John W. Weeks, Mrs. John W. Davidge, Miss Todd, Miss Davis, Mrs. A. P. Gardner, Dr. and Mrs. Chatard, Mr and Mrs. Walter Tuckerman and Miss Sargent.

M. J. S.

---

om POST
ldress: Washington, D. C.

ıte

, 1884

Miss Margaret Wilson entertained a ox party at the Boston Symphony conert at the National Theater yesterday fternoon. Her guests were Mrs. Rob-t Lansing, Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, Mrs. Villiam Hitz, Miss Bones and Miss enham. The German Ambassador was ost in the adjoining box, his guests inluding Mme. Hauge, Mrs. Wesley Merritt and Miss Harriet Southerland. The Italian Ambassador and Countess Macchi de Cellere were guests in the box of Gen. and Mrs. William Crozier. Mrs. Peter Gerry, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mrs. William Slater and Miss Patten were among the occupants of one of the stage boxes. Mrs. James McMillan entertained a box party, with Mrs. Preston Gibson among the guests. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mr. and Mrs. Abram Lisner and Mrs. Isaac T. Mann also entertained guests in their box. Among others in the audience were the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane; Mrs. David F. Houston, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. B. Rush Wendell, Mrs. Israel Putnam, Mrs. James Harlan, Miss Laura Harlan, Mme. Ekengren, Chief Justice White, Representative and Mrs. Longworth, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, Mrs. Clarence Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. William Eaches Fendall, Mr. and Mrs. George Peabody Eustis, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Reeside, Mrs. Frederick Chapin, Miss Flora Wilson, Miss Ethel Bagley, Mrs. Carl Vrooman, Mrs. Matthew T. Scott, Mrs. Thomas H. Carter, Mrs. Robert Taylor, Mrs. Beverly Williamson, Mrs. Oscar W. Underwood, Mrs. Victor Kauffmann, Mrs. William Cline Borden, Mrs. Robert Chew, Mrs. Alexander Stewart, Miss Helen Stewart, Miss Maury, Miss Todd, Mrs. Henry Brown, Miss Frances Noyes, Miss Ruth Wilson, Admiral Clover, Miss Clover, Mrs. J. W. Weeks, Mrs. J. W. Davidge, Mrs. Peyton Russell, Mrs. Charles Hamlin, Mrs. Rollins Morse, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins and Mr. and Mrs. James Parmelee.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City

Date FEB 1 0

Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter.

Für das geſtrige Abendkonzert hatte Herr Dr. Muck ein ſo vielſeitiges und reichhaltiges Programm zuſammengeſtellt, as nur ſeine erſtaunliche Elaſtizität und endfriſche ſo erfolgreich durchführen e.

er erſte Teil war Debuſſys dreiteilige, ymphoniſche Dichtung „Das Meer". Jean d'Udine ſagt im Hinblick auf ſie: „Debuſſy beſitzt durch ein Wunder das gefährliche Privilegium, imſtande zu ſein, die phantaſtiſcheſten Spiele von Licht und flüſſigen Wirbelwinden zu erfaſſen. Er iſt ein Verwandter des Zauberers und Taſchenſpielers, und ſeine Kunſt beruht faſt ganz auf der Aſſoziation muſikaliſcher Gedanken, deren Beziehungen nur in einem Zuſtand von halbem Bewußtſein aufgefaßt werden können und unter der Bedingung, daß man nicht darüber nachdenkt. Es iſt eine ausſchließlich ſenſuelle Kunſt, faſt außerhalb aller Zeit liegend, die im Raume dahinflutet mit einer verwirrenden Abweſenheit von Rhythmus, eine erſtaunlich franzöſiſche Kunſt."

Kann es für einen in allen Teilen ſo vollkommenen und verfeinerten Tonkörper wie das Boſtoner Orcheſter eine verführeriſchere Aufgabe geben als die Wiedergabe dieſer impreſſioniſtiſchen Kunſt? Tatſächlich ſcheint Dr. Muck ſich bewußt zu ſein, daß kein amerikaniſches Orcheſter ſo wie das ſeine berufen iſt, die verborgenen Schätze dieſer Sybaritenkunſt aufzuſpüren. Er hat das „Meer" zum erſten Mal hier und ſeit 1907 noch zwei weitere Male in Boſton vorgeführt. Auch die geſtrige Aufführung war ein Triumph für den Dirigenten und ſeine Schaar.

Nach dieſem Ausdruck einer abgeklärten, müden, wenn man will etwas dekadenten Kultur wirkt Richard Strauß mit ſeinem „Don Quichote" kräftig, tumultuariſch, hoffnungsvoll, aber auch oft etwas trivial. Von dieſem Werk heißt es, es reflektiere das damalige Bewußtſein des Komponiſten von der Tragi-Komödie ſeines maßloſen Ueber-Idealismus und ſeine Selbſtironie. Von dem Ueber-Idealismus ſeiner früheſten Künſtlerepoche iſt der Tonſetzer ſeitdem ſo gründlich geheilt worden, daß, wenn man ſeinem „Don Quichote" einen Anteil an der Heilung zuſchreiben wollte, man dieſe Symphonie als die erfolgreichſte Arbeit des Autors anſehen müßte.

Ueber die Aufführung ſei nur ſoviel geſagt, daß ſie eine muſikaliſche Glanzleiſtung des Boſtoner Orcheſters war, daß insbeſondere die unterhaltenden Klang- und Orcheſtrationsſpielereien, mit denen das Werk zur Zeit ſeiner Entſtehung Furore machte, mit einer verwegenen Bravour herauskamen und daß die beiden Soliſten, der Celliſt Warnke und der Bratſchiſt Férir meiſterhaft ſpielten.

Nach dieſen beiden Werken wäre Haydn's Es dur-Symphonie auch in einer weniger vollendeten Wiedergabe ſchon durch die Kontraſtwirkung ein Labſal geweſen. Sie gehört aber ebenfalls zu den ſchon früher gewürdigten Paradenummern der Boſtoner. In dem mit echt Wieneriſchen derben Humor vorgetragenen Andante trat das Geigen-Solo von Anton Witek vorteilhaft hervor. Das Ganze wurde mit fein abgewogener dynamiſcher Grade und doch großzügig, ohne alle kleinliche Schattierung geſpielt. Wir wünſchten, Herr Saint-Saens hätte zuhören können, der den Boſtonern zu ſtarke Kontraſte und zu feine Nuancen vorwarf, unter denen ſeine Dirigentenkunſt freilich nie gelitten hat.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date FEB 1 6 1916

Establis

Boston Symphony at Carnegie.

Dr. Carl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presented an interesting program, consisting of Debussy's "La Mer," Strauss's "Don Quixote" and Haydn's symphony in E flat major at Carnegie Hall last night. Mr. Warnke, a member of the orchestra, was heard in the violoncello solo in "Don Quixote." He player with feeling and spirit.

It is said that "Don Quixote" was written at a time when Strauss was "inclined to be conscious of the tragi-comedy of his own overzealous hyper-idealism and ironical at its expense." Dr. Muck played the work with his customary poetry, and imbued the finale, representing the death scene of the famous romantic figure, with a deep sense of its peace and solemnity.

The humorous touch in the pastoral scene brought forth peals of laughter from the appreciative audience, the chorus of sheep causing the amusement.

The last number, the symphony, was well received.

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
1916
Date
Establishec

Boston Symphony

Fourth Concert of Season, With Ernest Schelling as Piano Soloist

THE fourth concert of the present series of five by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, last evening, was of more than usual moment, and of memorable interest to the capacity audience present, the program having as a special feature the playing by Ernest Schelling, the pianist-composer, of his own "Impressions," a set of variations for piano and orchestra, while in a parquet-circle box, listening with close attention and evident appreciation to his former pupil, sat Ignace J. Paderewski, accompanied by Mrs. Paderewski. Mr. Schelling, in fact, is said to be the only pupil of the great Polish pianist, and it may be said in all truth that last evening the distinguished pupil reflected much credit upon his celebrated teacher. The attention of a large portion of the audience was about evenly divided between the two.

The program, which Dr. Muck conducted with characteristic attitude of self-effacement, but very apparent erudition and comprehensive musicianship, had as its opening number Debussy's set of orchestral sketches, "The Sea," in which the French composer presents three remarkable tonal pictures. To be sure, the average listener is likely to find these music-pastels vague and unintelligible. They will impress many an ear as a cubist picture does most eyes, but to him who listens with the gift of imagination and the spirit of receptivity, there is much of lucidness and beauty in this typical Debussy music.

"From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean" is the title of the first sketch, "Frolic of the Waves" is the second, and "Dialogue of Wind and Sea" the third. Wonderfully indeed does the composer convey the impression of liquidity, of depth, and of expanse, using mostly the wood-winds, with shimmer of strings, a mingling of those instruments of the orchestra which furnish the most of color and poetic idealization. Dissonances prevail, modulations that follow no accepted rule of harmonization flow one into the other, and often there seems to be little but discord and confusion. But this is Debussy, who has his followers, his admirers, many of whom apparently were in last night's audience. The composition, remarkably played, met with an appreciation that gave no sign of being feigned.

The appearance of Mr. Schelling caused a welcoming round of applause, for the pianist is well known here, and probably in no city is he more admired or appreciated. In his double capacity of composer and performer, last evening, he won perhaps his greatest success in Philadelphia. "Impressions," he calls his new composition, and "impressionistic" it is, in every sense. It is in the form of variations, nineteen in number, each one being associated in the composer's mind with some person, place or sensation. The first, for wood-wind alone, is labelled "B. S. O.," for "Boston Symphony Orchestra," while the second, a canon, for strings and piano-forte, "K. M.," apparently is a thought of Dr. Muck. Further down the list—No. IX.—is a polka, with the initials, I. J. P., a tribute to Mr. Paderewski. There are other personal sketches, with initials the significance of which might be guessed, and still others that seem to be a secret with the composer.

There is in the music much that may be accepted as vivid character drawing. As a whole, the work might appropriately serve, with educational enlightment, as an illustration for a talk on "The Orchestra and Its Instruments," such as Mr. Stokowski gave recently, in the series of Musical Lectures for Young People," at the Little Theatre, for Mr. Schelling has made use of practically all the different choirs and individual instruments of the modern orchestra, passing from one to another and treating them all with skill and clearness. For instance, there is a movement for violoncello and three flutes, another for solo oboe and piano, others for English horn, for viola, for clarinet, etc., in all of which the piano figures more or less prominently, with the full orchestra often coming out impressively, as in "Erin" (with the initials, L. S.) a stirring bit of free orchestration, "In Memory of Gustav Mahler," and a movement, thrilling in its martial fervor and tragic significance, entitled "August, 1914," very evidently felling of the outbreaking of the European nations into the havoc of war.

[illegible] "Habanera [illegible] orchestra, is one of [illegible] the sketches, full of life and color, and the end comes with an exalted "Lutheran Choral—Wartburg, 1915," which furnishes an impressive climax to the work. In his writing, Mr. Schelling gave even more attention to the various instruments of the orchestra, and to the orchestra as a whole, than to the piano, which is supposed to have the solo voice of the composition. To be sure, his instrument is given a conspicuous and important part in the variations, and he played throughout with the facility and brilliance for which he is noted, but it was quite as much as composer that he won his success last evening, as in the display of his pianistic ability. At the conclusion of the interpretation, he was recalled at least half a dozen times, the applause being in the nature of a real ovation.

The program was concluded with a splendid interpretation of Mozart's E-flat major symphony, the somewhat placid and classic beauty of which was all the more enjoyable because of the grateful contrast it presented to the distinctly modern works by which it was preceded.

◆

THE GOD OF BATTLE

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date FEB 1 6 1916
E rk, 1884

BOSTON PLAYERS HEARD.

Two Modern Works Presented by Visiting Organization.

At its fourth evening concert of the season, last night in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented two important modern works of two distinctly different musical schools, which had not been heard here in recent years: Debussy's three musical sketches, "La Mer," and Strauss's fantastic variations on a theme of knightly character, "Don Quixote." As it happened both had received their first production in New York by the visiting organization, the French composition under the direction of Dr. Muck, who conducted yesterday the German composition under the direction of Gericke. That the Massachusetts musicians gave a remarkable exhibition of their virtuoso powers not only in Debussy's fanciful and fascinating sea-pictures, but also in Strauss's masterful musical exposition of Cervantes's immortal story (Heinrich Warnke playing the exacting solo 'cello part and E. Ferir the viola), goes without saying. Each performance was nothing less than a tour de force and presented with startling clarity, transparency and sharpness of outline, treasures from which Stravinsky, author of "Petouchka," has borrowed so freely.

The evening closed with Hadyn's symphony in E flat major (B. & H. No. 1).

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date
Establis

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FOURTH MATINEE,

Unfamiliar Tone of Liszt Heard in Programme at Carnegie Hall.

Two compositions and a piece of music comprised the programme of the fourth matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday. The compositions were Rimsky-Korsakov's "Antar" symphony and Liszt's "What One Hears on the Mountain." The piece of music was the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." Philip Hale provided generous stores of information about the two compositions. In both instances Mr. Hale was much more interesting than the composers.

The "Antar" symphony is not altogether unfamilar; but few of yesterday's audience could have heard the Liszt work before. Possibly some of them may desire to hear it again, but at least one will not. It was all the fault of Victor Hugo, who wrote a poem about what he heard on a mountain. Liszt was unable to resist the temptation to translate it into music. It need hardly be added in the stereotyped language of the book reviewer that the spirit and style of the original were quite lost in the translation.

This tone poem is all Liszt's own. Some one wrote of it in 1869 that it "possesses all Liszt's defects and none, or nearly none, of his few excellences." This comment was published in Dwight's Journal of Music, not in the Evening Post. After listening to the composition with close attention, the reviewer for THE SUN heartily agrees with the comment. It is certain that on a mountain one sometimes hears a great deal of nonsense.

It is a pity that the good Dr. Muck is so hard put to it for material that he has to waste the great Boston Symphony Orchestra on such compositions as the two on yesterday's programme. When the real music began it certainly did sound good. What one hears in a single storm at sea, when one is Wagner, is more than one could hear in the whole range of the Himalayas, if one were Liszt.

From Evening PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date
Established: Le

SCHELLING SOLOIST WITH BOSTON BANI

Pianist Plays His Own Variations With Dr. Muck's Orchestra

A symphony heard here but two weeks ago, three symphonic sketches by Debussy not heard for some time, and a series of variations never heard here before, made up the program which the magnificent band from Beacon Hill (or more accurately, from Symphony Hall) played here last night. For the third and newest of these three numbers the composer, Ernest Schelling, was present as assisting artist.

The symphony was Mozart's in E flat, which Mr. Stokowski conducted at the concerts of February 4-5. There was something tempestuous in the first allegro, as Doctor Muck conducted it, and he raced with rare zest through the two final movements—with good authority, for Mozart himself was not averse to going through certain of his works "on high." The whole was admirably, deftly, intelligently played. It made one think, for all the now not only accepted but revered and bulwarked simplicity of it, that Mozart would have liked the three "sea" sketches of Debussy which stood on the same program. For in his time Mozart outraged quiet minds by his daring, and, no doubt, by his delicacy of humor. That is a quality which inheres in Debussy's sketches, as much as it does in those Iberian thumb-nail bits which are not often enough played by orchestras.

Humor and delicacy are not the only attitudes in the strange attempt to breathe the mystery of the sea into music. To define further is, according to not the least of Debussy's critics, tempting the fates. Yet one may point out the harmony which exists in the soul of the composer and in the soul of the sea, if we remember the sea in all the variety that sweeps across the monotony of its depths. Debussy has caught tempers of the water, has suggested even the nerves of the sea, and one may only quarrel with him if the sea he has so tremulously captured be not the sea of one's own experience or imagination. Even then something will be left in praise of the beauty of the themes and the marvels of orchestration. None of which were scanted in the playing last night.

Mr. Schelling's work was a series of "Impressions (from an artist's life) in form of variations on an original theme for orchestra and pianoforte!" The whole is dedicated to the composer's wife, the theme to the orchestra, which played it last night, the first variation to the same; the second, a canon, rather martial, to the conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. Memorial dedications are those to Hans Pfitzner and to Gustave Mahler. The oboe solo is to G. Longy, a variation for strings alone, "Polska" to Paderewski, one for viola and piano has the initials of Fritz Kreisler, another for full orchestra recalls the composer's association with the Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin. The variation, "August, 1914," with the suggestion of troops going to war without the glamor of battle had an immediate and special appeal.

So likeable, so varied and so interesting were all of these, and the other variation to the total number of 19, that one was prone to overlook the truly remarkable playing of Mr. Schelling himself. His virtuosity has long been unquestioned; his sympathetic interpretation of his own work might have been taken for granted. Yet, assuming everything, there was an added grandness of execution in Mr. Schelling, a thrilling and wonderful communication from the piano to the auditors.

Of the separate variations that with the initials of Doctor Muck was certainly the least subtle, though it was full of a charm and humor which certainly are characteristic of the great conductor. The dedicated offerings to both Paderewski and Kreisler are to the private man less than to the public, to the artist in each rather than to the player. Mr. Paderewski was, in the quaint and rustic phrase, an interested applauder at the performance. The turbulent spirit of Mahler was admirably suggested and the marvelous playing of Mr. Longy not only suggested but put to its severest test.

Apart from these personal interests, the whole work is largely conceived and orchestrated with a tremendous freedom. Mr. Schelling has the soul of a musician and adds to that the verve of the amateur (in more senses than one) when he begins to compose for the orchestra. So there is something generous and cheering and free in his work. It is too early to prophesy that no other pianist will care to learn these variations. It would be a pity if the intense personal nature of some of them would keep the series out of the repertoire of other orchestras than this. For the work is big enough and fine enough to go of its own. G. V. S.

From TRIBUNE

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date FEB 18 1916

Both Bodanzky in a box and Melanie Kurt in an orchestra chair took a brief respite from daily opera at the Boston Symphony concert that filled Carnegie Hall to the limit last evening. They laughed as loud as anybody among the 2,500 seasoned veteran subscribers to hear the bleating sheep and the whistling ride through air of the "Don Quixote" of Strauss. That crazy, noble hero recalled to some the "Von Quixote" of a famous war cartoon of world-wide sympathy. Dr. Muck guided his band into the grand amen of the death scene, where Strauss, as in all the works of a despot of din, seems trying to tell his hearers he's not so crazy after all.

There was Boston Symphony quality, a purity altogether crystalline, in the opening number last night, Debussy's "La Mer." For this, the polished leader let his hundred men stand up to bow. Those auditors who balked at double doses of bitter medicine from the ultra-moderns of Germany and France had their reward in a quaint old Austrian symphony. That lively, gentle finale was indeed like a return to "mother, home and Haydn."

To-night the Bostonians play in Brooklyn, with Witek as solo violin—he reenforced 'Cellist Warnke and "Viola" Ferir in Strauss last evening—while to-morrow afternoon Carnegie Hall will have Muck's revival of "What One Hears on the Mountain," a long forgotten tone poem of Liszt. For the first time this season, C. A. Ellis was with W. J. Brennan in charge of the band. One more return in the middle of March will end the season.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City
Date

Again the great symphony orchestra from Boston under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck played in Carnegie Hall last night. Their work was, as always, distinguished by superb balance and quality of tone. Dr. Muck's programme this time included two representative works of the ultra-modern school, Debussy's three symphonic sketches, "The Sea," with weird harmonics and atmospheric effects and Strauss' brilliant "Don Quixote."

From these exotic and unusual numbers it was a joy to listen to the pure melodies and harmonies of Haydn's beautiful symphony in B flat.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date FEB 18 1916

DEBUSSY'S MUSIC CHARMS

Debussy's "La Mer," Strauss's "Don Quixote" and Haydn's Symphony in E flat major were the offerings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its fourth concert last night at Carnegie Hall.

On the uncharted sea of Debussy's score the orchestra sailed safely and certainly. With delicate, subtle understanding it interpreted the Debussy of the sunlit waves and the limitless laughter of the ocean and the wilder, sterner Debussy of the last of the three sketches that make up "La Mer"—the "Dialogue of Wind and Sea."

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City
Date FEB 20 1916

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck conducting, gave an unusual programme in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Playing with their accustomed unanimity and perfection, they gave superb readings of Rimsky-Korsakoff's colorful symphony "Avtar," a work aiming to depict the Oriental poet and fighter of that name.

Liszt's symphonic poem "What One Hears on the Mountain" and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman" completed the programme.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date FEB 18 1916

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Music by Debussy, Strauss, and Haydn Superbly Given.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is again in New York, on its fourth visit, and gave its first concert last evening in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Muck made it an occasion for putting two of the moderns before his listeners at considerable length; the first numbers of the program were Debussy's three "symphonic sketches," called "La Mer," and Strauss's fantastic variations, "Don Quixote." Then came at the end Haydn's symphony in E flat, that begins with the kettle drum roll.

Debussy's pieces had been heard here before, and were first played in this country by the Boston Orchestra. The three sea pictures are entitled, respectively, "From Dawn till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of Waves," "Dialogue of Wind and Sea." The titles are of the general sort that serve to direct the listener's imagination in a certain direction, not requiring him to find the music exactly descriptive of a definite and detailed succession of things or thoughts. This particular music is accounted highly impressionistic. The composer has attempted little that suggests musical form or the development of musical ideas as such. He is almost exclusively concerned with color. There are passages of real beauty in all three pieces, passages of a singularly successful ingenuity in instrumental combination. But much of it seems now as it did when this music was first heard here, inept in picturing the sea, and its atmospheric effects. There is too much for some listeners of the crackling oboes and stopped trumpets—stopped trumpets have become apparently an obsession in some of Debussy's later works for orchestra. There are too many angular little phrases sharply outlined, leading, of course, nowhere, that shoot across the surface of things. There seems to be in these sketches less specifically musical ideas than in some of Debussy's other compositions, less that is really valuable musically, more that is merely the surface of music without its substance.

There was an extraordinarily fine performance of the composition, which presents great difficulties in many ways. The first division seemed to bewilder the audience and got little applause. There was much more after the others. Some of it must have been for the remarkable achievement of Dr. Muck and the orchestra in playing it as they did.

Even greater, more complex, and certainly more extensive are the difficulties of Strauss's fantastic picture of Don Quixote's adventures with Sancho Panza. Here was program music of a diametrically opposite sort, music aiming at the most exact definition. This was first played here by the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Gericke. The composer conducted a performance of it when he was in New York in 1903, a performance that broke down for a moment in the middle because the difficulties of the music had not been mastered.

The piece is thoroughly characteristic of the later Strauss of the orchestral pieces. It has the extravagances into which his quest for the most minute and detailed orchestral realism led him. The bleating of the brass instruments, to denote the bleating of real sheep, (which do it better,) is only a crass reductio ad absurdum of a sort of thing that pervades this and other such compositions. The wind machine keeps it close company. There are many pages that have little value as music; their function is to delineate, to describe definitely, which they cannot do, and they fall between two stools. But there are also pages of much beauty as music of imaginative and noble quality. Much of the introductory part and the long finale is of this sort. Some passages that might verge on the commonplace if heard otherwise gain an apparent increase in value by juxtaposition with what is harsh and violent. The general effect of the composition is thus uncertain and unequal.

The performance of its almost incredible difficulties and complications was of apparently easy mastery. Mr. Warnke, first 'cellist of the orchestra, and Mr. Férir, first viola, played the obbligatos for their instruments in a masterly manner. The applause after the performance was very generous, and Dr. Muck made his men rise to share it, of course singling out Messrs. Warnke and Férir.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG Abendblatt
Address: New York City
Date FEB 19 1916

Aus dem Konzertſaal.

Harfen-Rezital von Frl. Marie S. Warfel im Biltmore. — Andere Kunſtgenüſſe.

Das als Amerika's größte Harfenvirtuoſin anerkannte Frl. Marie S. Warfel, welche kürzlich in Konzerten von Mme Marie Rappold, Leopold Godowsky, Anna Fitzui, Ada Saſſoli uſw. mit ihrer Kunſt brillierte, wird am 25. Februar im Morgenkonzert im Baltimore mitwirken. Im März iſt die Künſtlerin auch für ein Sontags-Konzert im Metropolitan Opernhaus gebucht.

Frl. Warfel's Großvater war ein berühmter Wiener Baritoniſt und auch ihre Eltern hatten einen hervoragenden Namen in der Konzertwelt. Die junge Dame ſtudierte Muſik unter Conſtantin von Sternberg, in Philadelphia und lernte das Harfenſpiel u. A. unter Anleitung von Heinrich Schuecker, vom Boſton Symphonie Orcheſter. Frl. Warfel iſt Mitglied des Salzedo Harfen-Enſembles. Sie führt augenblicklich eine Harfenſchule in Lancaſter, Pa., will aber im Frühjahr ihren Wirkungskreis nach New York verlegen.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date FEB 18 1916

From Debussy to Haydn.

What would ultra-modern composers do without mutes (especially on the brass), odd percussion effects, the celesta and the toneless whole-toned scale? Take these away from the Debussy "symphonic sketches"—"The Sea"—played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night, and there would be no more left than when an iridescent bubble bursts. There are interesting bits of tone-color, it is true, but there is nothing whatever suggestive of the sea. Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture, to be played by the same organization Saturday, contains more of the salt foam in the first ten bars than all three of these Debussy pieces.

The second number on yesterday's programme was Richard Strauss's humorous (more or less) variations on a theme of "knightly character," known as "Don Quixote." This was better played than it was under the composer himself here some years ago, and some of the variations are very interesting, particularly the one with the bleating sheep, which caused much amusement in the audience. There was much applause after both numbers, which were indeed superbly played.

As to sea pieces, why are Jean L. Nicodé's two orchestral pieces from "Das Meer," which Anton Seidl played frequently, not heard nowadays? In "Phosphoresence," particularly, are anticipated many effects, the invention of which is now often attributed to others. Edward MacDowell was so fond of this work that he purchased a full score of the first two orchestral movements, and later the complete work, at a time when full scores were not cheap nor his pocket-book particularly fat. The whole work is worth doing by a choral society, but the orchestral part is of especial importance.

The programme closed with an infrequently played symphony of Haydn—No. 1 in E flat. For this infrequency the two uninteresting middle movements are doubtless responsible; the first and last are well worthy or "Papa Haydn."

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

WITEK SOLOIST WITH ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony's Concert-master Plays Joachim's Hungarian Concerto.

SCHUMANN WORK HEARD.

Fourth Programme of Series Well Balanced.

The fourth of the season's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, played last night at the Academy of Music, brought a programme that was genuinely enjoyed by the subscribers. It was a far better balanced programme than the Bostonians are accustomed to offer to their Brooklyn audiences. Furthermore, it emphasized the happier and more impulsive moods of orchestral expression. For this evening at least the sombre and the obscure had not been invited to mar the revelry of tone and rhythm which only Dr. Muck and his wonderful orchestra can furnish.

Anton Witek, the Boston Symphony's concert- master, was the assisting soloist, playing Joachim's Hungarian concerto (op. 11) for violin and orchestra. This is a work of characteristically national inspiration, and it was played with rare effect by the veteran Witek. As on his previous solo appearances here he showed himself an artist of highly sensitized inspiration—one of those infrequently met performers who shun exaggerations and dodge all temptation to be sensational. The concerto had fire and spontaneity—always there was the lilt and the rhythm of its Hungarian father—but never did it grow noisy, and certain of its quieter passages became as whispers. The technical difficulties of the piece, heralded in advance of its hearing, seemed negligible, for displays of technique as such are scarcely to be expected of a Boston Symphony concert-master.

Mr. Witek was vigorously applauded, and a second ovation was accorded to the orchestra at the close of the symphony. Dr. Muck had chosen the familiar Schumann, No. 1, redolent of springtime and joyful memories. The richly scored work of the master melodist brought out the manifold beauties of the separate instrumental

From TRIBUNE

Internatio

From Music & Drama

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date FEB 18 1916

Estal 884

Both Bodanzky in a box and Melanie Kurt in an orchestra chair took a brief respite from daily opera at the Boston Symphony concert that filled Carnegie Hall to the limit last evening. They laughed as loud as anybody among the 2,500 seasoned veteran subscribers to hear the bleating sheep and the whistling ride through air of the "Don Quixote" of Strauss. That crazy noble hero recalled to some the "Von Quixote" of a famous war cartoon of world-wide sympathy. Dr. Muck guided his band into the grand amen of the death scene, where Strauss, as in all the works of a despot of din, seems trying to tell his hearers he's not so crazy after all.

There was Boston Symphony quality, a purity altogether crystalline, in the opening number last night, Debussy's "La Mer." For this, the polished leader let his hundred men stand up to bow. Those auditors who balked at double doses of bitter medicine from the ultra-moderns of Germany and France had their reward in a quaint old Austrian symphony. That lively, gentle finale was indeed like a return to "mother, home and Haydn."

To-night the Bostonians play in Brooklyn, with Witek as solo violin—he reenforced 'Cellist Warnke and "Viola" Ferir in Strauss last evening—while to-morrow afternoon Carnegie Hall will have Muck's revival of "What One Hears on the Mountain," a long forgotten tone poem of Liszt. For the first time this season, C. A. Ellis was with W. J. Brennan in charge of the band. One more return in the middle of March will end the season.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City
Date

Esta 884

Again the great symphony orchestra from Boston under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck played in Carnegie Hall last night. Their work was, as always, distinguished by superb balance and quality of tone. Dr. Muck's programme this time included two representative works of the ultra-modern school, Debussy's three symphonic sketches, "The Sea," with weird harmonics and atmospheric effects and Strauss' brilliant "Don Quixote."

From these exotic and unusual numbers it was a joy to listen to the pure melodies and harmonies of Haydn's beautiful symphony in B flat.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date FEB 18 1916

Esta 1884

DEBUSSY'S MUSIC CHARMS

Debussy's "La Mer," Strauss's "Don Quixote" and Haydn's Symphony in E flat major were the offerings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its fourth concert last night at Carnegie Hall.

On the uncharted sea of Debussy's score the orchestra sailed safely and certainly. With delicate, subtle understanding it interpreted the Debussy of the sunlit waves and the limitless laughter of the ocean and the wilder, sterner Debussy of the last of the three sketches that make up "La Mer"—the "Dialogue of Wind and Sea."

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City
Date

Es 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck conducting, gave an unusual programme in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Playing with their accustomed unanimity and perfection, they gave superb readings of Rimsky-Korsakoff's colorful symphony "Avtar," a work aiming to depict the Oriental poet and fighter of that name.

Liszt's symphonic poem "What One Hears on the Mountain" and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman" completed the programme.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date FEB 18 1916

Est 1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Music by Debussy, Strauss, and Haydn Superbly Given.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is again in New York, on its fourth visit, and gave its first concert last evening in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Muck made it an occasion for putting two of the moderns before his listeners at considerable length; the first numbers of the program were Debussy's three "symphonic sketches," called "La Mer," and Strauss's fantastic variations, "Don Quixote." Then came at the end Haydn's symphony in E flat, that begins with the kettle drum roll.

Debussy's pieces had been heard here before, and were first played in this country by the Boston Orchestra. The three sea pictures are entitled, respectively, "From Dawn till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of Waves," "Dialogue of Wind and Sea." The titles are of the general sort that serve to direct the listener's imagination in a certain direction, not requiring him to find the music exactly descriptive of a definite and detailed succession of things or thoughts. This particular music is accounted highly impressionistic. The composer has attempted little that suggests musical form or the development of musical ideas as such. He is almost exclusively concerned with color. There are passages of real beauty in all three pieces, passages of a singularly successful ingenuity in instrumental combination. But much of it seems now as it did when this music was first heard here, inept in picturing the sea, and its atmospheric effects. There is too much for some listeners of the crackling oboes and stopped trumpets—stopped trumpets have become apparently an obsession in some of Debussy's later works for orchestra. There are too many angular little phrases sharply outlined, leading, of course, nowhere, that shoot across the surface of things. There seems to be in these sketches less specifically musical ideas than in some of Debussy's other compositions, less that is really valuable musically, more that is merely the surface of music without its substance.

There was an extraordinarily fine performance of the composition, which presents great difficulties in many ways. The first division seemed to bewilder the audience and got little applause. There was much more after the others. Some of it must have been for the remarkable achievement of Dr. Muck and the orchestra in playing it as they did.

Even greater, more complex, and certainly more extensive are the difficulties of Strauss's fantastic picture of Don Quixote's adventures with Sancho Panza. Here was program music of a diametrically opposite sort, music aiming at the most exact definition. This was first played here by the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Gericke. The composer conducted a performance of it when he was in New York in 1903, a performance that broke down for a moment in the middle because the difficulties of the music had not been mastered.

The piece is thoroughly characteristic of the later Strauss of the orchestral pieces. It has the extravagances into which his quest for the most minute and detailed orchestral realism led him. The bleating of the brass instruments, to denote the bleating of real sheep, (which do it better,) is only a crass reductio ad absurdum of a sort of thing that pervades this and other such compositions. The wind machine keeps it close company. There are many pages that have little value as music; their function is to delineate, to describe definitely, which they cannot do, and they fall between two stools. But there are also pages of much beauty as music of imaginative and noble quality. Much of the introductory part and the long finale is of this sort. Some passages that might verge on the commonplace if heard otherwise gain an apparent increase in value by juxtaposition with what is harsh and violent. The general effect of the composition is thus uncertain and unequal.

The performance of its almost incredible difficulties and complications was of apparently easy mastery. Mr. Warnke, first 'cellist of the orchestra, and Mr. Férir, first viola, played the obbligatos for their instruments in a masterly manner. The applause after the performance was very generous, and Dr. Muck made his men rise to share it, of course singling out Messrs. Warnke and Férir.

From STAATS=ZEITUNG Abendblatt
Address: New York City
Date FEB 1 8 1916

Est 884

Aus dem Konzertſaal.

Harfen=Rezital von Frl. Marie S. Warfel im Biltmore. — Andere Kunſtgenüſſe.

Das als Amerika's größte Harfenvirtuoſin anerkannte Frl. Marie S. Warfel, welche kürzlich in Konzerten von Mme Marie Rappold, Leopold Godowsky, Anna Fitzui, Ada Saſſoli uſw. mit ihrer Kunſt brillierte, wird am 25. Februar im Morgenkonzert im Baltimore mitwirken. Im März iſt die Künſtlerin auch für ein Sontags=Konzert im Metropolitan Opernhaus gebucht.

Frl. Warfel's Großvater war ein berühmter Wiener Baritoniſt und auch ihre Eltern hatten einen hervoragenden Namen in der Konzertwelt. Die junge Dame ſtudierte Muſik unter Conſtantin von Sternberg, in Philadelphia und lernte das Harfenſpiel u. A. unter Anleitung von Heinrich Schuecker, vom Boſton Symphonie Orcheſter. Frl. Warfel iſt Mitglied des Salzedo Harfen=Enſembles. Sie führt augenblicklich eine Harfenſchule in Lancaſter, Pa., will aber im Frühjahr ihren Wirkungskreis nach New York verlegen.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date

Est 34

From Debussy to Haydn.

What would ultra-modern composers do without mutes (especially on the brass), odd percussion effects, the celesta and the tonicless whole-toned scale? Take these away from the Debussy "symphonic sketches"—"The Sea"—played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night, and there would be no more left than when an iridescent bubble bursts. There are interesting bits of tone-color, it is true, but there is nothing whatever suggestive of the sea. Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture, to be played by the same organization Saturday, contains more of the salt foam in the first ten bars than all three of these Debussy pieces.

The second number on yesterday's programme was Richard Strauss's humorous (more or less) variations on a theme of "knightly character," known as "Don Quixote." This was better played than it was under the composer himself here some years ago, and some of the variations are very interesting, particularly the one with the bleating sheep, which caused much amusement in the audience. There was much applause after both numbers, which were indeed superbly played.

As to sea pieces, why are Jean L. Nicodé's two orchestral pieces from "Das Meer," which Anton Seidl played frequently, not heard nowadays? In "Phosphoresence," particularly, are anticipated many effects, the invention of which is now often attributed to others. Edward MacDowell was so fond of this work that he purchased a full score of the first two orchestral movements, and later the complete work, at a time when full scores were not cheap nor his pocket-book particularly fat. The whole work is worth doing by a choral society, but the orchestral part is of especial importance.

The programme closed with an infrequently played symphony of Haydn—No. 1 in E flat. For this infrequency the two uninteresting middle movements are doubtless responsible; the first and last are well worthy or "Papa Haydn."

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

188

WITEK SOLOIST WITH ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony's Concertmaster Plays Joachim's Hungarian Concerto.

SCHUMANN WORK HEARD.

Fourth Programme of Series Well Balanced.

The fourth of the season's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, played last night at the Academy of Music, brought a programme that was genuinely enjoyed by the subscribers. It was a far better balanced programme than the Bostonians are accustomed to offer to their Brooklyn audiences. Furthermore, it emphasized the happier and more impulsive moods of orchestral expression. For this evening at least the sombre and the obscure had not been invited to mar the revelry of tone and rhythm which only Dr. Muck and his wonderful orchestra can furnish.

Anton Witek, the Boston Symphony's concert- master, was the assisting soloist, playing Joachim's Hungarian concerto (op. 11) for violin and orchestra. This is a work of characteristically national inspiration, and it was played with rare effect by the veteran Witek. As on his previous solo appearances here he showed himself an artist of highly sensitized inspiration—one of those infrequently met performers who shun exaggerations and dodge all temptation to be sensational. The concerto had fire and spontaneity—always there was the lilt and the rhythm of its Hungarian father—but never did it grow noisy, and certain of its quieter passages became as whispers. The technical difficulties of the piece, heralded in advance of its hearing, seemed negligible, for displays of technique as such are scarcely to be expected of a Boston Symphony concert-master.

Mr. Witek was vigorously applauded, and a second ovation was accorded to the orchestra at the close of the symphony. Dr. Muck had chosen the familiar Schumann, No. 1, redolent of springtime and joyful memories. The richly scored work of the master melodist brought out the manifold beauties of the separate instrumental groups. It came last on the pro

[103]

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

E 1884

SYMPHONY OMITTED

Boston Orchestra Gives Concert At Lyric.

Program Curious And Only The Excellent Work Of Musicians Prevents Tiresome Evening.

So far as its program was concerned, the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last night certainly did not hold out much allure in advance. It was, in fact, largely due to the manner in which it was presented that the evening was not extremely tiresome.

The program was curious. It contained only three numbers, and there was no symphony, the closest thing to that sort of composition having been Liszt's symphonic poem, "Ce Qu'on Entend Sur La Montagne." This is a verbose composition of great length, and the Joachim Violin Concerto that preceded it by no means has the virtue ascribed to brevity. Naturally, the selection of these two works precluded the inclusion of a symphony.

The opening number, Beethoven's Lenore Overture No. 1, of course, would go a long way toward redeeming any program when played as superbly as it was under Dr. Muck's direction. It is one of the master's mature compositions, which means that it is characterized by profundity of thought and vision, and that it is fused with inspirational fire.

Seldom Played.

Neither the Joachim concerto nor the Liszt tone poem is very frequently played nowadays, a fact, which considering everything, is not calculated to create surprise. The concerto is in the Hungarian manner, and while it contains passages of passionate fervor and melodic loveliness, it is above everything else a long-drawn-out virtuosic thunderbolt. The middle movement, the romance, is an exquisite calm in the storm of notes, a thing of rare quieting charm. It must be one of the most tremendously difficult compositions in violin literature, and the way in which it was played by Anton Witek, the brilliant concertmeister of the orchestra, was admirable throughout. His technic was quite flawless, and his performance was marked with dignity and good taste.

Orchestration Rich.

"Ce Qu'on Entend Sur La Montagne" was composed by Liszt in 1849 after a poem by Victor Hugo. Needless to say that its orchestration is rich, and that it rises at times to stirring heights. But the whole effect is nullified by the prevailing incoherency, and by the lack of anything like sustained beauty. It is the sort of musical transcendentalism that bores one because of the constant conflict of ideas that in themselves have but little weight. Compared with the same composer's "Les Preludes" or any of the tone poems of Strauss it seems absolutely futile.

The Boston Symphony is one of the few orchestras that steadfastly maintains the highest standards of excellence, and the work of both the musicians and their impeccable director last night was above reproach. In the hands of a less capable organization the program would have been unbearable.

W. W. B.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FEB 19 1916

Es 1884

WITEK REPEATS BOSTON SUCCESS

Plays Joachim's Difficult Concerto at the Academy.

AUDIENCE ENTHUSIASTIC AT FOURTH CONCERT OF SERIES

Storms of Applause for Dr. Karl Muck and His Orchestra—Overture to Beethoven's "Leonora" Charmingly Rendered.

The opera house of the Academy of Music was filled to capacity last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The audience was a critical one, but the renditions were up to the usual standard set by Dr. Carl Muck, the able conductor, and brought forth storms of applause.

The assisting artist of the evening was Anton Witek, the violinist, who played Joachim's concerto in D major, opus 11, in the Hungarian style. Joachim's great concerto seldom appears on modern programmes, for as skilled as the violin virtuoso is to-day, there are few artists who are able to overcome the stupendous difficulties which Joachim has placed in this work. One of the few virtuosi able to do this is Witek, who is the concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In writing this concerto Joachim seems deliberately to have piled difficulty upon difficulty, but when played by Witek it sounded comparatively simple. He repeated here the great success he had in Boston when playing the same music.

Mr. Witek showed complete mastery of technique in all the three movements; in the first, the allegro un poco maestro, his work was masterful; the second movement, the romanza, brought forth the artist's wonderful pianissimo conception, and the finale, written in allegro con spirito, nearly all staccato, was clearly defined against the preceding movements, marked by their smoothness and softness of bowing.

Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, No. 1. opus 138, opened the evening's programme. This very difficult composition was well interpreted by the orchestra, and there seemed to be friendly rivalry between the various sets of strings and the wood wind in their efforts at pleasing execution.

The closing number of the evening's entertainment was Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, No. 1, Op. 38, the Spring Symphony. As already noted in the "Citizen," in the B flat major symphony, Schumann has written a clear, lucid score, and the music simply bubbles with the joy and happiness of the composer. It is in four movements, and in this the orchestra showed at its best; or, while the individual work was all that could be desired, the orchestra as a whole appeared as a well accomplished unit, whose complicated parts in their perfect unison only accentuated the skill and patience so necessary for the accomplishment of such a result.

Last night's concert was the fourth of a series of five given under the Brooklyn Institute auspices and music-loving Brooklynites feel that if the concert still to be given by Dr. Muck is of the excellence of the preceding ones, Brooklyn's symphony music will be par excellence.

The programme, in full, was as follows:

Concert in D major, for violins, Opus 11, in the Hungarian style, I., Allegro un poco maestoso, II., Romanza, Andante, jiu moto, poco allegretto, allegretto, III., Finale alla zingara: Allegro con spirito, Presto (Joachim). Symphony in B flat major, No. 1, Opus 38, I., Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace. II., Larghetto, III., Scherzo: Molto vivace; Trio I. Molto piu vivace; Trio II. IV., Allegro animato e grazioso (Schumann).

From AGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y
Date FEB 19

Estab

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Violinist Witek Plays Joachim Concerto at Academy.

Dr. Muck, with his genius for making monotonous programmes, came out better than usual in the fourth concert of his Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy, last night. There was little contrast in the general style of the music, but all three compositions on the programme were of great beauty. None of them is often heard in our concert rooms, so that monotony was atoned for by the novelty.

The programme opened with Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 1, which was really number four in the order of composition for the opera which we know as "Fidelio." It is less dramatic than the familiar "Leonore No. 3," but it is very beautiful and it is always welcome.

Then came the battle horse of the concert, Joachim's seldom heard Hungarian Concerto, played by the concert master of the orchestra, Anton Witek. The Concerto is a composition of amazing difficulty, for the solo instrument, but that can hardly be the reason for its being seldom heard in a period when half a dozen violinists have mastered Tschaikowsky's work, which waited years for a man who dared to play it, and when Maude Powell, and a few other artists, have given the Sibelius Concerto. The reason for the neglect of Joachim's work by artists having the technical equipment for it is to be found rather in its great length and in the fact that the music seems definitely "dated" from the period of its composition, the fifties. It is vitally Hungarian, but our concert rooms have been flooded with Hungarian music for the last half century so that its national color no longer has the attraction of freshness, while even the dash and tremendous difficulties of its brilliant last movement have had the edge taken from their effect by our familiarity with the Gypsy pieces of Wieniawsky and Sarasate. There remains the melody of the slow movement, "Romance," which is pure gold and would be welcome anywhere, and the facility and authority of Mr. Witek's performance to arouse enthusiasm. The variety and power of Witek's playing were only equaled by the man's extreme modesty. He sat at his usual desk, as first violin, and played in the Beethoven overture, arose and played the Concerto without the formality of an "entrance," with its invitation for applause, and then, after a performance which only two or three artists now before the public could equal, he returned to his place and led the violins through the Schumann Symphony. The audience was not misled, however, and the violinist received something approaching an ovation at the conclusion of the last movement, with its dazzling complication of notes and its dashing embodiment of the Gypsy spirit.

The concert closed with Schumann's first, or "Spring," symphony, which bubbles over with spring and youth. The Schumann of the piano is characteristically an intellectual poet with charming, if sometimes recondite, fancies and unfailing taste. The Schumann of this "First Symphony" is a poet with good, red blood bubbling in his veins, like the sap in trees in spring time. It is wholly delightful and Dr. Muck should be thanked for returning it to his programme, from which it has been banished too long.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
1916
Date

Establish

Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall

Dr. Karl Muck and His Orchestra Make the Most of an Uninteresting Programme.

There was little enthusiasm shown by the audience at yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. The programme, which was uninteresting, began with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" symphony, of which the first movement is interesting, while the remaining three are somnolent. This was followed by Liszt's symphonic poem, called "What One Hears on the Mountain." What one heard was beautifully played, but the music was of such calibre as to dissuade one from hearing it a second time. Finally came Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman," which, although far from being one of Wagner's masterpieces, loomed so high above the rest of the programme that it sounded brilliant.

Dr. Karl Muck conducted with his customary virtuosity and Anton Witek, concert master, played his solos in the Liszt piece with rare beauty of tone.

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date 1916

Establis

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was at its best last night at Carnegie Hall. Without the aid of other soloists than the artists of the organization Dr. Muck presented a programme of varied interest and the prolonged applause which brought the orchestra to its feet after the last two numbers was a deserved tribute to the playing of the famous band of musicians. Debussy's symphonic sketches "La Mer," the colorful, sunlit tone poem, was magnificently rendered, as was Strauss's "Don Quixote." Mr. Warnke poured out the soul of the famous knight on the 'cello with fine effect and Mr. Ferir played the viola part beautifully. Good old papa Haydn's E flat major symphony brought the interesting concert to a close. A finely arranged programme, Dr. Muck, and played as only the Bostons can play!

From TRIBUNE
Address

From

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City
Date FEB 18 1916
Established:

SYMPHONY BAND FROM BOSTON IN CONCERT

Debussy, Richard Strauss and Haydn— and enough of each to make an evening of music more than two hours long—were the composers who filled the programme of Dr. Karl Muck at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night. There was thus the impressionistic programme music of the modern French school, the old-fashioned narrative programme music of the middle nineteenth century of Liszt, new-moded by the mannerist cleverness of Strauss, and finally, the still fresh melodic vivacity of a quite other day.

One followed the plan and purpose of this programme with the proper intellectual pleasure—only its length was somewhat trying to continuously unmixed concentration. One found oneself waiting with a certain impatient urge for the dying glissando violoncello sigh of the poor Knight of la Mancha and following it with a decrescendo breathing sibilance of glissando satisfaction. And Haydn, afterward, perforce stirred only a Quixotically jaded pulse.

Dr. Muck chose to play all three of the symphonic sketches making up Debussy's "La Mer." Generally orchestral conductors play only one or another of them. These pieces are so largely in the same genre, their apparatus of impressionistic expression is so much the same in all and, esthetically, the turn of fancy in their conception is spun so much from the same always-glistening skein that one grows a bit weary before all three have been heard.

The first of the sketches, "De l'Aube a Midi sur la Mer," is an aubade at sea, and as a marine picture of a modernist "calm sea and prosperous voyage" is indubitably effective. Debussy's originality of instrumentation and orchestration serves him aptly for creating a subjective feeling for the wide expanses of sunlit ocean.

The other two sketches are called "Jeux de Vagues" and "Dialogue du Vent et de la Mer." As in the first, there is here a special genius for devising fitting orchestral effects. The sketches are always fanciful in intent and in result. Indeed, all three pieces are the product of an exquisite, poetic fancy and they are programme music only in its broadest sense.

It was illuminating to listen to the type of orchestral cleverness that is Strauss following that of the Frenchman. In the "Don Quixote" theme and variations, Strauss thus stood revealed as the manipulator of the mechanics of the orchestra, muting everything from the strings to the tuba or making the trombone squeal and the trumpet bleat.

Both Strauss and Debussy, in these pieces, are far from simple matters for an orchestra to play. They necessitate an almost continuous virtuosoship on the part of most of the members of the band. A large part of the particular pleasure in the Debussy sea sketches was the niceties of effect accomplished by the Boston players, while their admirable compassing of all the bristling difficulties made much of the interest in "Don Quixote."

Mr. Warnke, the first violoncellist of the orchestra, who played the chief solo part in "Don Quixote," proved himself to be an artist of intelligence, great technical ability and capable of producing a powerful, deeply beautiful tone from his instrument.

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City.
Date
Establ 34

Debussy, Strauss and Haydn.

Karl Muck likes to give his New York audiences violent contrasts of old and new music. Last evening the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began with Debussy and progressed through the sophistication of Strauss to the simplicity of Haydn.

All three compositions were comparatively unfamiliar. Debussy's "La Mer" suggests little of the sea but much that concerns modern orchestral methods. The third section contains practically all the tricks used by Stravinsky in his Russian ballet music.

The Strauss "Don Quixote" has much dullness to offset its flashes of real humor, and the Haydn "Paukenwirbel" symphony, aside from its first movement, is not a particularly interesting work.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date FEB 20 1916
Establis

Rare Liszt Work Given by Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in a most interesting programme in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Only three selections were given, but they were of unusual diversity.

The first number was a symphony by Rimshy-Karsakoff, entitled "Aantar," a work essentially oriental in character, melody and treatment. It resembled the same composer's "Scherherazade" suite, which proved one of the great musical attractions of the Diaghileff ballet.

The orchestra's interpretation of the veiled, vogue elemental strains and their charming harmonic environment was totally inglorious and perfect in its symmetry and balance.

The second selection was Liszt's setting to Victor Hugo's poem, "What One Hears on the Mountain." The Frenchman's verse is filled with just the sort of description and word pictures that would inspire Liszt to his greatest eloquence. And it did.

In the music given yesterday (for the first time at a concert of the Bostonians) the large and rapt audience heard Liszt in his most melodious, magnificent and ennobled mood. The hymn-like finale, sonorous, solemn and ineffably beautiful, was only one of many superb episodes in the too rarely heard composition.

The overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" was the closing selection. The audience, as is customary at these events, filled every seat and most of the standing room.

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date
Establishe

The performance of Debussy's "La Mer" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening induced Philip Hale, the writer of the programme notes, to quote W. E. Henley on the discovery of the ocean by Byron, who took it into his confidence and opened his soul to it. There is much description too in Byron, but one may doubt whether all of it rose much higher than Bryant's one line, "Old ocean's gray and melancholy waste."

Mr. Hale quotes from the excellent programme notes of the Chicago Orchestra, written by the distinguished critic Felix Borowski, a list of works composed with the ocean as the subject or suggestion. Mr. Hale finds the list incomplete and adds some works. Neither he nor Mr. Borowski recalled Nicode's remarkable tone poem "Das Meer."

The lists were confined to purely orchestral works; but even this could have properly included the greatest ocean composition of all, the overture to "The Flying Dutchman." For while the music discourses of more than the sea, its foundation is the great deep and the might of its tumult. No music has ever painted this with more splendid eloquence than the wild rush of Wagner's description.

The composer of "Tristan und Isolde" found other moods of the sea to voice, for he presents us not only with an idealized chantey in the first act, but in the introduction to the third he sings the loneliness of an empty ocean in heart wringing accents. Wagner had made a stormy voyage on a sailing vessel, and that is an experience which brings a man to a closer communion with the sea than even a winter crossing of the North Atlantic when made in a steel leviathan of 20,000 tons.

Those who go down to the sea in ships go much further when the rail is not over fifteen or eighteen feet from the water than when it is thirty or forty. Shouldering the billows aside with the driving power of triple screws gives one a confidence of victory which is quite absent when the ship is reeling and staggering through them under a "three reefed mitten with the thumb brailed up." Wagner might never have conceived the tempestuous parts of the "Flying Dutchman" overture if instead of sailing for London from Pillau in a windjammer he had gone from Petrograd in the Czarevitch Alexei (electric lights, stewardesses, &c.).

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date FEB 20 1916
Esta 1884

DR. MUCK PLAYS OLD SYMPHONIES

Orchestra's Revival of Music Seldom Given Gets Light Applause.

Dr. Muck's programmatic ideas still remain a mystery unfathomable. On Thursday evening, indeed, there appeared an evidence of regard for his audience, and a programme of varied interest was performed.

There was Debussy's "La Mer," Strauss's "Don Quixote," and Haydn's Symphony in E flat major (B. and H. No. 1), and if the Haydn symphony had been better first in the evening, it was yet a programme compounded of many moods.

But yesterday afternoon saw a partial return to the usual course—it is true that moods were several, but then the two major numbers possessed as their reason for performance the sole fact that they are rarely performed. At least this was what the huge audience in Carnegie Hall appeared to gather, with the result that its applause, if polite, was exceedingly light. These two numbers were the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Antar" Symphony, and the Liszt symphonic Poem No. 1, "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne."

The "Antar" Symphony is programmatic in content, and in the score the composer printed a synopsis of the ideas he wished to express. Antar is a hero of Arabic legend, and the symphony depicts his journey into the desert, where he saves the life of the fairy Ghul-Mazor, who as a reward promises him the three fruitions of his life—the delights of revenge, power, and love. These three very Oriental wishes are expressed by Rimsky-Korsakoff with, at times, as in the third movement, some amount of Oriental fancy, but the major portion of the work appeared given over to the muse of Dulness.

The Liszt symphonic poem is rarely given nowadays. With the exception of "Les Préludes," the Liszt orchestral compositions are fast becoming, to all but the Perfect Lisztian, a weariness to the spirit. It is doubtful if even the Perfect Lisztian will be able to go "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne."

It was written on the poem by Victor Hugo, and this, with the fact that it was the earliest of the symphonic poems, is its chief interest. It shows of course a certain mastery of orchestral effect, but its ideas are so impoverished and there is such a pompous ponderosity of brass that long before its end it became quite unbearable.

That Dr. Muck and his great orchestra did their best to bring out what beauties were in these two works does not need to be stated. The precision of the great band, its balance of tone, its general euphony of expression, were beyond all praise. And in the closing number, "The Flying Dutchman," these virtues brought splendid results.

From WORLD
Address: New York Cit
Date FEB 20 191
Established:

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES LISZT'S HEAVIEST WORK.

"Ce Qu'on Entend sur la Montagne" Is Well Rendered, but Lacks Excellence of Composer.

Liszt's symphonic poem, No. 1, "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne," had its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Why it is not performed oftener becomes apparent at a hearing, for it is heavy and lacking in the excellence the composer put into most of his orchestral works of similar character.

It was presented for the first time in this city by the Philharmonic Orchestra in 1869, under the direction of Carl Bergmann, and did not attract sufficient notice to warrant frequent repetition.

Its performance yesterday was brilliant, for the Boston musicians appeared to be in the best playing form. The strings in particular were resonant and noticeably pure in tone, and all the choirs played with a precision that was inspiriting. But this did not save the work.

Rimsky-Korsakov's second symphony "Antar," opened the concert, and its Oriental beauties were admirably revealed in the colorful interpretation under Dr. Muck's conducting. Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture concluded the concert.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date FEB 21 191

SYMPHONY CONCERT HELD

Beethoven - Wagner - Liszt Numbers Draw Crowd.

Beethoven-Wagner-Liszt is a hyphenation to conjure with in the field of symphonic concerts. The huge audience at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, perhaps the largest audience that has attended a Philharmonic concert this season, plainly attested to this fact. Strauss may be a sensation of the moment, but it is evident that the old names stand the test of time.

The inclusion of Liszt in yesterday's triumvirate will probably please the Lisztians, though to others it was a distinct anti-climax. Let us be thankful, however, that Mr. Stransky, more merciful than Dr. Muck, gave us Liszt's best symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," rather than his worst. The other two Liszt numbers were two of his songs, "Es Muss Ein Wunderbares Sein" and "Angiolin dal Biondo Crin," sung by Mme. Julia Culp. Mme. Culp also sang Beethoven's "Freudvoll und Leidvoll" and "Die Trommel Gerühret" with rare beauty, both of tone and interpretive understanding.

The symphony was the Beethoven Eighth, of which the band gave a commendable if not brilliant performance, Mr. Stransky's hand at time seeming a trifle heavy. The other Beethoven number was the "Egmont" overture. Of Wagner there was the "Tannhäuser" Bacchanale and his "Traume," sung by Mme. Culp.

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FEB

Music To-day.

The Boston Orchestra Symphony Concert Is Representative of Central Powers and Dr. Muck Conducts with Enthusiasm.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Brooklyn last month with Ernest Schelling, the English pianist, and a number of war compositions on the program, Dr. Karl Muck was suddenly seized by an attack of the grippe, and one of the first violins acted as his substitute. Of course, the pro-Ally nature of the program and the illness of the conductor was a mere coincidence, then, and last night it was a mere coincidence assuredly that the entire program was German, with a strong Austro-Hungarian flavor, and Dr. Muck wielded the baton with unwonted enthusiasm.

Joachim's Concerto in D Major for violin and orchestra, in the Hungarian style, was the most interesting number on the program from the viewpoint of the intellectuals, but it did not stir spontaneous applause. Anton Witek, concert master of the orchestra, was soloist and performed the extremely difficult work in a most creditable manner. The concerto is forty minutes in length, and is filled with double stops and three-voiced passages. The first movement is particularly technical, the second and third movements are freer and more melodious, with an effective finale. Yet the impression that remains is one of admiration for the physical strength of the soloist, upon whom the burden of the work is thrown, and toward whom the composer was merciless.

The Schumann Spring Symphony and the Leonora Overture No. 1 were the other numbers. The symphony in B flat major seems to be the most popular of the four composed by Schumann, and Dr. Muck's men played it with rare zest. The overture, too, was delightful. The next and last concert of the series will take place March 17, for which no soloist has been selected.

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date FEB 20 1916

Karl Muck, Josef Stransky and Walter Damrosch had better look to their laurels. Charlie Chaplin is going to conduct the Sousa band at the Hippodrome to-night, not only in a number by the march king, but also in Suppe's "Poet and Peasant" overture. His daring may be understood from his intention to escape to Los Angeles to-morrow.

Possible spectators at the Bandbox Theatre this week should be careful about the night they select. Three charities have bought the house on three evenings. There will be a benefit for destitute Russian women and children on Wednesday, for the relief of hal forphans and destitute children on Thursday and the Stonywold Sanatorium on Friday.

Nat Goodwin has started for Florida, where he will appear in a five reel farce.

From
EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y
Address
Date FEB 18 1916

THREE INSTITUTE LECTURES

Prof. Clarke, Frank Speight and H. E. Ives Heard.

Professor Hugh A. Clarke, who has been for forty-one years head of the music department of the University of Pennsylvania, lectured yesterday afternoon on the programme that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at the Academy of Music tonight. He discussed the structure of the Beethoven "Leonore Overture, No. 1," playing the various motives on the piano. Then he considered the three movements of Joachim's "Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, Opus 11," and concluded with the B flat major symphony of Schumann.

With an able interpretation of "A Tale of Two Cities," Frank Speaight concluded his course of Dickens recitals in the music hall of the Academy last evening. The story was divided into eight chapters.

Herbert E. Ives of Philadelphia explained the system of making "Artificial Daylight," last evening, in the lecture hall of the Academy, illustrating his lecture with lantern slides and practical demonstrations.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City.
Date [illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Last night's concert at Carnegie Hall was of the most thoroughly satisfying description, an evening of enjoyment without flaw. The principal reason was a superb programme, Debussy's "La Mer," Strauss's "Don Quixote," and Haydn's first symphony.

The second reason was the entire and merciful absence of a soloist. No singer of uncertain voice came to interrupt our enjoyment with his or her screeches and efforts to persuade us that the scale for the human voice is divided into quarter tones. No tedious virtuoso strutted on the platform to play a Chopin concerto or any other device for turning a symphony concert into a piano recital. There was nothing but the purest, loftiest, and in the last analysis the most satisfying form of music.

The orchestra played Debussy's ravishingly colorful music with a rich, orchidaceous tonal effect. The literary idea that suggested these symphonic pictures may help some listeners to enjoy them. But it is as pure music that they really make their appeal, a powerful appeal to the æsthetic emotions.

"Don Quixote" is one of the less frequently played of the Strauss tone poems. Without the transcendent, overpowering effect of "Tod und Verklaerung" or "Heldenleben," the work nevertheless stands the test of time as a composition with moments of supreme beauty and occasional flashes of practical humor.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date FEB 20 1916

PLAY "ANTAR" SYMPHONY.

Boston Orchestra Is Also Impressive in a Wagner Overture.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the matinee performance of its fourth pair of concerts in New York yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. Dr. Muck's program consisted of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" Symphony, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne" ("What one Hears on the Mountain,") and the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," by Wagner. This was not a long program in the playing, and it could be called unusual in the sense that the composers named are not generally represented by the works played yesterday. Liszt's "Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne" has, in fact, never been played by this organization in New York before, and there is one authority for the statement that there is no record of any other orchestra having played it here.

This symphonic poem, after a work by Victor Hugo, is the first work of its kind written by Liszt, who was the first composer to apply the title to this form of composition. Since then the writing of symphonic poems has known no end. One could find more to admire in the work yesterday from the historic viewpoint than from that of the music-lover, for it is rather long, somewhat diffuse, and undistinguished in its musical contents. The colorful and ingenious "Antar" symphony, not very often played, and the breadth and sonority of Wagner's scoring in "The Flying Dutchman," supplied musical neighbors on each side whose elegance made Liszt's work seem rather shabby and run down at the heels.

Dr. Muck and his orchestra were at their best in expounding the often complicated and always ingenious rhythms and colorings of "Antar" and in the impressive performance they gave of Wagner's overture.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date FEB 17 1916
Established:

SYMPHONY PLAYS UNUSUAL WORKS

Boston Orchestra Presents Program of Much Musical Interest.

A program of considerable musical interest but of limited general appeal was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, at the Lyric last night at its fourth concert here of the season. It consisted of Beethoven's overture to Leonore, No. 1, Opus 138, Joseph Joachim's concerto for violin and orchestra, Opus 11, and Liszt's first symphonic poem, entitled What One Hears on the Mountain. This was the first performance of the Liszt work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore. The special soloist of the concert was Anton Witek, the concert-master of the orchestra. The orchestra played better than usual.

Beethoven's so-called "first" Leonore overture was a pleasant change from the more frequent performances of the other overtures bearing the same name. It is not compelling music, however, and interest in it is by no means stimulated by a tedious introduction. Even the program notes by Philip Hale admit the introduction is long.

A brighter piece of more contrast than the overture would have made the long concerto, which followed, seem more agreeable and less taxing to follow to the musician as well as to the average auditor. The first movement required 25 minutes to play and the entire work over 40 minutes. The work is particularly interesting, as the musical utterance of one whose compositions are heard seldom. Its individual expressions, as they differ from those of other composers, gave probably the chief musical interest, as well as the embellishment of the cadenza at the end of the first movement with orchestral accompaniment, which is infrequent. This last Joachim did quite effectively. The concerto as a whole, however, is more prosy than poetic, as graceful as it is.

Mr. Witek showed great virtuosity in his performance. The composition keeps the solo player exceedingly busy, and Mr. Witek showed himself equal to the prolonged difficult tasks it imposes. His tone was certain in the most difficult places, and he was adaptable to the rapid changes of methods of expression. He was versatile and highly skilful throughout.

Liszt's clarity of orchestration is one of his strongest points. Few composers equal him in this. Consequently his music is vivid, clear and truly sonorous. The symphonic poem played last night, after a poem by Victor Hugo, contained these qualities. The composition is brilliant and it was played brilliantly. In fact, the thematic playing of the orchestra throughout the concert was more clearly done than sometimes.

J. N. H.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date FEB 19 1916

Beginning with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar," the Boston Symphony players were taking their leave for a month at Carnegie Hall this afternoon by reviving an old tone poem of Liszt, "What One Hears on the Mountain." By Philip Hale's official programme book it appears that this particular "One" in that lofty position hears voices of nature and humanity, of earth and ocean, of the heavens and—Mr. Hale uses the short and ugly word—of hell. Liszt himself wrote of the production fifty-nine years ago: "I expect all sorts of horrors from the critics and public in the present state of affairs." He was not disappointed. Later, in New York, a correspondent wrote: "The Liszt nondescript was humanely put at the end of the programme. The audience was an immense one and was down stairs a decorous one. In the third gallery, however, the talking, laughing, flirting and boorish rudeness were simply disgraceful. I regret to say that upon the fair sex rests the responsibility for three-fourths of this absolutely 'hoggish' behavior." Such conduct would hardly be tolerated where Dr. Muck casts his pearls to-day.

[106]

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date FEB 21 1916

SYMPHONY CONCERT HELD

Beethoven - Wagner - Liszt Numbers Draw Crowd.

Esta 884

Beethoven-Wagner-Liszt is a hyphenation to conjure with in the field of symphonic concerts. The huge audience at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, perhaps the largest audience that has attended a Philharmonic concert this season, plainly attested to this fact. Strauss may be a sensation of the moment, but it is evident that the old names stand the test of time.

The inclusion of Liszt in yesterday's triumvirate will probably please the Lisztians, though to others it was a distinct anti-climax. Let us be thankful, however, that Mr. Stransky, more merciful than Dr. Muck, gave us Liszt's best symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," rather than his worst. The other two Liszt numbers were two of his songs, "Es Muss Ein Wunderbares Sein" and "Angiolin dal Biondo Crin," sung by Mme. Julia Culp. Mme. Culp also sang Beethoven's "Freudvoll und Leidvoll" and "Die Trommel Gerühret" with rare beauty, both of tone and interpretive understanding.

The symphony was the Beethoven Eighth, of which the band gave a commendable if not brilliant performance, Mr. Stransky's hand at time seeming a trifle heavy. The other Beethoven number was the "Egmont" overture. Of Wagner there was the "Tannhäuser" Bacchanale nd his "Traume," sung by Mme. Culp.

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FEB

Music To-day.

The Boston Orchestra Symphony Concert Is Representative of Central Powers and Dr. Muck Conducts with Enthusiasm.

Establis

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Brooklyn last month with Ernest Schelling, the English pianist, and a number of war compositions on the program, Dr. Karl Muck was suddenly seized by an attack of the grippe, and one of the first violins acted as his substitute. Of course, the pro-Ally nature of the program and the illness of the conductor was a mere coincidence, then, and last night it was a mere coincidence assuredly that the entire program was German, with a strong Austro-Hungarian flavor, and Dr. Muck wielded the baton with unwonted enthusiasm.

Joachim's Concerto in D Major for violin and orchestra, in the Hungarian style, was the most interesting number on the program from the viewpoint of the intellectuals, but it did not stir spontaneous applause. Anton Witek, concert master of the orchestra, was soloist and performed the extremely difficult work in a most creditable manner. The concerto is forty minutes in length, and is filled with double stops and three-voiced passages. The first movement is particularly technical, the second and third movements are freer and more melodious, with an effective finale. Yet the impression that remains is one of admiration for the physical strength of the soloist, upon whom the burden of the work is thrown, and toward whom the composer was merciless.

The Schumann Spring Symphony and the Leonora Overture No. 1 were the other numbers. The symphony in B flat major seems to be the most popular of the four composed by Schumann, and Dr. Muck's men played it with rare zest. The overture, too, was delightful. The next and last concert of the series will take place March 17, for which no soloist has been selected.

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date FEB

stabli

Karl Muck, Josef Stransky and Walter Damrosch had better look to their laurels. Charlie Chaplin is going to conduct the Sousa band at the Hippodrome to-night, not only in a number by the march king, but also in Suppe's "Poet and Peasant" overture. His daring may be understood from his intention to escape to Los Angeles to-morrow.

Possible spectators at the Bandbox Theatre this week should be careful about the night they select. Three charities have bought the house on three evenings. There will be a benefit for destitute Russian women and children on Wednesday, for the relief of hal forphans and destitute children on Thursday and the Stonywold Sanatorium on Friday.

Nat Goodwin has started for Florida, where he will appear in a five reel farce.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FEB 18 1916

THREE INSTITUTE LECTURES

Prof. Clarke, Frank Speight and H. E. Ives Heard.

Estab 4

Professor Hugh A. Clarke, who has been for forty-one years head of the music department of the University of Pennsylvania, lectured yesterday afternoon on the programme that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at the Academy of Music tonight. He discussed the structure of the Beethoven "Leonore Overture, No. 1," playing the various motives on the piano. Then he considered the three movements of Joachim's "Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, Opus 11," and concluded with the B flat major symphony of Schumann.

With an able interpretation of "A Tale of Two Cities," Frank Speaight concluded his course of Dickens recitals in the music hall of the Academy last evening. The story was divided into eight chapters.

Herbert E. Ives of Philadelphia explained the system of making "Artificial Daylight," last evening, in the lecture hall of the Academy, illustrating his lecture with lantern slides and practical demonstrations.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Est 1884

Last night's concert at Carnegie Hall was of the most thoroughly satisfying description, an evening of enjoyment without flaw. The principal reason was a superb programme, Debussy's "La Mer," Strauss's "Don Quixote," and Haydn's first symphony.

The second reason was the entire and merciful absence of a soloist. No singer of uncertain voice came to interrupt our enjoyment with his or her screeches and efforts to persuade us that the scale for the human voice is divided into quarter tones. No tedious virtuoso strutted on the platform to play a Chopin concerto or any other device for turning a symphony concert into a piano recital. There was nothing but the purest, loftiest, and in the last analysis the most satisfying form of music.

The orchestra played Debussy's ravishingly colorful music with a rich, orchidaceous tonal effect. The literary idea that suggested these symphonic pictures may help some listeners to enjoy them. But it is as pure music that they really make their appeal, a powerful appeal to the æsthetic emotions.

"Don Quixote" is one of the less frequently played of the Strauss tone poems. Without the transcendent, overpowering effect of "Tod und Verklaerung" or "Heldenleben," the work nevertheless stands the test of time as a composition with moments of supreme beauty and occasional flashes of practical humor.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date FEB 20 1916

PLAY "ANTAR" SYMPHONY.

Boston Orchestra Is Also Impressive in a Wagner Overture.

Estab 884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the matinee performance of its fourth pair of concerts in New York yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. Dr. Muck's program consisted of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" Symphony, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne" ("What one Hears on the Mountain,") and the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," by Wagner. This was not a long program in the playing, and it could be called unusual in the sense that the composers named are not generally represented by the works played yesterday. Liszt's "Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne" has, in fact, never been played by this organization in New York before, and there is one authority for the statement that there is no record of any other orchestra having played it here.

This symphonic poem, after a work by Victor Hugo, is the first work of its kind written by Liszt, who was the first composer to apply the title to this form of composition. Since then the writing of symphonic poems has known no end. One could find more to admire in the work yesterday from the historic viewpoint than from that of the music-lover, for it is rather long, somewhat diffuse, and undistinguished in its musical contents. The colorful and ingenious "Antar" symphony, not very often played, and the breadth and sonority of Wagner's scoring in "The Flying Dutchman," supplied musical neighbors on each side whose elegance made Liszt's work seem rather shabby and run down at the heels.

Dr. Muck and his orchestra were at their best in expounding the often complicated and always ingenious rhythms and colorings of "Antar" and in the impressive performance they gave of Wagner's overture.

[106]

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date FEB 17 1916

Established:

SYMPHONY PLAYS UNUSUAL WORKS

Boston Orchestra Presents Program of Much Musical Interest.

A program of considerable musical interest but of limited general appeal was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, at the Lyric last night at its fourth concert here of the season. It consisted of Beethoven's overture to Leonore, No. 1, Opus 138, Joseph Joachim's concerto for violin and orchestra, Opus 11, and Liszt's first symphonic poem, entitled What One Hears on the Mountain. This was the first performance of the Liszt work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore. The special soloist of the concert was Anton Witek, the concert-master of the orchestra. The orchestra played better than usual.

Beethoven's so-called "first" Leonore overture was a pleasant change from the more frequent performances of the other overtures bearing the same name. It is not compelling music, however, and interest in it is by no means stimulated by a tedious introduction. Even the program notes by Philip Hale admit the introduction is long.

A brighter piece of more contrast than the overture would have made the long concerto, which followed, seem more agreeable and less taxing to follow to the musician as well as to the average auditor. The first movement required 25 minutes to play and the entire work over 40 minutes. The work is particularly interesting, as the musical utterance of one whose compositions are heard seldom. Its individual expressions, as they differ from those of other composers, gave probably the chief musical interest, as well as the embellishment of the cadenza at the end of the first movement with orchestral accompaniment, which is infrequent. This last Joachim did quite effectively. The concerto as a whole, however, is more prosy than poetic, as graceful as it is.

Mr. Witek showed great virtuosity in his performance. The composition keeps the solo player exceedingly busy, and Mr. Witek showed himself equal to the prolonged difficult tasks it imposes. His tone was certain in the most difficult places, and he was adaptable to the rapid changes of methods of expression. He was versatile and highly skilful throughout Liszt's clarity of orchestration is one of his strongest points. Few composers equal him in this. Consequently his music is vivid, clear and truly sonorous. The symphonic poem played last night, after a poem by Victor Hugo, contained these qualities. The composition is brilliant and it was played brilliantly. In fact, the thematic playing of the orchestra throughout the concert was more clearly done than sometimes.

J. N. H.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date FEB 19 1916

Estab 84

Beginning with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar," the Boston Symphony players were taking their leave for a month at Carnegie Hall this afternoon by reviving an old tone poem of Liszt, "What One Hears on the Mountain." By Philip Hale's official programme book it appears that this particular "One" in that lofty position hears voices of nature and humanity, of earth and ocean, of the heavens and—Mr. Hale uses the short and ugly word—of hell. Liszt himself wrote of the production fifty-nine years ago: "I expect all sorts of horrors from the critics and public in the present state of affairs." He was not disappointed. Later, in New York, a correspondent wrote: "The Liszt nondescript was humanely put at the end of the programme. The audience was an immense one and was down stairs a decorous one. In the third gallery, however, the talking, laughing, flirting and boorish rudeness were simply disgraceful. I regret to say that upon the fair sex rests the responsibility for three-fourths of this absolutely 'hoggish' behavior." Such conduct would hardly be tolerated where Dr. Muck casts his pearls to-day.

From TRIBUNE
Address

Date

From Music & Drama

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FFB 1 8 1916

ork, 1884

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME TALK.

Lecture on To-Night's Entertainment by Professor Clarke.

Professor Hugh A. Clarke, who has been for forty-one years head of the music department of the University of Pennsylvania, lectured yesterday afternoon on the programme that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at the Academy of Music to-night.

He discussed the structure of the Beethoven Leonore overture, No. 1, playing the various motives on the piano. Then he considered the three movements of Joachim's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, opus 11, and concluded with the charming B flat major Symphony of Schumann, with its sweet simple themes and pianistic qualities.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date FEB 2 0 1916

Estab 1884

LISZT POEM OFFERED.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Presents One of His Early Works.

An especially interesting feature of the programme offered yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck's direction, was Liszt's first symphonic poem, "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne" ("What one hears on the Mountain"), inspired by Victor Hugo's poem of that name.

It can hardly be said that the matinee gathering received Liszt's oldest and newest symphonic poem with joy. Perhaps it was too long to satisfy their tastes, coming as it did after the "Antar" symphony of Rimsky-Korsakoff, whose music shows the brand of Liszt, though more distinctly in "Sadko," which Hunecker tells us comes directly from the "Mountain" symphony, than in the work heard on this occasion. Connoisseurs, however, marveled at the originality and the vitality of this creation of genius and tried in vain to find a reasonable explanation for the neglect it had suffered in the course of almost forty years, while other far less inspired and far less beautiful works were receiving constant attention.

The programme, which opened so impressively with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" symphony, closed no less effectively with the overture to Wagner's "Der Fliegende Hollaender."

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City FEB 2 0 1916
Date

Esta 384

Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter.

Die Symphonie „Antar" von Rimsky-Korſakoff gehört meinem Gefühl nach zu den weniger erfreulichen Werken des ſehr geſchätzten ruſſiſchen Komponiſten. Sie iſt umfangreich, ſehr umfangreich, während für mich Rimsky-Korſakoff in Werken von geringerer Ausdehnung am wirkſamſten iſt. Dazu verführt der Vorwurf den Tonſetzer zu Sentimentalitäten und ſtarker Pathetik, zu grübelndem Peſſimismus, während ich den Hauptreiz des Komponiſten in ſeinem üblichen, ſo ſympatiſch wirkenden Optimismus erblicke. Schöne Partien enthält ja auch dieſes Werk, und nicht wenige, wie z. B. der emotionelle, arabiſche Liebesgeſang und das duftig inſtrumentierte „Allegretto vivace", und daß die Boſtoner unter Dr. Mucks ebenſo genau abwägendem als gelegentlich verklärendem Stab ihre ſchönſten Klangfarben ins Treffen führten, das wird jeder gern glauben. Dieſer Antar hat die Fee Gül-Nazar, die Königin von Palmyra, die in der Geſtalt einer Gazelle ſich erging, vor dem Tod in den Fängen eines wilden Vogels gerettet, daher er drei Wünſche erbitten darf. Er verlangt die Freuden der Rache, der Macht und der Liebe. Als er alles ausgekoſtet hat, und die Liebkoſungen der Fee ihn nicht mehr locken können, da gibt ſie ihm, ihrem Uebereinkommen gemäß, den Tod.

Leider war dieſes in die Länge gezerrte Stück von einem anderen ungebührlich ausgezogenen Werk gefolgt, Franz Liszt's „Ce qu'on entend ſur la montagne", („Bergſinfonie"). Ich fühle mich zu ſehr als herzlicher Bewunderer und Verfechter Liszt's, um nicht den Mut zu finden, eines ſeiner ſchwächeren Werke auch ruhig als ſolches zu bezeichnen. Es handelt ſich im Weſentlichen um den Kontraſt des ſeligen Naturlebens und dem ſich ſelbſt um alle Freunde bringenden, ſtets nach Unerreichbarem ringenden Menſchengeſchlecht. Alſo Optimismus gegen Peſſimismus oder, um mit Schillers Worten zu ſprechen: „Die Welt iſt vollkommen überall — Wo der Menſch nicht hinkommt mit ſeiner Qual!" Ein „Andante Religioſe" ſoll ſchließlich andeuten, daß die Tröſtungen der Religion dem Menſchen als Zufluchtsort aus ſeinen Wirren und ſelbſt geſchaffenen Prüfungen [illegible] welche die längſte aller Liszt'ſchen ſymphoniſchen Poeme iſt, nicht nur an übermäßiger Ausdehnung, ſondern auch an völliger Formloſigkeit. Als ob die ordnende Hand in dieſem beſtändigen Wechſel und Jagen der Motive, in dem fortwährenden Wechſel der Tonqualität und des Tempos fehlen würde! Der Geſammteindruck bleibt daher ungeachtet des virtuoſen Spieles der Boſtoner (nur dem Dirigenten muß ich eine gelegentlich ſchwere Hand vorwerfen) ein wenig günſtiger.

Als den Glanzpunkt der Veranſtaltung möchte ich die einfach hinreißende Ausgeſtaltung der „Fliegenden Holländer"-Ouverture bezeichnen, die Muck und ſeine ſieggewohnten Scharen dieſem Stück Meerespoeſie angedeihen ließen. Wie gerne hätte man dieſes emotionelle Stück Muſikdarbietung noch einmal gehört. H.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 1916

Establi 84

THE FLOW OF MELODY IN SCHELLING WORK

How His Variations Impressed Auditors at Recent Boston Symphony Concert.

RARE FEAT OF NEW SINGER

But She Really Did Not Accomplish the Achievement With Which She Was Credited.

In a creative sense, the work of Ernest Schelling, "Theme and Variations," played by the Boston Orchestra last Monday night, is one of the most important contributions to the cause of American music heard so far in this country. Mr. Schelling, according to the program book, was born in New Jersey, a fact which establishes him as a native American, and places him in the forefront of the few real American composers. Mr. Schelling has lived abroad so long and is so foreign in appearance he would never be taken for a resident of this country. He is typically Spanish in looks. He might have been the model for any number of portraits in the great gallery in Madrid. Despite his foreign look and study in Europe, where, of course, he must necessarily have assimilated the modern ideas so pronounced in the writings of young composers, Mr. Schelling has given to the world a work that is strikingly original and unlike anything else for orchestra and piano. The idea of annotating each variation is not new, but the important thing, the variations themselves, are decidedly odd and interesting. The artistic side of his work alone would commend it, even were the melodic form lacking in beauty.

The variations are not planned as a vehicle for piano virtuosity, although they require great command of the keyboard, but more for orchestral manipulation, with the piano as part of the ensemble. There are many passages for piano alone and in conjunction with one or more instruments, but there are also soli for violin, viola and harp—so the piano, as such, never seems tiresome or obtrusive. The charm of melody, and the still greater quality of originality of form and structure seem inherent in Mr. Schelling's work, and make it one of compelling interest throughout. There is never the least striving after effect, but, on the contrary, a delightful and almost naive ease and flow of melody and form. It would be impossible to associate this work with striving and labor to produce it. It would seem more natural to think of it as an improvisation—something dashed off on the impulse of the moment, and filled with the power always conveyed by such strokes of genius.

* * *

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date FEB 1916

Established:

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Liszt's Symphonic Poems.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra usually plays better in New York than anywhere else, not only because it wants to hold its own in comparison with our local orchestras, but because the pieces performed here have been played previously in Boston (four or five times, including rehearsals), and also in Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington. Hence the excellent ensemble. On Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, this ensemble was again in evidence, but the performance of the opening and closing numbers—Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" symphony and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture, was surprisingly somnolent. To be sure, the symphony does not offer much material to inspire the conductor or the players. It is dull, especially in comparison with the same master's "Scheherazade." But the Wagner overture is a masterwork, in which one longs to hear the whistling of the wind in the masts and smell the salt breezes.

In the third number on the programme, fortunately, both the conductor and the orchestra found themselves, and rose to their usual high level of excellence, in giving a splendid performance of Liszt's unjustly neglected symphonic poem, "What One Hears on the Mountain." It is not, as Saint-Saëns holds, the best of Liszt's twelve works of this class, several of them, notably "Tasso," which follows it, being more inspired as a whole; yet it has superb pages, and one can understand that Wagner, who learned so much from these tone poems of Liszt, could find ecstatic delight (die grösste Wonne) in this "Mountain Symphony." It is based on a poem by Victor Hugo. From the top of a mountain the poet contemplates the sea and the glories of nature, and contrasts them with the troubles and torments of man. Liszt interweaves those motives ingeniously, and adds to them a third—Faith—which brings about a happy solution. The new musical form which has since revolutionized all orchestral writing makes this tone-poem of historic importance, and while parts of it are dull, others rise to sublime heights. The story has been told in this journal as to how, many years ago, Liszt himself showed Dr. Muck how to interpret this work. He and his musicians gave a splendid performance of it, and the audience bestowed on it the most cordial applause.

While "Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne" is the first of Liszt's symphonic poems, and "Tasso" the best, the most popular of them is "Les Préludes." This was on the programme of yesterday afternoon's Philharmonic concert in Carnegie Hall, and it is needless to say that Mr. Stransky brought out all its poetry. It is worth noting that America's two leading orchestral conductors, Stransky and Muck, are both of them Liszt enthusiasts, as, indeed, all the great conductors are and have been. Mr. Stransky also conducted Wagner's "Bacchanale" and Beethoven's "Egmont" and eighth symphony. There was a "capacity" audience, which lavished its applause on the orchestral works and also on the songs beautifully sung by Julia Culp: Beethoven's "Freudvoll und Leidvoll" and "Die Trommel Gerühret," Liszt's "Es muss ein Wunderbares sein," and Wagner's "Dreams."

From TRIBUNE
Address:

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 18 1916

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME TALK.

Lecture on To-Night's Entertainment by Professor Clarke.

Professor Hugh A. Clarke, who has been for forty-one years head of the music department of the University of Pennsylvania, lectured yesterday afternoon on the programme that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at the Academy of Music to-night.

He discussed the structure of the Beethoven Leonore overture, No. 1, playing the various motives on the piano. Then he considered the three movements of Joachim's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, opus 11, and concluded with the charming B flat major Symphony of Schumann, with its sweet simple themes and pianistic qualities.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date FEB 20 1916

LISZT POEM OFFERED.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Presents One of His Early Works.

An especially interesting feature of the programme offered yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck's direction, was Liszt's first symphonic poem, "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne" ("What one hears on the Mountain"), inspired by Victor Hugo's poem of that name.

It can hardly be said that the matinee gathering received Liszt's oldest and newest symphonic poem with joy. Perhaps it was too long to satisfy their tastes, coming as it did after the "Antar" symphony of Rimsky-Korsakoff, whose music shows the brand of Liszt, though more distinctly in "Sadko," which Hunecker tells us comes directly from the "Mountain" symphony, than in the work heard on this occasion. Connoisseurs, however, marveled at the originality and the vitality of this creation of genius and tried in vain to find a reasonable explanation for the neglect it had suffered in the course of almost forty years, while other far less inspired and far less beautiful works were receiving constant attention.

The programme, which opened so impressively with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" symphony, closed no less effectively with the overture to Wagner's "Der Fliegende Hollaender."

From STAATS=ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date

Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter.

Die Symphonie „Antar" von Rimsky-Korſakoff gehört meinem Gefühl nach zu den weniger erfreulichen Werken des ſehr geſchätzten ruſſiſchen Komponiſten. Sie iſt umfangreich, ſehr umfangreich, während für mich Rimsky-Korſakoff in Werken von geringerer Ausdehnung am wirkſamſten iſt. Dazu verführt der Vorwurf den Tonſetzer zu Sentimentalitäten und ſtarker Pathetik, zu grübelndem Peſſimismus, während ich den Hauptreiz des Komponiſten in ſeinem üblichen, ſo ſympatiſch wirkenden Optimismus erblicke. Schöne Partien enthält ja auch dieſes Werk, und nicht wenige, wie z. B. der emotionelle, arabiſche Liebesgeſang und das duftig inſtrumentierte „Allegretto vivace", und daß die Boſtoner unter Dr. Mucks ebenſo genau abwägendem als gelegentlich verklärendem Stab ihre ſchönſten Klangfarben ins Treffen führten, das wird jeder gern glauben. Dieſer Antar hat die Fee Gül-Nazar, die Königin von Palmyra, die in der Geſtalt einer Gazelle ſich erging, vor dem Tod in den Fängen eines wilden Vogels gerettet, daher er drei Wünſche erbitten darf. Er verlangt die Freuden der Rache, der Macht und der Liebe. Als er alles ausgekoſtet hat, und die Liebkoſungen der Fee ihn nicht mehr locken können, da gibt ſie ihm, ihrem Uebereinkommen gemäß, den Tod.

Leider war dieſes in die Länge gezerrte Stück von einem anderen ungebührlich ausgezogenen Werk gefolgt, Franz Liszt's „Ce qu'on entend ſur la montagne", („Bergſinfonie"). Ich fühle mich zu ſehr als herzlicher Bewunderer und Verfechter Liszt's, um nicht den Mut zu finden, eines ſeiner ſchwächeren Werke auch ruhig als ſolches zu bezeichnen. Es handelt ſich im Weſentlichen um den Kontraſt des ſeligen Naturlebens und dem ſich ſelbſt um alle Freunde bringenden, ſtets nach Unerreichbarem ringenden Menſchengeſchlecht. Alſo Optimismus gegen Peſſimismus oder, um mit Schillers Worten zu ſprechen: „Die Welt iſt vollkommen überall — Wo der Menſch nicht hinkommt mit ſeiner Qual!" Ein „Andante Religioſe" ſoll ſchließlich andeuten, daß die Tröſtungen der Religion dem Menſchen als Zufluchtsort aus ſeinen Wirren und ſelbſt geſchaffenen Prüfungen bedeuten. Leider krankt die Kompoſition, welche die längſte aller Liszt'ſchen ſymphoniſchen Poeme iſt, nicht nur an übermäßiger Ausdehnung, ſondern auch an völliger Formloſigkeit. Als ob die ordnende Hand in dieſem beſtändigen Wechſel und Jagen der Motive, in dem fortwährenden Wechſel der Tonqualität und des Tempos fehlen würde! Der Geſammteindruck bleibt daher ungeachtet des virtuoſen Spieles der Boſtoner (nur dem Dirigenten muß ich eine gelegentlich ſchwere Hand vorwerfen) ein wenig günſtiger.

Als den Glanzpunkt der Veranſtaltung möchte ich die einfach hinreißende Ausgeſtaltung der „Fliegenden Holländer"-Ouverture bezeichnen, die Muck und ſeine ſieggewohnten Scharen dieſem Stück Meerespoeſie angedeihen ließen. Wie gerne hätte man dieſes emotionelle Stück Muſikdarbietung noch einmal gehört. H.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

THE FLOW OF MELODY IN SCHELLING WORK

How His Variations Impressed Auditors at Recent Boston Symphony Concert.

RARE FEAT OF NEW SINGER

But She Really Did Not Accomplish the Achievement With Which She Was Credited.

In a creative sense, the work of Ernest Schelling, "Theme and Variations," played by the Boston Orchestra last Monday night, is one of the most important contributions to the cause of American music heard so far in this country. Mr. Schelling, according to the program book, was born in New Jersey, a fact which establishes him as a native American, and places him in the forefront of the few real American composers. Mr. Schelling has lived abroad so long and is so foreign in appearance he would never be taken for a resident of this country. He is typically Spanish in looks. He might have been the model for any number of portraits in the great gallery in Madrid. Despite his foreign look and study in Europe, where, of course, he must necessarily have assimilated the modern ideas so pronounced in the writings of young composers, Mr. Schelling has given to the world a work that is strikingly original and unlike anything else for orchestra and piano. The idea of annotating each variation is not new, but the important thing, the variations themselves, are decidedly odd and interesting. The artistic side of his work alone would commend it, even were the melodic form lacking in beauty.

The variations are not planned as a vehicle for piano virtuosity, although they require great command of the keyboard, but more for orchestral manipulation, with the piano as part of the ensemble. There are many passages for piano alone and in conjunction with one or more instruments, but there are also soli for violin, viola and harp—so the piano, as such, never seems tiresome or obtrusive. The charm of melody, and the still greater quality of originality of form and structure seem inherent in Mr. Schelling's work, and make it one of compelling interest throughout. There is never the least striving after effect, but, on the contrary, a delightful and almost naive ease and flow of melody and form. It would be impossible to associate this work with striving and labor to produce it. It would seem more natural to think of it as an improvisation—something dashed off on the impulse of the moment, and filled with the power always conveyed by such strokes of genius.

* * *

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date
Established:

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Liszt's Symphonic Poems.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra usually plays better in New York than anywhere else, not only because it wants to hold its own in comparison with our local orchestras, but because the pieces performed here have been played previously in Boston (four or five times, including rehearsals), and also in Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington. Hence the excellent ensemble. On Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, this ensemble was again in evidence, but the performance of the opening and closing numbers—Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" symphony and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture, was surprisingly somnolent. To be sure, the symphony does not offer much material to inspire the conductor or the players. It is dull, especially in comparison with the same master's "Scheherazade." But the Wagner overture is a masterwork, in which one longs to hear the whistling of the wind in the masts and smell the salt breezes.

In the third number on the programme, fortunately, both the conductor and the orchestra found themselves, and rose to their usual high level of excellence, in giving a splendid performance of Liszt's unjustly neglected symphonic poem, "What One Hears on the Mountain." It is not, as Saint-Saëns holds, the best of Liszt's twelve works of this class, several of them, notably "Tasso," which follows it, being more inspired as a whole; yet it has superb pages, and one can understand that Wagner, who learned so much from these tone poems of Liszt, could find ecstatic delight (die grösste Wonne) in this "Mountain Symphony." It is based on a poem by Victor Hugo. From the top of a mountain the poet contemplates the sea and the glories of nature, and contrasts them with the troubles and torments of man: Liszt interweaves those motives ingeniously, and adds to them a third—Faith—which brings about a happy solution. The new musical form which has since revolutionized all orchestral writing makes this tone-poem of historic importance, and while parts of it are dull, others rise to sublime heights. The story has been told in this journal as to how, many years ago, Liszt himself showed Dr. Muck how to interpret this work. He and his musicians gave a splendid performance of it, and the audience bestowed on it the most cordial applause.

While "Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne" is the first of Liszt's symphonic poems, and "Tasso" the best, the most popular of them is "Les Préludes." This was on the programme of yesterday afternoon's Philharmonic concert in Carnegie Hall, and it is needless to say that Mr. Stransky brought out all its poetry. It is worth noting that America's two leading orchestral conductors, Stransky and Muck, are both of them Liszt enthusiasts, as, indeed, all the great conductors are and have been. Mr. Stransky also conducted Wagner's "Bacchanale" and Beethoven's "Egmont" and eighth symphony. There was a "capacity" audience, which lavished its applause on the orchestral works and also on the songs beautifully sung by Julia Culp: Beethoven's "Freudvoll und Leidvoll" and "Die Trommel Gerühret," Liszt's "Es muss ein Wunderbares sein," and Wagner's "Dreams."

[107]

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 21 1916
Established:

Music.

The Frightfulness Programme and Dr. Muck.

A pianist from New York recently gave a recital in Boston. He put on his programme the F minor sonata of Brahms. He not only put it on his programme, he played it. The redoubtable Philip Hale, attending the recital, reacted as follows:

"Then there was the sonata by Brahms. It had already been played here this season by Messrs. Shattuck, Powell, and Bauer. There is an old saying, 'Three times and out!' but this saw is ignored by the disciples of Johannes. Mr. Cooper put the sonata on his programme without apology or trepidation. Mme Legenska announces its terrible approach. No doubt others will have no mercy before the season is over. Yet the years are passing quickly; we are all nearing the grave, and there is much beautiful music that could be played."

As the pianists do not confine their ministrations (when they can help it) to any one city or modify greatly en route the programmes they have worked up, New York this season has come in also for its course in the F minor sonata of Brahms. Notably Mr. Gabrilowitsch, whom Mr. Hale does not name in his list, has played it here. His performance I did not hear, but I am assured it was especially masterly, and quite sufficient unto the work for one season. But still the pianists are playing it, though much beautiful music, as Mr. Hale suggests, none of them are playing. Indeed, Mr. Hale is stirred up enough about the thing to point out the interesting discovery that in West Roxbury (of his town) there is a Brahms street, "running from 4589 Washington street about 160 feet southwest of Haydn street, northwest to about 107 feet beyond Nikisch avenue." Then slyly inquires Mr. Hale, "Why do not the pianists play the sonata out there?"

The case of the Brahms F minor sonata is not by any means unique. The sonata merely happens to be the worthy and unoffending piece the pianists have elected (of course they have not conspired!) to turn into the pianistic nuisance of the current season. The "song reciters" are doing the same thing for Hugo Wolf's "Elfenlied." Every warbler of our concert skies seems convinced that not to carol that merry ditty would be to wrench from an audience some deep-rooted, inalienable right. The orchestras have perhaps shown more mercy this year. At times in the past they have elected (not conspired!) to play the C minor or the D major symphony of Brahms, the Fifth or the Sixth of Tschaikowsky, or Beethoven's Third "Leonora" overture until the steady concert-goer was ready to shriek at the thought of the dread name.

Of course neither Mr. Damrosch, nor Mr. Stransky, nor Dr. Muck had the slightest idea that either of the other gentlemen, or any other orchestral conductor in America, was putting this or that work on an impending programme. How could those gentlemen, towering through the mists of fancy into that upper ether where the starry soul sits poised in lonely communication with an uncompanioned infinite. It is the grubbing professional reviewer who knows pestilent things like that. Meantime, to repeat the eloquent words of Mr. Hale, "The years are passing quickly; we are all nearing the grave, and there is much beautiful music that could be played." One reviewer was once even so imbedded in his earth-earthiness as to suggest a clearing house for concert pieces. Well, no interpreter stooped from his starry height to sanction that mundane proposition.

Dr. Muck, for this yarn has another strand, I do not blame too harshly for bringing over this or that symphonic work for performance in New York. He is a guest within our gates, a welcome guest, and he is perhaps entitled to fetch from his Boston repertory the pieces he regards as best for himself, his men, and his audiences, without too much attention to what the New York conductors are putting forward at the time. The frightfulness of repetition is not so much his frightfulness. His particular brand has been the frightfulness of collocation. The "unified" programmes of Dr. Muck would, one feels sure, have sorely depleted the ranks of the faithful attendants on concerts of the Boston band in this town were the band not so utterly extraordinary an organization and Dr. Muck so admirable a conductor. It is the supreme proof of those qualities that the subscription for the New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have continued at the top notch of possibility.

It is a particular pleasure now, after the various outcries that have been made in this place against the "unified" programmes of Dr. Muck, to emphasize approbation of the programme he offered New York last week. In the past, it has been maintained here, Dr. Muck has taken the surest means to render the classics obnoxious by stringing along in a single programme the deadly sequence of, for example, a Haydn symphony, a Mozart symphony, a Beethoven symphony. He has turned the moderns into a scourge by devoting a whole concert to the unrelieved publication of their most dissonances. A judicious mingling, a grateful contrast of periods and styles, has

Now, it is probably not for nothing that Dr. Muck looks as much like Satan as our own city's cherished Mephisto looks like President Eliot, and it takes no flight of fancy to conjure the smile of diabolic joy that played upon the visage of the learned Doctor when he abruptly turned upon his past and made two programmes to rejoice the hearts of those who have been detesting Muck the programme-maker as cordially as they have been doting on Muck the conductor. So why mince matters? Whatever Dr. Muck has done in the past and whatever he may do in the future, last week in New York he devoted the activities of his incomparable orchestra to two programmes of most gratifying selection and arrangement.

Take the programme Thursday night. There were two ultra modern pieces, Debussy's "La Mer," and Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote," for though neither was written yesterday, neither has yet ceased to be ultramodern. They are both works that require effort in the listening, that tax the attention; the hearts will probably allow themselves to be persuaded by parts and find themselves repelled by others. Now, to round off this sufficiency of the ultramodern, what more delightful than a symphony by Haydn—a mountain brook dancing in sunshine, no harder nut to chack than that!

The programme Saturday afternoon is less apt for illustration, because less vivid in contrasts. But neither Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" symphony nor Liszt's "What One Hears on the Mountain" is familiar here, and both put, therefore, some special strain on the attention of the listener. To cap these came "The Flying Dutchman" overture, admirably calculated to send an audience home satisfied with the concert and itself. I do not know whether the change in the doctorial policy is more than fleeting, other than a sly bit of jocular diablerie. Be that as it may, for this relief I thank you, Dr. Muck!

PITTS SANBORN.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

FEBRUARY 26.

UNUSUAL PROGRAM SUPERBLY PLAYED

Harold Bauer Shares Honors With Symphony Orchestra.

By E. F. Harkins

An unusual program, superbly performed from first to last, marked yesterday's Symphony concert, the glory being shared between the orchestra and Harold Bauer, the fourth piano soloist of the season.

On the program are Goldmark's "Sappho" overture, which has not been played at Symphony concerts since 1904; the Brahms concerto in B flat, for piano and orchestra, and the MacDowell suite in A minor, both of which have remained on the Symphony shelf for nearly a decade. To the younger devotees, the program possesses the double interest of being both classic and unfamiliar.

The Goldmark overture is typical of the composer, who, although a Hungarian by birth, was transported by his imagination to distant climes and still more distant eras. The introduction for two harps, imitating the ancient lyre, and the first melody, played by oboe to the accompaniment of harps, serve to establish the atmosphere of ancient Lesbos, where the nightingale sang his sweetest tune and the "little dark woman with black hair" and "beautiful smile" held court in spicy gardens overlooking the Egean. There are many solo passages for oboe, flute, harp and violin, and the romantic character of the composition itself is enriched in this instance by the brilliant character of the performance.

If visiting orchestras were to hear the performance of "Sappho" and the Brahms concerto—in which the orchestra is called upon to show virtuosity similar to that of the piano soloist—they might be induced to stay at home for a little while longer.

After the Goldmark number the orchestra was applauded until every man stood up. Another big outburst of applause rewarded the performance of the Brahms number. Mr. Bauer acknowledged it. He deserved a good share of it for his own brilliant performance, but the orchestra also merited a wealth of plaudits for its work.

The revival of the MacDowell suite is opportune. Foreign novelties are said to be scarcer than ever. But why be downhearted over this when such charming little tone pictures as MacDowell wrought in Wiesbaden and Peterboro can be ordered of the librarian?

The program of next week's concerts is as follows: Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 4; Volkmann, serenade for strings in F major; Ravel, "Spanish Rhapsody."

BOSTON GLOBE—

FEBRUARY 26.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Bauer's Playing Redeems Brahms Concerto.

Dr Muck Gives Poetic Reading of MacDowell Suite.

The symphony program yesterday consisted of Goldmarks overture, "Sappho," Brahm's second concerto in B flat major for piano and orchestra, Harold Bauer soloist, and McDowell's suite in A minor. Dr Muck conducted.

Sappho, the classic bardess, the passion and fire of whose songs made men forget that she had not beauty, would have been a likely subject for the modern Frenchman. One may ponder upon what Debussy of 10 years ago would have made of her, an impression by Ravel or Florent Schmitt would be well worth hearing. Had Richard Strauss preferred her above a day's doings in his own household as a theme, the result might have had greater anthropological value. Goldmark can claim little subtlety of expression, but his is honest, melodious music, straighforward and written with a sense of what will "sound." The hearer observed that the poetess had both lyric and imperious moments. The bardic introduction for the two harps in the set rhythmic sentences gives little warning of the storm about to break, a shrewd commentary upon femininity, whether Teutonic or Hellenic.

Fuller-Maitland, who is thrice eligible to the inner circle of the elect of Brahms, admits that apart from the thematic beauty of the first movement of the second piano concerto, "its unusual structure is apt to puzzle even educated hearers at first." Did Brahms write the fourth and last movement in a vein frankly reminiscent of the Hungarian dances, to cheer the drooping spirits from the other three? Until then, the piano is treated principally as an orchestral instrument. It has a graceful function in embroidering delicately the sustained song in cello and clarinet in the slow movement, but the soloist emerges but little from the ensemble until the final one. Much preceding has been cryptic, dry and pedantic as dust, a work for the student to hear and consider as a text. Mr Bauer made the most of his opportunities and finished in a brilliant manner, with superb dash and triumph.

When will the visiting virtuosos bring to these concerts the inspired beauty, for example, of a work like MacDowell's second concerto, pages teeming with imagination, music richly rewarding the player, and a stimulation to the audience? The suite was welcomed yesterday. The clear sensitivity, the intimate poetic gift that would never have permitted this man to set down music that in some degree did not give back light and beauty, is instinct in these five numbers. Each needs no other guide to understanding than the captions they bear. The "voices" he heard were those of nature, of a fervid, rich and nimble imagination, and not those of a turgid contrapuntal problem.

Dr Muck revealed his fine sense of mood and of proportion in all that he did—in overture, concerto, in which the orchestra outstrips soloist, and in the suite. The virtuosity of the men was characteristic and the golden euphony of tone that which the ear never forgets.

BOSTON HERALD.

FEBRUARY 26, 1916.

15TH SYMPHONY CONCERT OF SEASON GIVEN

Mr. Bauer, Pianist, Plays Brahms's Concerto No. 2—Its First Movement Weary Work — MacDowell's Beautiful and Fanciful Suite in A Minor, op. 42, Heard.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 15th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Bauer was the pianist. The program was as follows: Goldmark, overture to "Sappho"; Brahms, Concerto in B flat major, No. 2, for piano and orchestra; MacDowell, Suite in A minor, op. 42.

Goldmark's overture to "Sappho" had not been played here for a dozen years. The neglect is not easily explained. Another overture of Goldmark, "Prometheus," might well have a hearing. The two are perhaps not so characteristic of the composer's peculiar style as the "Sakuntala," but they are better musically and more effective than later overtures made in Germany which we have been obliged to hear.

It would be interesting to know what Goldmark had in mind when he wrote his "Sappho." The opening, with its solemn phrases for harps and then the oboe with its enchanting phrase, may well invoke the appearance of the Tenth Muse; but why the exulting trumpets with the fiery measures following? Is there the thought of Sappho's glory for all time? Or is there a portrayal of raging and despair? Goldmark might have replied: "I was chiefly concerned with writing an overture. Find in it what you please."

There are, indeed, beautiful and noble thoughts artfully and powerfully expressed. The hearer, however, may miss one great theme for Sappho, "a marvel, made of perfect sound and exceeding passion." The sustained measures that may express her love-longing are eloquent, but there is no supreme expression of sensuousness, except possibly in certain explosions in wailing dissonances, that caused Hanslick in 1893 to dub Goldmark "the king of dissonances," sighs and moans that even now seem strangely modern.

Mr. Joseffy after a brilliant performance of Brahms's concerto at a Symphony concert many years ago was enthusiastically applauded, for Mr. Joseffy, a Hungarian, played the last movement in an inimitable and intoxicating manner. Later in the evening, he marvelled at the applause, and kept saying: "And after this concerto of Brahms! After this concerto of Brahms!" Mr. Bauer gave a fine performance yesterday and he, too, was heartily applauded. The hearer might have said: "And after this concerto of Brahms!"

Some day a pianist may have the courage to play only the third and fourth movements of the concerto. The first movement is weary work, as the English malt-worm said after he had drunk twenty or thirty glasses of cider without their producing the expected and desired effect. Mr. Kalbeck, Brahms's adoring biographer, and some other deep-thinking Germans say that this concerto was inspired by Brahms's visits to Italy. But what of Italy is there in this concerto? Is there any blue sky, gorgeous sun, smiling landscape, vineclad hillslope in the first two movements? Is there anything of Italy in the third, charming as it is in its meditative spirit? In the fourth we are surely in Hungary. Even Mr. Bauer could not make the first movement endurable. Here Brahms was not in Venice, Orvieto, Sicily. He was far underground in the bowels of the earth; the only light came through a mine-shaft. The second movement enlarges the first offence, destroys the balance of the concerto, and is altogether superfluous.

It was a pleasure to hear MacDowell's Suite again. Not so important as the "Indian" Suite, it contains delightful and fanciful music. While it shows in the manner of instrumentation the influence of Raff, the poetic contents are wholly MacDowell's, as are the mysterious and capricious moments in the first movement, the tricksy twists in the last. How clearly the thoughts are expressed! How deftly is that which might easily have been conventional glorified by some harmonic change or unexpected turn in the melodic figure! And MacDowell knew here the value of concise expression. He knew when he had said his effective say.

There is a curious instance of similarity of harmonic and melodic thought between a passage, several times repeated, in Goldmark's overture and a section of Santuzza's aria. The resemblance is striking. "Sappho" was produced in 1893; "Cavalleria Rusticana" 1890.

The concert will be repeated this evening. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 4 in F minor; Volkmann, Serenade for Strings No. 2, F major; Ravel, Spanish Rhapsody.

From TRIBUNE

Address

Date

BOSTON POST,

FEBRUARY 26,

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE ENTHUSES

Goldmark's "Sappho" and Bauer's Playing Pleases

BY OLIN DOWNES

Harold Bauer was soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The programme consisted of Goldmark's "Sappho" overture, Brahm's piano concerto in B flat, and MacDowell's Suite in A minor, op. 42. This programme, cunningly contrived, was one of the most interesting of the season. Side by side with the purple and gold of the composer of "Sappho" was the virile, open-air music of Brahms, and while the suite of MacDowell is not a great piece of music, or even the most mature product of the composer's pen, it is a delightful and fanciful composition.

BEAUTIES OF "SAPPHO"

Goldmark's overture is not written for the famous play of Daudet. Mr Wilhelm Gericke suddenly removed the piece from a Boston symphony programme during the period of fuss about Daudet's drama. He wished to avoid a scandal in Symphony Hall. He need not have troubled himself, for Goldmark has written of the poetess of Lesbos, the tenth muse, the singer of burning verses who smote the harp on the shores of the sea. And indeed, in spite of incongruous elements, Goldmark has written with superb wealth of color, with a noble melodic sweep, and a rapture Swinburnian. The gorgeous coloring which was his distinctive trait as a composer is here present, but there is also the long line of antiquity. What programme had the composer in mind? The fanfares, the almost martial music which alternates with the lyrical strains may mean anything you like. They are today chiefly valuable as a foil to the lyrical themes, for with the passing of time the fiery passages have become a little cheap and noisy. But later there is the introduction, in the midst of tempestuous passages of the orchestra, of a phrase which carries with it one of the most interesting and characteristic harmonies Goldmark ever devised, a progression that is as the sigh of the passionate and melancholy lover of Phaon, and forms one of the most distinctive details of the score. This progression, and the harmonies of the opening, with their strange flavor of the antique, would in themselves make a composition worth going a long way to hear. The overture pleased the audience greatly. There was long continued applause. Finally the orchestra rose to its feet.

Mr. Bauer gave an ideal performance of Brahms' work, although, for that matter, as much praise is due to Dr. Muck and his men. All took part in a most fortunate manner in a symphonic performance which was farthest from an occasion devised to exalt the personality of a solo performer. Mr. Bauer has long been admired for his interpretations of Brahms. His playing yesterday was a fine balance of virility of feeling and of the most intimate poetic effects. The entire concert was presented with astonishing clearness and force and also beauty.

MacDowell felt nature, too, and in a manner not near to that of Brahms. For that matter, MacDowell had a dog trained to play dead when the name of Brahms was uttered! MacDowell did not write symphonies or operas and only a few suites, but he expressed himself in a characteristic and utterly sincere manner of his own. The suite heard yesterday, which shows very plainly the influence of Raff, is nevertheless a stimulating and individual work, which, like all the other music on the programme, was interpreted with the utmost sympathy by Dr. Muck.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

FEBRUARY 26,

HAROLD BAUER SOLOIST WITH THE SYMPHONY

A well arranged program, played in the Symphony orchestra's best style, coupled with the appearance of Harold Bauer, pianist, as soloist, made the concert of the Symphony orchestra yesterday afternon one of the best of the season. The program was: Goldmark, overture to "Sappho"; Brahms, Concerto in B flat major, No. 2, for piano and orchestra; MacDowell, suite in A minor, op. 42.

Dr. Muck was notably successful in bringing out every merit, and they were many in the Goldmark and MacDowell selections, admittedly not either composer's best work. Mr. Bauer was at his best in the concerto and was rewarded with a fine showing of enthusiastic approval.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

FEBRUARY 26,

HAROLD BAUER WITH SYMPHONY PLAYS BRAHMS

SYMPHONY HALL—Fifteenth program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor; Harold Bauer, soloist; afternoon of Feb. 25 and evening of Feb. 26: Goldmark, overture to "Sappho"; Brahms, concerto in B flat major, No. 2, for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 83; MacDowell, suite in A minor, op. 42, I, "In a Haunted Forest"; II, "Summer Idyl"; III, "In October"; IV, "The Shepherdess' Song"; V, "Forest Spirits."

Without the Goldmark "Sappho" overture the Friday afternoon audience never would have been able to enjoy the Brahms concerto, and without that in turn it never would have appreciated the MacDowell suite. For the gaiety of the overture was needed to prepare the listeners for the academic profundities of the concerto, and after an hour in these depths a return to the impressionistic days we live in through some such medium as the MacDowell suite was imperative. Thus Dr. Muck, about whose programs there is sometimes complaint, disproved the dicta of the carpers. Granting that a program had to have the second Brahms piano concerto included, could it be better surrounded than this?

This concerto, as is the case with the most of Brahms' larger works, was written from the pinnacle of the composer's greatness, with no concessions to those struggling to grasp the meaning. After diligent study one may comprehend the first movement. The study is demanded, however. There are no aids, no ladders of song, no smooth paths of melody. Rough and rugged is the way, and it continues stony until the andante, with its 'cello solo introduction, although because of the obstacles encountered in the first movement, allegro non troppo, the second, allegro appassionato, does not seem so insurmountable as it might if one came upon it unprepared. One finds at last comparatively good going in the light and wondrously pleasing melodies of the last movement allegretto grazioso.

Mr. Bauer, as is his custom,—one, by the way, worthy of frequent emulation—became a member of the orchestra, keeping a careful eye on the baton and even casting a fruitful glance occasionally on the conductor's left hand. Brahms was the business of the hour, greater than conductor, orchestra, or soloist, and both conductor and soloist did their best to make this fact realized. Mr. Bauer played with an unwonted warmth of tone and was rewarded by many recalls.

The habit of applause was started by the "Sappho" overture. This so took the fancy of the audience that Dr. Muck had to call the men to their feet to share the plaudits with him. Its joyousness of phrase and charm of melody betokened no great musical depth, but its tunefulness was most gratifying. The opening measures gave opportunity to realize again the excellent harping of Mr. Holy and Mr. Cella.

As to the MacDowell suit, opinion about it must be largely an individual matter. MacDowell as a pioneer among the moderns is still too close for us to form adequate judgment as to the value of his work. As we study his music, both in relation to the men of his time and those who have gone before, we shall be able to put a juster estimate on its worth. This suite in A minor certainly has not the value of the second suite in E minor, the Indian suite. In the first place it has not the research a series of impressions gained and recorded by a man who loved nature passionately. In the second place it is more reminiscent of other of MacDowell's works than is the second suite. In the third place it deals not with human feeling, the ideas common to all mankind, but with a limited field, and so misses the broad application the later work has.

There is no denying the charm both of the ideas and the manner of their setting forth. Latent and patent love of nature is indicated in each of the five impressions set down, though "The Shepherdess' Song" is least successful. The "Forest Spirits" might conceivably be the dancing sunbeams among the branches, set all aquiver by a momentary breeze and then scattered of a sudden by a passing cloud. There is no quarreling with the value of the piece on this program, however. It served to bridge the gap between the awesome Brahms and the meantime of our life here.

TRANSCRIPT,

FEBRUARY 26,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. BAUER'S HOMAGE TO BRAHMS SEVERE

After Nine Years the Concerto in B-Flat in All Its Lengths and Exactions—The Endurance of the Beginning for the Sake of the End — A Just Performance by Pianist and Conductor—For the Rest, Sensuous Goldmark and Lyric MacDowell

IF music, as some say, is a poetry of tones, then presumably it is amenable to Matthew Arnold's characterization of true verse as "simple, sensuous or impassioned." Brahms's concerto in B-flat for pianoforte and orchestra, played yesterday afternoon at the Symphony Concerts, is admittedly music; and none but some rabid "anti-Brahmsite," like the departed Hugo Wolf or the still militant Henry Finck would write that it merely "passes for" music. Whether it is poetry in tones is a much more debatable matter. Grant for the moment it is such and then put it to the test of Arnold's transferred saying. Certainly, the concerto is not "simple." A hundred, mayhap a thousand, who have attempted to follow the devious course and the abstruse mutations of the themes of the first movement, with ear or eye or both, will bear unanimous witness to the deliberate intricacy of music that even the lucid Mr. Bauer could not clarify on Friday afternoon. As certainly, the concerto is not "sensuous." Rather it is an austere music, that may have beauty in the slow movement and the finale; but even there a beauty that does not caress the ear and stimulate the senses. If, then, the concerto is at all poetry of tones, according to Arnold's definition, it must be "impassioned." Perhaps it is; but the passion is almost wholly a passion of the intellect—the most difficult of all, even with a Muck and a Bauer aiding, to communicate to a miscellaneous company of variously tempered hearers.

By report of biographers, Brahms invented his musical ideas in travail of mind and spirit. Perhaps, then, he brought a measure of mental passion to the quest and the formulation of the themes of the opening Allegro in the concerto. In themselves, they do interest the ear, even if they neither sway nor charm it. Certainly, that passion, in its kind, is not lacking in his long, abstruse and insatiable development and transformation of them through the length, breadth and thickness of that almost interminable first movement (A wit of London—Lord Ribblesdale, if memory serves—used to say that it had not only these three dimensions, but also a fourth, tedium. No one but a composer, mentally impassioned with the possibilities of thematic elaboration and transmutation, as a mathematician might be impassioned with the possibilities of the calculus, could so have channeled and drained his musical thoughts. Brahms indeed almost forgets the piano of his own choice in his tireless absorption in this development. Enough that he fling it "passage-work," imitation and ornament, while the orchestra does the rest—"the things that matter" as the slang of this war-time might put it. Somehow, the listener can see the big heavy body bent over his writing table, the big bearded head dropped lower and lower on the music paper, while the mind within goes endlessly on with this often dry and seldom imaginative elaboration. The solution of problems with the calculus are not read out in public except at congresses of mathematicians. Why might not the first movement of this concerto of Brahms be reserved for similar congresses of, say, conductors and composers, with a circumambient audience of incorrigible "Brahmsites."

The ensuing Scherzo leaves the listener in no better, perhaps in even worse, case. It is as dry and labored as the preceding movement and it has no distinction of musical invention. Whatever else that interminable Allegro may be, there is no commonness in it; whereas in the Scherzo there is little else. If Brahms had set the label "Allegro Appassionato" over the first movement, the hearer might agree to the characterization on the intellectual side. Over the dulness, the dryness, the sheer mediocrity of that Scherzo, the much-enduring hearer almost resents it. As any one may guess that reads those letters of Brahms dear to the learned and quoting programmists, there was a lower-middle-class streak in him, especially when he believed he was writing with fancy and maybe humor. Once and again, it crosses his music as in this very Scherzo—not the commonness that is cheap, tricky and showy, but the less endurable commonness that is merely mediocrity, deadly dull. Again, why should not [illegible] the things Brahms had better thrust [illegible] dustiest pigeon-hole. No wonder [illegible] banished it from the concerto for violin.

At last, at the end of a full thirty minutes, relief comes in the andante, and the quasi-Hungarian finale. In both Brahms is "impassioned," after his manner and not wholly with the passion of ardent intellectual process; in both he is even "sensuous," again after his manner. There is grave and cool beauty in the melody of the slow movement, of which Dr. Muck and Mr. Bauer—perhaps somewhat relieved themselves—made the most yesterday. The advancing and returning song has the clearness to the ear of autumn light to the eye without its sharpness; the melancholy mood of vague and brooding longing is one of the quieter moods of romance; the coloring seeks the subdued autumnal tint to which Brahms's imagination and hand were temperamentally and often beautifully sensitive; the suffusion of the timbres of orchestra and pianoforte woos the ear; the workmanship is serene chiselling. In fine the music is a "sensuous" and "impassioned" poetry of tones as Keats's poem of the Grecian urn is a "sensuous" and "impassioned" poetry of words. After all, melancholy and longing, as those know that cultivate such experiences of the spirit, have their sensuous satisfactions. . . . A lighter beauty and a happy fancy permeate the finale. It is scholarly of course, since Brahms could not help such quality when he had three motives in rondo form upon which to exercise it. Of course, again, he keeps himself well in hand—better bridle the zest of the songful and keenly rhythmed Hungarian motive than have it run away with you, Lisztian or modern wise. But somehow again one can see the stout body and the grizzled head, straightening up from the work-table and letting the fancy that was in Brahms with all his austerity and "mentality" have its play. "Dulce est desipere in loco," even if one is a thoughtful composer for the mind; but in this particular concerto, the "loco" is a well-nigh intolerable time a-coming.

Seldom relatively as this concerto of Brahms is played—for nine years it had not been heard at the Symphony Concerts—many a pianist still courts it as he courts no less the other and more interesting concerto in D minor. The presumption is that Mr. Bauer's cup is full; for he alone, seemingly, of the eminent virtuosi of our time, has played both concertos with the Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck. As probably, he plays the concerto of yesterday as well as a pianist may. His exposition of the first movement was as lucid as the nature of the music itself permitted. Like that same music, it was all in black and white, since of color in that opening Allegro there is little. Whenever any rhythmic emphasis, telling modulation or firm-set period could animate the music and make it graphic of Brahms's mental processes, neither Mr. Bauer—nor for that matter Dr. Muck—missed it. Occasionally they planted little oases in the desert of the Scherzo, before the hot wind of Brahms's mediocrity in it could quite dry them.

Seldom has the pianist better proved his analytical mind that searches out his music and rears anew in tones and before other minds the composer's design. As he missed not an implication of the music, so he made no futile effort to lessen the forbidding quality of the Allegro or mask the barrenness of the Scherzo. Always Mr. Bauer sees clear; his mind and his temperament are now the trustiest and readiest of understanding and imparting mechanisms. They were much more when he came to the songful beauty of the slow movement or the playful and ingratiating fancy of the finale. In the one, the quality of Mr. Bauer's tone summoned flawlessly the clear, cool and pensive beauty of the music. Composer and pianist seemed coequal in their serene chiselling of the contours and the phrases of the song. The ear heard it as in relief upon a clear white surface and again there was the analogy of Keats's urn. And the tempered zest of the finale under Mr. Bauer's hand was the tempered zest of Brahms himself. At every turn he and Dr. Muck were as one with the music, even when it is really a symphonic piece with an accessory pianoforte for embroidery and imitation. Dr. Muck and Mr. Bauer know how to differentiate the music of the mind from the music of the senses and to temper the one with the other. There is no better poised conductor and no better poised pianist. Even when the listener resents the matter upon which they are exercising their faculties, he has his rare satisfactions of the artists themselves. By so much, even the concerto in B-flat major, No. 2, for Pianoforte and Orchestra by Johannes Brahms (Opur 83) has its right to, say decennial perfomance.

For preface to this "work" of Brahms—for one the word deserves a place outside the half-articulate dialect of music—and the forty-five minutes that it consumed, stood Goldmark's overture, "Sappho"; while for finis to the concert came MacDowell's nameless suite that from the sub-titles of the movements, he might plausibly have called "Forest Scenes." Goldmark's tone-poem—for it is really such though he chooses the overture form—may or may not be readily moulded to the legends of Sappho; but in itself, it is music that glows upon the ear in the richness of its melody, harmonies and instrumental coloring, in the passion of tones that fills it. Here was music as opulently sensuous as Brahms's was gravely austere—music that would exhaust not its intellectual, but, so to say, its fleshly, content; music that summoned beside its own enkindled beauty and ardent power, the image of a woman enkindled and impassioned, too, and set it, besides, in the wolden light of old legend in the Grecian seas. In some of his oriental music, it is as though Goldmark would drug the senses of his hearers or then prick them—quite as sensually—with some stroke of disromance. In this tone-poem of Sappho he is content to suffuse them in radiant clouds of tone and then past them upon his poetess in impassioned and faded song. For here his dissonance may be the voice of fate as well as [illegible]

[109]

From TRIBUNE
Address
Date

BOSTON POST,
FEBRUARY 26,

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE ENTHUSES

Goldmark's "Sappho" and Bauer's Playing Pleases

BY OLIN DOWNES

Harold Bauer was soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The programme consisted of Goldmark's "Sappho" overture, Brahm's piano concerto in B flat, and MacDowell's Suite in A minor, op. 42. This programme, cunningly contrived, was one of the most interesting of the season. Side by side with the purple and gold of the composer of "Sappho" was the virile, open-air music of Brahms, and while the suite of MacDowell is not a great piece of music, or even the most mature product of the composer's pen, it is a delightful and fanciful composition.

BEAUTIES OF "SAPPHO"

Goldmark's overture is not written for the famous play of Daudet. Mr Wilhelm Gericke suddenly removed the piece from a Boston symphony programme during the period of fuss about Daudet's drama. He wished to avoid a scandal in Symphony Hall. He need not have troubled himself, for Goldmark has written of the poetess of Lesbos, the tenth muse, the singer of burning verses who smote the harp on the shores of the sea. And indeed, in spite of incongruous elements, Goldmark has written with superb wealth of color, with a noble melodic sweep, and a rapture Swinburnian. The gorgeous coloring which was his distinctive trait as a composer is here present, but there is also the long line of antiquity. What programme had the composer in mind? The fanfares, the almost martial music which alternates with the lyrical strains may mean anything you like. They are today chiefly valuable as a foil to the lyrical themes, for with the passing of time the fiery passages have become a little cheap and noisy. But later there is the introduction, in the midst of tempestuous passages of the orchestra, of a phrase which carries with it one of the most interesting and characteristic harmonies Goldmark ever devised, a progression that is as the sigh of the passionate and melancholy lover of Phaon, and forms one of the most distinctive details of the score. This progression, and the harmonies of the opening, with their strange flavor of the antique, would in themselves make a composition worth going a long way to hear. The overture pleased the audience greatly. There was long continued applause. Finally the orchestra rose to its feet.

Mr. Bauer gave an ideal performance of Brahms' work, although, for that matter, as much praise is due to Dr. Muck and his men. All took part in a most fortunate manner in a symphonic performance which was farthest from an occasion devised to exalt the personality of a solo performer Mr. Bauer has long been admired for his interpretations of Brahms. His playing yesterday was a fine balance of virility of feeling and of the most intimate poetic effects. The entire concert was presented with astonishing clearness and force and also beauty.

MacDowell felt nature, too, and in a manner not near to that of Brahms. For that matter, MacDowell had a dog trained to play dead when the name of Brahms was uttered! MacDowell did not write symphonies or operas and only a few suites, but he expressed himself in a characteristic and utterly sincere manner of his own. The suite heard yesterday, which shows very plainly the influence of Raff, is nevertheless a stimulating and individual work, which, like all the other music on the programme, was interpreted with the utmost sympathy by Dr. Muck.

BOSTON TRAVELER,
FEBRUARY 26,

HAROLD BAUER SOLOIST WITH THE SYMPHONY

A well arranged program, played in the Symphony orchestra's best style, coupled with the appearance of Harold Bauer, pianist, as soloist, made the concert of the Symphony orchestra yesterday afternon one of the best of the season. The program was: Goldmark, overture to "Sappho"; Brahms, Concerto in B flat major, No. 2. for piano and orchestra; MacDowell, suite in A minor, op. 42.

Dr. Muck was notably successful in bringing out every merit, and they were many in the Goldmark and MacDowell selections, admittedly not either composer's best work. Mr. Bauer was at his best in the concerto and was rewarded with a fine showing of enthusiastic approval.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

, FEBRUARY 26,

HAROLD BAUER WITH SYMPHONY PLAYS BRAHMS

SYMPHONY HALL—Fifteenth program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor; Harold Bauer, soloist; afternoon of Feb. 25 and evening of Feb. 26: Goldmark, overture to "Sappho"; Brahms, concerto in B flat major, No. 2, for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 83; MacDowell, suite in A minor, op. 42. I, "In a Haunted Forest"; II, "Summer Idyl"; III, "In October"; IV, "The Shepherdess' Song"; V, "Forest Spirits."

Without the Goldmark "Sappho" overture the Friday afternoon audience never would have been able to enjoy the Brahms concerto, and without that in turn it never would have appreciated the MacDowell suite. For the gaiety of the overture was needed to prepare the listeners for the academic profundities of the concerto, and after an hour in these depths a return to the impressionistic days we live in through some such medium as the MacDowell suite was imperative. Thus Dr. Muck, about whose programs there is sometimes complaint, disproved the dicta of the carpers. Granting that a program had to have the second Brahms piano concerto included, could it be better surrounded than this?

This concerto, as is the case with the most of Brahms' larger works, was written from the pinnacle of the composer's greatness, with no concessions to those struggling to grasp the meaning. After diligent study one may comprehend the first movement. The study is demanded, however. There are no aids, no ladders of song, no smooth paths of melody. Rough and rugged is the way, and it continues stony until the andante, with its 'cello solo introduction, although because of the obstacles encountered in the first movement, allegro non troppo, the second, allegro appassionato, does not seem so insurmountable as it might if one came upon it unprepared. One finds at last comparatively good going in the light and wondrously pleasing melodies of the last movement allegretto grazioso.

Mr. Bauer, as is his custom,—one, by the way, worthy of frequent emulation—became a member of the orchestra, keeping a careful eye on the baton and even casting a fruitful glance occasionally on the conductor's left hand. Brahms was the business of the hour, greater than conductor, orchestra, or soloist, and both conductor and soloist did their best to make this fact realized. Mr. Bauer played with an unwonted warmth of tone and was rewarded by many recalls.

The habit of applause was started by the "Sappho" overture. This so took the fancy of the audience that Dr. Muck had to call the men to their feet to share the plaudits with him. Its joyousness of phrase and charm of melody betokened no great musical depth, but its tunefulness was most gratifying. The opening measures gave opportunity to realize again the excellent harping of Mr. Holy and Mr. Cella.

As to the MacDowell suit, opinion about it must be largely an individual matter. MacDowell as a pioneer among the moderns is still too close for us to form adequate judgment as to the value of his work. As we study his music, both in relation to the men of his time and those who have gone before, we shall be able to put a juster estimate on its worth. This suite in A minor certainly has not the value of the second suite in E minor, the Indian suite. In the first place it has not the research a series of impressions gained and recorded by a man who loved nature passionately. In the second place it is more reminiscent of other of MacDowell's works than is the second suite. In the third place it deals not with human feeling, the ideas common to all mankind, but with a limited field, and so misses the broad application the later work has.

There is no denying the charm both of the ideas and the manner of their setting forth. Latent and patent love of nature is indicated in each of the five impressions set down, though "The Shepherdess' Song" is least successful. The "Forest Spirits" might conceivably be the dancing sunbeams among the branches, set all aquiver by a momentary breeze and then scattered of a sudden by a passing cloud. There is no quarreling with the value of the piece on this program, however. It served to bridge the gap between the awesome Brahms and the meantime of our life here.

TRANSCRIPT,
FEBRUARY 26,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. BAUER'S HOMAGE TO BRAHMS SEVERE

After Nine Years the Concerto in B-Flat in All Its Lengths and Exactions—The Endurance of the Beginning for the Sake of the End — A Just Performance by Pianist and Conductor—For the Rest, Sensuous Goldmark and Lyric MacDowell

IF music, as some say, is a poetry of tones, then presumably it is amenable to Matthew Arnold's characterization of true verse as "simple, sensuous or impassioned." Brahms's concerto in B-flat for pianoforte and orchestra, played yesterday afternoon at the Symphony Concerts, is admittedly music; and none but some rabid "anti-Brahmsite," like the departed Hugo Wolf or the still militant Henry Finck would write that it merely "passes for" music. Whether it is poetry in tones is a much more debatable matter. Grant for the moment it is such and then put it to the test of Arnold's transferred saying. Certainly, the concerto is not "simple." A hundred, mayhap a thousand, who have attempted to follow the devious course and the abstruse mutations of the themes of the first movement, with ear or eye or both, will bear unanimous witness to the deliberate intricacy of music that even the lucid Mr. Bauer could not clarify on Friday afternoon. As certainly, the concerto is not "sensuous." Rather it is an austere music, that may have beauty in the slow movement and the finale; but even there a beauty that does not caress the ear and stimulate the senses. If, then, the concerto is at all poetry of tones, according to Arnold's definition, it must be "impassioned." Perhaps it is; but the passion is almost wholly a passion of the intellect—the most difficult of all, even with a Muck and a Bauer aiding, to communicate to a miscellaneous company of variously tempered hearers.

By report of biographers, Brahms invented his musical ideas in travail of mind and spirit. Perhaps, then, he brought a measure of mental passion to the quest and the formulation of the themes of the opening Allegro in the concerto. In themselves, they do interest the ear, even if they neither sway nor charm it. Certainly, that passion, in its kind, is not lacking in his long, abstruse and insatiable development and transformation of them through the length, breadth and thickness of that almost interminable first movement (A wit of London—Lord Ribblesdale, if memory serves—used to say that it had not only these three dimensions, but also a fourth, tedium. No one but a composer, mentally impassioned with the possibilities of thematic elaboration and transmutation, as a mathematician might be impassioned with the possibilities of the calculus, could so have channeled and drained his musical thoughts. Brahms indeed almost forgets the piano of his own choice in his tireless absorption in this development. Enough that he fling it "passage-work," imitation and ornament, while the orchestra does the rest—"the things that matter" as the slang of this war-time might put it. Somehow, the listener can see the big heavy body bent over his writing table, the big bearded head dropped lower and lower on the music paper, while the mind within goes endlessly on with this often dry and seldom imaginative elaboration. The solution of problems with the calculus are not read out in public except at congresses of mathematicians. Why might not the first movement of this concerto of Brahms be reserved for similar congresses of, say, conductors and composers, with a circumambient audience of incorrigible "Brahmsites."

The ensuing Scherzo leaves the listener in no better, perhaps in even worse, case. It is as dry and labored as the preceding movement and it has no distinction of musical invention. Whatever else that interminable Allegro may be, there is no commonness in it; whereas in the Scherzo there is little else. If Brahms had set the label "Allegro Appassionato" over the first movement, the hearer might agree to the characterization on the intellectual side. Over the dulness, the dryness, the sheer mediocrity of that Scherzo, the much-enduring hearer almost resents it. As any one may guess that reads those letters of Brahms dear to the learned and quoting programmists, there was a lower-middle-class streak in him, especially when he believed he was writing with fancy and maybe humor. Once and again, it crosses his music as in this very Scherzo—not the commonness that is cheap, tricky and showy, but the less endurable commonness that is merely mediocrity, deadly dull. Again, why should not the scherzo be left among the things Brahms had better thrust into his dustiest pigeon-hole. No wonder Joachim banished it from the concerto for violin.

At last, at the end of a full thirty minutes, relief comes in the Andante, and the quasi-Hungarian finale. In both Brahms is "impassioned," after his manner and not wholly with the passion of ardent intellectual process; in both he is even "sensuous," again after his manner. There is grave and cool beauty in the melody of the slow movement, of which Dr. Muck and Mr. Bauer—perhaps somewhat relieved themselves—made the most yesterday. The advancing and returning song has the clearness to the ear of autumn light to the eye without its sharpness; the melancholy mood of vague and brooding longing is one of the quieter moods of romance; the coloring seeks the subdued autumnal tint to which Brahms's imagination and hand were temperamentally and often beautifully sensitive; the suffusion of the timbres of orchestra and pianoforte woos the ear; the workmanship is serene chiselling. In fine the music is a "sensuous" and "impassioned" poetry of tones as Keats's poem of the Grecian urn is a "sensuous" and "impassioned" poetry of words. After all, melancholy and longing, as those know that cultivate such experiences of the spirit, have their sensuous satisfactions. . . . A lighter beauty and a happy fancy permeate the finale. It is scholarly of course, since Brahms could not help such quality when he had three motives in rondo form upon which to exercise it. Of course, again, he keeps himself well in hand—better bridle the zest of the songful and keenly rhythmed Hungarian motive than have it run away with you, Lisztian or modern wise. But somehow again one can see the stout body and the grizzled head, straightening up from the work-table and letting the fancy that was in Brahms with all his austerity and "mentality" have its play. "Dulce est desipere in loco," even if one is a thoughtful composer for the mind; but in this particular concerto, the "loco" is a well-nigh intolerable time a-coming.

Seldom relatively as this concerto of Brahms is played—for nine years it had not been heard at the Symphony Concerts—many a pianist still courts it as he courts no less the other and more interesting concerto in D minor. The presumption is that Mr. Bauer's cup is full; for he alone, seemingly, of the eminent virtuosi of our time, has played both concertos with the Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck. As probably, he plays the concerto of yesterday as well as a pianist may. His exposition of the first movement was as lucid as the nature of the music itself permitted. Like that same music, it was all in black and white, since of color in that opening Allegro there is little. Whenever any rhythmic emphasis, telling modulation or firm-set period could animate the music and make it graphic of Brahms's mental processes, neither Mr. Bauer—nor for that matter Dr. Muck—missed it. Occasionally they planted little oases in the desert of the Scherzo, before the hot wind of Brahms's mediocrity in it could quite dry them.

Seldom has the pianist better proved his analytical mind that searches out his music and rears anew in tones and before other minds the composer's design. As he missed not an implication of the music, so he made no futile effort to lessen the forbidding quality of the Allegro or mask the barrenness of the Scherzo. Always Mr. Bauer sees clear; his mind and his temperament are now the trustiest and readiest of understanding and imparting mechanisms. They were much more when he came to the songful beauty of the slow movement or the playful and ingratiating fancy of the finale. In the one, the quality of Mr. Bauer's tone summoned flawlessly the clear, cool and pensive beauty of the music. Composer and pianist seemed coequal in their serene chiselling of the contours and the phrases of the song. The ear heard it as in relief upon a clear white surface and again there was the analogy of Keats's urn. And the tempered zest of the finale under Mr. Bauer's hand was the tempered zest of Brahms himself. At every turn, he and Dr. Muck were as one with the music, even when it is really a symphonic piece with an accessory pianoforte for embroidery and imitation. Dr. Muck and Mr. Bauer know how to differentiate the music of the mind from the music of the senses and to temper the one with the other. There is no better poised conductor and no better poised pianist. Even when the listener resents the matter upon which they are exercising their faculties, he has his rare satisfactions of the artists themselves. By so much, even the concerto in B-flat major, No. 2, for Pianoforte and Orchestra by Johannes Brahms (Opur 83) has its right to, say decennial perfomance.

For preface to this "work" of Brahms—for one the word deserves a place outside the half-articulate dialect of music—and the forty-five minutes that it consumed, stood Goldmark's overture, "Sappho"; while for finis to the concert came MacDowell's nameless suite that from the sub-titles of the movements, he might plausibly have called "Forest Scenes." Goldmark's tone-poem—for it is really such though he chooses the overture form—may or may not be readily moulded to the legends of Sappho; but in itself, it is music that glows upon the ear in the richness of its melody, harmonies and instrumental coloring, in the passion of tones that fills it. Here was music as opulently sensuous as Brahms's was gravely austere—music that would exhaust not its intellectual, but, so to say, its fleshly, content; music that summoned beside its own enkindled beauty and ardent power, the image of a woman enkindled and impassioned, too, and set it, besides, in the wolden light of old legend in the Grecian seas. In some of his oriental music, it is as though Goldmark would drug the senses of his hearers or then prick them—quite as sensually—with some stroke of disromance. In this tone-poem of Sappho he is content to suffuse them in radiant clouds of tone and then past them upon his poetess in impassioned and faded song. For here his dissonance may be the voice of [illegible] well as [illegible]

by Goldmark [illegible] so warmly
It deserved resurrection from the to which [illegible]—grave-digger of int had buried it.

Perhaps the interposing forty-five utes of Brahms, plus a round ten of mission, did their service to MacDo music. Heard too soon, after the suous splendor and the golden lumin of "Sappho," it might have rounded and cool of invention and pale of
For the music of American compos and even of a MacDowell in these ea years before he had gained the i inative light and heat of the "Indian Suite" and the final sonatas—is not usually (to return to Arnold's saying) either "Sensuous" or "impassioned." Either they have not the passion that releases itself in the self-expression of the arts or, being of a young race, not quite articulate, even when it is most garrulous, know not how to set it free in tones or words. Similarly they lack the sensuousness of voice and mood that in Goldmark almost to excess liberates itself in richness, ardor and glow, alike of emotion and expression, that basks, almost in its own intensities. We are pure souls as yet—as a hundred pulpits may be saying tomorrow but it may be doubted whether the pure in heart best serve the expressive arts. All of which as to MacDowll's suite of the purest is neither here nor there since he set himself to writing no more than little lrics in tones of the woodland that he knew and felt with quick and affectionate imagination. He wrote them, moreover, with as many a lyric stroke, in tonal coloring, modulation, contrast and rhythm of happy and artful imagery. This woodland suite deserves a place in the minor poetry of tones, and are not the Symphony Concerts our anthology of music.

H. T. P.

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date FEB 12 1916

ork, 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth and last but one of the concerts given each season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening. The program which Dr. Muck has arranged presents at least two points of surpassing interest. These are Joachim's concerto in D major for violin and orchestra entitled "In the Hungarian Style" and Liszt's first symphonic poem, "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne."

Joachim's great concerto seldom appears on modern programs, for, as skilled as the violin virtuoso is today, there are few artists who will undertake and are able to overcome the stupendous difficulties which Joachim has placed in this work. One of the few virtuosi able to do this is Anton Witek, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and he has just played it in Boston with remarkable success.

To Dr. Muck falls the credit of reviving in this country what in many respects is the most remarkable of the series of symphonic poems by which Liszt practically revolutionized the music of his day and of the days that followed him. Until Dr. Muck played it in Boston three weeks ago the only performance in America on record was in New York by the Philharmonic Society under Bergmann in 1869. It is astonishing and speaks well for Liszt's genius that, although this poem was conceived in 1833 and actually played in 1847, is is more modern in thought and feeling than much of the music of today. "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne" contains much of Liszt's best and most characteristic writing, and undoubtedly Dr. Muck's very successful revival of it means new life to the poem.

The program follows:

Overture, "Leonora" No. 1, Opus 138 .... Beethoven
Concerto in D Major, Opus 11 ("In the Hungarian Style") .... Joachim
Symphonic Poem No. 1, "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne" ("What one hears upon the mountain"). (After Victor Hugo) .... Liszt

---

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 12 1916

Esta
4

THE fourth of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music Monday evening. The first half of the program is devoted to works by Debussy and Schelling, while the last half of the program is given to Mozart's Symphony in E-flat Major.

Debussy will be represented by his symphonic sketches entitled "The Sea." These sketches, which are three in number, entitled respectively "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of the Waves" and "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea," are just ten years old, having their first performance at a Lamoureax concert in Paris, October 15, 1905.

The novelty of the concert will be Ernest Schelling's variations for orchestra and piano, which had its first performance in Boston six weeks ago. The title is "Impressions from an Artist's Life, in the form of variations on an original [illegible] and pianoforte." [illegible] twenty-

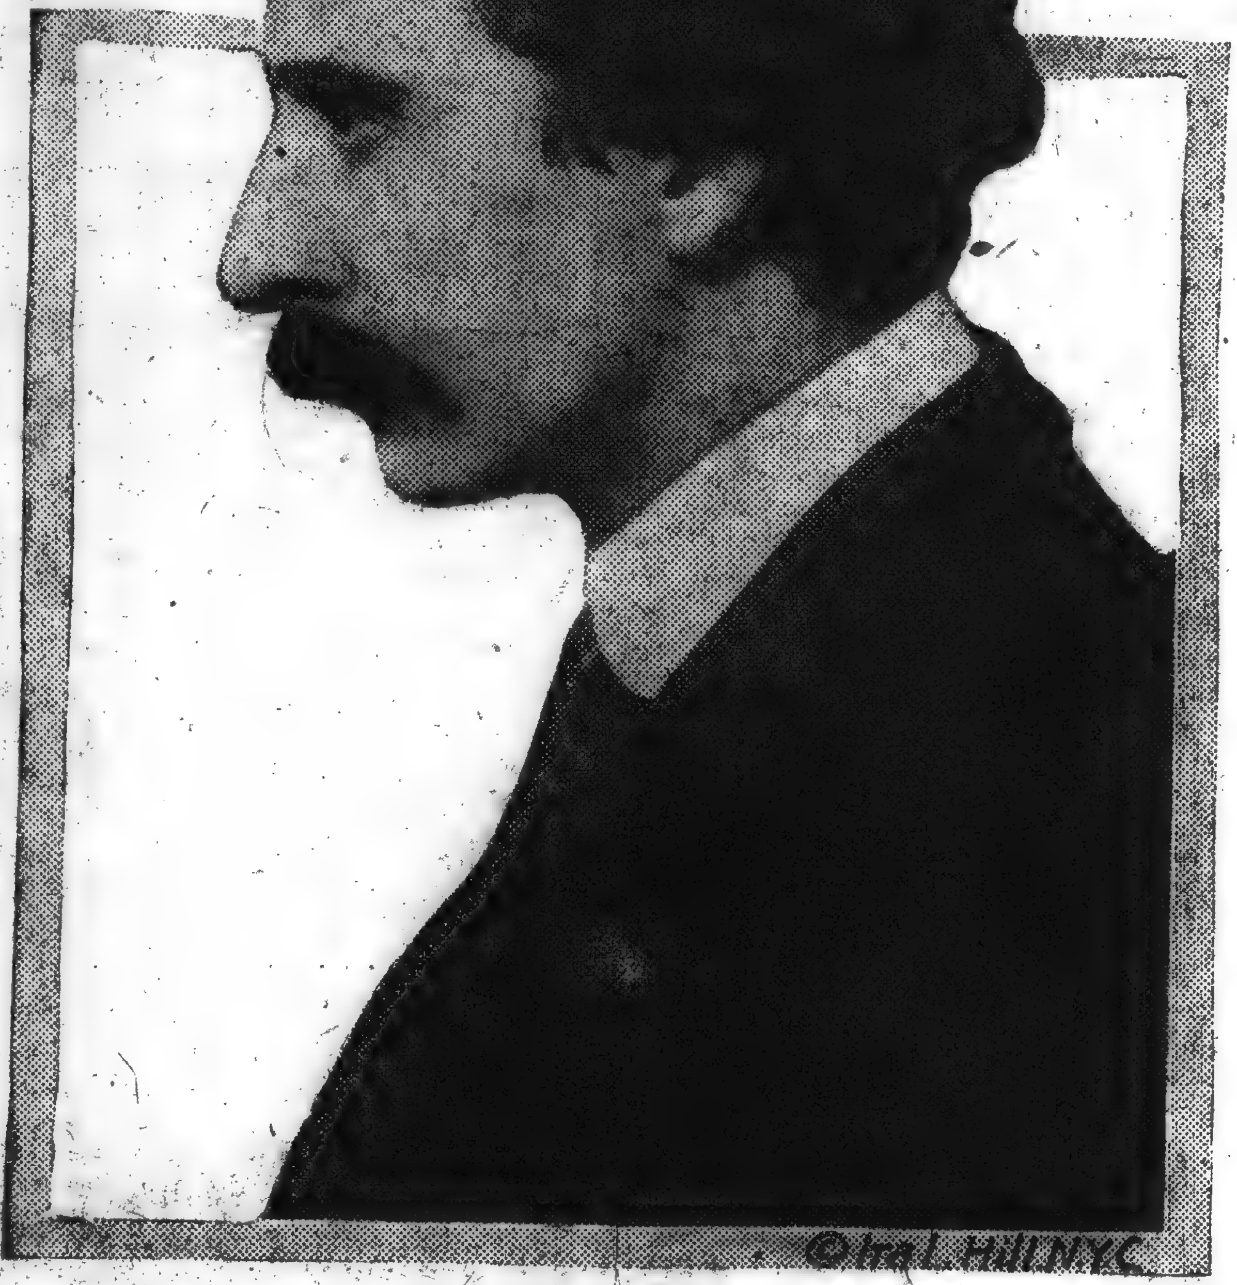
---

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 13 1916

Established:

ANNOUNCEMENTS OF THE MUSICAL SEASON

Philadelphia Orchestra to Play Symphony by American Composer—Julia Culp to to Be Heard in Recital



ERNEST SCHELLING

Who will play here tomorrow with the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fourth and last, but one of the series of concerts given here each season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, February 14, at 8.15. Dr. Muck has divided the programme between the ultra-moderns and the best of the eighteenth century; in other words the first half of the programme is devoted to works by Debussy and Schelling, while the last half of the programme is given to Mozart's Symphony in E flat Major, K. 543.

Debussy will be represented by his symphonic sketches entitled "The Sea." These sketches which are three in number, entitled respectively "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of the Waves," and "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea" are just ten years old, having had their first performance at a Lamoureaux concert in Paris, October 15, 1905. Dr. Muck gave the first performances of these sketches in America at a Boston Symphony concert in Boston, March 2 and 3, 1907. Then, as two years before in Paris, they were regarded practically as incomprehensible from a musical point of view, but so rapidly does the ear become accustomed to new tonalities, that today they are thought comparatively simple and their full beauty is realized.

The novelty of the concert will be Ernest Schelling's variations for orchestra and piano which had its first performances in Boston, December 31 and January 1 last. The title is "Impressions From an Artist's Life," in the form of variations on an original theme for orchestra and pianoforte. Mr. Schelling, whose ties in Philadelphia are very close and whose talent has long been recognized here, in this work shows himself as a composer of extraordinary skill and fancy. He uses a theme which may be regarded as exotic in character and on this he has built twenty-one variations of widely different forms.

Most of these variations are dedicated to various persons. The first two are dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the second to Dr. Muck. The fourth is in commemoration of Pfitzner, Schelling's teacher in composition; the seventh and oboe solo, is dedicated to Georges Longy, first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the eighth to Pavlowa, the ninth to Paderewski and others to Gustav Mahler, Fritz Kraisler, etc. One of the most impressive of the variations is entitled "August, 1914," in which Mr. Schelling pictures the war. Mr. Schelling will play the pianoforte.

From Nation
Address: New York City
Date FEB 24 1916

When Miss Farrar, while still in her teens, first sang at the Royal Opera in Berlin, she was allowed by the Kaiser (who was—or pretended to be—at that time very partial to everything American) to do things in her own way to a degree which displeased the conductors, including Dr. Muck. Since then, Farrar and Muck have become good friends, and only a week or two ago she sang in Boston at a concert of that city's famous orchestra. Yet Dr. Muck, like most orchestral conductors, prefers concerts without soloists. In Carnegie Hall, last week, he had none either on Thursday or Saturday, yet his audiences were happy. His Saturday programme included "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne." Saint-Saëns considers this the best of Liszt symphonic poems, and wonders why it is not often seen on programmes. To most of those who heard it in Carnegie Hall it was a novelty. Its first performance in New York was in 1869. Philharmonic audiences must have been queer in those days to judge by what the correspondent of Dwight's Journal of Music wrote concerning this occasion:

> The Liszt nondescript was humanely put at the end of the programme, and was of course heard by comparatively few people. The "poem" possesses all of Liszt's defects and none, or nearly none, of his few excellences; it is the very essence of turgidity, and is thoroughly chaotic in form, or in the lack of form. . . . The audience was an immense one, and was downstairs a decorous one; in the third gallery, however, the talking, laughing, flirting, and boorish rudeness were simply disgraceful. I regret to say that upon the fair sex rests the responsibility of three-fourths of this absolutely "hoggish" behavior.

Philharmonic audiences have changed since those days, even in the "third gallery"; they behave better and have learned to listen to Liszt's inspired works and to applaud them more enthusiastically, perhaps, than any others, except Wagner's, thanks largely to their admirable interpretation under Josef Stransky. Like him, Dr. Muck is a Liszt enthusiast. Last year he conducted four performances of Liszt's "Faust" symphony which were acknowledged to be the climax of the season in Boston. This year he poured oil on the flames by his revival of "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne," and its cordial reception led him to bring it to New York, where it was sure to meet with the same favor; for, thanks to Seidl and Stransky, New York has been ahead of Boston in learning to appreciate the genius of Liszt, whom Wagner (who learned and borrowed much from him) called "the greatest musician of all time."

Liszt's "Mountain Symphony," as they call it in Germany, is based on a poem by Victor Hugo in which the glories of nature are contrasted with the discords and sorrows of humanity. To these two poetic motives, so well adapted for musical treatment, Liszt adds a third—Faith, or the consolations of religion. These three are interwoven with wonderful art, which reaches its climax in a choral-like passage for the brass choir. On the whole, while one may not agree with Saint-Saëns that this is the greatest of Liszt's symphonic poems (it is certainly inferior to "Tasso"), one can understand how Wagner could derive "ecstatic delight" from hearing it.

HENRY T. FINCK.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date FEB 12 1916

Estal
1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth and last but one of the concerts given each season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, February 16, at 8.15. The program which Dr. Muck has arranged presents at least two points of surpassing interest. These are Joachim's Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra, entitled In the Hungarian Style, and Liszt's first symphonic poem, Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne.

Joachim's great concerto seldom appears on modern programs, for as skilled as the violin virtuoso is today—which is saying much—there are few artists who will undertake and are able to overcome the stupendous difficulties which Joachim has placed in this work.

Beethoven—Overture, Leonora No. 1, Opus 138. Joachim—Concerto in D Major, Opus 11 (In the Hungarian Style). Liszt—Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne (What one hears upon the mountain), Symphonic Poem No. 1 (after Victor Hugo).

[illegible] is indeed an [illegible] richness of tone th[illegible] music [illegible] lavished upon it throbbed [illegible] orchestra [illegible] all the senses. Not for long has [illegible] by Goldmark been so warmly appl[illegible] It deserved resurrection from the to[illegible] which routine—grave-digger of inte[illegible] had buried it.

Perhaps the interposing forty-five [illegible] utes of Brahms, plus a round ten of [illegible] mission, did their service to MacDo[illegible] music. Heard too soon, after the [illegible] suous splendor and the golden lumin[illegible] of "Sappho," it might have rounded [illegible] and cool of invention and pale of [illegible] For the music of American compos[illegible] and even of a MacDowell in these ea[illegible] years before he had gained the i[illegible] inative light and heat of the "Indian Suite" and the final sonatas—is not usually (to return to Arnold's saying) either "Sensuous" or "impassioned." Either they have not the passion that releases itself in the self-expression of the arts or, being of a young race, not quite articulate, even when it is most garrulous, know not how to set it free in tones or words. Similarly they lack the sensuousness of voice and mood that in Goldmark almost to excess liberates itself in richness, ardor and glow, alike of emotion and expression, that basks, almost in its own intensities. We are pure souls as yet—as a hundred pulpits may be saying tomorrow but it may be doubted whether the pure in heart best serve the expressive arts. All of which as to MacDowll's suite of the purest is neither here nor there since he set himself to writing no more than little lrics in tones of the woodland that he knew and felt with quick and affectionate imagination. He wrote them, moreover, with as many a lyric stroke, in tonal coloring, modulation, contrast and rhythm of happy and artful imagery. This woodland suite deserves a place in the minor poetry of tones, and are not the Symphony Concerts our anthology of music.

H. T. P.

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date__________

ork, 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth and last but one of the concerts given each season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening. The program which Dr. Muck has arranged presents at least two points of surpassing interest. These are Joachim's concerto in D major for violin and orchestra entitled "In the Hungarian Style" and Liszt's first symphonic poem, "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne."

Joachim's great concerto seldom appears on modern programs, for, as skilled as the violin virtuoso is today, there are few artists who will undertake and are able to overcome the stupendous difficulties which Joachim has placed in this work. One of the few virtuosi able to do this is Anton Witek, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and he has just played it in Boston with remarkable success.

To Dr. Muck falls the credit of reviving in this country what in many respects is the most remarkable of the series of symphonic poems by which Liszt practically revolutionized the music of his day and of the days that followed him. Until Dr. Muck played it in Boston three weeks ago the only performance in America on record was in New York by the Philharmonic Society under Bergmann in 1869. It is astonishing and speaks well for Liszt's genius that, although this poem was conceived in 1833 and actually played in 1847, is is more modern in thought and feeling than much of the music of today. "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne" contains much of Liszt's best and most characteristic writing, and undoubtedly Dr. Muck's very successful revival of it means new life to the poem.

The program follows:

Overture, "Leonora" No. 1, Opus 138 ....Beethoven
Concerto in D Major, Opus 11 ("In the Hungarian Style")....Joachim
Symphonic Poem No. 1, "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne" ("What one hears upon the mountain") (After Victor Hugo) ....Liszt

---

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date__________

Estab

THE fourth of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music Monday evening. The first half of the program is devoted to works by Debussy and Schelling, while the last half of the program is given to Mozart's Symphony in E-flat Major.

84

Debussy will be represented by his symphonic sketches entitled "The Sea."
These sketches, which are three in number, entitled respectively "From Dawn
Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of the Waves" and "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea," are just ten years old, having their first performance at a Lamoureax concert in Paris, October 15, 1905.
The novelty of the concert will be Ernest Schelling's variations for orchestra and piano, which had its first performance in Boston six weeks ago. The title is "Impressions from an Artist's Life, in the form of variations on an original theme for orchestra and pianoforte."
Most of the variations—there are twenty-[illegible] to various persons.

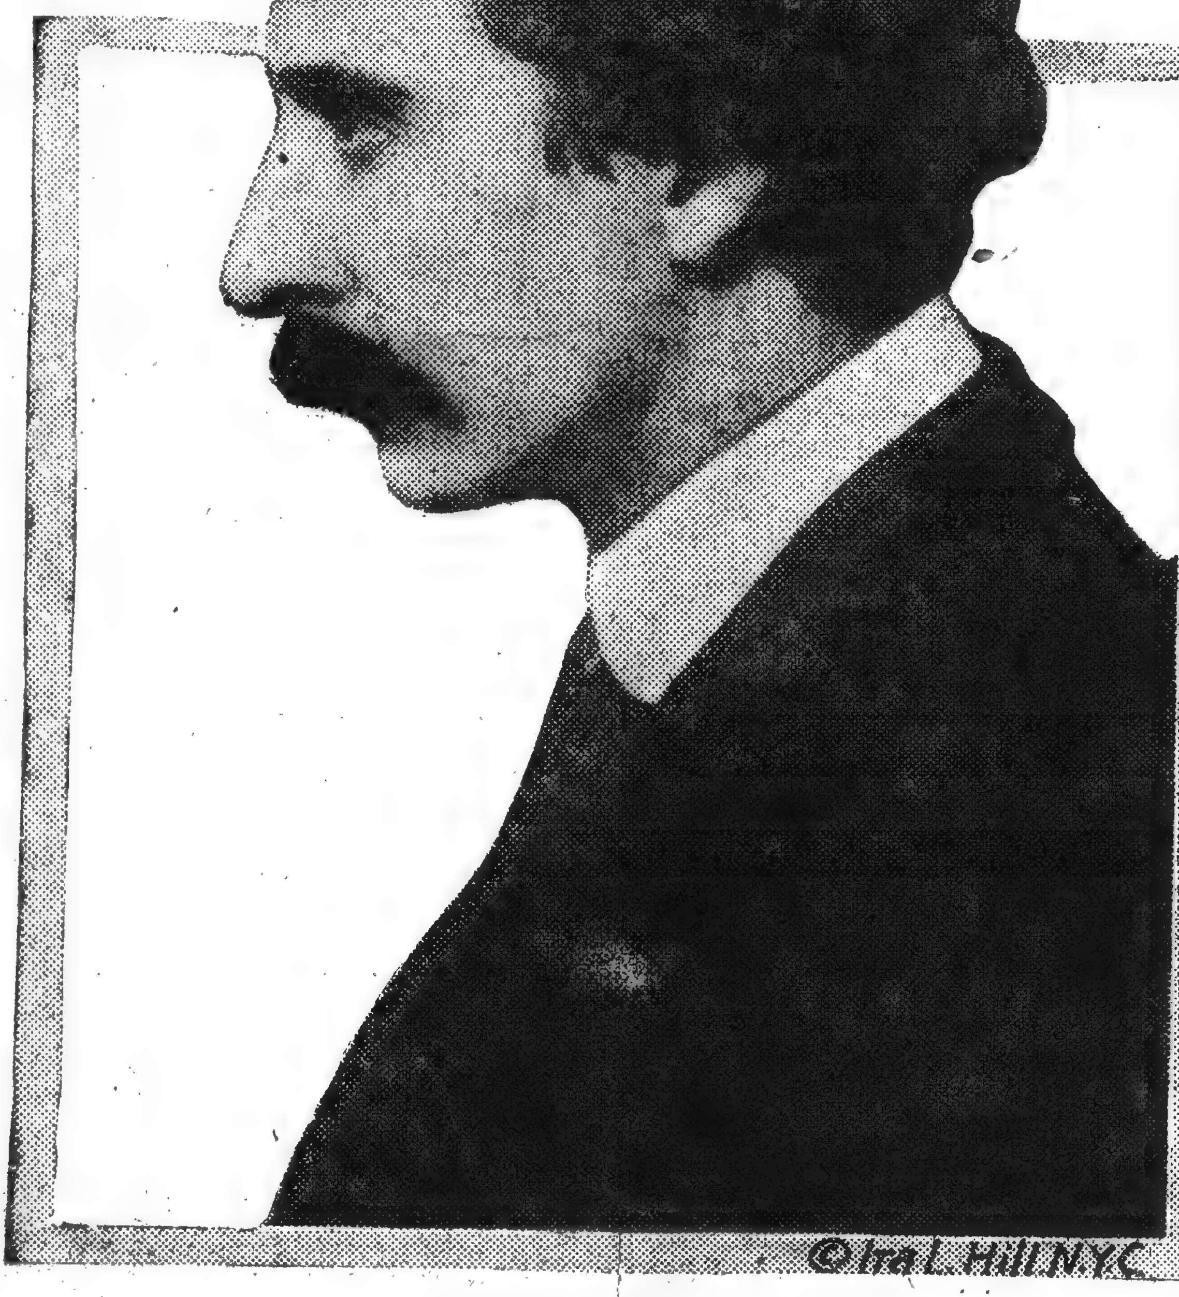
From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 1 3 1916
Date__________

Established:

ANNOUNCEMENTS OF THE MUSICAL SEASON

Philadelphia Orchestra to Play Symphony by American Composer—Julia Culp to to Be Heard in Recital



©Ira L. Hill N.Y.C.

ERNEST SCHELLING
Who will play here tomorrow with the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fourth and last, but one of the series of concerts given here each season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, February 14, at 8.15. Dr. Muck has divided the programme between the ultra-moderns and the best of the eighteenth century; in other words the first half of the programme is devoted to works by Debussy and Schelling, while the last half of the programme is given to Mozart's Symphony in E flat Major, K. 543.

Debussy will be represented by his symphonic sketches entitled "The Sea." These sketches which are three in number, entitled respectively "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of the Waves," and "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea" are just ten years old, having had their first performance at a Lamoureaux concert in Paris, October 15, 1905. Dr. Muck gave the first performances of these sketches in America at a Boston Symphony concert in Boston, March 2 and 3, 1907. Then, as two years before in Paris, they were regarded practically as incomprehensible from a musical point of view, but so rapidly does the ear become accustomed to new tonalities, that today they are thought comparatively simple and their full beauty is realized.

The novelty of the concert will be Ernest Schelling's variations for orchestra and piano which had its first performances in Boston, December 31 and January 1 last. The title is "Impressions From an Artist's Life," in the form of variations on an original theme for orchestra and pianoforte. Mr. Schelling, whose ties in Philadelphia are very close and whose talent has long been recognized here, in this work shows himself as a composer of extraordinary skill and fancy. He uses a theme which may be regarded as exotic in character and on this he has built twenty-one variations of widely different forms.

Most of these variations are dedicated to various persons. The first two are dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the second to Dr. Muck. The fourth is in commemoration of Pfitzner, Schelling's teacher in composition; the seventh and oboe solo, is dedicated to Georges Longy, first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the eighth to Pavlowa, the ninth to Paderewski and others to Gustav Mahler, Fritz Kraisler, etc. One of the most impressive of the variations is entitled "August, 1914," in which Mr. Schelling pictures the war. Mr. Schelling will play the pianoforte.

From Nation
Address: New York City
Date FEB 2 4 1916

When Miss Farrar, while still in her teens, first sang at the Royal Opera in Berlin, she was allowed by the Kaiser (who was—or pretended to be—at that time very partial to everything American) to do things in her own way to a degree which displeased the conductors, including Dr. Muck. Since then, Farrar and Muck have become good friends, and only a week or two ago she sang in Boston at a concert of that city's famous orchestra. Yet Dr. Muck, like most orchestral conductors, prefers concerts without soloists. In Carnegie Hall, last week, he had none either on Thursday or Saturday, yet his audiences were happy. His Saturday programme included "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne." Saint-Saëns considers this the best of Liszt symphonic poems, and wonders why it is not often seen on programmes. To most of those who heard it in Carnegie Hall it was a novelty. Its first performance in New York was in 1869. Philharmonic audiences must have been queer in those days to judge by what the correspondent of Dwight's Journal of Music wrote concerning this occasion:

> The Liszt nondescript was humanely put at the end of the programme, and was of course heard by comparatively few people. The "poem" possesses all of Liszt's defects and none, or nearly none, of his few excellences; it is the very essence of turgidity, and is thoroughly chaotic in form, or in the lack of form. . . . The audience was an immense one, and was downstairs a decorous one; in the third gallery, however, the talking, laughing, flirting, and boorish rudeness were simply disgraceful. I regret to say that upon the fair sex rests the responsibility of three-fourths of this absolutely "hoggish" behavior.

Philharmonic audiences have changed since those days, even in the "third gallery"; they behave better and have learned to listen to Liszt's inspired works and to applaud them more enthusiastically, perhaps, than any others, except Wagner's, thanks largely to their admirable interpretation under Josef Stransky. Like him, Dr. Muck is a Liszt enthusiast. Last year he conducted four performances of Liszt's "Faust" symphony which were acknowledged to be the climax of the season in Boston. This year he poured oil on the flames by his revival of "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne," and its cordial reception led him to bring it to New York, where it was sure to meet with the same favor; for, thanks to Seidl and Stransky, New York has been ahead of Boston in learning to appreciate the genius of Liszt, whom Wagner (who learned and borrowed much from him) called "the greatest musician of all time."

Liszt's "Mountain Symphony," as they call it in Germany, is based on a poem by Victor Hugo in which the glories of nature are contrasted with the discords and sorrows of humanity. To these two poetic motives, so well adapted for musical treatment, Liszt adds a third—Faith, or the consolations of religion. These three are interwoven with wonderful art, which reaches its climax in a choral-like passage for the brass choir. On the whole, while one may not agree with Saint-Saëns that this is the greatest of Liszt's symphonic poems (it is certainly inferior to "Tasso"), one can understand how Wagner could derive "ecstatic delight" from hearing it.

HENRY T. FINCK.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date FEB 1 2 1916

Estab 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth and last but one of the concerts given each season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, February 16, at 8:15. The program which Dr. Muck has arranged presents at least two points of surpassing interest. These are Joachim's Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra, entitled In the Hungarian Style, and Liszt's first symphonic poem, Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne.

Joachim's great concerto seldom appears on modern programs, for as skilled as the violin virtuoso is today—which is saying much—there are few artists who will undertake and are able to overcome the stupendous difficulties which Joachim has placed in this work.

Beethoven—Overture, Leonora No. 1, Opus 138. Joachim—Concerto in D Major, Opus 11 (In the Hungarian Style). Liszt—Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne (What one hears upon the mountain), Symphonic Poem No. 1 (after Victor Hugo).

[illegible] is indeed an opu[illegible] richness of tone that [illegible] music [illegible] upon it throbbed upo[illegible] orchestra [illegible] all the senses. Not for long has a piece by Goldmark been so warmly applauded. It deserved resurrection from the tomb in which routine—grave-digger of interest—had buried it.

Perhaps the interposing forty-five minutes of Brahms, plus a round ten of intermission, did their service to MacDowell's music. Heard too soon, after the sensuous splendor and the golden luminority of "Sappho," it might have rounded them and cool of invention and pale of color. For the music of American composers—and even of a MacDowell in these earlier years before he had gained the imaginative light and heat of the "Indian Suite" and the final sonatas—is not usually (to return to Arnold's saying) either "Sensuous" or "impassioned." Either they have not the passion that releases itself in the self-expression of the arts or, being of a young race, not quite articulate, even when it is most garrulous, know not how to set it free in tones or words. Similarly they lack the sensuousness of voice and mood that in Goldmark almost to excess liberates itself in richness, ardor and glow, alike of emotion and expression, that basks, almost in its own intensities. We are pure souls as yet—as a hundred pulpits may be saying tomorrow but it may be doubted whether the pure in heart best serve the expressive arts. All of which as to MacDowll's suite of the purest is neither here nor there since he set himself to writing no more than little lrics in tones of the woodland that he knew and felt with quick and affectionate imagination. He wrote them, moreover, with as many a lyric stroke, in tonal coloring, modulation, contrast and rhythm of happy and artful imagery. This woodland suite deserves a place in the minor poetry of tones, and are not the Symphony Concerts our anthology of music.

H. T. P.

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

ork, 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth and last but one of the concerts given each season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening. The program which Dr. Muck has arranged presents at least two points of surpassing interest. These are Joachim's concerto in D major for violin and orchestra entitled "In the Hungarian Style" and Liszt's first symphonic poem, "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne."

Joachim's great concerto seldom appears on modern programs, for, as skilled as the violin virtuoso is today, there are few artists who will undertake and are able to overcome the stupendous difficulties which Joachim has placed in this work. One of the few virtuosi able to do this is Anton Witek, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and he has just played it in Boston with remarkable success.

To Dr. Muck falls the credit of reviving in this country what in many respects is the most remarkable of the series of symphonic poems by which Liszt practically revolutionized the music of his day and of the days that followed him. Until Dr. Muck played it in Boston three weeks ago the only performance in America on record was in New York by the Philharmonic Society under Bergmann in 1869. It is astonishing and speaks well for Liszt's genius that, although this poem was conceived in 1833 and actually played in 1847, is is more modern in thought and feeling than much of the music of today. "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne" contains much of Liszt's best and most characteristic writing, and undoubtedly Dr. Muck's very successful revival of it means new life to the poem.

The program follows:

Overture, "Leonora" No. 1, Opus 138 .... Beethoven
Concerto in D Major, Opus 11 ("In the Hungarian Style").... Joachim
Symphonic Poem No. 1, "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne" ("What one hears upon the mountain"). (After Victor Hugo) .... Liszt

---

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Estab 84

THE fourth of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music Monday evening. The first half of the program is devoted to works by Debussy and Schelling, while the last half of the program is given to Mozart's Symphony in E-flat Major.

Debussy will be represented by his symphonic sketches entitled "The Sea." These sketches, which are three in number, entitled respectively "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of the Waves" and "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea," are just ten years old, having their first performance at a Lamoureax concert in Paris, October 15, 1905.

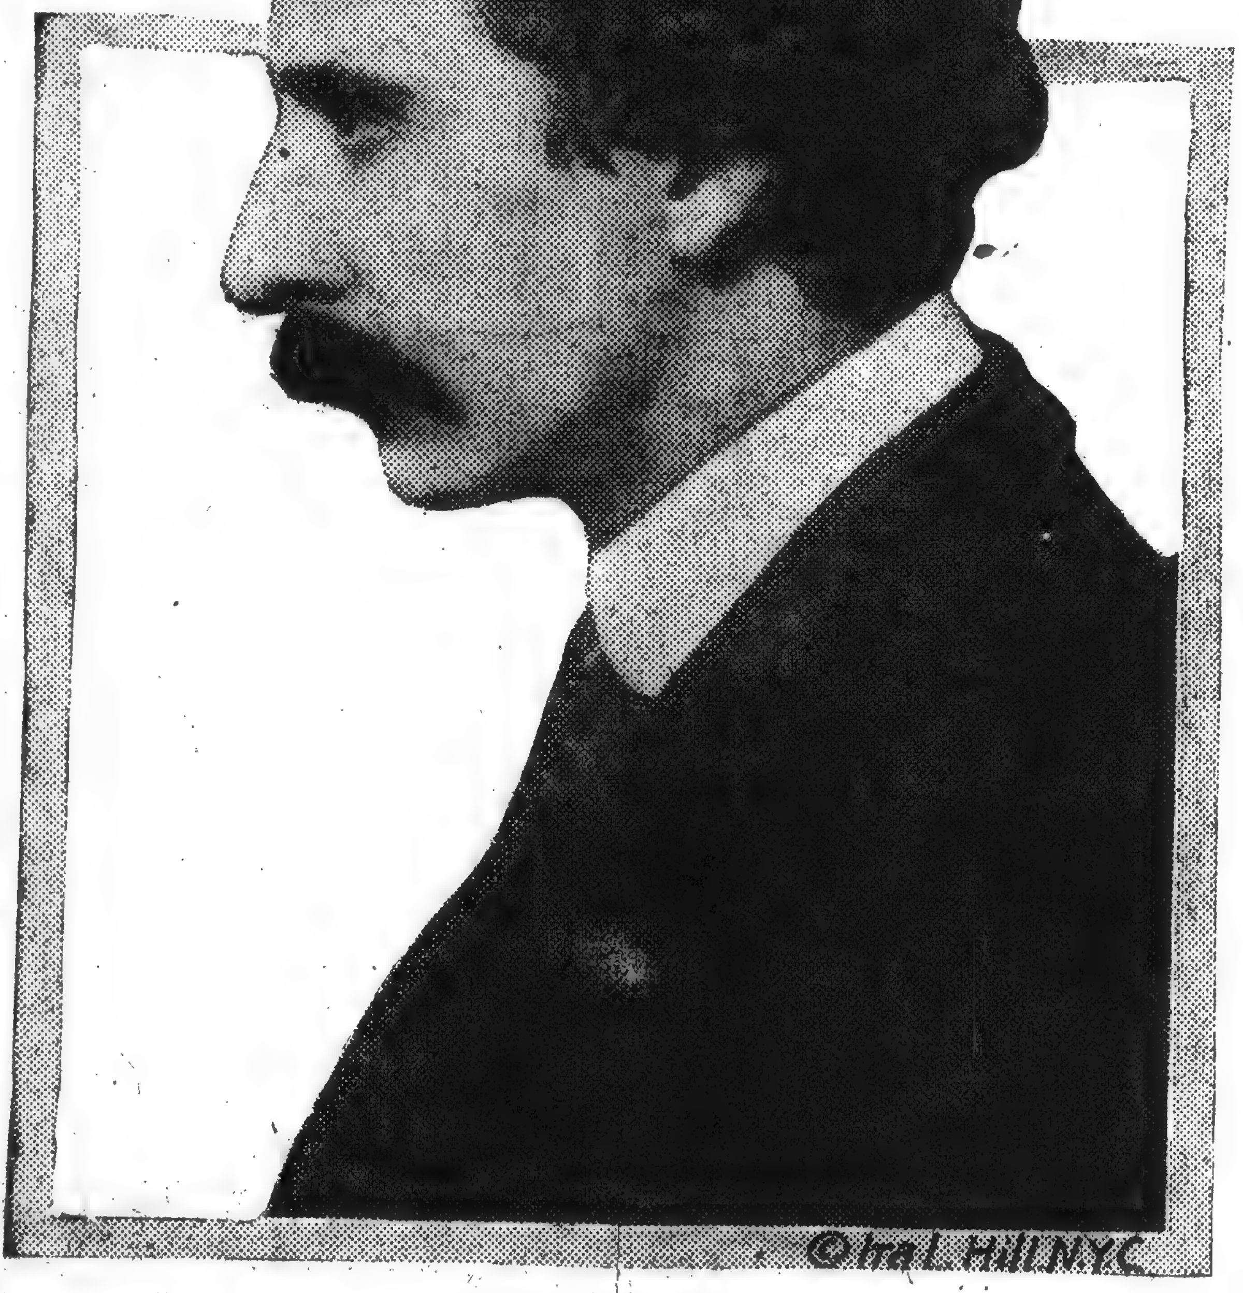
The novelty of the concert will be Ernest Schelling's variations for orchestra and piano, which had its first performance in Boston six weeks ago. The title is "Impressions from an Artist's Life, in the form of variations on an original theme for orchestra and pianoforte." [illegible] there are twenty-[illegible] Most of [illegible] persons.

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 13 1916

ished: I

ANNOUNCEMENTS OF THE MUSICAL SEASON

Philadelphia Orchestra to Play Symphony by American Composer—Julia Culp to to Be Heard in Recital



©Ira L. Hill N.Y.C.

ERNEST SCHELLING
Who will play here tomorrow with the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fourth and last, but one of the series of concerts given here each season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, February 14, at 8.15. Dr. Muck has divided the programme between the ultra-moderns and the best of the eighteenth century; in other words the first half of the programme is devoted to works by Debussy and Schelling, while the last half of the programme is given to Mozart's Symphony in E flat Major, K. 543.

Debussy will be represented by his symphonic sketches entitled "The Sea." These sketches which are three in number, entitled respectively "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of the Waves," and "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea" are just ten years old, having had their first performance at a Lamoureaux concert in Paris, October 15, 1905. Dr. Muck gave the first performances of these sketches in America at a Boston Symphony concert in Boston, March 2 and 3, 1907. Then, as two years before in Paris, they were regarded practically as incomprehensible from a musical point of view, but so rapidly does the ear become accustomed to new tonalities, that today they are thought comparatively simple and their full beauty is realized.

The novelty of the concert will be Ernest Schelling's variations for orchestra and piano which had its first performances in Boston, December 31 and January 1 last. The title is "Impressions From an Artist's Life," in the form of variations on an original theme for orchestra and pianoforte. Mr. Schelling, whose ties in Philadelphia are very close and whose talent has long been recognized here, in this work shows himself as a composer of extraordinary skill and fancy. He uses a theme which may be regarded as exotic in character and on this he has built twenty-one variations of widely different forms.

Most of these variations are dedicated to various persons. The first two are dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the second to Dr. Muck. The fourth is in commemoration of Pfitzner, Schelling's teacher in composition; the seventh and oboe solo, is dedicated to Georges Longy, first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the eighth to Pavlowa, the ninth to Paderewski and others to Gustav Mahler, Fritz Kraisler, etc. One of the most impressive of the variations is entitled "August, 1914," in which Mr. Schelling pictures the war. Mr. Schelling will play the pianoforte.

From Nation
Address: New York City
Date FEB 24 1916

When Miss Farrar, while still in her teens, first sang at the Royal Opera in Berlin, she was allowed by the Kaiser (who was—or pretended to be—at that time very partial to everything American) to do things in her own way to a degree which displeased the conductors, including Dr. Muck. Since then, Farrar and Muck have become good friends, and only a week or two ago she sang in Boston at a concert of that city's famous orchestra. Yet Dr. Muck, like most orchestral conductors, prefers concerts without soloists. In Carnegie Hall, last week, he had none either on Thursday or Saturday, yet his audiences were happy. His Saturday programme included "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne." Saint-Saëns considers this the best of Liszt symphonic poems, and wonders why it is not often seen on programmes. To most of those who heard it in Carnegie Hall it was a novelty. Its first performance in New York was in 1869. Philharmonic audiences must have been queer in those days to judge by what the correspondent of Dwight's Journal of Music wrote concerning this occasion:

> The Liszt nondescript was humanely put at the end of the programme, and was of course heard by comparatively few people. The "poem" possesses all of Liszt's defects and none, or nearly none, of his few excellences; it is the very essence of turgidity, and is thoroughly chaotic in form, or in the lack of form. . . . The audience was an immense one, and was downstairs a decorous one; in the third gallery, however, the talking, laughing, flirting, and boorish rudeness were simply disgraceful. I regret to say that upon the fair sex rests the responsibility of three-fourths of this absolutely "hoggish" behavior.

Philharmonic audiences have changed since those days, even in the "third gallery"; they behave better and have learned to listen to Liszt's inspired works and to applaud them more enthusiastically, perhaps, than any others, except Wagner's, thanks largely to their admirable interpretation under Josef Stransky. Like him, Dr. Muck is a Liszt enthusiast. Last year he conducted four performances of Liszt's "Faust" symphony which were acknowledged to be the climax of the season in Boston. This year he poured oil on the flames by his revival of "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne," and its cordial reception led him to bring it to New York, where it was sure to meet with the same favor; for, thanks to Seidl and Stransky, New York has been ahead of Boston in learning to appreciate the genius of Liszt, whom Wagner (who learned and borrowed much from him) called "the greatest musician of all time."

Liszt's "Mountain Symphony," as they call it in Germany, is based on a poem by Victor Hugo in which the glories of nature are contrasted with the discords and sorrows of humanity. To these two poetic motives, so well adapted for musical treatment, Liszt adds a third—Faith, or the consolations of religion. These three are interwoven with wonderful art, which reaches its climax in a choral-like passage for the brass choir. On the whole, while one may not agree with Saint-Saëns that this is the greatest of Liszt's symphonic poems (it is certainly inferior to "Tasso"), one can understand how Wagner could derive "ecstatic delight" from hearing it.

HENRY T. FINCK.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date FEB 12 1916

Estal 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth and last but one of the concerts given each season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, February 16, at 8:15. The program which Dr. Muck has arranged presents at least two points of surpassing interest. These are Joachim's Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra, entitled In the Hungarian Style, and Liszt's first symphonic poem, Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne.

Joachim's great concerto seldom appears on modern programs, for as skilled as the violin virtuoso is today—which is saying much—there are few artists who will undertake and are able to overcome the stupendous difficulties which Joachim has placed in this work.

Beethoven—Overture, Leonora No. 1, Opus 138. Joachim—Concerto in D Major, Opus 11 (In the Hungarian Style). Liszt—Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne (What one hears upon the mountain), Symphonic Poem No. 1 (after Victor Hugo).

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date FEB 12 1916

Esta 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY APPEARS WEDNESDAY

Joachim's Difficult D Major Violin Concerto On Program—Anton Witek Soloist.

LISZT POEM TO BE PLAYED

Dr. Muck Revived Piece Which Until Three Weeks Ago Had Been Given Only Once In America.

The fourth concert to be given this season in Baltimore by the Boston Symphony will take place at the Lyric next Wednesday evening, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, when the program will contain two very interesting novelties, Joachim's rarely heard D major violin concerto, the one written "in the Hungarian manner," and Liszt's first symphonic poem, "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne."

The supreme difficulty of the Joachim concerto has militated somewhat against its popularity, for very few players are willing to attempt it. For this reason it is scarcely ever found on a concert program. Anton Witek, the concertmeister of the Boston Orchestra, who will be the soloist on this occasion, has recently presented this work in Boston with signal success, so that his performance of this difficult composition on Wednesday next will have a special significance.

Revived Liszt Symphonic Poem.

To Dr. Muck falls the credit of reviving in this country what in many respects is the most remarkable of the series of symphonic poems by which Liszt practically revolutionized the music of his day and of the days that followed him. Until Dr. Muck played it in Boston, three weeks ago, the only performance in America on record was that given in New York by the Philharmonic Society, under Gergmann, in 1869. It is astounding and speaks well for Liszt's genius, although this poem was conceived in 1833 and actually played in 1847, it is more modern in thought and feeling than much of the music that is written today.

Listening to it the auditor familiar with modern literature of music is not unlike the youth who said he liked to go to Shakespeare's plays because they were so full of familiar quotations.

Wagner Drew From Him.

Liszt's son-in-law, Wagner, dipped most deeply into this work, as he did into many of Liszt's other works, for material for his music dramas. Richard Strauss was familiar with it and had it decidedly in his mind when he wrote the finale of his "Zarathustra." "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne" contains much of Liszt's best and most characteristic writing, and undoubtedly Dr. Muck's very successful revival of it means new life to the poem.

The concert next Wednesday will open with the playing of Beethoven's first "Leonora" overture.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

Estal 4

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's picturesque symphony, "Antar," is the principal number on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its fourth concert at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon. Like many of the Russian symphonies, this is a symphony only in name. It is in three movements and is much more in the order of a suite than a symphony. It has much in common with the same composer's famous suite, "Scheherazade," in that the music is strongly tinged with the color of the orient.

The soloist will be Joseph Malkin, the celebrated cellist of the orchestra.

[illegible]

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date 16

Establi

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Rimsky - Korsakoff's picturesque symphony "Antar" is the principal number on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth concert in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 15. Like many of the Russian symphonies, this is a symphony only in name. It is in three movements and is much more on the order of a suite than a symphony. It has much in common with the same composer's famous suite, "Scheherazade," in that the music is strongly tinged with the color of the Orient.

The soloist, as already announced, will be Joseph Malkin, the celebrated cellist of the orchestra.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB

Established

The fourth of the series of concerts given here each season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. Dr. Muck has divided the program between the ultra-moderns and the best of the eighteenth century; in other words, the first half of the program is devoted to works by Debussy and Schelling, while the last half of the program is given to Mozart's Symphony in E-flat Major, 543.

—Ira L. Hill's Studio.

ERNEST SCHELLING.

Debussy will be represented by his Symphonic Sketches entitled "The Sea." These sketches, entitled, respectively, "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of the Waves" and "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea," are 10 years old, having had their first performance at a Lamoureaux concert in Paris, Oct. 15, 1905. Dr. Muck gave the first performances of the sketches in America at a Boston Symphony concert in Boston, in March, 1907. Then, as two years before in Paris, they were regarded practically as incomprehensible from a musical point of view. But so rapidly does the ear become accustomed to new tonalities that today they are comparatively simple and their full beauty is realized.

The novelty of the concert will be Ernest Schelling's Variations for Orchestra and Piano, which had its first performances in Boston December 31 and January 1 last. The title is "Impressions From an Artist's Life," in the form of variations on an original theme for orchestra and pianoforte." Schelling uses a theme which may be regarded as exotic in character and on this he has built 21 variations of widely-different forms. Most of these variations are dedicated to various persons. The first two are dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the second to Dr. Muck. The fourth is in commemoration of Pfitzner, Schelling's teacher in composition; the seventh and oboe solo, is dedicated to Georges Longy, first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the eighth to Pavlowa, the ninth to Paderewski and others to Gustav Mahler, Fritz Kreisler, etc. One of the most impressive of the Variations is entitled "August, 1914," in which Schelling pictures the war. Schelling will play the pianoforte.

* * *

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date FEB 9 - 1916

Establis

CONCERT GAVE GREAT DELIGHT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Aided by Miss Kathleen Howard

Infantry Hall was well-filled last night for the fourth of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the large audience heard a programme that was of great merit and that furnished unvarying enjoyment. The orchestra was assisted by Miss Kathleen Howard, one of the foremost contraltos of this country, and she added much to the measure of pleasure that was found in the music of the evening. As usual, Dr. Muck, the director of the orchestra, had arranged a collection of numbers of variety and yet of high order, and that the audience was fully satisfied was shown beyond possibility of doubt by the enthusiasm displayed at the close of each selection. It was gratifying to see Dr. Muck wielding the baton again, and he was greeted warmly when he made his first entrance.

The concert opened with the symphony, which was Mozart's in E-flat major, one of the three masterpieces that he wrote within the space of a few months, which have never ceased to delight and inspire music lovers. This work is marked by much feeling and possesses, also, a richness of coloring that makes it ever appeal to those who revel in music of that character. Contrasted with it in a manner to reveal the beauties of both was the second number for the orchestra, Handel's concerto for strings and two wind choirs, which is a fascinating composition, with all the tunefulness that accentuates the music by this composer when his work is of his best. In this was heard to fine advantage the celebrated wind choir of this orchestra, and the skill evinced by this portion of the orchestra won prolonged expressions of appreciation from the audience. The final instrumental number was Dvorak's overture, "Husitska," which was admirably suited for a closing selection to leave an impression of completeness and satisfaction with those in attendance.

The vocal numbers were well chosen to show the quality and power of Miss Howard's voice. A Canadian by birth, who has spent most of her career in Germany and London, she received the greater part of her musical education in this country. She stands high in her profession and she merits the distinction and praise she has received. Her voice is a rich, deep contralto of extensive range, under full control, beautifully modulated, carefully trained and managed with a fine command of technique. She sings with spirit and yet with marked sympathy and tenderness when the text demands that emotion. That she pleased all who heard her last night was unmistakable from the reception she was accorded after each number. The aria, "Gerechter Gott," from Wagner's opera, "Rienzi," was rendered in a manner that won instant attention and held it until the last note. The second selection, the familiar aria from Saint-Saens's "Samson and Delilah," "Mon Coeur S'ouvre a ta Voix," was sung with brilliant effect and drew from the audience still further expressions of delight.

The programme as arranged in proper order was as follows:

Mozart ..Symphony, E-flat major (K. 543)
I. Adagio; Allegro.
II. Andante
III. Minuetto; Trio
IV. Finale; Allegro
Wagner....................Scene, "Just God"
And aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from "Rienzi," Act. III., No. 9.
Handel ....Concerto in F-major
For Strings and Two Wind Orchestras.
(Edition of Gustav F. Kogel.)
I. Pomposo
II. Allegro
III. A tempo ordinario
IV. Largo
V. Allegro
Saint-Saens...."My Heart at Thy Dear Voice," from "Samson and Delilah."
Dvorak ....
..Dramatic overture, "Hositska," op. 67

SUNDAY POST, MARCH 5,

Composers and Conductors

Scrupulous Fidelity of Dr. Muck Toward Composer's Wishes—Vexed Question of "Cuts" in Symphonic Compositions—Mr. Ellis' Opera Tour Next Fall—Concerts to Come

Sibelius' second symphony will be conducted for the first time by Dr. Muck in this city at the Boston Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday, and the symphony will then be restored to its original version, dispensing with the editing of Mr. Fiedler, who was very fond of this composition, but who feared, perhaps, to present Sibelius in an absolutely unadulterated form to his audiences, here were some slight cuts, as we remember Mr. Fiedler's performance, in the slow movement and in the finale. Mr. Fielder also made a few changes in the instrumentation, with a view to brightening and clarifying certain passages.

In the case of Sibelius there is a certain monotony of coloring which is not displeasing, but rather suggestive of sullen Northern nature, of vast spaces and skirling winds. We personally missed in Mr. Fiedler's performance a repetition of a very characteristic passage which comes just before the end of the final movement of the Second Symphony.

It is a place where continuous scale figure in the lower strings accompanies a monotonous chant of the wind instruments. When this passage appears for the last time it is repeated and extended, and the burden of the chant is taken by violins and a few wind instruments, with the whirling scale figure given the upper wind as well as the lower strings, and various rhythmical elaborations. The mood of the music is thus intensified. The tonality being minor the peroration of the movement, which is in the major, becomes the more brilliant and emphatic.

Dr. Muck is a firm believer in presenting a composer's message in its exact original form. Not in the many years of his conductorship of opera in Berlin did he undertake cuts in his Wagner performances, and on one occasion he performed Meyerbeer's "Huguenots" in its entirety. What the experience must have been we cheerfully leave to the imagination. "Les Huguenots," long enough in all conscience, has never, so far as the records show, been heard in its entirety in this country. In Berlin, under Dr. Muck, the performance took 11 hours and lasted through two evenings.

MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS.,

SATURDAY, MARCH 4,

"MON AMI TEDDY" AT THE COPLEY BY FRENCH PLAYERS

COPLEY THEATER—Le Théâtre Français d'Amérique presents "Mon Ami Teddy," comedy in three acts by Andre Rivoire, evening of March 3. The cast:

Teddy W. Kimberley	Edgar Becman
Didier Morel	Ferdinand Verley
D'Alonne	Georges Renavent
Bertin	Georges Saulieu
Verdier	Paul Cerny
Corbett	Emile Detramont
Dominique	Pierre Mindaist
Willie	Bernhey
Madeleine	Yvonne Garrick
Mme. Roucher	Jenny Diska
Mathilde	Ginnette Guerande
Franine	Mado Ditza
Juliette	Madeleine Rivort
Yvonne	Simone Revyl
Aline	Georgette Ducellier

Present day authors of plays seem quite unable to incorporate in their works the character of a subject or citizen of some country other than that where the action takes place without having recourse to the humorous or comic element. "Mon Ami Teddy," given at the Copley last night by the French players, made no exception. But however pleasant it may have been for an American audience (and this left one no doubt that it was pleased) to see their national character and peculiarities portrayed in a more or less favorable light in the role of Teddy Kimberley, it seemed a great pity from the language point of view that it should have been necessary for M. Becman to adopt that English accent in his French. His diction and enunciation are particularly good, and it must have been a kind of disappointment to many of those present who went there with the expectation of hearing him speak in the way which served him as such a favorable introduction at the beginning of the week.

As far as the story itself goes, as in the case of the two previous plays reviewed in these columns, its intrinsic value is very small. M. Didier Morel, a member of the Chambre des Députés, cares very little about his charming young wife Madeleine and too much about his parliamentary reports and the counsels and praises of ambitious Mme. Roucher. Teddy Kimberley, a young American with bags of money, is introduced to the family, sizes up the situation, and since Madeleine is not the right kind of woman for M. Didier Morel and M. Didier Morel not the right kind of husband for Madeleine, Teddy makes up his mind to bring about a divorce and then marry Madeleine. He invites the whole family and friends to his villa at the seaside, where things come to a crisis, but Madeleine, not being aware of the designs of "mon ami Teddy," agrees to marry a young secretary to an embassy, Bertin. The engagement is not looked upon too favorably by either side, so Teddy tells Madeleine, who is now free, that Bertin would not be the right kind of man for her either, makes known to her what he had done and in the end they are happily united.

Once one has become reconciled as regards the language question, it cannot be denied that M. Becman made a very good American indeed, and the audience was warmly appreciative; also Mlle. Yvonne Garrick as Madeleine Didier Morel was in well merited favor throughout the piece. Mr. Becman and Mlle. Garrick as chief characters harmonize very happily. Highly commendable performance were those of Messieurs Georges Saulien as Berton, George Renavent as D'Alonne and Paul Cerny as Verdier, while Mme. Jenny Diska also succeeded very well in the role of Mme. Roucher.

BOSTON POST,

MARCH 4,

HONORS TO RAVEL BY SYMPHONY

Spanish Rhapsody Is Brilliantly Played

BY OLIN DOWNES

Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, Volkmann's Serenade in F major, op. 63, and Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" made the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Tschaikowsky's work was brilliantly performed, and the humanity of the music, its frankness of appeal, its profound melancholy, its desperate gayety, and all the old Tschaikowsky tricks of instrumentation which it is the habit to make fun of, but which say so much in such an undeniably convincing way, stirred the audience. There was so much applause that the orchestra rose to its feet, and Dr. Muck was called back to the stage after the last movement more than once.

RAVEL'S RHAPSODY

Volkmann's serenade music, written vithout pretension and with only a ittle of the sadness characteristic of o much of Volkmann's music, likeise entertained. But the triumph of he concert, after which the orchestra hould indeed have been called to its eet, was the remarkable performance Ravel's rhapsody.

Ravel is an impressionist, but his pressionism is not confined to the cord of impressions of merely exrior derivation. There is a quality once grim and sensuous, savage and elancholy, in this music which is ind tragic, at moments fate-ridden. The "Prelude a la Nuit," with its ournful dance refrain and its perstent figure of four notes which unts this movement and the succeed- movements, and makes a final aparance in the midst of the madness the Fair—this prelude, and the giering cadenza's of wind instruments hich occur near its close—has a fantical macabre quality that even in ese days of musical articulateness is ard to parallel in any other score.

There is unending variety of color, lor not confined to that furnished by strumental combinations, but color, so, which is inherent in the musical eas, in the clashing of chords and tervals. The skill displayed in composition and instrumentation is monuental. It has often seemed that in e beginning Ravel followed Debussy. oday he is certainly his own master, d one of the marvels and enigmas the modern French school. The usic of this suite is sad and cruel, or ay, or hot with color and sunshine, nd savage in its rythmic power. A arvellous score, interpreted with a astery little short of marvellous by r. Muck and his players. But not usic for sentimentalism or pink tea, ence not music that found such favor as the reveries of Volkmann or the ailing of Tschaikowsky.

MARCH 4, 1916

ADVERTISER, SATURDAY

SYMPHONY CONCERT FINE ORCHESTRAL PROGRAMME

Enough Melodic Beauty to Satisfy Conservatives and Enough Orchestral Glow to Fulfil Demands of Modern Radicals

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PFOGRAMME

Tschaikowsky. Symphony No. 4, F minor.
Volkmann. Serenade for strings, No. 2, F major.
Ravel. Spanish Rhapsody.

A good and strongly-contrasted programme, purely orchestral and with enough melodic beauty to satisfy the conservatives, and enough orchestral glow to fulfil the demands of the modern radicals. It is becoming evident that Tschaikowsky's fourth and fifth symphonies are emerging from the temporary eclipse into which the excessive popularity of the sixth symphony threw them. At each hearing they show themselves stronger than their weeping and wailing successor.

The interest began with the introduction. Dr. Muck threw the Motto theme (which begins the work, and forms its chief germ) at the audience, as if it were a cannonade. The contrast with happiness which soon followed was immediately nullified by this remarkable fate-figure, which had the merit of being easily followed and understood. Tschaikowsky here makes use of a waltz rhythm to typify pleasure, but not even he (nor Berlioz either) can persuade us that the waltz can rise to symphonic standards. But this particular waltz gradually leads to frenzy. It begins as a waltz and ends as a sort of Carmagnole. The spasmodic character of the first movement militates against its full success.

In the second movement we have the true Eastern folk-song flavor. It is a brooding and pensive style which is full of charm. And here the oboe and the bassoon deserve praise for the simple and dreamy manner in which their themes were given. And here also we have the promise of the future glory of Russian music. Its chief composers (unless stung by the modern tarantula, as Stravinsky and Scriabine) build on the folk-song as on a rock, and this may give them a supremacy over the German phrase and motive jugglers very soon.

The third movement, although not very definite, was agreeable, with its constant Coda, and it won the most enthusiastic applause so that the orchestra was obliged to rise in acknowledgement. The finale was the most striking movement of all, and it is typically Russian from first to last. It is like a merry-making of the Moujiks. But here, amid the hearty jollity of the peasantry, there still comes the fate motive of the introduction. The whole symphony seems to be a contest between the "joie de vivre" and a grim, pursuing Destiny. The subordinate theme of this Finale is an actual Russian folk-song—"A Birch-tree stood in the Fields"—although Tschaikowsky has somewhat altered its rhythmic structure. Again there was wild applause and again the orchestra arose in response.

Dr. Muck read the work with all that rough vigor that the subject demanded. Only the second movement was a respite from the excitement and abandon of the entire work. Will there ever come a time when some Russian composer will tone down this fury with something of the calmness of a Brahms?

To go from this wild work to the sedate Serenade of Volkmann was like going from Philip drunk to Philip very, very sober. It was, a taste of the old Leipsic Conservatory type. Not that it was "Kapellmeistermusik," it was too beautiful for that, but it gave not one unnecessary dissonance, not one resolution that could not be justified by Richter. Many of the audience evidently enjoyed the sedative, it gave sweet repose to the nerves.

And it displayed our string orchestra in mazes of suave counterpoint, in which the ensemble was faultless. In this work, as in the Tschaikowsky symphony there was a waltz movement, but of a much more Chesterfieldian type than the very excited one which the Russian employed. Perhaps the Volkmann work suffered a little in coming after that wild Tschaikowsky finale, but after all such gentility and serenity in Music, as Volkmann displays, is a respite which one might crave once in a while in these very excitable musical days.

The four short movements of this Serenade were given continuously, without pause, and Dr. Muck adopted the same course with the Ravel Suite which followed. It is a question whether this course does not puzzle some of the audience.

Dr. Muck gave a finesse to the Spanish Rhapsody that would have delighted its composer. There was mystery, and the hush of a tropical night, as well as the floating, and sometimes aggressive, dance rhythms which resounded through it.

How many composers of different nations seek their inspiration in Spain! Chabrier, Debussy, Rimski-Korsakoff, Dvorak, Moszkowski, and many others might be named, who have flavored their music with Garlic. Spain is the country of effective idealized rag-time attracts them. Nevertheless we do not find Ravel as distinctively Spanish as some of the others above-mentioned. He seems more intent upon giving brilliant experiments in tone-coloring than in preserving "local color." Yet Spanish dance rhythms are there. There is a Habanera which does not abolish Bizet's charming idealization of the strong rhythm. There is a Malaguena which is much more furious, and the Suite ends with a picture of a Fair in which all the modern hurly-burly is let loose; xylophone, tambourine, castagnettes, and muted trumpets, heaping one dance rhythm upon another, Fandago, Cachuca, etc., and almost all through the Suite there is a simple figure of four descending diatonic notes.

The Suite, consisting of four movements, has the merit of brevity, and its effective tone-coloring makes it continuously interesting. Of course it was bizarre, but, for all that, we found it to be one of the welcome additions to the repertoirs of ultra-modern music. But poor Volkmann's genteel suavity, coming between the frenzy of a Moujik festival and the delirium of a Spanish Fair, was crushed between the upper and the nether mill-stone.

TRANSCRIPT,
MARCH 4,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Easy and Pleasurable Music, Excellent Performance and an Applausive Audience—The Contrasts of Tschaikovsky and Ravel

WITH Tschaikovsky's symphony in F minor to begin Dr. Muck's programme and Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody to end it; with an audience variously and amusingly applausive in the right and the wrong place, contrast, for once, was not lacking in the Symphony Concert of yesterday. Two pieces of music could hardly be further apart than is the Russian's from the Parisian's; while listeners who had applauded the string choir after the pizzicati passages in Tschaikovsky's Scherzo so heartily that the conductor called the musicians to their feet, clapped only scantily and scrappily at the close of Ravel's suite. The Scherzo is a pleasing and well-liked piece; to play stringed instruments with the fingers instead of the bow and to pick them so for some minutes (as Tschaikovsky prescribes) arrests the attention of an audience; and hence, perhaps, the impression abides that these pizzicati measures exact an extraordinary feat of virtuosity. As a matter of fact they do not, either in themselves or in comparison with the demands that Ravel lays upon all the divisions of his orchestra. He takes for granted a technical aptness and imagination in the players which Tschaikovsky hardly suspected; he writes what he will in whatever fashion he may choose for it and bids conductor and band give it vivid voice. They did yesterday with superlative skill and felicity. And a listening audience dismissed them with faint plaudits, whereas it had nearly rent its gloves over as vivid but by no means as exacting a performance of Tschaikovsky's symphony. That piece happens to be familiar and well-liked, while as yet Ravel's Rhapsody is "one of those French things, you know,—modern stuff.

No wonder that the house so rose to the Russian's music. The motives out of which it is to expand may not overpass the dullest ear; on the instant, almost, they become melodies, clear of profile and course, engaging the ear, suggestive to the fancy. There is no mistaking the phrase of relentless fate that begins the symphony to recur through the first movement; as obvious are the contrasting measures of restless or lulled submission. The slow movement is a brooding and changeful music, wistful in itself and melancholy of impression—not passion for all Tschaikovsky's sounding phrases about it, but of a pensive sentiment. His hearers "feel with him." The instrumental whimsies, the play of the light rhythms, the floating phrases of the scherzo give as easy pleasure; and none may withstand the boisterous rushes and the clear folk-tune of the finale. Music with a tang to it, music of immediate and unmistakable suggestion, music that gives something of the pleasure of the theatre when we follow the moods and the voice of a personage clearly set before our eyes, music that is full of pleasing or stimulating diversions along the way. Gladly the listening ears hear the orchestra thrashing about with the motive of fate or lunging and lurching through the finale; as gladly they follow the caprices of the choirs through the scherzo or the appropriate instruments adding their color to the melancholy song. The workmanship is as transparent. To and fro through the orchestra goes a phrase that happens to catch Tschaikovsky's fancy; the arabesques spin themselves; at the due moment back comes the anticipated and easily recognizable melody. It all seems as easy as the pleasure of it and symphonic music does not often wear that guise.

Moreover, the music is full of the self-revelation—the expansive self-revelation—that most of us like to hear and with which Trahaikovsky is as prodigal as though he had a strain of the American temperament mixed with the temperament of the Slav. Reticence he knows not; the music of pure imagination lies not within his powers or even inclination; the music of universal voce speaking the impulses of the universal spirit or farther beyond them; he is little disposed to the music that might record and transfigure his impressions of external things as they reacted upon him. In these last three symphonies there is only one music that he can write—the music of his own individual sensations as he insistently reaches out his own spirit. It is he and not the universe of men that endures relentless fate in a sad restlessness or a drugged submission; it is his spirit that broods in vague longing and wistful memories; that tries to play with capricious fancies, that plunges deep and wild into rough and riotous pleasures. In lengthy letters to his friends he may write of all these things as though they were universal moods and sensations, pleasure and pain; but so doing he is busy once more, as in his recording of them in tones, with self examination and self-confession.

The practice is dangerous even for a nature less sensitive, neurotic and introspective than Tschaikovsky's. It narrows mind and spirit to purely individual, closely self-centred and often rather hysterical expression; it tortures nerves, that need not be so bared, that other nerves may tingle; and it comes gradually to take a sensuous and a morbid pleasunre in its own brooding. It dulls self-criticism and the mental faculties of control and selection. It relaxes standards. There is less hysteria in this fourth symphony, for example, than there is in the Pathetic; but there is more of this sensuous satisfaction in brooding and introspection to give form, body and color to motive and melody. The fourth is not so morbid as the fifth and the sixth symphonies, but there is the same relaxation in the choice of high means to high purpose. This self-revealing Tschaikovsky is as transparent as his music. With pleasure he feels his hearers feasting upon his spirit as well as upon his music. He and they have their sensuous satisfactions. No wonder that those who love pleasing and decidedly remote exhibitions of emotions that they themselves know not, cherish him as a composer. And in his music what a mellifluous and transparent revelation it is.

MARCH 4, 1916.
BOSTON HERALD,

16TH SYMPHONY CONCERT OF THE SEASON GIVEN

Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony Played—Shows Composer at His Best, Writing with Honesty and Frankness, His Musical Speech Being in Russian.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Tschaikowsky's Symphony, F minor, No. 4; Volkmann's Serenade for strings, F major; Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody.

The fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky was for a long time thought to be wild and barbaric. Even Mr. Nikisch, who was by no means lacking in courage, put only the two middle movements on a program of a concert here, and the whole symphony was played in Boston for the first time by the visiting New York Symphony Orchestra. The fifth was considered a much more "artistic" work. Then came the "Pathetic," which soon became as popular as a Turkish Patrol and thousands rejoiced in the luxury of woe and called on conductors for frequent hearings of the pessimistic document of the self-torturer.

Years go by. Fancies, likes and dislikes pass with them. If a man changes his skin every seven years, why should he not change his taste in art? Many now think that the Fourth Symphony is the one of the six that is most characteristic of the composer; the one that is also the most Russian in spirit. Only in the Trio of the Pathetic's Scherzo do they find a trace of the Slav-Orientalism with which the Fourth is charged. And for the Fourth, Tschaikowsky wrote a definite program that his friend Mme. von Meck might dilate with the proper emotion. This program, with the picture of the man checked in his pursuit of happiness by Fate; growing old and remembering bygone days when youth found pleasure in life; dreaming fantastical dreams in which he hears gutter-songs of drunkards, in which his imagination plays queer pranks; and then the moral, with the injunction to seek happiness among the simple folk—this program is entertaining; it is instructive to those who wish to know Tschaikowsky, the human being, better; but it is not indispensable to one while the music is playing. Tschaikowsky himself ended his letter to Mme. von Meck with these words: "It is the characteristic feature of instrumental music that it does not allow analysis."

There are certain vexing matters of detail peculiar to Tschaikowsky even in this symphony; as the tossing of a comparatively unimportant phrase from one instrument to another without thus avoiding monotony; ginger-bread ornamentation of a phrase that is impressive by its inherent melancholy or pathetic sentiment. There is also at times, as in the Finale, a rudeness of expression that dangerously approaches vulgarity; but here enters the skill of the conductor, who, when there is reason for it, should glorify vulgarity and give it dramatic intensity. By the way, did Leoncavallo ever hear the circus-phrase, the preliminary flourish in this Finale? It is singularly like a musical sentence in the opening scene of "Pagliacci."

This may be said of the symphony: it shows Tschaikowsky at his best, writing with the utmost honesty and frankness, not searching out dramatic effects, but pouring out his own gloomy thoughts, his own emotions. At the same time there his musical speech is in Russian. In this symphony the composer is not cosmopolitan; he is a Russian whose music makes a universal appeal; nor is he a Russian simply because in the Finale he uses a folk-song.

Revel's "Spanish Rhapsody" is delightfully impressionistic; a cunning study in rhythm and in orchestral colors. Is this music more faithful to Spain than Chabrier's Gorgeous "Espana," or Debussy's impression of Grenada? The Spaniards will not have "Carmen." What do they say to Granados or to Laparra with his "Habanera"? Perhaps some day when we visit our castles in Spain we may be able to determine positively this question for ourselves. Until then Ravel's "Rhapsody" is a fascinating work—but yesterday, in spite of the extraordinarily brilliant performance, we were wishing that the music was Chabrier's.

Between the two vivid works Volkmann's Serenade was a mild sedative: old-fashioned music by a composer once thought to be a radical, yet today the Waltz with its folk-spirit has a certain charm.

There were many features in the superb orchestral performance of the two chief compositions. It will be a long time before Mr. Longy's phrasing of the oboe song in Tschaikowsky's Andantino will be forgotten; and this was only one of many memorable moments.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 2; Schumann, piano concerto; Beethoven, Overture to "Coriolanus"; Stojowski, piano concerto, No. 2. Mr. Paderewski will be the pianist.

BOSTON JOURNAL
MARCH 4, 1916.

SYMPHONY MEN PLAY IN MOST BRILLIANT FORM

Given Ovation After Third Part of Tschaikowsky Work Yesterday.

Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, which has become a regular biennial offering at the Symphony concerts, was performed yesterday with the customary success. The third movement—the scherzo—is played pizzicato for the most part. There are themes for wood-wind and for brass and kettle-drums, but the strings play the principal theme pizzicato. Yesterday the performance of the scherzo was given with such fire and skill that the audience insisted upon having the orchestra stand up and take its well-merited ovation without waiting for the symphony to end.

And if this were not glory enough for the strings for one day, they were given the Volkmann serenade in F major to play. This suave, melodious composition, with the charming waltz that is said to have inspired Eugene Field to write a fairy story, is altogether a thing of beauty and therefore a joy forever; and it was performed con amore under Dr. Muck's sympathetic direction.

Equally brilliant, in its way, was the performance of Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody," the third and last number on one of the best programs of the year. The same program will be presented again tonight.

Paderewski will play twice at next week's concerts—an unusual proceeding, akin to the encores that he alone is permitted to play at Symphony concerts, as the occasion may demand. The master pianist has chosen the Schumann concerto in A minor and a new concerto by Stojowski. The orchestra will play the Sibelius symphony in D major and Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY,
MARCH 6, 1916

ANNUAL WAGNER

THE USUAL FRAGMENTS UNDER DR. MUCK

The Routine Repertory Once More—Reasons Why It Should Be Widened—The Pleasure of the Audience, the Eloquence of the Conductor and the Response of the Band—The Good-Friday Spell from "Parsifal" for Relative Novelty

IF Wagner's music-dramas were regularly represented in Boston on an operatic stage, as they are in most capitals of music, there would be no occasion for "Wagner Concerts" in which fragments of those same music-dramas are played as quasi-symphonic pieces by an orchestra. As it is, we are dependent upon such performances of Wagner's operas as the Metropolitan Company may bring to us—three or four at most in a fortnight in the spring and seldom of any music-drama of the Ring. Through the rest of the season, if we are to hear Wagner's operatic music at all, we must receive it from the Symphony Orchestra. But Dr. Muck, like most conductors accustomed to Wagner in the theatre, has little inclination toward him in the concert-room. The "Faust Overture" and the "Siegfried Idyl," which are purely symphonic pieces, he puts on his programmes oftener than did most of his predecessors; but he is more sparing than they with the overtures and the preludes, which in the concert-room, may also pass for symphonic music—with a programme. Into the Symphony Concerts, he will obtrude not another measure of Wagner's music; and it was difficult to persuade him to open even the concerts for the Pension Fund to isolated fragments of the music-dramas, like the Apotheosis of Siegfried in

TRANSCRIPT,

MARCH 4,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Easy and Pleasurable Music, Excellent Performance and an Applausive Audience —The Contrasts of Tschaikovsky and Ravel

WITH Tschaikovsky's symphony in F minor to begin Dr. Muck's programme and Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody to end it; with an audience variously and amusingly applausive in the right and the wrong place, contrast, for once, was not lacking in the Symphony Concert of yesterday. Two pieces of music could hardly be further apart than is the Russian's from the Parisian's; while listeners who had applauded the string choir after the pizzicati passages in Tschaikovsky's Scherzo so heartily that the conductor called the musicians to their feet, clapped only scantily and scrappily at the close of Ravel's suite. The Scherzo is a pleasing and well-liked piece; to play stringed instruments with the fingers instead of the bow and to pick them so for some minutes (as Tschaikovsky prescribes) arrests the attention of an audience; and hence, perhaps, the impression abides that these pizzicati measures exact an extraordinary feat of virtuosity. As a matter of fact they do not, either in themselves or in comparison with the demands that Ravel lays upon all the divisions of his orchestra. He takes for granted a technical aptness and imagination in the players which Tschaikovsky hardly suspected; he writes what he will in whatever fashion he may choose for it and bids conductor and band give it vivid voice. They did yesterday with superlative skill and felicity. And a listening audience dismissed them with faint plaudits, whereas it had nearly rent its gloves over as vivid but by no means as exacting a performance of Tschaikovsky's symphony. That piece happens to be familiar and well-liked, while as yet Ravel's Rhapsody is "one of those French things, you know,—modern stuff.

No wonder that the house so rose to the Russian's music. The motives out of which it is to expand may not overpass the dullest ear; on the instant, almost, they become melodies, clear of profile and course, engaging the ear, suggestive to the fancy. There is no mistaking the phrase of relentless fate that begins the symphony to recur through the first movement; as obvious are the contrasting measures of restless or lulled submission. The slow movement is a brooding and changeful music, wistful in itself and melancholy of impression—not passion for all Tschaikovsky's sounding phrases about it, but of a pensive sentiment. His hearers "feel with him." The instrumental whimsies, the play of the light rhythms, the floating phrases of the scherzo give as easy pleasure; and none may withstand the boisterous rushes and the clear folk-tune of the finale. Music with a tang to it, music of immediate and unmistakable suggestion, music that gives something of the pleasure of the theatre when we follow the moods and the voice of a personage clearly set before our eyes, music that is full of pleasing or stimulating diversions along the way. Gladly the listening ears hear the orchestra thrashing about with the motive of fate or lunging and lurching through the finale; as gladly they follow the caprices of the choirs through the scherzo or the appropriate instruments adding their color to the melancholy song. The workmanship is as transparent. To and fro through the orchestra goes a phrase that happens to catch Tschaikovsky's fancy; the arabesques spin themselves; at the due moment back comes the anticipated and easily recognizable melody. It all seems as easy as the pleasure of it and symphonic music does not often wear that guise.

Moreover, the music is full of the self-revelation—the expansive self-revelation—that most of us like to hear and with which Trahaikovsky is as prodigal as though he had a strain of the American temperament mixed with the temperament of the Slav. Reticence he knows not; the music of pure imagination lies not within his powers or even inclination; the music of universal voce speaking the impulses of the universal spirit or farther beyond them; he is little disposed to the music that might record and transfigure his impressions of external things as they reacted upon him. In these last three symphonies there is only one music that he can write—the music of his own individual sensations as he insistently reaches out his own spirit. It is he and not the puiverse of men that endures relentless fate in a sad restlessness or a drugged submission; it is his spirit that broods in vague longing and wistful memories; that tries to play with capricious fancies, that plunges deep and wild into rough and riotous pleasures. In lengthy letters to his friends he may write of all these things as though they were universal moods and sensations, pleasure and pain; but so doing he is busy once more, as in his recording of them in tones, with self examination and self-confession.

The practice is dangerous even for a nature less sensitive, neurotic and introspective than Tschaikovsky's. It narrows mind and spirit to purely individual, closely self-centred and often rather hysterical expression; it tortures nerves, that need not be so bared, that other nerves may tingle; and it comes gradually to take a sensuous and a morbid pleasunre in its own brooding. It dulls self-criticism and the mental faculties of control and selection. It relaxes standards. There is less hysteria in this fourth symphony, for example, than there is in the Pathetic; but there is more of this sensuous satisfaction in brooding and introspection to give form, body and color to motive and melody. The fourth is not so morbid as the fifth and the sixth symphonies, but there is the same relaxation in the choice of high means to high purpose. This self-revealing Tschaikovsky is as transparent as his music. With pleasure he feels his hearers feasting upon his spirit as well as upon his music. He and they have their sensuous satisfactions. No wonder that those who love pleasing and decidedly remote exhibitions of emotions that they themselves know not, cherish him as a composer. And in his music what a mellifluous and transparent revelation it is.

MARCH 4, 1916.

BOSTON HERALD,

16TH SYMPHONY CONCERT OF THE SEASON GIVEN

Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony Played—Shows Composer at His Best, Writing with Honesty and Frankness, His Musical Speech Being in Russian.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Tschaikowsky's Symphony, F minor, No. 4; Volkmann's Serenade for strings, F major; Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody.

The fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky was for a long time thought to be wild and barbaric. Even Mr. Nikisch, who was by no means lacking in courage, put only the two middle movements on a program of a concert here, and the whole symphony was played in Boston for the first time by the visiting New York Symphony Orchestra. The fifth was considered a much more "artistic" work. Then came the "Pathetic," which soon became as popular as a Turkish Patrol and thousands rejoiced in the luxury of woe and called on conductors for frequent hearings of the pessimistic document of the self-torturer.

Years go by. Fancies, likes and dislikes pass with them. If a man changes his skin every seven years, why should he not change his taste in art? Many now think that the Fourth Symphony is the one of the six that is most characteristic of the composer; the one that is also the most Russian in spirit. Only in the Trio of the Pathetic's Scherzo do they find a trace of the Slav-Orientalism with which the Fourth is charged. And for the Fourth, Tschaikowsky wrote a definite program that his friend Mme. von Meck might dilate with the proper emotion. This program, with the picture of the man checked in his pursuit of happiness by Fate; growing old and remembering bygone days when youth found pleasure in life; dreaming fantastical dreams in which he hears gutter-songs of drunkards, in which his imagination plays queer pranks; and then the moral, with the injunction to seek happiness among the simple folk—this program is entertaining; it is instructive to those who wish to know Tschaikowsky, the human being, better; but it is not indispensable to one while the music is playing. Tschaikowsky himself ended his letter to Mme. von Meck with these words: "It is the characteristic feature of instrumental music that it does not allow analysis."

There are certain vexing matters of detail peculiar to Tschaikowsky even in this symphony; as the tossing of a comparatively unimportant phrase from one instrument to another without thus avoiding monotony; ginger-bread ornamentation of a phrase that is impressive by its inherent melancholy or pathetic sentiment. There is also at times, as in the Finale, a rudeness of expression that dangerously approaches vulgarity; but here enters the skill of the conductor, who, when there is reason for it, should glorify vulgarity and give it dramatic intensity. By the way, did Leoncavallo ever hear the circus-phrase, the preliminary flourish in this Finale? It is singularly like a musical sentence in the opening scene of "Pagliacci."

This may be said of the symphony: it shows Tschaikowsky at his best, writing with the utmost honesty and frankness, not searching out dramatic effects, but pouring out his own gloomy thoughts, his own emotions. At the same time there his musical speech is in Russian. In this symphony the composer is not cosmopolitan; he is a Russian whose music makes a universal appeal; nor is he a Russian simply because in the Finale he uses a folk-song.

Revel's "Spanish Rhapsody" is delightfully impressionistic; a cunning study in rhythm and in orchestral colors. Is this music more faithful to Spain than Chabrier's Gorgeous "Espana," or Debussy's impression of Grenada? The Spaniards will not have "Carmen." What do they say to Granados or to Laparra with his "Habanera"? Perhaps some day when we visit our castles in Spain we may be able to determine positively this question for ourselves. Until then Ravel's "Rhapsody" is a fascinating work—but yesterday, in spite of the extraordinarily brilliant performance, we were wishing that the music was Chabrier's.

Between the two vivid works Volkmann's Serenade was a mild sedative: old-fashioned music by a composer once thought to be a radical, yet today the Waltz with its folk-spirit has a certain charm.

There were many features in the superb orchestral performance of the two chief compositions. It will be a long time before Mr. Longy's phrasing of the oboe song in Tschaikowsky's Andantino will be forgotten; and this was only one of many memorable moments.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 2; Schumann, piano concerto; Beethoven, Overture to "Coriolanus"; Stojowski, piano concerto, No. 2. Mr. Paderewski will be the pianist.

BOSTON JOURNAL-

MARCH 4, 1916.

SYMPHONY MEN PLAY IN MOST BRILLIANT FORM

Given Ovation After Third Part of Tschaikowsky Work Yesterday.

Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, which has become a regular biennial offering at the Symphony concerts, was performed yesterday with the customary success. The third movement—the scherzo—is played pizzicato for the most part. There are themes for woodwind and for brass and kettle-drums, but the strings play the principal theme pizzicato. Yesterday the performance of the scherzo was given with such fire and skill that the audience insisted upon having the orchestra stand up and take its well-merited ovation without waiting for the symphony to end.

And if this were not glory enough for the strings for one day, they were given the Volkmann serenade in F major to play. This suave, melodious composition, with the charming waltz that is said to have inspired Eugene Field to write a fairy story, is altogether a thing of beauty and therefore a joy forever; and it was performed con amore under Dr. Muck's sympathetic direction.

Equally brilliant, in its way, was the performance of Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody," the third and last number on one of the best programs of the year. The same program will be presented again tonight.

Paderewski will play twice at next week's concerts—an unusual proceeding, akin to the encores that he alone is permitted to play at Symphony concerts, as the occasion may demand. The master pianist has chosen the Schumann concerto in A minor and a new concerto by Stojowski. The orchestra will play the Sibelius symphony in D major and Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY,

MARCH 6, 1916

ANNUAL WAGNER

THE USUAL FRAGMENTS UNDER DR. MUCK

The Routine Repertory Once More—Reasons Why It Should Be Widened—The Pleasure of the Audience, the Eloquence of the Conductor and the Response of the Band—The Good-Friday Spell from "Parsifal" for Relative Novelty

IF Wagner's music-dramas were regularly represented in Boston on an operatic stage, as they are in most capitals of music, there would be no occasion for "Wagner Concerts" in which fragments of those samè music-dramas are played as quasi-symphonic pieces by an orchestra. As it is, we are dependent upon such performances of Wagner's operas as the Metropolitan Company may bring to us—three or four at most in a fortnight in the spring and seldom of any music-drama of the Ring. Through the rest of the season, if we are to hear Wagner's operatic music at all, we must receive it from the Symphony Orchestra. But Dr. Muck, like most conductors accustomed to Wagner in the theatre, has little inclination toward him in the concert-room. The "Faust Overture" and the "Siegfried Idyl," which are purely symphonic pieces, he puts on his programmes oftener than did most of his predecessors; but he is more sparing than they with the overtures and the preludes, which in the concert-room, may also pass for symphonic music—with a programme. Into the Symphony Concerts, he will obtrude not another measure of Wagner's music; and it was difficult to persuade him to open even the concerts for the Pension Fund to isolated fragments of the music-dramas, like the Apotheosis of Siegfried in

[113]

"Götterdämmerung" or the Good Friday Spell in "Parsifal," or to arrangements of more or less interrelated music from them. Now he has so far yielded as not only to admit the self-contained excerpts aforesaid but also such manufactured pieces as the potpourri from the third act of "Die Meistersinger" and Richter's collocation of passages at the end of "Siegfried" and the beginning of "Götterdämmerung," that he included in his programme of yesterday as he has once or twice before in concerts for the Pension Fund.

Now, to yield so far is to yield the principle at stake. If fragments of Wagner's music-dramas are to be played at all in the concert-room—and operatic conditions in Boston imperatively require that they be so played, if we are to hear his music often—why confine the excerpts to a narrow routine? The Good Friday spell and the Glorification of Siegfried are not one whit more self-contained music than are the introductions to the third acts of "Tristan" or "Tannhäuser"; yet we never hear these at our "Wagner Concerts." Nay, the curtain has not risen while either is played, whereas the Good Friday spell is music to a visible picture and even occasional speech on the stage. Exactly similar music of picture and atmosphere is that for the Entrance of the Gods into Valhalla at the end of "Rheingold" or of the Forest Scene in "Siegfried," yet Dr. Muck will have none of them. Of course, it is true that the two introductions bear a definite relation to what has preceded them and to what will follow them in the music-drama before the eyes and the ears of the spectator. But is it any more essential to illusion than all that precedes and all that follows the Apotheosis of Siegfried? Yet Dr. Muck willingly plays the one in Pension Fund concerts, but rejects the others. The closing scene of "Rheingold" and the episodes of the sun-lit and whirring forest in "Siegfried" do not differ in their relation to visible sights and audible speech on the stage from the Good Friday music in "Parsifal," but Dr. Muck rejects the two pieces from the Ring operas and accepts the fragment of the "sacred festival play." Beyond peradventure the conductor has a logical mind, but wherein is the logic of these arbitrary distinctions that keep the music of Wagner that we hear from him in the rut of routine.

Admittedly, the collocations of fragments from this or that act of Wagner's music-dramas or from the whole opera itself, do not well bear æsthetic tests. That from the third act of "Die Meistersinger," played yesterday, is for example, no more than the Introduction, the Apprentices' Dance, the Entrance of the Masters and the Acclamation of Sachs set in a row along which orchestra and audience move as before an array of specimens. Richter's arrangement of the music that leads Siegfried to sight of Brünhilde upon her fire-girt rock, that hymns their great love and that sends him forth along the Rhine does have more symphonic continuity and is more artfully put together; but the whole justification of it is, no less, the measure of Wagner that it preserves to the concert-room. Neither the one nor the other piece is appreciably better or worse by purely æsthetic standards than many another such arrangement, like Colonne's epitome of "Das Rheingold," for example or Thomas's of various scenes in the Ring operas that Mr. Stock occasionally uses to this day in Chicago. Collocations from "Die Walküre" or "Siegfried" or "Tristan" are not a whit more divorced from speech, action and picture on the stage and the conditions of the theatre generally than are the pieces from the third act of "Die Meistersinger." Dr. Muck sacrificed his consistency when he admitted two of these arrangements to the Pension Fund concerts. He would be no more inconsistent, he would pleasure his public and he would do service to Wagner, if he now found room for others. Possibly, however, as there is no arguing about tastes, so there is no reasoning about prejudices.

Unquestionably a numerous, eager and dependable public craves these excerpts from Wagner that in the length, breadth and thickness of our musical year (which are considerable) only these concerts for the Pension Fund afford. A "Wagner Programme" is the one "sure thing" in the semi-annual arrangements for them—surer even than Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" or cherished pieces of Beethoven. Yesterday, as many times before, the audience filled the concert-room from the highest to the lowest-priced seats, listened intently, applauded warmly and testified to its satisfaction in every way that such a company may do. In it, moreover, was every sort of listener from the connoisseurs of music in this town and the devotees of the Symphony Orchestra down to the hungry seekers after Wagner in any guise and the chance concert-goer for the pleasure he may receive. With all of these, better the overtures and the collocations which they had heard many times than no Wagner at all; they will come to hear them, so long as Dr. Muck elects to play them; but to question them and to note their chance talk in the intermission and between the numbers was to learn quickly that they are hungrier still for music from Wagner that now they never hear. Dr. Muck was scrupulously and persuasively loyal to Wagner, from his point of view, so long as he would admit nothing to the concert-room but the overtures, the preludes and the two symphonic pieces; but having let down the bars to excerpts he is not so loyal when he walks in the present path of routine. In a measure Boston is an operaless city; in still larger measure it is a Wagnerless city ouside what of the music-dramas the Pension Fund concerts let fall on us.

Dr. Muck, moreover, is a celebrated conductor of opera—one of the few of the justest and the highest eminence in our time; the chances are that he will never lead in the theatre in Boston or anywhere else in the United States, unless an unbelievable good fortune should some time crown the desire of the Metropolitan to make him its chief conductor; and Bostonian ears may only "sample" him, as it were, in such capacity when he plays these fragments of Wagner at the Pension Fund concerts. Memory is thick with recollections of his eloquence in them that the concert of yesterday renewed and amplified. We may seldom hear in the opera house such heightening modulation of pace and rhythm as he brought to the folk-dance from "Die Meistersinger," such mellow pomps of striding tone as ushered the masters upon the scene; such suspense and culmination, such illusion of all the assembled throng in song as that with which the orchestra acclaimed Sachs. Through the introduction to the third act, a single voice might have been speaking in soliloquy, such was the beauty of tone, the perfection of melting or pointed phrase, the sensuous suggestion of gentle or animated musing with which Dr. Muck suffused the music. The heroic clangors of Siegfried's ascent stilled themselves into the music of his awed wonder at the sight of the sleeping Valkyr and of the deep-voiced song that broods over them in the dawning. Then, of a sudden—as is the way of these arrangements—he was riding the Rhine in the flow of the Rhine-Daughters' melody. Again the sensuous beauty, the dramatic import and the pictorial quality of the music moved unitedly and thrillingly. It was epical and it was sung in the ears of the audience. The superb rush of the sea music, as in tonal gale, at the beginning of the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," is an old story "at these concerts" under Dr. Muck's hand. The upswelling breadth and depth of the closing measures of the overture to "Tannhäuser," as though all the choirs of all the earth were singing it, is as old. So, too, is the sensual bite and the lustful tang of the Venusberg and the tonal apotheosis—radiance above and darkness beneath—of Senta and her mariner. Yet in Wagner's music and under Dr. Muck's hand, they sound ever new.

As is the conductor, so is the orchestra in these "Wagner Concerts." The frequenter of them waits in eager anticipation for the violins and then the violoncellos to sing as one man—and with what beauty of tone and what long-drawn loveliness of phrase! —the song of Siegfried and Brünnhilde; for the horns to intone the golden melody of the Rhine; for the rush of the excited strings before the Masters come; for Mr. Sand with the voice of Senta or of Tannhäuser in praise of Venus; for the richness of the brass in the quiring of the Pilgrims. The newcomer hears for the first time and the psychologists may decide whether the thrill of surprised or anticipated sensation is the keener. New to all ears, yesterday, was the Good-Friday Spell from "Parsifal," under Dr. Muck's hands. In San Francisco, last spring he added it to the Wagnerian repertory of the orchestra that the vernal freshness and stir, the soft limpidity and the gentle serenity of the music might exhale from its tones. So much of the music of "Parsifal" seems the super-refinement in tones of Wagner's visioning. Here his lyric vision of the springtide in the solitary and shining meadows of the grail springs into instant but not less perfect being. It is his lyric of lyrics, even though the "Siegfried Idyl" stood beside it yesterday, with all the familiar wonders of a performance in which the orchestra sings and trills with a voice of shimmering and gossamer tones of which no human throat knows the secret and the conductor opens not only the immediate loveliness of the music but all that it implies of affection so deep and stirred that it must whisper even its joy. And operaless, Wagnerless Boston has barely one such concert in a whole musical year.

H. T. P.

BOSTON POST,

MARCH 6, 1916

WAGNER BY SYMPHONY

Master Playing at Pension Fund Concert

A large and representative audience gathered in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon when the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, was given, with a Wagner programme. This programme was as follows: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," "Siegfried Idyll," selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," arranged by Hans Richter; "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," introduction to 3d act of "Die Meistersinger," and overture to "Tannhauser."

The performances were brilliant, authoritative; the performances of a virtuoso orchestra led by a conductor deeply imbued with Wagnerian tradition. A conductor, moreover, who understands well the fact that tonal beauty was not the last consideration with Wagner.

In Dr. Muck's hands any work sounds euphonious, but in reading Wagner his peculiar sensitiveness to tonal values, his esthetic appreciation, goes hand in hand with his dramatic sense. Interpreted with such authority and appreciation these Wagnerian scores, by the side of later compositions, scores that once seemed mad to men, have now a flavor of classic repose and grandeur. The lines are so big and noble; the orchestra is so deep, so fundamental in its tone qualities. Where is the secret? Beside Wagner's orchestra the orchestra of Richard Strauss, for instance, is coarse and vulgar. In some way [illegible] these simple and powerful sonorities seemed to have died. No greater master of the orchestra has appeared.

The programme offered a historic resume of Wagner's development as an artist, and further offered testimony to the versatility as well as the greatness of Wagner's expression. The orchestra excelled itself; the conductor, apparently as contained, as alert and master of himself as ever, bowed his thanks in acknowledgment of the most enthusiastic applause.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

MARCH 6, 1916.

BIG AUDIENCE AT PENSION CONCERT

Symphony Orchestra Heard in an All-Wagner Program.

Only at pension concert funds, like the one given yesterday, can the musical public hear the Symphony Orchestra in a Wagner program, and even on these occasions the well-beaten path is followed pretty closely.

However, Bostonians are glad to grasp even at these crumbs from the Wagner table, and yesterday Symphony Hall was filled with an enthusiastic audience. The public is always generous toward these pension concerts, for it is proud of the Symphony Orchestra; and it has a warm regard for Dr. Muck, who ranks abroad among the few approved Wagner conductors. But he does not cull much from the Bayreuth programs during the regular Symphony season. He believes that the opera House is the best place for most of the works of the Leipsic genius. Unfortunately, in the opera house, even when the Metropolitan company comes to town, only certain more or less fashionable features of the Wagnerian repertoire are ever presented.

Yesterday the program embraced the "Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhaeuser" overtures, the "Siegfried Idyll," selections from "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung," the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and selections from the third act of "Die Meistersinger."

At the end of the first part of the program, and again at the conclusion, the whole orchestra had to stand up and join Dr. Muck in acknowledgment of the applause.

Advertiser
March 6, 1916

MUSICAL MATTERS

Symphony Concert

A concert was given Sunday afternoon by the Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conducting, in aid of the Pension Fund with an all Wagner programme as follows: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," a Siegfried Idyll, selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung" arranged by Hans Richter; "Good Friday Magic," from "Parsifal"; selection from "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," Overture to "Tannhauser."

Although a long programme, the unusually large audience remained seated to the very end, with particularly enthusiastic applause after "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser" Overtures. These two well-known compositions never lose their charm and the orchestra played them as if inspired. The remainder of the numbers were not quite as well known as the opening and closing overtures, yet under Dr. Muck's able leadership they also revealed much of their wonderful meaning. It is only with such an organization as this orchestra that many of the beauties of Wagner can be brought forth, especially in the slow tempos.

Criticism is hardly in keeping with the spirit of the concert, so suffice it to say that the afternoon was thoroughly enjoyed by a large number of people in aid of a most worthy cause.

A. E. W.

ADVERT

"Götterdämmerung" or the Good Friday Spell in "Parsifal," or to arrangements of more or less interrelated music from them. Now he has so far yielded as not only to admit the self-contained excerpts aforesaid but also such manufactured pieces as the potpourri from the third act of "Die Meistersinger" and Richter's collocation of passages at the end of "Siegfried" and the beginning of "Götterdämmerung," that he included in his programme of yesterday as he has once or twice before in concerts for the Pension Fund.

Now, to yield so far is to yield the principle at stake. If fragments of Wagner's music-dramas are to be played at all in the concert-room—and operatic conditions in Boston imperatively require that they be so played, if we are to hear his music often—why confine the excerpts to a narrow routine? The Good Friday spell and the Glorification of Siegfried are not one whit more self-contained music than are the introductions to the third acts of "Tristan" or "Tannhäuser"; yet we never hear these at our "Wagner Concerts." Nay, the curtain has not risen while either is played, whereas the Good Friday spell is music to a visible picture and even occasional speech on the stage. Exactly similar music of picture and atmosphere is that for the Entrance of the Gods into Valhalla at the end of "Rheingold" or of the Forest Scene in "Siegfried," yet Dr. Muck will have none of them. Of course, it is true that the two introductions bear a definite relation to what has preceded them and to what will follow them in the music-drama before the eyes and the ears of the spectator. But is it any more essential to illusion than all that precedes and all that follows the Apotheosis of Siegfried? Yet Dr. Muck willingly plays the one in Pension Fund concerts, but rejects the others. The closing scene of "Rheingold" and the episodes of the sun-lit and whirring forest in "Siegfried" do not differ in their relation to visible sights and audible speech on the stage from the Good Friday music in "Parsifal," but Dr. Muck rejects the two pieces from the Ring operas and accepts the fragment of the "sacred festival play." Beyond peradventure the conductor has a logical mind, but wherein is the logic of these arbitrary distinctions that keep the music of Wagner that we hear from him in the rut of routine.

Admittedly, the collocations of fragments from this or that act of Wagner's music-dramas or from the whole opera itself, do not well bear æsthetic tests. That from the third act of "Die Meistersinger," played yesterday, is for example, no more than the Introduction, the Apprentices' Dance, the Entrance of the Masters and the Acclamation of Sachs set in a row along which orchestra and audience move as before an array of specimens. Richter's arrangement of the music that leads Siegfried to sight of Brünhilde upon her fire-girt rock, that hymns their great love and that sends him forth along the Rhine does have more symphonic continuity and is more artfully put together; but the whole justification of it is, no less, the measure of Wagner that it preserves to the concert-room. Neither the one nor the other piece is appreciably better or worse by purely æsthetic standards than many another such arrangement, like Colonne's epitome of "Das Rheingold," for example or Thomas's of various scenes in the Ring operas that Mr. Stock occasionally uses to this day in Chicago. Collocations from "Die Walküre" or "Siegfried" or "Tristan" are not a whit more divorced from speech, action and picture on the stage and the conditions of the theatre generally than are the pieces from the third act of "Die Meistersinger." Dr. Muck sacrificed his consistency when he admitted two of these arrangements to the Pension Fund concerts. He would be no more inconsistent, he would pleasure his public and he would do service to Wagner. if he now found room for others. Possibly, however, as there is no arguing about tastes, so there is no reasoning about prejudices.

Unquestionably a numerous, eager and dependable public craves these excerpts from Wagner that in the length, breadth and thickness of our musical year (which are considerable) only these concerts for the Pension Fund afford. A "Wagner Programme" is the one "sure thing" in the semi-annual arrangements for them—surer even than Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" or cherished pieces of Beethoven. Yesterday, as many times before, the audience filled the concert-room from the highest to the lowest-priced seats, listened intently, applauded warmly and testified to its satisfaction in every way that such a company may do. In it, moreover, was every sort of listener from the connoisseurs of music in this town and the devotees of the Symphony Orchestra down to the hungry seekers after Wagner in any guise and the chance concert-goer for the pleasure he may receive. With all of these, better the overtures and the collocations which they had heard many times than no Wagner at all; they will come to hear them, so long as Dr. Muck elects to play them; but to question them and to note their chance talk in the intermission and between the numbers was to learn quickly that they are hungrier still for music from Wagner that now they never hear. Dr. Muck was scrupulously and persuasively loyal to Wagner, from his point of view, so long as he would admit nothing to the concert-room but the overtures, the preludes and the two symphonic pieces; but having let down the bars to excerpts he is not so loyal when he walks in the present path of routine. In a measure Boston is an operaless city; in still larger measure it is a Wagnerless city ouside what of the music-dramas the Pension Fund concerts let fall on us.

Dr. Muck, moreover, is a celebrated conductor of opera—one of the few of the justest and the highest eminence in our time; the chances are that he will never lead in the theatre in Boston or anywhere else in the United States, unless an unbelievable good fortune should some time crown the desire of the Metropolitan to make him its chief conductor; and Bostonian ears may only "sample" him, as it were, in such capacity when he plays these fragments of Wagner at the Pension Fund concerts. Memory is thick with recollections of his eloquence in them that the concert of yesterday renewed and amplified. We may seldom hear in the opera house such heightening modulation of pace and rhythm as he brought to the folk-dance from "Die Meistersinger," such mellow pomps of striding tone as ushered the masters upon the scene; such suspense and culmination, such illusion of all the assembled throng in song as that with which the orchestra acclaimed Sachs. Through the introduction to the third act, a single voice might have been speaking in soliloquy, such was the beauty of tone, the perfection of melting or pointed phrase, the sensuous suggestion of gentle or animated musing with which Dr. Muck suffused the music. The heroic clangors of Siegfried's ascent stilled themselves into the music of his awed wonder at the sight of the sleeping Valkyr and of the deep-voiced song that broods over them in the dawning. Then, of a sudden—as is the way of these arrangements—he was riding the Rhine in the flow of the Rhine-Daughters' melody. Again the sensuous beauty, the dramatic import and the pictorial quality of the music moved unitedly and thrillingly. It was epical and it was sung in the ears of the audience. The superb rush of the sea music, as in tonal gale, at the beginning of the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," is an old story "at these concerts" under Dr. Muck's hand. The upswelling breadth and depth of the closing measures of the overture to "Tannhäuser," as though all the choirs of all the earth were singing it, is as old. So, too, is the sensual bite and the lustful tang of the Venusberg and the tonal apotheosis—radiance above and darkness beneath—of Senta and her mariner. Yet in Wagner's music and under Dr. Muck's hand, they sound ever new.

As is the conductor, so is the orchestra in these "Wagner Concerts." The frequenter of them waits in eager anticipation for the violins and then the violoncellos to sing as one man—and with what beauty of tone and what long-drawn loveliness of phrase! —the song of Siegfried and Brünnhilde; for the horns to intone the golden melody of the Rhine; for the rush of the excited strings before the Masters come; for Mr. Sand with the voice of Senta or of Tannhäuser in praise of Venus; for the richness of the brass in the quiring of the Pilgrims. The newcomer hears for the first time and the psychologists may decide whether the thrill of surprised or anticipated sensation is the keener. New to all ears, yesterday, was the Good-Friday Spell from "Parsifal," under Dr. Muck's hands. In San Francisco, last spring he added it to the Wagnerian repertory of the orchestra that the vernal freshness and stir, the soft limpidity and the gentle serenity of the music might exhale from its tones. So much of the music of "Parsifal" seems the super-refinement in tones of Wagner's visioning. Here his lyric vision of the springtide in the solitary and shining meadows of the grail springs into instant but not less perfect being. It is his lyric of lyrics, even though the "Siegfried Idyl" stood beside it yesterday, with all the familiar wonders of a performance in which the orchestra sings and trills with a voice of shimmering and gossamer tones of which no human throat knows the secret and the conductor opens not only the immediate loveliness of the music but all that it implies of affection so deep and stirred that it must whisper even its joy. And operaless, Wagnerless Boston has barely one such concert in a whole musical year.

H. T. P.

BOSTON POST,

MARCH 6, 1916

WAGNER BY SYMPHONY

Master Playing at Pension Fund Concert

A large and representative audience gathered in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon when the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, was given, with a Wagner programme. This programme was as follows: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," "Siegfried Idyll," selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," arranged by Hans Richter; "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," introduction to 3d act of "Die Meistersinger," and overture to "Tannhauser."

The performances were brilliant, authoritative; the performances of a virtuoso orchestra led by a conductor deeply imbued with Wagnerian tradition. A conductor, moreover, who understands well the fact that tonal beauty was not the last consideration with Wagner.

In Dr. Muck's hands any work sounds euphonious, but in reading Wagner his peculiar sensitiveness to tonal values, his esthetic appreciation, goes hand in hand with his dramatic sense. Interpreted with such authority and appreciation these Wagnerian scores, by the side of later compositions, scores that once seemed mad to men, have now a flavor of classic repose and grandeur. The lines are so big and noble; the orchestra is so deep, so fundamental in its tone qualities. Where is the secret? Beside Wagner's orchestra the orchestra of Richard Strauss, for instance, is coarse and vulgar. In some way [illegible] these simple and powerful sonorities seemed to have died. No greater master of the orchestra has appeared.

The programme offered a historic resume of Wagner's development as an artist, and further offered testimony to the versatility as well as the greatness of Wagner's expression. The orchestra excelled itself; the conductor, apparently as contained, as alert and master of himself as ever, bowed his thanks in acknowledgment of the most enthusiastic applause.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

MARCH 6, 1916.

BIG AUDIENCE AT PENSION CONCERT

Symphony Orchestra Heard in an All-Wagner Program.

Only at pension concert funds, like the one given yesterday, can the musical public hear the Symphony Orchestra in a Wagner program, and even on these occasions the well-beaten path is followed pretty closely.

However, Bostonians are glad to grasp even at these crumbs from the Wagner table, and yesterday Symphony Hall was filled with an enthusiastic audience. The public is always generous toward these pension concerts, for it is proud of the Symphony Orchestra; and it has a warm regard for Dr. Muck, who ranks abroad among the few approved Wagner conductors. But he does not cull much from the Bayreuth programs during the regular Symphony season. He believes that the opera House is the best place for most of the works of the Leipsic genius. Unfortunately, in the opera house, even when the Metropolitan company comes to town, only certain more or less fashionable features of the Wagnerian repertoire are ever presented.

Yesterday the program embraced the "Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhaeuser" overtures, the "Siegfried Idyll," selections from "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung," the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and selections from the third act of "Die Meistersinger."

At the end of the first part of the program, and again at the conclusion, the whole orchestra had to stand up and join Dr. Muck in acknowledgment of the applause.

Advertiser
March 6, 1916

MUSICAL MATTERS

Symphony Concert

A concert was given Sunday afternoon by the Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conducting, in aid of the Pension Fund with an all Wagner programme as follows: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," a Siegfried Idyll, selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung" arranged by Hans Richter; "Good Friday Magic," from "Parsifal"; selection from "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," Overture to "Tannhauser."

Although a long programme, the unusually large audience remained seated to the very end, with particularly enthusiastic applause after "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser" Overtures. These two well-known compositions never lose their charm and the orchestra played them as if inspired. The remainder of the numbers were not quite as well known as the opening and closing overtures, yet under Dr. Muck's able leadership they also revealed much of their wonderful meaning. It is only with such an organization as this orchestra that many of the beauties of Wagner can be brought forth, especially in the slow tempos.

Criticism is hardly in keeping with the spirit of the concert, so suffice it to say that the afternoon was thoroughly enjoyed by a large number of people in aid of a most worthy cause.

A. E. W.

ADVERT

BOSTON HERALD.

MARCH 6, 1916

SYMPHONY GIVES PENSION FUND CONCERT

A large audience attended the Pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday. Dr. Muck conducted. A Wagner program was played, including the following: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; Siegfried Idyll; selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," arranged by Hans Richter; Good Friday music from "Parsifal"; selection from "Die Meistersinger," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

The audience was generous of its applause and the orchestra itself showed that it had caught the spirit of the occasion. Wagner's themes, rich in unconventional contrivance, yet most exacting in demands on the wind and reed instruments, suffice to tax the resources of any well-equipped body of players; for the Symphony Orchestra they have slight terrors, since the instruments, some of them ever so infrequently employed, are at hand, and the men behind them are beyond the criticism which might befall less well trained and tried musicians.

The Good Friday music from "Parsifal" was given with all reverence due to the dignity and melodic richness with which Wagner invested it. Even more effective was the selection from "Die Meistersinger," which included the introduction to Act III., the dance of apprentices, and the procession of the Meistersingers. The concluding number, the always popular overture to "Tannhauser," and as familiar to the frequenters of the "Pops" in summer as to the possibly more serious patrons of the mid-winter concerts, was given with admirable spirit.

BOSTON GLOBE

MARCH 6.

PENSION CONCERT.

Dr Muck Gives Another All Wagner Program.

Audience, Filling All Symphony Hall Seats, Applauds Orchestra.

Dr Muck offered another all Wagner program at the concert for the Pension Fund yesterday afternoon. The numbers were as follows: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," "A Siegfried Idyll," Hans Richter's arrangement from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdamerung," including Siegfried's passage to Bruennhilde's rock from the third act of the first and "Morning Dawn" and Siegfried's "Rhine Journey" from the first act of the second; "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," selection from "The Mastersingers," including introduction to the scene of Sachs' soliloquy, "Dance of the Apprentices, Procession of the Mastersingers and Homage to Hans Sachs"; overture to "Tannhauser."

The incongruity Dr Muck believes to exist in introducing excerpts from the Wagnerian music dramas into the concert room is known to all who follow the ways of the Symphony Orchestra. The absence of Wagner from the usual Friday and Saturday concerts, except as some soloist sings from him, as Miss Farrar recently sang Elsa's first aria from "Lohengrin," whets the public appetite the keener for the once a year concert for the Pension Fund; when, as yesterday, the audience fills all seats.

These occasions are more significant than the element of the unusual or the aid to the beneficiary account of the orchestra would indicate. At them Dr Muck appears for the only times in this country as a conductor of opera, insofar as such performance of excerpts from Wagner without the singers, the equipment and setting of the opera house can be so named. In Europe his fame has been chiefly that of a conductor of opera. In this country he is known solely in symphonic music.

The concert yesterday, in which Wagner's scores were played with a virtuosity in detail, a sense of balance, a flood of euphony, is peculiar to these occasions, which well may have prompted in many the desire to see Dr Muck enabled to show his powers as a conductor of opera; made general director here of a season of opera as of Symphony concerts, the latter to be less frequent than now, and to alternate in some manner with performances in the opera house. Taste for neither would become surfeited, for a gorging operatic season of three filled weeks at any time invites surfeit, and some equality for both institutions in basis of artistic direction, equipment and social constituency then could be obtained.

MONITOR, BOSTON

MARCH 6, 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS FOR PENSION FUND

SYMPHONY HALL—Boston Symphony orchestra in concert in aid of its Pension Fund, afternoon of March 5. The program from works by Richard Wagner was as follows:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; "A Siegfried Idyll"; selections from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung" (arranged by Hans Richter)—Siegfried's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock ("Siegfried," Act III.); Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine Journey ("Götterdämmerung," Act I.); "Good Friday Magic," from "Parsifal"; selection from "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg" (Introduction to Act III. and Dance of the Apprentices, Procession of the Mastersingers and Homage to Hans Sachs, Act III. Scene II.); overture to "Tannhaüser."

Symphony hall filled yesterday afternoon, with even some standees, attested again that Boston likes Wagner. Another composer's name on a Pension Fund program sometimes is the cause of empty seats, Wagner's never. This liking for Wagner's music cannot be attributed altogether to the fact that it is seldom heard in the regular concerts of the orchestra. Neither is its popularity because it can be called "light music," easy to hear and understand. There must be some curious affinity between the state of Boston's musical development now and Wagner's music. Possibly we are emerging from the swinish condition that has been described of our musical appreciation. Possibly we should emerge a little faster did Dr. Muck unbend a trifle and give less meticulous and pedantic readings.

The audience was liberal in its applause for conductor and men and thereby indicated its willingness to learn whatever Dr. Muck might choose to teach it regarding Wagner. These Pension Fund concerts are an opportunity such as any conductor might envy, for there is an eager public ready to absorb such ideas as he chooses to give out. It is an opportunity to extend among us the appreciation of music and involves the spirit of service that should make a conductor glad to be able to help formulate musical taste.

BOSTON GLOBE—

MARCH 11.

PADEREWSKI PLAYS.

Brings New Concerto of Unequal Value.

Sibelius' Noble Symphony No. 2 Superbly Performed.

For many the presence of Mr Paderewski dominated the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. He last appeared as soloist with the orchestra two years ago this month. The eminent pianist still fills the public eye. The increasing gray in his hair makes him no less a personage. There well may be the hush of anticipation, of expectancy, for that moment before the burst of applause when the door to the artists' room opens and the familiar figure appears. It is not often that any concert stage holds at one time such a conductor, such an orchestra and such a pianist, with all that he stands for as musician and as patriot.

The three movements of Mr Stojowski's concerto, which was being played for the first time in this city, are without intervening pause, and bring all the resulting applause to the end. The scene yesterday was an unusual one in the common course of appearing, performing, applauded and departing soloists. The audience's tribute to Mr Paderewski was instant, eager and enthusiastic. But he was not too preoccupied to remember his associates with appreciation, bowing to the orchestra, twice seizing Dr Muck's hand and bringing him before the audience. At his second appearance from the retiring room Mr Paderewski came leading out Mr Stojowski, the composer. Both insisted that Dr Muck climb over the conductor's stand, whether he would or no, and take the applause with them. The composer then began to thank the members of the orchestra personally.

Mr Paderewski may have his own reasons for choosing the work of his fellow-countryman and former pupil for this occasion. Mr Stojowski lives in New York, where he gives lessons upon the piano. He has appeared in Boston on several occasions as a pianist, in ensemble and in recital. A pianist himself, he has written a singularly unpianistic concerto. The solo instrument for the greater part is embroiled with its fellows, struggling to avert being engulfed by them. At other times it is one of them in the general treatment of ideas that have no particular relation to the piano as a means of expression.

There was the fine passage of impassioned song in the orchestra to the sweeping embroideries in the piano and the solo instruments share in the theme to the final variations which are to be remembered with the few lyric moments, but these are rare. For the greater part the pianist sets in the orchestra; he is required to reinforce its dramatic [illegible] cal fabric which often is purely orchestral, if it is anything, far more often than it is calculated to offer a medium to a solo instrument with an orchestral frame.

There are some fine thoughts in Mr Stojowski's music, but they are jumbled with much that is irrelevant. The score is cluttered. There is too little definiteness of purpose. There are too many fragmentary ideas. The theme in the finale, together with parts of the first movement, should be excellent material for a work reflecting the composer's ardent spirit and animation, but with greater unity and clearness.

Mr Paderewski of course made the most of the music; displayed the magnetism, authority and fire which long have distinguished him. As the one alone for whom such dispensation exists, he played at the close of the program, and was compelled by the usual demonstration following to add to it.

A performance of unsurpassable nobility and beauty, which is worthy of more consideration, was that of Sibelius' second symphony, which preceded. Dr Muck interpreted in deep sympathy this music in epic mold, heroic in fiber of soul and towering in vision. A no less splendid performance of the Coriolonus overture followed.

BOSTON HERALD,

MARCH 11, 1916.

17TH SYMPHONY CONCERT OF THE SEASON GIVEN

Paderewski, Soloist, Plays Piano Concerto No. 2 by Stojowski, First Time in Boston—Composer Present and Is Led Upon Stage by Pianist to Acknowledge Plaudits.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 2, D major; Beethoven, Overture to "Coriolanus"; Stojowski, Piano Concerto No. 2. Mr. Paderewski was the pianist.

When Mr. Gericke produced this symphony of Sibelius 12 years ago, the music was unintelligible to many in the audience, who could say only this: it was depressing. The composer was classed with Dismal Jemmy. The symphony was not heard again for nearly six years. Dr. Muck had not put it on a program before yesterday. It probably appealed to him as it did to Mr. Fiedler before him.

The music was undoubtedly effective yesterday, but the applause was incited chiefly by the sonorous close. The constant repetition of a short theme with ever increasing force excited the nerves of the hearers. Nearly every "apotheosis," provided it be broad and vigorous—not to say screaming—will put the hearers in a state when they too are eager to make a joyful noise.

The symphony as a whole is a strange work, which in purely musical quality and in dramatic expression, falls below the first symphony of this composer. The themes of the first two movements are vague; they are short wails, or snorts of defiance. The treatment of them is episodic. The Scherzo has more sustained interest and the Finale to which it is joined without a pause is, as we have said, effective, mainly by reason of repetition and the long crescendo.

Here and there are passages of wild beauty and imposing strength, but they are separated by others that are not interesting. The instrumentation is too often thick and muddy. Where the musical thought is clothed in becoming and picturesque orchestral dress Sibelius has a trick of introducing instruments, especially the brass, which are incongruous, damaging to the established mood, and without a really striking contrast. It is as if a garment of garish or vulgar color where suddenly added to those in quiet taste.

Mr. Stojowski's concerto was played for the first time in Boston. Performed for the first time in London in 1913, when the composer was the pianist, it was played by Mr. Stojowski in New York a year ago, and by Mr. Paderewski in New York last week.

It had been announced that Mr. Paderewski at the concert yesterday would play this concerto, also Schumann's, which he has never played, at a subscription concert of the orchestra in Boston. The disappointment was keen. The two concertos, however, would have made the program unreasonably long. Mr. Paderewski preferred, then, to do honor to his fellow-countryman.

Stojowski's concerto has many pages that at once win favor. It is tuneful; the themes are easily grasped; the Scherzo is vivacious and a free use of pulsatile instruments keeps the attention alert. The Prologue is really a first movement. It is, on the whole, the best constructed and the most expressive. The Scherzo contains much that is only agreeable tinkling, but the swiftness, a certain grace, and a sparkling instrumental dress insure immediate popularity. The Finale is a theme with variations. Like nearly all composers who employ the variation form, Mr. Stojowski has no mercy on the endurance of his hearers. If the number in this concerto were reduced to one-half, the whole effect would be greater. There are pleasing pages; there are some that have genuine beauty; others show merely toil and trouble.

BOSTON HERALD.

MARCH 6, 1916

SYMPHONY GIVES PENSION FUND CONCERT

A large audience attended the Pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday. Dr. Muck conducted. A. Wagner program was played, including the following: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; Siegfried Idyll; selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," arranged by Hans Richter; Good Friday music from "Parsifal"; selection from "Die Meistersinger," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

The audience was generous of its applause and the orchestra itself showed that it had caught the spirit of the occasion. Wagner's themes, rich in unconventional contrivance, yet most exacting in demands on the wind and reed instruments, suffice to tax the resources of any well-equipped body of players; for the Symphony Orchestra they have slight terrors, since the instruments, some of them ever so infrequently employed, are at hand, and the men behind them are beyond the criticism which might befall less well trained and tried musicians.

The Good Friday music from "Parsifal" was given with all reverence due to the dignity and melodic richness with which Wagner invested it. Even more effective was the selection from "Die Meistersinger," which included the introduction to Act III., the dance of apprentices, and the procession of the Meistersingers. The concluding number, the always popular overture to "Tannhauser," and as familiar to the frequenters of the "Pops" in summer as to the possibly more serious patrons of the mid-winter concerts, was given with admirable spirit.

BOSTON GLOBE

MARCH 6.

PENSION CONCERT.

Dr Muck Gives Another All Wagner Program.

Audience, Filling All Symphony Hall Seats, Applauds Orchestra.

Dr Muck offered another all Wagner program at the concert for the Pension Fund yesterday afternoon. The numbers were as follows: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," "A Siegfried Idyll," Hans Richter's arrangement from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdamerung," including Siegfried's passage to Bruennhilde's rock from the third act of the first and "Morning Dawn" and Siegfried's "Rhine Journey" from the first act of the second; "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," selection from "The Mastersingers," including introduction to the scene of Sachs' soliloquy, "Dance of the Apprentices, Procession of the Mastersingers and Homage to Hans Sachs"; overture to "Tannhauser."

The incongruity Dr Muck believes to exist in introducing excerpts from the Wagnerian music dramas into the concert room is known to all who follow the ways of the Symphony Orchestra. The absence of Wagner from the usual Friday and Saturday concerts, except as some soloist sings from him, as Miss Farrar recently sang Elsa's first aria from "Lohengrin," whets the public appetite the keener for the once a year concert for the Pension Fund; when, as yesterday, the audience fills all seats.

These occasions are more significant than the element of the unusual or the aid to the beneficiary account of the orchestra would indicate. At them Dr Muck appears for the only times in this country as a conductor of opera, insofar as such performance of excerpts from Wagner without the singers, the equipment and setting of the opera house can be so named. In Europe his fame has been chiefly that of a conductor of opera. In this country he is known solely in symphonic music.

The concert yesterday, in which Wagner's scores were played with a virtuosity in detail, a sense of balance, a flood of euphony, is peculiar to these occasions, which well may have prompted in many the desire to see Dr Muck enabled to show his powers as a conductor of opera; made general director here of a season of opera as of Symphony concerts, the latter to be less frequent than now, and to alternate in some manner with performances in the opera house. Taste for neither would become surfeited, for a gorging operatic season of three filled weeks at any time invites surfeit, and some equality for both institutions in basis of artistic direction, equipment and social constituency then could be obtained.

MONITOR, BOSTON

MARCH 6, 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS FOR PENSION FUND

SYMPHONY HALL—Boston Symphony orchestra in concert in aid of its Pension Fund, afternoon of March 5. The program from works by Richard Wagner was as follows:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; "A Siegfried Idyll"; selections from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung" (arranged by Hans Richter)—Siegfried's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock ("Siegfried," Act III.); Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine Journey ("Götterdämmerung," Act I.); "Good Friday Magic," from "Parsifal"; selection from "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg" (Introduction to Act III. and Dance of the Apprentices, Procession of the Mastersingers and Homage to Hans Sachs, Act III. Scene II.); overture to "Tannhaüser."

Symphony hall filled yesterday afternoon, with even some standees, attested again that Boston likes Wagner. Another composer's name on a Pension Fund program sometimes is the cause of empty seats, Wagner's never. This liking for Wagner's music cannot be attributed altogether to the fact that it is seldom heard in the regular concerts of the orchestra. Neither is its popularity because it can be called "light music," easy to hear and understand. There must be some curious affinity between the state of Boston's musical development now and Wagner's music. Possibly we are emerging from the swinish condition that has been described of our musical appreciation. Possibly we should emerge a little faster did Dr. Muck unbend a trifle and give less meticulous and pedantic readings.

The audience was liberal in its applause for conductor and men and thereby indicated its willingness to learn whatever Dr. Muck might choose to teach it regarding Wagner. These Pension Fund concerts are an opportunity such as any conductor might envy, for there is an eager public ready to absorb such ideas as he chooses to give out. It is an opportunity to extend among us the appreciation of music and involves the spirit of service that should make a conductor glad to be able to help formulate musical taste.

BOSTON GLOBE—

MARCH 11.

PADEREWSKI PLAYS.

Brings New Concerto of Unequal Value.

Sibelius' Noble Symphony No. 2 Superbly Performed.

For many the presence of Mr Paderewski dominated the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. He last appeared as soloist with the orchestra two years ago this month. The eminent pianist still fills the public eye. The increasing gray in his hair makes him no less a personage. There well may be the hush of anticipation, of expectancy, for that moment before the burst of applause when the door to the artists' room opens and the familiar figure appears. It is not often that any concert stage holds at one time such a conductor, such an orchestra and such a pianist, with all that he stands for as musician and as patriot.

The three movements of Mr Stojowski's concerto, which was being played for the first time in this city, are without intervening pause, and bring all the resulting applause to the end. The scene yesterday was an unusual one in the common course of appearing, performing, applauded and departing soloists. The audience's tribute to Mr Paderewski was instant, eager and enthusiastic. But he was not too preoccupied to remember his associates with appreciation, bowing to the orchestra, twice seizing Dr Muck's hand and bringing him before the audience. At his second appearance from the retiring room Mr Paderewski came leading out Mr Stojowski, the composer. Both insisted that Dr Muck climb over the conductor's stand, whether he would or no, and take the applause with them. The composer then began to thank the members of the orchestra personally.

Mr Paderewski may have his own reasons for choosing the work of his fellow-countryman and former pupil for this occasion. Mr Stojowski lives in New York, where he gives lessons upon the piano. He has appeared in Boston on several occasions as a pianist, in ensemble and in recital. A pianist himself, he has written a singularly unpianistic concerto. The solo instrument for the greater part is embroiled with its fellows, struggling to avert being engulfed by them. At other times it is one of them in the general treatment of ideas that have no particular relation to the piano as a means of expression.

There was the fine passage of impassioned song in the orchestra to the sweeping embroideries in the piano and the solo instruments share in the theme to the final variations which are to be remembered with the few lyric moments, but these are rare. For the greater part the pianist sets in the orchestra; he is required to reinforce its dramatic utterances, to punctuate rhythmic ac- [illegible] cal fabric which often is purely orchestral, if it is anything, far more often than it is calculated to offer a medium to a solo instrument with an orchestral frame.

There are some fine thoughts in Mr Stojowski's music, but they are jumbled with much that is irrelevant. The score is cluttered. There is too little definiteness of purpose. There are too many fragmentary ideas. The theme in the finale, together with parts of the first movement, should be excellent material for a work reflecting the composer's ardent spirit and animation, but with greater unity and clearness.

Mr Paderewski of course made the most of the music; displayed the magnetism, authority and fire which long have distinguished him. As the one alone for whom such dispensation exists, he played at the close of the program, and was compelled by the usual demonstration following to add to it.

A performance of unsurpassable nobility and beauty, which is worthy of more consideration, was that of Sibelius' second symphony, which preceded. Dr Muck interpreted in deep sympathy this music in epic mold, heroic in fiber of soul and towering in vision. A no less splendid performance of the Coriolonus overture followed.

[115]

BOSTON HERALD,

MARCH 11, 1916.

17TH SYMPHONY CONCERT OF THE SEASON GIVEN

Paderewski, Soloist, Plays Piano Concerto No. 2 by Stojowski, First Time in Boston—Composer Present and Is Led Upon Stage by Pianist to Acknowledge Plaudits.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 2, D major; Beethoven, Overture to "Coriolanus"; Stojowski, Piano Concerto No. 2. Mr. Paderewski was the pianist.

When Mr. Gericke produced this symphony of Sibelius 12 years ago, the music was unintelligible to many in the audience, who could say only this: it was depressing. The composer was classed with Dismal Jemmy. The symphony was not heard again for nearly six years. Dr. Muck had not put it on a program before yesterday. It probably appealed to him as it did to Mr. Fiedler before him.

The music was undoubtedly effective yesterday, but the applause was incited chiefly by the sonorous close. The constant repetition of a short theme with ever increasing force excited the nerves of the hearers. Nearly every "apotheosis," provided it be broad and vigorous—not to say screaming—will put the hearers in a state when they too are eager to make a joyful noise.

The symphony as a whole is a strange work, which in purely musical quality and in dramatic expression, falls below the first symphony of this composer. The themes of the first two movements are vague; they are short wails, or snorts of defiance. The treatment of them is episodic. The Scherzo has more sustained interest and the Finale to which it is joined without a pause is, as we have said, effective, mainly by reason of repetition and the long crescendo.

Here and there are passages of wild beauty and imposing strength, but they are separated by others that are not interesting. The instrumentation is too often thick and muddy. Where the musical thought is clothed in becoming and picturesque orchestral dress Sibelius has a trick of introducing instruments, especially the brass, which are incongruous, damaging to the established mood, and without a really striking contrast. It is as if a garment of garish or vulgar color where suddenly added to those in quiet taste.

Mr. Stojowski's concerto was played for the first time in Boston. Performed for the first time in London in 1913, when the composer was the pianist, it was played by Mr. Stojowski in New York a year ago, and by Mr. Paderewski in New York last week.

It had been announced that Mr. Paderewski at the concert yesterday would play this concerto, also Schumann's, which he has never played, at a subscription concert of the orchestra in Boston. The disappointment was keen. The two concertos, however, would have made the program unreasonably long. Mr. Paderewski preferred, then, to do honor to his fellow-countryman.

Stojowski's concerto has many pages that at once win favor. It is tuneful; the themes are easily grasped; the Scherzo is vivacious and a free use of pulsatile instruments keeps the attention alert. The Prologue is really a first movement. It is, on the whole, the best constructed and the most expressive. The Scherzo contains much that is only agreeable tinkling, but the swiftness, a certain grace, and a sparkling instrumental dress insure immediate popularity. The Finale is a theme with variations. Like nearly all composers who employ the variation form, Mr. Stojowski has no mercy on the endurance of his hearers. If the number in this concerto were reduced to one-half, the whole effect would be greater. There are pleasing pages; there are some that have genuine beauty; others show merely toil and trouble.

It is needless to say that Mr. Paderewski, who was warmly greeted, played the concerto con amore, bestowing on the work of his fellow-countryman the care and attention that he would give to that of any "classic" composer. He brought out all that was inherently fine, and pages that were less interesting had for the moment an excuse for their existence. Fortunate composer, to have such a pianist, such a conductor and such an orchestra to introduce an unfamiliar work before an audience not personally acquainted with him! Stojowski was led upon the stage by Mr. Paderewski, and they, with Dr. Muck, bowed repeatedly. The audience insisted on Mr. Paderewski playing for it after the concert was at an end.

This concert will be repeated tonight. There will be none next week. The program for March 24 and 25 will be as follows: Goetz, overture "Spring"; Volkmann, Concerto in A-minor for 'cello (Mr. Warnke, 'cellist); Hill, symphonic poem, "The Parting of Lancelot and Guinevere" (first time here); Mendelssohn, "Italian" Symphony.

ADVERTISER, SATURDAY

MARCH 11, 1916

PADEREWSKI AND SYMPHONY CONCERT

PIANIST TRIUMPHANT AND CROWD ADORING

Sibelius and Beethoven Sufficient Sop to Those With Orchestral Tastes

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAMME

Sibelius. Second Symphony. D major.
Beethoven. "Coriolanus" Overture.
Stojowski. Prelude, Scherzo and Variations. Piano and Orchestra.
Soloist, Ignaz Paderewski.

When Paderewski appears at the Symphony Concerts the orchestra hitches its wagon to a star and consequently becomes a trailer. It was not to hear the Sibelius symphony or the "Coriolanus" overture that a crowd of patient waiters began to gather at the hall door early yesterday morning in the midst of a snow storm. We are afraid that Sibelius and Beethoven, on this occasion, were merely tolerated by many of the audience. Stojowski's work was intrinsically not the least important upon the programme. But if Paderewski chose to play Czerny's "Velocity Studies" he would still draw an adoring crowd. Nevertheless we may voice our regret that the noble Schumann concerto, which was first announced, was withdrawn. That would have given us the king of pianists in a fittingly royal work, even though the Stojowski concerto was astonishingly effective.

Nevertheless Sibelius and Beethoven were a sufficient sop to the Cerberus with orchestral tastes. Sibelius' second symphony is by no means as crabbed as his fourth, yet, possibly on account of its sombre content, it has not often been given here. Gericke introduced it and Fiedler played it, and it was interesting to study Mr. Muck's interpretation yesterday. He made much of its solemnity and gave its sadness as if he were illustrating Longfellow's lines:—

> "A feeling of Sadness comes o'er me
> That is not akin to Pain,
> And resembles Sorrow only
> As the Mist resembles Rain."

Hon. Andrew D. White, long our Ambassador to Russia, has told the present writer that the Finns seemed to him the noblest people that he had come in contact with in Europe. It may be that Sibelius is to do for Finland what Chopin did for Poland. May he have a happier history to transmute into tones.

Originality is in every part of the work. Not that St. Vitus kind of originality which is in much modern music, but an originality that is combined with sincerity. The very first movement has a chief theme that is strikingly new without being bizarre. The tone-coloring, too, is effective and Sibelius seems as thorough a master of the wind instruments in deep register as Tschaikowsky himself.

There is an attractive weirdness to the second movement which is emphasized by the basso ostinato of the contra-basses, with pizzicato mystery against a strange theme on the bassoons, excellently played. If the second movement had been shorter it would have been more effective, but when a Scandinavian gets to brooding it is impossible to confine him within reasonable limits.

In the last two movements one found the folk-song flavor of the North. Sibelius has the knack of catching this folk-song spirit so thoroughly that many commentators have imagined that he used the actual songs of the people. All his themes are his own, however. In much of the northern music there is a picturesque monotony of reiteration which has a peculiar charm, but we think that Sibelius drives this too far, so that much becomes mere and meaningless repetition. The ground bass seems a favorite device of Sibelius, for after the long one of the second movement (pizzicato), we found another in the finale. But the climax was very noble and Dr. Muck read it with great breadth. This symphony has moments of genius, even if it is not entirely a masterpiece. It is too fragmentary, however. Dr. Muck read the last portion in King Cambyses' vein and the brasses were often very heavy. The trumpeters fairly blew their lips off. Nevertheless the symphony won two recalls and a stand-up!

What a pity that Beethoven never read Shakespeare! He would have given the most wonderful orchestral pictures of an Othello or a Lear that could be imagined. This "Coriolanus" is Collins not Shakespeare, but none the less the imperious character of the hero is drawn as if the composer had read the lines:—

> "His nature is too noble for the world:
> He would not flatter Neptune for his Trident,
> Or Jove for's power to thunder."

To us Beethoven's greatest overtures are those where he depicts such a hero, as in this or in the "Egmont" overture. The massive, broad strokes with which he does this are worth more than the frenzies of the "Leonore No. 2" or "No. 3." Right nobly did Dr. Muck read the three figures which begin the work and reappear in the centre and at the end, and the subordinate theme was given in tender contrast. The graphic picture of death, in the Coda, was also very effectively drawn. But here there was not so much applause, for all were now waiting for the great event.

Then came the magnetic Pole, with his Stojowski offering. If we ventured to regret the Schumann concerto it would still be unjust to imagine Mr. Sigismond Stojowski as an unknown or inferior composer. He won the first prize for composition, as well as piano-playing, at the Paris Conservatoire, and he has been a favorite pupil of Paderewski. We recall hearing him in Boston some 10 years ago, when he gave the impression of being a Jupiter Tonans of the piano, and his compositions left a good impression. This concerto is a composition of real value.

It is the first time that we have heard one of Mr. Stojowski's works in the large forms. We are thankful that he keeps to symmetrical form and is not a disciple of tonal ugliness. It is needless to say that his work was played with all possible effect. Paderewski abundantly proved that he is still the greatest living pianist.

The concerto is a free one, as the title in the above programme may show. It stands to the classical concerto about as the symphonic poem does to the Symphony. It begins and ends in free Fantasia style. The orchestration is good and the piano well interwoven with it. There are noble climaxes, well worked up, and the great pianist made the most of these.

The Prologue is long for such a prelude, but the work as a whole is of modest dimensions. The contrasts between pastoral and military effects in the Scherzo are finely arranged.

The theme of the finale is a splendid one, both intrinsically and for variation purposes. But we scarcely like the variation form for a concerto finale; it generally puts ingenuity in the fore, and poetry in the background. Nevertheless, these variations were in excellent contrast of power, rhythm, and general treatment, and the final pianissimo ending came as a surprise.

Altogether then there was a "raison d'estre" for the Stojowski concerto, and when Paderewski brought forth the composer from the green-room there was intense enthusiasm.

The programme was ended, and yet nobody left the hall; in fact, almost everybody remained seated. This was because they knew the Symphony Concert rule: "No artist is allowed to accept an encore—EXCEPT PADEREWSKI!" Therefore, when we left the building the great pianist was giving a supplementary programme, to the frenzied delight of a vast crowd of rapt adorers.

BOSTON JOURNAL

MARCH 11.

PADEREWSKI IS THE SYMPHONY CONCERT STAR

Ovation Follows Performance of Concerto by Stojowski.

Paderewski's presence made yesterday's Symphony concert one of the most remarkable events of the season —in more than one way.

In the first place, the fact that the great Polish pianist was the soloist led directly to the introduction of the second concerto by Sigismond Stojowski, which, although it is now nearly three years old, is a novelty in Boston. It is a rambling composition noteworthy on account of its frequent lyrical passages and its many fine technical points.

It is not profoundly emotional or intellectual, but it bids fair to be popular, after the style of the Tschaikowsky concerto, which it recalls from time to time; and yesterday there was a big outburst of enthusiasm when the performance was over.

The scene at this point was fit for the historical painter. Paderewski courteously and justly insisted that the orchestra should receive due acknowledgment for matching him in a brilliant performance, and he walked over and took a two-handed grip on Dr. Muck and heroically dragged the leader out of his retirement behind the grand piano. Then, as the applause went on, the pianist brought forth the composer, and then both Paderewski and Stojowski pulled Dr. Muck out of his hiding place again. After that the composer went around shaking hands and the pianist continued his jacknife bows.

Finally, Paderewski exercised the privilege which seems to belong to him alone, and he sat down at the piano again and played the Aria or slow movement from Schumann's sonata in F sharp minor. The audience applauded for more, but down went the lid of the piano, and the extraordinary concert was over.

No doubt somewhat similar scenes will be acted tonight, for the delectation of those who weekly sit at the Symphony second-table.

The concert began with an eloquent performance of the Sibelius symphony in D major, which seems to tell of the gloom and tragedy in Finland's history. For the first time, Symphony patrons heard the symphony exactly as Sibelius wrote it, for Dr. Muck did not follow his predecessors into tinkering with it. It is a symphony with a noble gloom and rage. Then followed another beautiful performance of Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture.

There will be no concerts next week. On March 24 and 25 the program will present a novelty in the shape of a symphonic poem by E. B. Hill, called "The Parting of Lancelot and Guinevere;" Gotz' "Spring" overture, Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony and Volkmann's concerto for 'cello and orchestra, with Heinrich Warnke as soloist.

BOSTON POST,

MARCH 11, 1916

PADEREWSKI PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

Pianist and Sibelius' Work Share the Honors

BY OLIN DOWNES

Ignace Paderewski was the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Paderewski played Sigismund Stojowski's second concerto for piano and orchestra, which was heard for the first time here.

Sibelius' second symphony, a mighty work, made scarcely less of an impression on the audience than the remarkable performance of Mr. Paderewski.

PLAYED AS WRITTEN

Performing the second symphony yesterday for the first time since he has been in Boston, Dr. [illegible] occasion to restore passages which Mr. Fiedler cut. Mr. Fiedler, as his performances showed, did not lack enthusiasm and understanding of this work, but he feared its length, and he made some substantial shortenings, if memory serves, in the slow movement and in the finale. He also made some minor changes in the instrumentation, although these were few. Dr. Muck restored the passages eliminated by Mr. Fiedler, with advantage. He restored the original instrumentation in some places, but unless our ears were very much at fault yesterday, he doubled the wood-wind instruments in more than one place, with an occasional result of undue heaviness and coarseness of tone.

Aside from this, and certain details of tempo concerning which so distinguished a musician as Dr. Muck has certainly a right to his own conclusions, the performance was stirring in the extreme. The commentator on music is overwhelmed with his own helplessness when he endeavors, if he is so foolish, to try to record in words his impressions of such a work and such a performance as that of yesterday afternoon. The only adequate criticism of music is music. The second symphony of Sibelius, for us, is even finer and more powerful than the first, long a favorite here. As regards distinction and individuality of material, far more pregnant ideas, a greater mastery of instrumental effects, and a much more profound spirit, this symphony leaves its predecessor far behind.

A Lament and Defiance

The slow movement alone would be enough to place the second symphony in a niche by itself. That movement is itself a saga, a noble lament, a Berserker defiance. Music of the days when there were giants in the land, of pagan heroes who saw the gleaming gates swinging asunder as they fell in battle. So passing, they surely heard music, while the winds skirled about them, similar to that of the apotheosis of the last movement of the symphony heard yesterday.

Each performance of this work, and of other representative compositions of Sibelius, strengthens the impression of a talent more powerful in some respects than any other to be met with today. Take the themes of this symphony—the strange theme played by the bassoons and the contrasting lyrical theme of the second movement, or the theme, 42 measures in length, which introduces the finale—where is the composer who can equal this breadth and arch in his building material? True, the themes of the first movement are short, but how significant! Especially the second theme, a sort of a wild call, which is developed with unending resources and dramatic power.

Every Instrument Tells

The music has, indeed, a seven-league stride of the music, a primeval force felt in every measure, yet the means employed by the composer are very simple. and his orchestra is small. How much each instrument says! What an arresting physiognomy, as one might say, has this orchestra, come out of the north, and resounding with the harmonies of northern nature! No wonder that the audience was excited, that the symphony swept the listeners from their feet. Would that there were more such works in the repertoire. Would that other composers might arise, with one half the ideas and the spiritual greatness of this man from the Northland.

After the performance of the symphony Dr. Muck was recalled several times and the orchestra rose in response to the applause. The Beethoven overture, which also says so much in a compass much smaller than that of the vast composition of Sibelius, was the bridge to the concerto of Mr. Stojowski.

Paderewski in Best Mood

Mr. Paderewski had originally intended to play Schumann's concerto as well as that of Stojowski, but on account of the length of the programme the masterpiece was omitted, while the novelty remained. No one will refuse to do Mr. Paderewski honor for his faithful service to a friend. In the hands of another the reception of the work would not have been the same. The concerto is lacking in musical substance, though effectively put together. The themes, curiously enough, have not a Polish character, but savor considerably in two instances, of what is Celtic.

But the composition is far better than the "Phantasy," played by Mr. Stojowski at a concert in the Boston Opera House in 1913. Curiously enough, there is a theme in the former work which reminds one of a theme of the "Phantasy." The concerto is far more concise and effective, and of course has a very brilliantly written piano part.

But the work does not require such careful regard as the performance. In this performance, indeed, Mr. Paderewski again played as only he of living pianists can play if he so chooses, with incomparable fire and elan, with creative mastery, with a tone of unutterable beauty of singing passages, with unlimited power and technical resource.

Virtuosity in Double

With Paderewski and with Dr. Muck in collaboration, the performance for sheer fire and virtuosity would be difficult indeed to parallel. It is a memorable thing to play as Mr. Paderewski played. It is not a small thing to have accompanied him as Dr. Muck accompanied, and we doubt if any musician enjoys himself more than Dr. Muck, with his fine nervousness, when he is driving with two race horses, the one a virtuoso of overwhelming temperament, and the other an orchestra that he has only to think as quickly as very few men save Dr. Karl Muck can think in order to have it do his bidding.

After this performance the ordinary rule of no encores at the Symphony concerts was again relaxed, as it usually is when Mr. Paderewski is the soloist, and the pianist responded to the joy of those who applauded, and also those who languished and made for the edge of the

BOSTON TRAVELER.

MARCH 11, 1916.

PADEREWSKI GIVEN FINE RECEPTION AT SYMPHONY

While opinions as to the rating of Paderewski in the world of pianists may differ there can be no question as to his place with the Symphony audience. He is easily first. It was several minutes after he came on the stage as soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon before the applause would permit his proceeding with his number. Another exceptional outburst of enthusiasm followed the close of the number, when the player was recalled and recalled. In vain did he insist upon Dr. Muck sharing in the tribute. In vain did he drag forth Mr. Stojowski, composer of the concerto, to share in the tribute. The audience wanted and insisted upon, Symphony concert rules notwithstanding, that Paderewski play an extra number, and he finally did. Even then nothing short of closing the piano would drive the audience from the hall.

As to Stojowski's concerto. It was given for the first time at these concerts; is well worth hearing, particularly with such an artist as Paderewski as soloist and such an orchestra as the Symphony. It is not a great work, but it is interesting from first to last and whets the appetite for more.

Dr. Muck came off with flying colors in his first reading in this city of the Sibelius Second Symphony. One, however, may well prefer the more joyous side of Finnish life, if there be one. Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture fitted in well between the symphony and the concerto, making one of the most interesting concerts of the season.

TRANSCRIPT,
MARCH 11, 1916

THE SYMPONY CONCERT

PIANIST AND COMPOSER HAND IN HAND

Mr. Paderewski Plays Mr. Stojowski's Concerto, Transfigures It and Almost Persuades the Audience It Has Heard a Remarkable Piece—Beethoven's Overture to "Coriolanus" in Contrast—A Long-Overlooked Symphony of Sibelius

If there is a twentieth-century Pepys in Boston, it is earnestly to be hoped that he was present and observant in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon or that being mistakenly absent then he will not fail to be in his place this evening. Already, doubtless he has recorded in his diary the amusing incidents and atmosphere of a Symphony Concert when Mr. Paderewski, appearing as "assisting artist," takes full possession of it, while an excited audience all agog to see and hear, listens and applauds. Yesterday, however, one of these interesting entertainments was raised to a new and higher power. For Mr. Paderewski, as the managers say, was "presenting a protégé"—Mr. Sigismond Stojowski, a fellow Pole, now resident in New York where he is an estimable teacher of the piano, an occasional virtuoso of the concert-room and in his leisure a composer too. In fact it was as a composer that Mr. Paderewski "presented" his friend. The elder Pole was quite willing to play both Schumann's concerto and Mr. Stojowski's but, since the two on one programme would have prolonged the concert into a third hour, he chose between them. Naturally he selected that of his countryman and pupil. The audience would probably have preferred Schumann's, but such a predilection is a detail quite beneath Mr. Paderewski's consideration.

Accordingly Mr. Stojowski's second concerto—or as he sometimes calls it a Prelude, Scherzo and Variations for Pianoforte and Orchestra—filled forty-five minutes of the concert in the ears of an audience that, as sundry acute observers remarked, seemed appreciably disappointed and disillusioned as it ran its course. Some even affirmed that the applause at the end was not so hearty as it used to be when Mr. Paderewski had bestowed the powers that he lavished upon Mr. Stojowski's music upon some classic concerto seemingly more worthy of them. It sufficed, however, to recall him ardently and at a second summons to bring with him the beaming composer. The two Poles saluted the audience and soon drew Dr. Muck, hitherto an interested bystander, over his little platform to share the plaudits. Everybody, except, possibly, the faintly smiling conductor, congratulated everybody else, and the innocent-minded must have believed that they were fortunate enough to be present on a great occasion when a new "master-work" was born to the world, say like the Prize-Song in "Die Meistersinger" that a whole quintet must hymn. Then the concert proceeded, according to ancient custom, which is to say that Mr. Paderewski played extra pieces to his audience, taking a just delight in the beauty and the poetry with which the enkindled pianist glamored them.

So was Mr. Stojowski's concerto graced by his great and good friend; yet even so, the impression does persist that it is not exactly a notably interesting or at all important addition to what the catalogues call "the literature of the piano." Once upon a time Rachmaninov wrote a concerto so difficult that he himself, a long-practised virtuoso, could not play it. Mr. Stojowski has played his; but it is hardly less full of exactions upon the pianist that serve no clear æsthetic purpose and make little impression, even technically, upon the ear. Being a pianist, the composer should have been kindly disposed toward his instrument; yet time and again, he sets it in tonal conflict with the orchestra, while, as often, it comes off second best. Or he seems to count it only one more instrument in the band to be used for rhythmic interruptions, colorful contrasts or garlanding ornament. Very seldom, even in a long set of variations, does he seek its characteristic voice for the beauty or the power with which he would swell his music. If a pianist had not written the concerto it would be safe to say that the piano does not "sound" in it and that his chief preoccupation was with the orchestra.

As a symphonic piece, the concerto seems no more remarkable. The motives from which it springs and the ten variations fall clearly, though not impressively upon the ear. The workmanship in the development of them is studious and resourceful. Usually the expected happens in play of rhythm, modulation, harmony, progress and climax. When it does not befall, the substitute is more ingenious than quickening. Mr. Stojowski lacks imagination, creative emotion and more than conventional mood in the invention of his motives and his processes with them. Almost never comes the stroke that sets ear, mind and spirit a-tingling; seldom is there sustained or enkindling mood; as rarely comes token of poetic impulse or any other passion than that of workmanship; only in the scherzo is there hint of playful fancy.

Certainly such music needs all the transfiguring that a pianist like Mr. Paderewski may bestow out of himself. He played it as though he believed in the concerto to the last measure, and in such faith and hope was lavishing all his powers upon it. More than once they seemed to give unity to a fragmentary piece; to clothe measures in a beauty that was of his touch, tone, feeling and imagination; to suggest amplitude and ardor where there was really little; to enrich and transform the music into illusion of sound, mood and fancy through his own puissant temper. These powers and many another that the concerto called into play are thrice familiar; but almost always Mr. Paderewski exercises them upon music that in itself makes almost equal return. Yesterday they were in new and rare function—the transfiguring of music that in itself was commonplace.

On the orchestral side, Dr. Muck, whose impressions of the day must have been many and various, did like service to Mr. Stojowski's concerto, steadily animating, warming and, so far as it was possible, characterizing the music. He held the orchestra tense upon it; he kept the balance true and elastic between the band and the pianist; and he made details tell that perhaps had been no more than filling or ornament as the composer put them to paper. Moreover, unlike Mr. Paderewski, the conductor through the first half of the concert had music worthy of his own and his orchestra's mettle—Beethoven's overture to the forgotten "Coriolanus" of a dull and dry Viennese poet and Sibelius's second symphony that he has hitherto somewhat strangely overlooked for the less mannered and more roundly speaking first and the singular and baffling fourth. Perhaps the overture is almost too familiar a repertory piece. As many a conductor and orchestra play it by routine, so probably most of us listen in as inert a fashion. We hear familiarly the mighty measures of the beginning—how much Beethoven can make of his chords and his orchestra in fullest voice. We hear familiarly the proud and chafing motive called of the masterful Coriolanus—with what vigor Beethoven has invented and fashioned it. We hear familiarly the succeeding motive, called of the gentler moods of the Roman—how readily and fully Beethoven can command this softer and almost pleading beauty in a few measures before even they begin to be melody. And so onward to the end with the usual impressions in our ears and the usual response on our lips.

Yet if Beethoven's overture instead of Mr. Stojowski's concerto had been labelled "first time in Boston" what would not the more sensitive hearers have experienced of it and what might they not have answered to it. Those mighty chords, those grandiose unisons seem still to set the Roman and the tragic scene. Out of music of pride and passion bearing all before them rises the figure of the Roman himself. Out of music that melts the ear and the heart, his spirit softens. The overture speaks in the tones of his implacable pride, his stern rages, his indomitable temper and surges with the strife that they provoke, while within and around that soft- otive is persuading him to compassion even yielding. The strife mutters itself y; the music darkens and is still with stillness of a spirit that quenches it- rather than submit. Here, we should , had a composer of our time written the overture, is tonal tragedy in epitome and here music that calls into vivid, impassioned being the heroic personage whose spirit it would open. Here we should say Beethoven writes as the Greek tragic poets wrote of their heroes whose pride and will is their downfall. We should exhaust our praise over music of such tonal might and such tragic eloquence. But the overture to "Coriolanus" is only a classic—say to bridge the way from Sibelius to Stojowski.

H. T. P.

MONITOR. BOSTON.

MARCH 11, 1916

STOJOWSKI WORK SOLO NUMBER OF MR. PADEREWSKI

SYMPHONY HALL—Seventeenth program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of March 10. The program: Sibelius, second symphony in D major, op. 43; Beethoven, "Coriolanus" overture, op. 62; Stojowski, piano concerto No. 2, op. 32 (first time in Boston, Ignace J. Paderewski, soloist).

It was the part of friendliness for the Polish pianist to bring with him on his visit a piece written by a fellow-expatriate. Moreover, it was the part of graciousness for him to present the work of a man who has earned leisure to compose through toil as a teacher in an American music school. A Symphony concert soloist could hardly come before the public with better motives. The audience that would not warmly applaud him when he walked on the platform would indeed be lost to all ideas of hospitality.

Concerning the share of the audience in the occasion, anybody might think of more things than applause. One might almost say of the subscribers and others who filled the hall that if they had not stayed in their places, even to the last person, until the program ended, they would have been a churlish gathering. But this would be out of the way of stock comment. For the code of musical æsthetics is one-sided. It expects a pianist to play well. It says nothing as to how he shall be heard. Reviewers note much about what should be and should not be on the further side of the footlights and little about the ought and the ought not on the hither side. They are careful to weigh individual responsibility, careless to mark collective responsibility.

Reason enough why they should be, since it is commonly reckoned more or less of a condescension for one human being to sit up straight and give heed while another shows off his powers at such a pastime as touching the keys of a piano. No more natural impulse can be conceived than for the hands of the first human being to reach for a door handle when those of the second reach for the keyboard. The æsthetic code, a social expedient doubtless anyway, demands that the artist shall keep that impulse from becoming effective.

Mr. Paderewski can hold the impulse down in 2700 people at once. He is very likely the only performer before the public who can do it with the particular 2700 that assembles Friday afternoons in Symphony hall. With the Stojowski concerto, which is written to be played without pauses, he had an advantage that he would not have had with an old-school work; but, all allowances made, his exploit in keeping the attention of a volatile audience at the end of the day was remarkable.

Necessarily he could not have won this sort of success unless he had something to say to his listeners. He could not have achieved it on the reputation for former playing or on mere brilliance of execution. He must have held his house with a substantial and consecutive message. Nevertheless few listeners will in any likelihood come forward with extended accounts of his communication to them. The day is scarcely to be regarded as one in which the pianist made profound revelations. It could not be so from the nature of his selection. The prelude, scherzo and variations which he played are less than a decade from the composer's pen. And the Polish pianist does not express himself with music of such fresh issue. He speaks at his best only through the old masterworks. And this less because of their style than because of their associations. He is one of those interpreters who gather up in their work the thought of all the players of the past. He is little of the contributor, much of the summarizer. That is why he is the most popular pianist of the times. He is the poet of the accepted and the verifiable. Some of his less applauded contemporaries are the poets of the unproved and the problematical. His playing is of unspeakable value because of its conserving qualities. It holds the comment of all the men of the nineteenth century who pondered over the pages of Beethoven, Liszt, Schumann and Chopin. It is encyclopedic, and it is of indisputable authority but it does not look forward.

The concerto which the artist brought to hearing was no bar to his expression because of any modern feeling it contains but only because traditions have had short time to gather about it. It is a gratifying composition to listen to, having much of the pleasing sonority of Mahler's music and a small amount of the passion of Wagner's. The scherzo has an individual kind of humor and the whole piece moves. The score is compact, clear and vigorous and has no waste pages.

The most interesting number of the program as far as the orchestra was concerned was the Sibelius symphony, which was executed with great brilliancy, the brass instruments being played with especial distinction. So well was the work of the Finnish composer given that a rather improvised reading of the "Coriolanus" overture could be condoned.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date MAR 1 1 1916

Boston Symphony Orchestra

HOME talent will be utilized at the final pair of concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. On Thursday the concert-master of the orchestra, Anton Witek, will play the Joachim concerto for violin, which will be preceded by Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture, and followed by Schumann's first symphony. On Saturday Mr. Witek and Mr. Ferir will be heard in Mozart's "Concertante Symphonie" for violin and viola. It will be preceded by Beethoven's second symphony and Brahms's "Academic Overture," and followed by Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date 1916

Boston Symphony.

The last appearances of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Thursday evening Anton Witek, the concert master of the orchestra, will appear as soloist, playing the rarely heard concerto in Hungarian style for violin and orchestra by Josef Joachim.

The programme will be as follows:

Overture to "Leonore" No. 1, op. 138..Beethoven
Concerto (after the Hungarian for violin and orchestra), op. 11....................Joachim
Symphony No. 1, in B flat major.......Schumann

The programme for Saturday afternoon includes the seldom heard and very delightful "Concertante Symphonie" of Mozart for violin and viola, the solo instruments being played by Messrs. Anton Witek and Emile Ferir.

Symphony No. 2, in D major..........Beethoven
"Academic Festival" Overture..........Brahms
Concertante Symphonie for violin and viola.
Mozart
Messrs. Witek and Ferir.
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger".........Wagner

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date MAR 1 2 1916

Letztes Konzert der „Boſtoner“.

Das letzte in der Serie der dieswinterlichen Konzerte gibt das rühmlichſt bekannte Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter am Freitag, den 17. März, abends 8 Uhr, unter den Auſpicien des Brooklyn Inſtituts für Künſte und Wiſſenſchaften im Opernſaale der Academy of Music. Der Dirigent hat ein äußerſt gediegenes Programm zuſammengeſtellt, das Piecen von Tſchaikowſky, Brahms, Volkmann und Wagner aufweiſt.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 1 2 1916

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final appearance this season in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the eminent Russian pianist.

Contrary to the general usage of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck has requested Mr. Gabrilowitsch to play two concertos, Mozart's "Concerto in D Minor" and Weber's "Concertpiece for Piano and Orchestra in F Minor." Mr. Gabrilowitsch played them at his appearance with the orchestra in Boston last spring, and it is said created the sensation of that season.

For the concert in February, Dr. Muck announced Handel's "Concerto for Strings and Two Wind Orchestras," but was compelled to omit it at the last minute owing to illness of members of the orchestra necessary to its performance. He has placed this on the program of the coming concert. The symphony will be Schumann's, in B flat, No. 1, which usually carries the title "Spring." The final number will be the "[illegible]hauser" overture.

BOSTON TRAVELER.

MARCH 11, 1916.

PADEREWSKI GIVEN FINE RECEPTION AT SYMPHONY

While opinions as to the rating of Paderewski in the world of pianists may differ there can be no question as to his place with the Symphony audience. He is easily first. It was several minutes after he came on the stage as soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon before the applause would permit his proceeding with his number. Another exceptional outburst of enthusiasm followed the close of the number, when the player was recalled and recalled. In vain did ne insist upon Dr. Muck sharing in the tribute. In vain did he drag forth Mr. Stojowski, composer of the concerto, to share in the tribute. The audience wanted and insisted upon, Symphony concert rules notwithstanding, that Paderewski play an extra number, and he finally did. Even then nothing short of closing the piano would drive the audience from the hall.

As to Stojowski's concerto. It was given for the first time at these concerts; is well worth hearing, particularly with such an artist as Paderewski as soloist and such an orchestra as the Symphony. It is not a great work, but it is interesting from first to last and whets the appetite for more.

Dr. Muck came off with flying colors in his first reading in this city of the Sibelius Second Symphony. One, however, may well prefer the more joyous side of Finnish life, if there be one. Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture fitted in well between the symphony and the concerto, making one of the most interesting concerts of the season.

TRANSCRIPT,
MARCH 11, 1916

THE SYMPONY CONCERT

PIANIST AND COMPOSER HAND IN HAND

Mr. Paderewski Plays Mr. Stojowski's Concerto, Transfigures It and Almost Persuades the Audience It Has Heard a Remarkable Piece—Beethoven's Overture to "Coriolanus" in Contrast—A Long-Overlooked Symphony of Sibelius

IF there is a twentieth-century Pepys in Boston, it is earnestly to be hoped that he was present and observant in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon or that being mistakenly absent then he will not fail to be in his place this evening. Already, doubtless he has recorded in his diary the amusing incidents and atmosphere of a Symphony Concert when Mr. Paderewski, appearing as "assisting artist," takes full possession of it, while an excited audience all agog to see and hear, listens and applauds. Yesterday, however, one of these interesting entertainments was raised to a new and higher power. For Mr. Paderewski, as the managers say, was "presenting a protégé"—Mr. Sigismond Stojowski, a fellow Pole, now resident in New York where he is an estimable teacher of the piano, an occasional virtuoso of the concert-room and in his leisure a composer too. In fact it was as a composer that Mr. Paderewski "presented" his friend. The elder Pole was quite willing to play both Schumann's concerto and Mr. Stojowski's but, since the two on one programme would have prolonged the concert into a third hour, he chose between them. Naturally he selected that of his countryman and pupil. The audience would probably have preferred Schumann's, but such a predilection is a detail quite beneath Mr. Paderewski's consideration.

Accordingly Mr. Stojowski's second concerto—or as he sometimes calls it a Prelude, Scherzo and Variations for Pianoforte and Orchestra—filled forty-five minutes of the concert in the ears of an audience that, as sundry acute observers remarked, seemed appreciably disappointed and disillusioned as it ran its course. Some even affirmed that the applause at the end was not so hearty as it used to be when Mr. Paderewski had bestowed the powers that he lavished upon Mr. Stojowski's music upon some classic concerto seemingly more worthy of them. It sufficed, however, to recall him ardently and at a second summons to bring with him the beaming composer. The two Poles saluted the audience and soon drew Dr. Muck, hitherto an interested bystander, over his little platform to share the plaudits. Everybody, except, possibly, the faintly smiling conductor, congratulated everybody else, and the innocent-minded must have believed that they were fortunate enough to be present on a great occasion when a new "master-work" was born to the world, say like the Prize-Song in "Die Meistersinger" that a whole quintet must hymn. Then the concert proceeded, according to ancient custom, which is to say that Mr. Paderewski played extra pieces to his audience, taking a just delight in the beauty and the poetry with which the enkindled pianist glamored them.

So was Mr. Stojowski's concerto graced by his great and good friend; yet even so, the impression does persist that it is not exactly a notably interesting or at all important addition to what the catalogues call "the literature of the piano." Once upon a time Rachmaninov wrote a concerto so difficult that he himself, a long-practised virtuoso, could not play it. Mr. Stojowski has played his; but it is hardly less full of exactions upon the pianist that serve no clear æsthetic purpose and make little impression, even technically, upon the ear. Being a pianist, the composer should have been kindly disposed toward his instrument; yet time and again, he sets it in tonal conflict with the orchestra, while, as often, it comes off second best. Or he seems to count it only one more instrument in the band to be used for rhythmic interruptions, colorful contrasts or garlanding ornament. Very seldom, even in a long set of variations, does he seek its characteristic voice for the beauty or the power with which he would swell his music. If a pianist had not written the concerto it would be safe to say that the piano does not "sound" in it and that his chief preoccupation was with the orchestra.

As a symphonic piece, the concerto seems no more remarkable. The motives from which it springs and the ten variations fall clearly, though not impressively upon the ear. The workmanship in the development of them is studious and resourceful. Usually the expected happens in play of rhythm, modulation, harmony, progress and climax. When it does not befall, the substitute is more ingenious than quickening. Mr. Stojowski lacks imagination, creative emotion and more than conventional mood in the invention of his motives and his processes with them. Almost never comes the stroke that sets ear, mind and spirit a-tingling; seldom is there sustained or enkindling mood; as rarely comes token of poetic impulse or any other passion than that of workmanship; only in the scherzo is there hint of playful fancy.

Certainly such music needs all the transfiguring that a pianist like Mr. Paderewski may bestow out of himself. He played it as though he believed in the concerto to the last measure, and in such faith and hope was lavishing all his powers upon it. More than once they seemed to give unity to a fragmentary piece; to clothe measures in a beauty that was of his touch, tone, feeling and imagination; to suggest amplitude and ardor where there was really little; to enrich and transform the music into illusion of sound, mood and fancy through his own puissant temper. These powers and many another that the concerto called into play are thrice familiar; but almost always Mr. Paderewski exercises them upon music that in itself makes almost equal return. Yesterday they were in new and rare function—the transfiguring of music that in itself was commonplace.

On the orchestral side, Dr. Muck, whose impressions of the day must have been many and various, did like service to Mr. Stojowski's concerto, steadily animating, warming and, so far as it was possible, characterizing the music. He held the orchestra tense upon it; he kept the balance true and elastic between the band and the pianist; and he made details tell that perhaps had been no more than filling or ornament as the composer put them to paper. Moreover, unlike Mr. Paderewski, the conductor through the first half of the concert had music worthy of his own and his orchestra's mettle—Beethoven's overture to the forgotten "Coriolanus" of a dull and dry Viennese poet and Sibelius's second symphony that he has hitherto somewhat strangely overlooked for the less mannered and more roundly speaking first and the singular and baffling fourth. Perhaps the overture is almost too familiar a repertory piece. As many a conductor and orchestra play it by routine, so probably most of us listen in as inert a fashion. We hear familiarly the mighty measures of the beginning—how much Beethoven can make of his chords and his orchestra in fullest voice. We hear familiarly the proud and chafing motive called of the masterful Coriolanus—with what vigor Beethoven has invented and fashioned it. We hear familiarly the succeeding motive, called of the gentler moods of the Roman—how readily and fully Beethoven can command this softer and almost pleading beauty in a few measures before even they begin to be melody. And so onward to the end with the usual impressions in our ears and the usual response on our lips.

Yet if Beethoven's overture instead of Mr. Stojowski's concerto had been labelled "first time in Boston" what would not the more sensitive hearers have experienced of it and what might they not have answered to it. Those mighty chords, those grandiose unisons seem still to set the Roman and the tragic scene. Out of music of pride and passion bearing all before them rises the figure of the Roman himself. Out of music that melts the ear and the heart, his spirit softens. The overture speaks in the tones of his implacable pride, his stern rages, his indomitable temper and surges with the strife that they provoke, while within and around that soft- otive is persuading him to compassion even yielding. The strife mutters itself y; the music darkens and is still with stillness of a spirit that quenches it- rather than submit. Here, we should , had a composer of our time written the overture, is tonal tragedy in epitome and here music that calls into vivid, impassioned being the heroic personage whose spirit it would open. Here we should say Beethoven writes as the Greek tragic poets wrote of their heroes whose pride and will is their downfall. We should exhaust our praise over music of such tonal might and such tragic eloquence. But the overture to "Coriolanus" is only a classic—say to bridge the way from Sibelius to Stojowski.

H. T. P.

MONITOR, BOSTON

MARCH 11, 1916

STOJOWSKI WORK SOLO NUMBER OF MR. PADEREWSKI

SYMPHONY HALL—Seventeenth program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of March 10. The program: Sibelius, second symphony in D major, op. 43; Beethoven, "Coriolanus" overture, op. 62; Stojowski, piano concerto No. 2, op. 32 (first time in Boston, Ignace J. Paderewski, soloist).

It was the part of friendliness for the Polish pianist to bring with him on his visit a piece written by a fellow-expatriate. Moreover, it was the part of graciousness for him to present the work of a man who has earned leisure to compose through toil as a teacher in an American music school. A Symphony concert soloist could hardly come before the public with better motives. The audience that would not warmly applaud him when he walked on the platform would indeed be lost to all ideas of hospitality.

Concerning the share of the audience in the occasion, anybody might think of more things than applause. One might almost say of the subscribers and others who filled the hall that if they had not stayed in their places, even to the last person, until the program ended, they would have been a churlish gathering. But this would be out of the way of stock comment. For the code of musical æsthetics is one-sided. It expects a pianist to play well. It says nothing as to how he shall be heard. Reviewers note much about what should be and should not be on the further side of the footlights and little about the ought and the ought not on the hither side. They are careful to weigh individual responsibility, careless to mark collective responsibility.

Reason enough why they should be, since it is commonly reckoned more or less of a condescension for one human being to sit up straight and give heed while another shows off his powers at such a pastime as touching the keys of a piano. No more natural impulse can be conceived than for the hands of the first human being to reach for a door handle when those of the second reach for the keyboard. The æsthetic code, a social expedient doubtless anyway, demands that the artist shall keep that impulse from becoming effective.

Mr. Paderewski can hold the impulse down in 2700 people at once. He is very likely the only performer before the public who can do it with the particular 2700 that assembles Friday afternoons in Symphony hall. With the Stojowski concerto, which is written to be played without pauses, he had an advantage that he would not have had with an old-school work; but, all allowances made, his exploit in keeping the attention of a volatile audience at the end of the day was remarkable.

Necessarily he could not have won this sort of success unless he had something to say to his listeners. He could not have achieved it on the reputation for former playing or on mere brilliance of execution. He must have held his house with a substantial and consecutive message. Nevertheless few listeners will in any likelihood come forward with extended accounts of his communication to them. The day is scarcely to be regarded as one in which the pianist made profound revelations. It could not be so from the nature of his selection. The prelude, scherzo and variations which he played are less than a decade from the composer's pen. And the Polish pianist does not express himself with music of such fresh issue. He speaks at his best only through the old masterworks. And this less because of their style than because of their associations. He is one of those interpreters who gather up in their work the thought of all the players of the past. He is little of the contributor, much of the summarizer. That is why he is the most popular pianist of the times. He is the poet of the accepted and the verifiable. Some of his less applauded contemporaries are the poets of the unproved and the problematical. His playing is of unspeakable value because of its conserving qualities. It holds the comment of all the men of the nineteenth century who pondered over the pages of Beethoven, Liszt, Schumann and Chopin. It is encyclopedic, and it is of indisputable authority but it does not look forward.

The concerto which the artist brought to hearing was no bar to his expression because of any modern feeling it contains but only because traditions have had short time to gather about it. It is a gratifying composition to listen to, having much of the pleasing sonority of Mahler's music and a small amount of the passion of Wagner's. The scherzo has an individual kind of humor and the whole piece moves. The score is compact, clear and vigorous and has no waste pages.

The most interesting number of the program as far as the orchestra was concerned was the Sibelius symphony, which was executed with great brilliancy, the brass instruments being played with especial distinction. So well was the work of the Finnish composer given that a rather improvised reading of the "Coriolanus" overture could be condoned.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date MAR 11 1916

Boston Symphony Orchestra

HOME talent will be utilized at the final pair of concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. On Thursday the concert-master of the orchestra, Anton Witek, will play the Joachim concerto for violin, which will be preceded by Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture, and followed by Schumann's first symphony. On Saturday Mr. Witek and Mr. Férir will be heard in Mozart's "Concertante Symphonie" for violin and viola. It will be preceded by Beethoven's second symphony and Brahms's "Academic Overture," and followed by Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date 1916

Boston Symphony.

The last appearances of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Thursday evening Anton Witek, the concert master of the orchestra, will appear as soloist, playing the rarely heard concerto in Hungarian style for violin and orchestra by Josef Joachim.

The programme will be as follows:

Overture to "Leonore" No. 1, op. 138..Beethoven
Concerto (after the Hungarian for violin and orchestra), op. 11.....................Joachim
Symphony No. 1, in B flat major.......Schumann

The programme for Saturday afternoon includes the seldom heard and very delightful "Concertante Symphonie" of Mozart for violin and viola, the solo instruments being played by Messrs. Anton Witek and Emile Ferir.

Symphony No. 2, in D major..........Beethoven
"Academic Festival" Overture...........Brahms
Concertante Symphonie for violin and viola, Mozart
Messrs. Witek and Ferir.
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger".........Wagner

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date MAR 12 1916

Letztes Konzert der „Boſtoner“.

Das letzte in der Serie der dieswinterlichen Konzerte gibt das rühmlichſt bekannte Boſtoner Symphonie Orcheſter am Freitag, den 17. März, abends 8 Uhr, unter den Auſpicien des Brooklyn Inſtituts für Künſte und Wiſſenſchaften im Opernſaale der Academy of Muſic. Der Dirigent hat ein äußerſt gediegenes Programm zuſammengeſtellt, das Piècen von Tſchaikowſky, Brahms, Volkmann und Wagner aufweiſt.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 12 1916

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final appearance this season in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the eminent Russian pianist.

Contrary to the general usage of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck has requested Mr. Gabrilowitsch to play two concertos, Mozart's "Concerto in D Minor" and Weber's "Concertpiece for Piano and Orchestra in F Minor." Mr. Gabrilowitsch played them at his appearance with the orchestra in Boston last spring, and it is said created the sensation of that season.

For the concert in February, Dr. Muck announced Handel's "Concerto for Strings and Two Wind Orchestras," but was compelled to omit it at the last minute owing to illness of members of the orchestra necessary to its performance. He has placed this on the program of the coming concert.

The symphony will be Schumann's, in B flat, No. 1, which usually carries the title "Spring."

The final number will be the "Tannhauser" overture.

[117]

From Address ASHING
Date MA

THE Boston Symphony will make its final a the season at the Nat day afternoon, March The soloist will be brilowitsch, the eminent Russ

Contrary to the general usage of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck has requested Mr. Gabrilowitsch to play two concertos. Both of them are short. The first is Mozart's "Concerto in D Minor" and the second is Weber's "Concertpiece for Piano and Orchestra in F Minor." Mr. Gabrilowitsch played both of these works with the orchestra in Boston last spring with signal success.

The orchestral part of the program is equally interesting. It will be remembered that for the concert in February, Dr. Muck announced Handel's "Concerto for Strings and Two Wind Orchestras." This number he was compelled to change at the last minute owing to illness of members of the orchestra necessary to its performance. He has placed this on the program of the coming concert.

The symphony will be Schumann's, in B flat, No. 1. This symphony usually carries the title of "Spring." It might as easily be called the "Bridal" symphony, for Schumann wrote it in the great outburst of joy that filled him when he finally had won Clara Wieck as his bride. The symphony is Schumann in his most ingratiating mood. The clouds that darkened his life at the end had not yet appeared and he was full of the joy of living.

The final number will be the "Tannhauser Overture" of Wagner.

From SUN,
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date 1916

MME. FARRAR TO SING

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final appearance of the season in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening at 8.15. The concert promises to end a brilliant season in a most brilliant manner. The soloist will be Mme. Geraldine Farrar.

The outstanding orchestral number on the program will be Richard Strauss' tone poem "Don Quixote." "Don Quixote-Fastastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character" is the least-known of Strauss' later orchestral works, this notwithstanding the fact that it contains some of the most beautiful music that ever sprang from his fertile fancy and in orchestral construction rises to a point of almost uncanny ingenuity.

In the tone poem Strauss carries the "Melancholy Don" through various of his adventures. Parts of it are program music raised to the *n*th degree, as, for example, when the ardent knight throws himself into battle with a flock of sheep and, again, when he struggles manfully against the windmills. From the purely technical point of view it presents greater difficulties than any of the other poems, not even excluding the "Domestica" and "Ein Heldenleben." The beauty of the music in the parts which describe the Don's conversation with Sancho Panzo, the vigil which the good knight keeps, and his death rises to exquisite heights.

Mme. Farrar will sing two numbers. The first will be "Elsa's Dream," from the first act of "Lohengrin." The second will be the lovely air of "Marguerite," from the third part of Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," the first words of which are "D'amour l'ardente flamme."

The program in its entirety is as follows:

Symphony No. 2 in D-major	Bethoven
Elsa's Dream, from Lohengrin	Wagner
Don Quixote	Strauss
La Damnation de Faust	Berlioz
Overture to Tannhauser	Wagner

Soloist, Mme. Geraldine Farrar.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date 1916

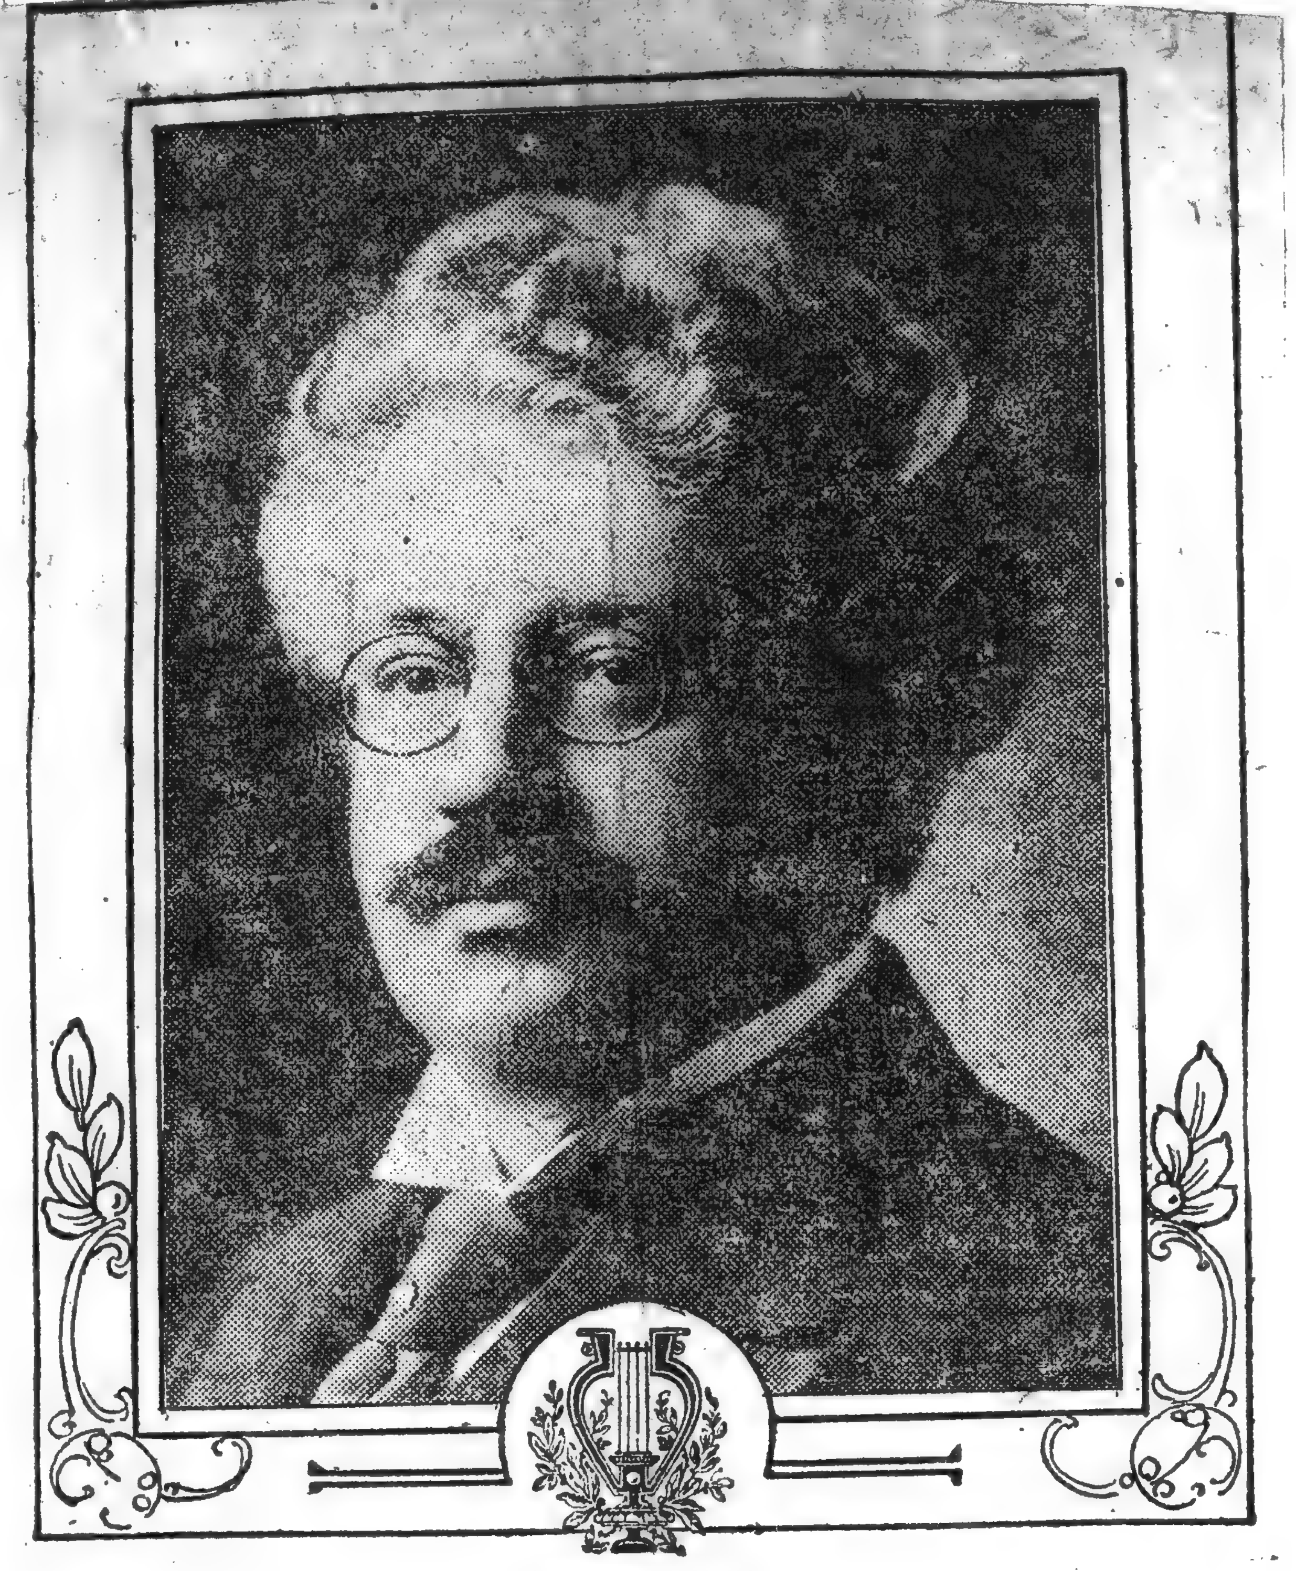
BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final appearance of the season in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening at 8:15. The concert promises to end a brilliant season in a most brilliant manner. The soloist will be Mme. Geraldine Farrar.

The outstanding orchestral number on the program will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, Don Quixote. Don Quixote—Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, is the least known of Strauss' later orchestral works, this notwithstanding the fact that it contains some of the most beautiful music that ever sprang from his fertile fancy and in orchestral construction rises to a point of almost uncanny ingenuity.

From STAATS ZEITUNG
Address New York City.
Date

Established



Anton Witek,
Konzertmeiſter, Boſton Symph. Orch.

Dr. Muck hat für die letzten beiden hieſigen Konzerte der Boſtoner in Carnegie Hall, welche am Abend des 16., reſp. am Nachmittag des 18. d. Mts. ſtattfinden, die folgenden Programme aufgeſtellt. Er dirigiert am kommenden Donnerstag abend Beethoven's „Leonoren"-Ouverture, No. 1, op. 138, und Schumann's Erſte Symphonie in B-Dur. Als Soliſt wird Herr Anton Witek, der hochgeſchätzte Konzertmeiſter des Orcheſters, bekanntlich ein allgemein anerkannter Virtuoſe, das ſelten gehörte „Konzert in ungariſchem Stil" von Joſef Joachim mit Orcheſterbegleitung ſpielen. Das Programm für den Samstag nachmittag lautet wie folgt: Beethoven's Zweite Symphonie, Brahms' Akademiſche Feſt-Ouvertüre, Wagner's „Meiſterſinger"-Vorſpiel und Mozart's „Konzertante Symphonie" für Violine und Viola mitden Herren Witek und Férir als Soliſten.

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

FARRAR COMING

Will Appear Wednesday As Soloist At Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will make its final appearance of the season in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening at 8.15 o'clock, when the soloist will be Geraldine Farrar.

The principal orchestral number on the program will be Richard Strauss' tone poem. "Don Quixote." "Don Quixote-Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character" is the latest known of Strauss' later orchestral works, this notwithstanding the fact that it contains some of the most beautiful music that ever sprang from his fertile fancy and in orchestral construction rises to a point of almost uncanny ingenuity.

In the tone poem Strauss carries the "Melancholy Don" through various of his adventures, including the episode in which the ardent knight throws himself into battle with a flock of sheep and also his struggle against the windmills.

Mme. Farrar will sing two numbers. The first will be "Elsa's Dream," from the first act of "Lohengrin." The second will be the lovely air of Marguerite from the third part of Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," the first words of which are "D'amour l'ardente flamme."

The symphony will be Beethoven's Second. The concert will close with the "Tannhauser" overture.

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore Md.
Date

was among the guests.

The concert this evening at the Lyric by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be one of the most brilliant musical events of the winter. More than 700 people have been turned away at the box office. A number of hostesses will have box parties.

Geraldine Farrar, the Metropolitan Grand Opera favorite, will be the soloist.

From
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR 9 -1916

DURING the Lenten season a number of musical events will interest society, several box parties having been given last evening at the Lyric for the New York Philharmonic concert.

On Saturday evening of this week the Alliance Francaise will have an evening of music, when the members will meet at Arundell Hall at 8.30 o'clock. The artists will be Frank C. Bornschein, violinist, and Howard R. Thatcher, pianist.

Next Wednesday evening Geraldine Farrar, one of the most popular of the Metropolitan Opera Stars, who was heard here recently in a concert, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. and on March 22 Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, the well-known pianist, will play with the Philadelphia Orchestra. This will be the first appearance here this season of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler is a sister of Dr. Maurice Bloomfield, a member of the faculty of Johns Hopkins University, whose guest she has been here on a number of occasions.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 12 1916

Music Events For This Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final appearance of the season in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 14, at 4:20. For this occasion Dr. Muck has made a program of exceptional charm. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the eminent Russian pianist.

Contrary to the general usage of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck has requested Mr. Gabrilowitsch to play two concertos. Both of them are short. The first is Mozart's "Concerto in D minor," and the second is Weber's "Concertpiece for piano and orchestra in minor."

The program is as follows:

Schumann, Symphony No. 1 in B flat; Mozart, concerto for piano in D minor; Weber, concertstuck for piano in minor; Handel, concerto for strings and two wind orchestras; and Wagner, overture to "Tannhauser." Soloist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date AP

FARRAR WITH SYMPHONY

Entire House Sold And Audience Is Record For Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its last local appearance of the season tonight at the Lyric before one of the largest audiences that has ever attended one of its concerts in this city.

Geraldine Farrar is the bright particular attraction. She was announced as soloist of the concert early in the season, and the event has been anticipated with unusual interest. The Boston Orchestra's season sale was large enough practically to crowd the house, so that the big extra demand for the Farrar engagement quickly disposed of what seats still were to be had. Every chair in the house has been sold, and a very large number of standees is expected.

Miss Farrar will sing two numbers, and the principal orchestra novelty of Dr. Muck's program will be Richard Strauss' tone poem "Don Quixote," which is unfamiliar here.

TAKES HEAVY POISON DOSE

From POST
Address ASHINGTON, D. C.
Date MAR 12 1916

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final appearance of the season at the National Tuesday afternoon, March 14, at 4:30. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the eminent Russian pianist.

Contrary to the general usage of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck has requested Mr. Gabrilowitsch to play two concertos. Both of them are short. The first is Mozart's "Concerto in D Minor" and the second is Weber's "Concertpiece for Piano and Orchestra in F Minor." Mr. Gabrilowitsch played both of these works with the orchestra in Boston last spring with signal success.

The orchestral part of the program is equally interesting. It will be remembered that for the concert in February, Dr. Muck announced Handel's "Concerto for Strings and Two Wind Orchestras." This number he was compelled to change at the last minute owing to illness of members of the orchestra necessary to its performance. He has placed this on the program of the coming concert.

The symphony will be Schumann's, in B flat, No. 1. This symphony usually carries the title of "Spring." It might as easily be called the "Bridal" symphony, for Schumann wrote it in the great outburst of joy that filled him when he finally had won Clara Wieck as his bride. The symphony is Schumann in his most ingratiating mood. The clouds that darkened his life at the end had not yet appeared and he was full of the joy of living.

The final number will be the "Tannhauser Overture" of Wagner.

From SUN,
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date 916

MME. FARRAR TO SING

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final appearance of the season in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening at 8.15. The concert promises to end a brilliant season in a most brilliant manner. The soloist will be Mme. Geraldine Farrar.

The outstanding orchestral number on the program will be Richard Strauss' tone poem "Don Quixote." "Don Quixote-Fastastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character" is the least-known of Strauss' later orchestral works, this notwithstanding the fact that it contains some of the most beautiful music that ever sprang from his fertile fancy and in orchestral construction rises to a point of almost uncanny ingenuity.

In the tone poem Strauss carries the "Melancholy Don" through various of his adventures. Parts of it are program music raised to the nth degree, as, for example, when the ardent knight throws himself into battle with a flock of sheep and, again, when he struggles manfully against the windmills. From the purely technical point of view it presents greater difficulties than any of the other poems, not even excluding the "Domestica" and "Ein Heldenleben." The beauty of the music in the parts which describe the Don's conversation with Sancho Panzo, the vigil which the good knight keeps, and his death rises to exquisite heights.

Mme. Farrar will sing two numbers. The first will be "Elsa's Dream," from the first act of "Lohengrin." The second will be the lovely air of "Marguerite," from the third part of Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," the first words of which are "D'amour l'ardente flamme."

The program in its entirety is as follows:

Symphony No. 2 in D-major.....Bethoven
Elsa's Dream, from Lohengrin.....Wagner
Don Quixote.....Strauss
La Damnation de Faust.....Berlioz
Overture to Tannhauser.....Wagner
Soloist, Mme. Geraldine Farrar.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date 916

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final appearance of the season in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening at 8:15. The concert promises to end a brilliant season in a most brilliant manner. The soloist will be Mme. Geraldine Farrar.

The outstanding orchestral number on the program will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, Don Quixote. Don Quixote—Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, is the least known of Strauss' later orchestral works, this notwithstanding the fact that it contains some of the most beautiful music that ever sprang from his fertile fancy and in orchestral construction rises to a point of almost uncanny ingenuity.

Anton Witek,
Konzertmeiſter, Boſton Symph. Orch.

Dr. Muck hat für die letzten beiden hieſigen Konzerte der Boſtoner in Carnegie Hall, welche am Abend des 16., reſp. am Nachmittag des 18. d. Mts. ſtattfinden, die folgenden Programme aufgeſtellt. Er dirigiert am kommenden Donnerstag abend Beethoven's „Leonoren"=Ouverture, No. 1, op. 138, und Schumann's Erſte Symphonie in B=Dur. Als Soliſt wird Herr Anton Witek, der hochgeſchätzte Konzertmeiſter des Orcheſters, bekanntlich ein allgemein anerkannter Virtuoſe, das ſelten gehörte „Konzert in ungariſchem Stil" von Joſef Joachim mit Orcheſterbegleitung ſpielen. Das Programm für den Samstag nachmittag lautet wie folgt: Beethoven's Zweite Symphonie, Brahms' Akademiſche Feſt=Ouvertüre, Wagner's „Meiſterſinger"=Vorſpiel und Mozart's „Konzertante Symphonie" für Violine und Viola mitden Herren Witek und Férir als Soliſten.

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.

FARRAR COMING

Will Appear Wednesday As Soloist At Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will make its final appearance of the season in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening at 8.15 o'clock, when the soloist will be Geraldine Farrar.

The principal orchestral number on the program will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Quixote." "Don Quixote-Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character" is the latest known of Strauss' later orchestral works, this notwithstanding the fact that it contains some of the most beautiful music that ever sprang from his fertile fancy and in orchestral construction rises to a point of almost uncanny ingenuity.

In the tone poem Strauss carries the "Melancholy Don" through various of his adventures, including the episode in which the ardent knight throws himself into battle with a flock of sheep and also his struggle against the windmills.

Mme. Farrar will sing two numbers. The first will be "Elsa's Dream," from the first act of "Lohengrin." The second will be the lovely air of Marguerite from the third part of Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," the first words of which are "D'amour l'ardente flamme."

The symphony will be Beethoven's Second. The concert will close with the "Tannhauser" overture.

From EVG. SUN
Address: Baltimore Md.
Date

was among the guests.

The concert this evening at the Lyric by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be one of the most brilliant musical events of the winter. More than 700 people have been turned away at the box office. A number of hostesses will have box parties.

Geraldine Farrar, the Metropolitan Grand Opera favorite, will be the soloist.

From
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR 9 - 1916

DURING the Lenten season a number of musical events will interest society, several box parties having been given last evening at the Lyric for the New York Philharmonic concert.

On Saturday evening of this week the Alliance Française will have an evening of music, when the members will meet at Arundell Hall at 8.30 o'clock. The artists will be Frank C. Bornschein, violinist, and Howard R. Thatcher, pianist.

Next Wednesday evening Geraldine Farrar, one of the most popular of the Metropolitan Opera Stars, who was heard here recently in a concert, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. and on March 22 Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, the well-known pianist, will play with the Philadelphia Orchestra. This will be the first appearance here this season of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler is a sister of Dr. Maurice Bloomfield, a member of the faculty of Johns Hopkins University, whose guest she has been here on a number of occasions.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 12 1916

Music Events For This Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final appearance of the season in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 14, at 4:30. For this occasion Dr. Muck has made a program of exceptional charm. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the eminent Russian pianist.

Contrary to the general usage of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck has requested Mr. Gabrilowitsch to play two concertos. Both of them are short. The first is Mozart's "Concerto in D minor," and the second is Weber's "Concertpiece for piano and orchestra in F minor."

The program is as follows:

Schumann, Symphony No. 1 in B flat; Mozart, concerto for piano in D minor; Weber, concertstuck for piano in F minor; Handel, concerto for strings and two wind orchestras; and Wagner, overture to "Tannhauser." Soloist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date AP

FARRAR WITH SYMPHONY

Entire House Sold And Audience Is Record For Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its last local appearance of the season tonight at the Lyric before one of the largest audiences that has ever attended one of its concerts in this city.

Geraldine Farrar is the bright particular attraction. She was announced as soloist of the concert early in the season, and the event has been anticipated with unusual interest. The Boston Orchestra's season sale was large enough practically to crowd the house, so that the big extra demand for the Farrar engagement quickly disposed of what seats still were to be had. Every chair in the house has been sold, and a very large number of standees is expected.

Miss Farrar will sing two numbers, and the principal orchestra novelty of Dr. Muck's program will be Richard Strauss' tone poem "Don Quixote," which is unfamiliar here.

TAKES HEAVY POISON DOSE

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date 12 [illegible]

HERE THIS WEEK WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

GERALDINE FARRAR

Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Quixote," which will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its final concert of the season at the Lyric next Wednesday night, is the least familiar of all the works of its iconoclastic composer.

It has never been performed in Baltimore, and the fact that Dr. Muck has included it in his program has stirred the interest of local music-lovers to an unusual degree. Schoenberg's "Kammersymphonie" could hardly be anticipated with greater anxiety.

The concert will be further notable for the appearance of Geraldine Farrar, who has never been heard here as an orchestral soloist. Several times she was announced to sing at such affairs, but illness compelled her to cancel the engagements.

Dr. Muck will open the Wednesday night program with Beethoven's early Symphony No. 2 in D major. Mme. Farrar sings "Elsa's Dream" Mme. Farrar singe "Elsa's Dream" from "Lohengrin," and the concert will be closed with the overture from "Tannhauser," which will be preceded by a soprano aria from Berlioz's "La Damnation de Faust."

From NEWS
Address PROV[illegible]
Date MAR 4 - 1916

Established:

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The musical season of 1915-16 is rapidly nearing its end. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is giving the last but one of its Providence Concerts in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, March 7th, and a month later it will make its final appearance of the season here.

For the coming concert Dr. Muck has confined his program to familiar works although the symphony, Beethoven's Second in D-Major has not been played in Providence many times. This symphony is not only interesting from its musical content, but from its historical position. It marks, so to say, the end of the path followed by the young Beethoven. This path had been marked out in rigid lines by Mozart and Haydn and Beethoven was the first to turn aside from it and follow the bent of his own genius.

This Second Symphony in D-Major is cast in rigid mold established principally by Haydn for symphonic form, but one finds in the music itself many indications of the master mind which was to break down the precedents and bring quite new elements into the art of music in the "Eroica" Symphony which follows the Second. The composer in the D-Major Symphony follows the letter of the law, but the spirit is his own. It is a work full of melody and shows the composer full of the joyousness of youth.

The three works on the second part of the program are very familiar. The Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" remains today as the day it was written, one of the finest works in its form in the literature of music. Wagner always reached the highest point of his imagination and skill when he was depicting Nature in her varied moods. Many composers have been impelled to paint the sea in tone, but none brings it so vividly to the mind as this "Flying Dutchman" Overture of Richard Wagner.

The final number on the program is the best and most popular of Liszt's symphonic poems, "Les Preludes" which contains all the finest qualities of Liszt's genius. The soloist, as already announced will be Ernest Schelling. Mr. Schelling is a native of New Jersey but a considerable part of his life has been spent abroad. He has the distinction of being one of the very few pupils of Paderewski and there is much similarity between the playing of these two pianists. Mr. Schelling is not only completely the master of the technique of his instrument, but his playing is notable for its poetic beauty and imagination. Schumann's Concerto in A—Minor which he plays, while anything but a "show" piece, tries the skill of the pianist to the utmost. Rhythmically it is full of passages to trip up the performer The program in its proper order is as follows:

Beethoven, Symphony in D-Major No. 2.
Wagner, Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."
Schumann, Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A-Minor.
Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

From Bulletin
Address Pro[illegible]
Date MAR [illegible] 91[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES PROGRAMMF OF OLD FAVORITI

Ernest Schelling, American Pi of Paderewski, Soloist at fantry Hall in Piano Selectic Dr. Muck Unable to Cond Because of Illness.

For its fifth concert of its 35th seaso the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a agreeable programme of old favorites i Infantry Hall last evening, presenting fo its soloist, Ernest Schelling, pianist, native of this country, who has the distinction of being one of the few pupil of Paderewski.

The programme was given in the following order:

Beethoven. .Symphony in D-major, No. 2, Op. 3
I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.
II. Larghetto.
III. Scherzo: Allegro; Trio.
IV. Allegro molto.
Wagner....Overture to "The Flying Dutchman'
Schumann ....Concerto in A-minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 5
I. Allegro affettuoso.
II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso
III. Allegro vivace.
Liszt....Symphonic Poem No. 3. "Les Preludes" (after Lamartine

After the members of the orchestra were in their seats, likewise those in the audience who arrived before the doors were closed, announcement was made that, owing to the illness of Dr. Muck his place would be taken for his second annual absence, as for his first, by Mr. Schmidt.

SECOND SYMPHONY GIVEN.

The Second Symphony, which has been less often heard here than some of the later, more romantic symphonies of Beethoven, came in a measure as a novelty, after a period of some 10 years, its classical outline and beauty of development affording much pleasure as it was presented, the joyous music almost tempting one to doubt the composer's own statement of his unhappiness when it was written.

In his reading, Mr. Schmidt made a more convincing impression than upon his first appearance. The symphony is especially interesting in its construction, as like the first it shows the classical influence of Haydn and Mozart, before Beethoven, by his third symphony, the "Eroica," established the Romantic School, and the strict sonata form of the first movement is fascinating in its working out. The stately passage of the Larghetto, contrasted with the livelier scherzo and finale, were beautiful in harmony, and it was good to be reminded of its almost forgotten charm.

Of the other orchestral numbers, Wagner's "Overture to the Flying Dutchman," given here some half-dozen years ago, was played with considerable force and fire, while Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," formed a fitting climax to the music of the evening.

Between these two came the lovely concerto in A-minor, by Schumann, the apostle of the Romantic school, which is by many considered the most beautiful concerto ever written for the piano, and which is alike the terror of orchestras and the joy of pianists who understand Schumann, and possess a technique of sufficient finish to interpret him.

INDIVIDUALITY SHOWN.

Mr. Schelling is a pianist of maturity, and he played the concerto with marked individuality, masterly technical skill, and a beautiful quality of tone, particularly in his legato passages. So well was his performance received that the pianist was applauded to the echo, and the audience seemed loth to let him go.

While in such a programme so presented there is nothing at which to cavil, one feels impelled to ask why, among so many old orchestral favorites, one novelty might not have been provided like Mr. Schelling's own "Impressions (from an Artist's Life) in Form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte?" Just because Boston failed to appreciate its felicity and frivolity is no reason that [illegible] should not be given a chance to show its sense of humor. In a season when pianists have come among us as thick as bees, when younger composers like Grainger and Ornstein have been acclaimed, (and with Paderewski coming fast on his heels,) Mr. Schelling might have given us an opportunity to hear him in his own work, instead of in measures that we know by heart.

While on this subject it seems timely to ask when we are to hear Carpenter's much-talked-of suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator." Boston is said not to have received that with enthusiasm either, but since New York and Chicago did, why may we not have a chance to decide for ourselves?

In the long run most of us come back to the old and tried friends in music as in life, but in both it is well occasionally to make a new friend. Beethoven symphonies, Wagner overtures and symphonic poems invented by Liszt we have had many times and oft. And it must be acknowledged that we like them probably better than most music in reality. But a steady diet is apt to pall, and while it must also be acknowledged that we have heretofore taken the musical fare which Dr. Muck has provided in good part, appreciating his selection and presentation, to let a pianist and composer come to us and play, no matter how well, such an old standby as the Schumann sonata, with such a novelty as his own "Variations" up his sleeve, so to speak, is enough to make the worm turn.

Many had hoped for the deferred "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage" of Mendelssohn, promised for an earlier concert, of which the Boston performance was so extolled by the critics: but when Mr. Schmidt appeared, the reason for its non-appearance, and for the programme of well-worn favorites was apparent.

At the final concert a Wagner programme will be given "by request." No announcement is made of a soloist at the concert which will be given on Tuesday evening, April 11.

A. W. C.

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date [illegible]AR 1 4 1916

Boston Symphony

Final Concert of Season With Geraldine Farrar as Soloist

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and last concert of its thirty-fifth season in Philadelphia, before the usual large audience at the Academy of Music last evening, when Geraldine Farrar appeared as the soloist of a program which included Beethoven's second symphony, in D major, and the "Don Quixote" of Richard Strauss, as the principal orchestral numbers, the "Tannhauser" overture of Wagner coming as a fitting climax at the close.

The symphony came at the opening and constituted the first part of the program, and its classic beauty, direct, sincere and inspiring in all its effects, created an atmosphere of melodious joy that was not wholly dispelled by the modern eccentricities of Strauss, in the second part, after Miss (or "Mme." as she is now programmed, since she has become the wife of Lou Tellegen) Farrar had sung her first number. Dr. Muck was characteristically sedate and self-effacing in his reading of the work, but as ever held the skilled musicians so firmly in hand that the absorbed listener forgot conductor and men in the pure joy of listening to the music.

The Strauss composition was played here by the Boston Symphony several years ago, and perhaps there were persons in last night's audience, who, having heard it then, were glad to hear it again. The music shows the skill, the imagination and the daring of its composer, who at least has the courage of his convictions and does not hesitate to do what he pleases with all the instruments of the complete orchestra—and then some. In tonally illustrating the adventures of the romance-crazed hero of the tale by Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra, Strauss takes advantage of several of the most striking episodes as an opportunity to produce some of the most bizarre effects known to modern instrumentation. The scene with the windmills, the ride through the air on the wooden horse, the upsetting of the boat, the battle with the bleating sheep, these bring forth queer sounds and ear-splitting discords which at times last evening caused the audience to smile, even to laugh. But just when the conglomeration of unusual sounds seems to be almost too much, relief comes in some of the passages of simple melodious beauty which Strauss so well knows how to write. Thus, in depicting the fair Dulcinea, in the entrance of the penitent pilgrims, the barcarolle, and, at the end, the death of Don Quixote, who, bereft of his romantic fancies, and realizing that they were but as smoke and vanity, is content to die, there is some rich harmonization and charming melodization. The interpretation was deft and skilful throughout, the orchestra as a whole fulfilling expertly every intricate demand of the score, while the two solo instruments, the 'cello, representing Don Quixote, and the viola, as his faithful Sancho, were played respectively in an admirable manner by H. Warnke and E. Ferir.

Miss (or "Mme.") Farrar looked her prettiest in an elaborate gown of silver and white, with a cloud of white tulle thrown about her otherwise uncovered shoulders, and her singing evidently gave great pleasure to the majority of persons in the audience. She was cordially received and repeatedly recalled after both of her numbers. Shes ang first "Elsa's Dream," from "Lohengrin," giving this well-known Wagner aria with a manner of vision-seeing ecstacy that was appropriate and effective, and later the aria "D'amour l'ardente flamme," from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." It was in her use of the mezzo voce, in those passages where the mellow sweetness of her pure soprano was advantageously displayed, that she was at her best. There were sympathy and dramatic feeling in all that she did, but in some of the points of climax, in the use of the full tone, particularly on the high notes, there was so much of the "reed," and such a near approach to the forced and the strident, that the result was neither altogether artistic nor wholly agreeable. Farrar's voice, in fact, while it never has been sweeter in some respects, in others seems to have lost some of its power to charm.

ELOPE IN SPITE OF VIGILANCE

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 1 2 1916

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final appearance of the season in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening with Geraldine Farrar as soloist. Mme. Farrar will sing two numbers. The first will be "Elsa's Dream," from "Lohengrin." The second will be the lovely air of Marguerite from the third part of Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," the first words of which are, "D'amour l'ardente flamme." Other numbers on the program are: Beethoven, Symphony No. 2 in D major; Strauss' "Don Quixote"; Wagner, overture to "Tannhauser."

* * *

One of the important local musical events of the early spring is the joint recital of Hans Kindler, violoncellist, and Ellis Clark Hammann, pianist, to be given in Witherspoon Hall next Wednesday evening. The affair is given under the management of the Smit Musical Bureau, and will enjoy distinguished patronage. The program follows:

1. Sonate op. 69, in A major (piano and cello) Beethoven
   Allegro, ma non tanto
   Scherzo. Allegro molto
   Adagio Cantabile
   Allegro Vivace
   Mr. Hammann and Mr. Kindler
2. Pastorale..................Scarlatti-Tausig
   Novelette No. 4, in D major.......Schumann
   Nocturne F sharp
   Ballade in A flat
   Mr. Hammann..........................Chopin
3. (a) Largo ....Chopin
   (b) Ritornell ....Sinding
   (c) Scherzo-Caprice ....Zeckwer
   Mr. Kindler
4. Variations Symphoniques (cello and piano). Boellmann
   Mr. Kindler and Mr. Hammann

* * *

The second and last recital of the season by Fritz Kreisler will be given in the Academy of Music Tuesday afternoon, March 21, at 3 o'clock. Mr. Kreisler will be assisted, as in the past, by Carl Lamson, accompanist. His program follows:

1. (a) Suite in E minor.....................Bach
   (b) Sarabande and Allegretto..........Corelli
   (c) Prelude and Allegro..............Pugnani
2. Concerto No. 2, F sharp minor...Vieuxtemps
3. (a) Romance in A major..........Schumann
   (b) Larghetto ....Weber
   (c) Moment Musical.....................Schubert
   (d) Rondo in G major.....................Mozart
4. (a) "Wienerisch" ....Godowsky
   (b) Rondino (on a theme by Beethoven).
   (c) Wiegenlied ....Kreisler
   (d) Slavonic Fantasy........Dvorak-Kreisler

* * *

PHOTO AIME DUPONT

GERALDINE FARRAR, SOPRANO WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR [illegible] 19[illegible]

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final appearance of the season in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, with Geraldine Farrar as soloist. The outstanding orchestral number on the program will be Richard Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Quixote," probably the least known of Strauss's later orchestral works, this notwithstanding the fact that it contains some of his most beautiful music.

Mme. Farrar will sing two numbers—"Elsa's Dream," from the first act of "Lohengrin," and the lovely air of Marguerite, from the third part of Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," the first words of which are "D'amour l'ardente flamme."

Beethoven's second symphony will open the program, and the familiar "Tannhauser" overture will bring it to a close.

[119]

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date 12 1916

Esta 1884

HERE THIS WEEK WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

GERALDINE FARRAR

Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Quixote," which will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its final concert of the season at the Lyric next Wednesday night, is the least familiar of all the works of its iconoclastic composer.

It has never been performed in Baltimore, and the fact that Dr. Muck has included it in his program has stirred the interest of local music-lovers to an unusual degree. Schoenberg's "Kammersymphonie" could hardly be anticipated with greater anxiety.

The concert will be further notable for the appearance of Geraldine Farrar, who has never been heard here as an orchestral soloist. Several times she was announced to sing at such affairs, but illness compelled her to cancel the engagements.

Dr. Muck will open the Wednesday night program with Beethoven's early Symphony No. 2 in D major. Mme. Farrar sings "Elsa's Dream" Mme. Farrar singe "Elsa's Dream" from "Lohengrin," and the concert will be closed with the overture from "Tannhauser," which will be preceded by a soprano aria from Berlioz's "La Damnation de Faust."

From NEWS
Address Provid
Date MAR 4 - 1916

Established:

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The musical season of 1915-16 is rapidly nearing its end. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is giving the last but one of its Providence Concerts in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, March 7th, and a month later it will make its final appearance of the season here.

For the coming concert Dr. Muck has confined his program to familiar works although the symphony, Beethoven's Second in D-Major, has not been played in Providence many times. This symphony is not only interesting from its musical content, but from its historical position. It marks, so to say, the end of the path followed by the young Beethoven. This path had been marked out in rigid lines by Mozart and Haydn and Beethoven was the first to turn aside from it and follow the bent of his own genius.

This Second Symphony in D-Major is cast in rigid mold established principally by Haydn for symphonic form, but one finds in the music itself many indications of the master mind which was to break down the precedents and bring quite new elements into the art of music in the "Eroica" Symphony which follows the Second. The composer in the D-Major Symphony follows the letter of the law but the spirit is his own. It is a work full of melody and shows the composer full of the joyousness of youth.

The three works on the second part of the program are very familiar. The Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" remains today as the day it was written, one of the finest works in its form in the literature of music. Wagner always reached the highest point of his imagination and skill when he was depicting Nature in her varied moods. Many composers have been impelled to paint the sea in tone, but none brings it so vividly to the mind as this "Flying Dutchman" Overture of Richard Wagner.

The final number on the program is the best and most popular of Liszt's symphonic poems, "Les Precludes" which contains all the finest qualities of Liszt's genius. The soloist, as already announced will be Ernest Schelling. Mr. Schelling is a native of New Jersey but a considerable part of his life has been spent abroad. He has the distinction of being one of the very few pupils of Paderewski and there is much similarity between the playing of these two pianists. Mr. Schelling is not only completely the master of the technique of his instrument, but his playing is notable for its poetic beauty and imagination. Schumann's Concerto in A—Minor which he plays, while anything but a "show" piece, tries the skill of the pianist to the utmost. Rhythmically it is full of passages to trip up the performer The program in its proper order is as follows:

Beethoven, Symphony in D-Major No. 2.
Wagner, Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."
Schumann, Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A-Minor.
Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

From Bulletin
Address
Date Prov MAR 191

Establi 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES PROGRAMME OF OLD FAVORITE

Ernest Schelling, American Pup of Paderewski, Soloist at In fantry Hall in Piano Selection: Dr. Muck Unable to Conduc Because of Illness.

For its fifth concert of its 35th seaso the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a agreeable programme of old favorites i Infantry Hall last evening, presenting fo its soloist, Ernest Schelling, pianist, native of this country, who has the distinction of being one of the few pupil of Paderewski.

The programme was given in the following order:

Beethoven..Symphony in D-major, No. 2, Op. 3
- I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.
- II. Larghetto.
- III. Scherzo: Allegro; Trio.
- IV. Allegro molto.

Wagner....Overture to "The Flying Dutchman'
Schumann ....Concerto in A-minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 5
- I. Allegro affettuoso.
- II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso
- III. Allegro vivace.

Liszt....Symphonic Poem No. 3, "Les Preludes' (after Lamartine

After the members of the orchestra were in their seats, likewise those in the audience who arrived before the doors were closed, announcement was made that, owing to the illness of Dr. Muck his place would be taken for his second annual absence, as for his first, by Mr. Schmidt.

SECOND SYMPHONY GIVEN.

The Second Symphony, which has been less often heard here than some of the later, more romantic symphonies of Beethoven, came in a measure as a novelty, after a period of some 10 years, its classical outline and beauty of development affording much pleasure as it was presented, the joyous music almost tempting one to doubt the composer's own statement of his unhappiness when it was written.

In his reading, Mr. Schmidt made a more convincing impression than upon his first appearance. The symphony is especially interesting in its construction, as like the first it shows the classical influence of Haydn and Mozart, before Beethoven, by his third symphony, the "Eroica," established the Romantic School, and the strict sonata form of the first movement is fascinating in its working out. The stately passage of the Larghetto, contrasted with the livelier scherzo and finale, were beautiful in harmony, and it was good to be reminded of its almost forgotten charm.

Of the other orchestral numbers, Wagner's "Overture to the Flying Dutchman," given here some half-dozen years ago, was played with considerable force and fire, while Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," formed a fitting climax to the music of the evening.

Between these two came the lovely concerto in A-minor, by Schumann, the apostle of the Romantic school, which is by many considered the most beautiful concerto ever written for the piano, and which is alike the terror of orchestras and the joy of pianists who understand Schumann, and possess a technique of sufficient finish to interpret him.

INDIVIDUALITY SHOWN.

Mr. Schelling is a pianist of maturity, and he played the concerto with marked individuality, masterly technical skill, and a beautiful quality of tone, particularly in his legato passages. So well was his performance received that the pianist was applauded to the echo, and the audience seemed loth to let him go.

While in such a programme so presented there is nothing at which to cavil, one feels impelled to ask why, among so many old orchestral favorites, one novelty might not have been provided like Mr. Schelling's own "Impressions (from an Artist's Life) in Form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte?" Just because Boston failed to appreciate its felicity and frivolity is no reason that [illegible] should not be given a chance to show its sense of humor. In a season when pianists have come among us as thick as bees, when younger composers like Grainger and Ornstein have been acclaimed, (and with Paderewski coming fast on his heels,) Mr. Schelling might have given us an opportunity to hear him in his own work, instead of in measures that we know by heart.

While on this subject it seems timely to ask when we are to hear Carpenter's much-talked-of suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator." Boston is said not to have received that with enthusiasm either, but since New York and Chicago did, why may we not have a chance to decide for ourselves?

In the long run most of us come back to the old and tried friends in music as in life, but in both it is well occasionally to make a new friend. Beethoven symphonies, Wagner overtures and symphonic poems invented by Liszt we have had many times and oft. And it must be acknowledged that we like them probably better than most music in reality. But a steady diet is apt to pall, and while it must also be acknowledged that we have heretofore taken the musical fare which Dr. Muck has provided in good part, appreciating his selection and presentation, to let a pianist and composer come to us and play, no matter how well, such an old standby as the Schumann sonata, with such a novelty as his own "Variations" up his sleeve, so to speak, is enough to make the worm turn.

Many had hoped for the deferred "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage" of Mendelssohn, promised for an earlier concert, of which the Boston performance was so extolled by the critics: but when Mr. Schmidt appeared, the reason for its non-appearance, and for the programme of well-worn favorites was apparent.

At the final concert a Wagner programme will be given "by request." No announcement is made of a soloist at the concert which will be given on Tuesday evening, April 11.

A. W. C.

---

n BULLETIN
ess: Philadelphia, Pa.
AR 1 4 1916

84

Boston Symphony

al Concert of Season With Geraldine Farrar as Soloist

E Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and last concert of its -fifth season in Philadelphia, before sual large audience at the Academy sic last evening, when Geraldine appeared as the soloist of a pro which included Beethoven's second symphony, in D major, and the "Don Quixote" of Richard Strauss, as the principal orchestral numbers, the "Tannhauser" overture of Wagner coming as a fitting climax at the close.

The symphony came at the opening and constituted the first part of the program, and its classic beauty, direct, sincere and inspiring in all its effects, created an atmosphere of melodious joy that was not wholly dispelled by the modern eccentricities of Strauss, in the second part, after Miss (or "Mme." as she is now programmed, since she has become the wife of Lou Tellegen) Farrar had sung her first number. Dr. Muck was characteristically sedate and self-effacing in his reading of the work, but as ever held the skilled musicians so firmly in hand that the absorbed listener forgot conductor and men in the pure joy of listening to the music.

The Strauss composition was played here by the Boston Symphony several years ago, and perhaps there were persons in last night's audience, who, having heard it then, were glad to hear it again. The music shows the skill, the imagination and the daring of its composer, who at least has the courage of his convictions and does not hesitate to do what he pleases with all the instruments of the complete orchestra—and then some. In tonally illustrating the adventures of the romance-crazed hero of the tale by Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra, Strauss takes advantage of several of the most striking episodes as an opportunity to produce some of the most bizarre effects known to modern instrumentation. The scene with the windmills, the ride through the air on the wooden horse, the upsetting of the boat, the battle with the bleating sheep, these bring forth queer sounds and ear-splitting discords which at times last evening caused the audience to smile, even to laugh. But just when the conglomeration of unusual sounds seems to be almost too much, relief comes in some of the passages of simple melodious beauty which Strauss so well knows how to write. Thus, in depicting the fair Dulcinea, in the entrance of the penitent pilgrims, the barcarolle, and, at the end, the death of Don Quixote, who, bereft of his romantic fancies, and realizing that they were but as smoke and vanity, is content to die, there is some rich harmonization and charming melodization. The interpretation was deft and skilful throughout, the orchestra as a whole fulfilling expertly every intricate demand of the score, while the two solo instruments, the 'cello, representing Don Quixote, and the viola, as his faithful Sancho, were played respectively in an admirable manner by H. Warnke and E. Ferir.

Miss (or "Mme.") Farrar looked her prettiest in an elaborate gown of silver and white, with a cloud of white tulle thrown about her otherwise uncovered shoulders, and her singing evidently gave great pleasure to the majority of persons in the audience. She was cordially received and repeatedly recalled after both of her numbers. Shes ang first "Elsa's Dream," from "Lohengrin," giving this well-known Wagner aria with a manner of vision-seeing ecstacy that was appropriate and effective, and later the aria "D'amour l'ardente flamme," from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." It was in her use of the mezzo voce, in those passages where the mellow sweetness of her pure soprano was advantageously displayed, that she was at her best. There were sympathy and dramatic feeling in all that she did, but in some of the points of climax, in the use of the full tone, particularly on the high notes, there was so much of the "reed," and such a near approach to the forced and the strident, that the result was neither altogether artistic nor wholly agreeable. Farrar's voice, in fact, while it never has been sweeter in some respects, in others seems to have lost some of its power to charm.

ELOPE IN SPITE OF VIGILANCE

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 12 1916

Establis

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final appearance of the season in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening with Geraldine Farrar as soloist. Mme. Farrar will sing two numbers. The first will be "Elsa's Dream," from "Lohengrin." The second will be the lovely air of Marguerite from the third part of Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," the first words of which are, "D'amour l'ardente flamme." Other numbers on the program are: Beethoven, Symphony No. 2 in D major; Strauss' "Don Quixote"; Wagner, overture to "Tannhauser."

* * *

One of the important local musical events of the early spring is the joint recital of Hans Kindler, violoncellist, and Ellis Clark Hammann, pianist, to be given in Witherspoon Hall next Wednesday evening. The affair is given under the management of the Smit Musical Bureau, and will enjoy distinguished patronage. The program follows:

1. Sonate op. 69, in A major (piano and cello) Beethoven
   Allegro, ma non tanto
   Scherzo. Allegro molto
   Adagio Cantabile
   Allegro Vivace
   Mr. Hammann and Mr. Kindler
2. Pastorale.................... Scarlatti-Tausig
   Novelette No. 4, in D major........Schumann
   Nocturne F sharp
   Ballade in A flat ....Chopin
   Mr. Hammann
3. (a) Largo ....Chopin
   (b) Ritornell ....Sinding
   (c) Scherzo-Caprice ....Zeckwer
   Mr. Kindler
4. Variations Symphoniques (cello and piano), Boellmann
   Mr. Kindler and Mr. Hammann

* * *

The second and last recital of the season by Fritz Kreisler will be given in the Academy of Music Tuesday afternoon, March 21, at 3 o'clock. Mr. Kreisler will be assisted, as in the past, by Carl Lamson, accompanist. His program follows:

1. (a) Suite in E minor.........................Bach
   (b) Sarabande and Allegretto.........Corelli
   (c) Prelude and Allegro...............Pugnani
2. Concerto No. 2, F sharp minor...Vieuxtemps
3. (a) Romance in A major...........Schumann
   (b) Larghetto ....Weber
   (c) Moment Musical...................Schubert
   (d) Rondo in G major..................Mozart
4. (a) "Wienerisch" ....Godowsky
   (b) Rondino (on a theme by Beethoven).
   (c) Wiegenlied ....Kreisler
   (d) Slavonic Fantasy.........Dvorak-Kreisler

* * *

Gabrilowitsch, the eminent pianist

PHOTO AIME DUPONT

GERALDINE FARRAR, SOPRANO WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 19

Estab 84

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final appearance of the season in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, with Geraldine Farrar as soloist. The outstanding orchestral number on the program will be Richard Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Quixote," probably the least known of Strauss's later orchestral works, this notwithstanding the fact that it contains some of his most beautiful music.

Mme. Farrar will sing two numbers—"Elsa's Dream," from the first act of "Lohengrin," and the lovely air of Marguerite, from the third part of Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," the first words of which are "D'amour l'ardente flamme."

Beethoven's second symphony will open the program, and the familiar "Tannhauser" overture will bring it to a close.

[119]

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 1 2 1916

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final appearance of the season in the Academy of Music tomorrow (Monday) evening at 8:15. The concert promises to end a brilliant season in a most brilliant manner. The soloist will be Mme. Geraldine Farrar.

The outstanding orchestral number on the program will be Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Don Quixote." "Don Quixote—Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character" is the least known of Strauss' later orchestral works, this notwithstanding the fact that it contains some of the most beautiful music that ever sprang from his fertile fancy and in orchestral construction rises to a point of almost uncanny ingenuity.

In the Tone Poem, Strauss carries the "Melancholy Don" through various of his adventures. Parts of it are program music raised to the nth degree as, for example, when the ardent knight throws himself into battle with a flock of sheep and, again, when he struggles manfully against the windmills. From the purely technical point of view, it presents greater difficulties than any of the other poems, not even excluding the "Domestica" and "Ein Heldenleben." The beauty of the music in the parts that describe the Don's conversation with Sancho Panza, the vigil which the good knight keeps, and his death, rises to exquisite heights.

Photograph by Aime Dupont

GERALDINE FARRAR

Mme. Farrar will sing two numbers. The first will be "Elsa's Dream," from the first act of "Lohengrin." The second will be the lovely air of Marguerite, from the third part of Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," the first words of which are, "D'amour l'ardente flamme."

The program in its entirety is as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D major......Beethoven
"Elsa's Dream," from "Lohengrin"..Wagner
"Don Quixote"......................Strauss
"D'amour l'ardente Flamme," from
"La Damnation de Faust"......Berlioz
Overture to "Tannheuser"...........Wagner
Soloist, Mme Geraldine Farrar.

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date
Established:

FARRAR IS COMING

Prima Donna Startled Metropolitan Patrons.

With Boston Symphony Next Wednesday; In Lohengrin Number.

Mme. Geraldine Farrar will make her first Baltimore appearance since she became Mrs. Lou-Tellegen at the Lyric next Wednesday night, when she will be the soloist at the last Boston Symphony Concert of the season.

Farrar, for the first time in her life, is now designated by her press representatives as "Mme." Heretofore she was Miss Farrar or simply Farrar.

Nobody before the public manages to keep more securely in that position than this American girl, who has had such a remarkable career. Everything she does and says is worth reams of space and her recent temperamental gyrations at the Metropolitan Opera, when she returned to sing "Carmen," proved to be worth almost as much to the papers as a rapid-fire, death-dealing Billy Sunday sermon.

Miss Farrar's first repetition of "Carmen" almost resulted in a "ruction." It was said, indeed, that she and Caruso had engaged in a verbal passage at arms as a result of a terrific super-Carmenesque whack delivered on the fair cheek of the majestic tenor.

This was denied and things were reported to be—as everyone knows they always are at the Metropolitan—as sweet and harmonious as possible.

Result of it all: When Mme. Farrar appeared for her second Carmen of the year, the house was packed to the doors and people were turned away.

When she sings with the Boston Orchestra here she will present an aria from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" and "Elsa's Dream" from "Lohengrin."

The principal feature of the orchestral program will be Strauss' tone poem, "Don Quichotte" which has as a sub-title, by way of description, "Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character."

This has been but seldom performed in this country and has never been heard in Baltimore. It is said to out-domestic the "Domestica" Symphony, so far as harmonic iconoclasm is concerned.

It is program music with a vengeance. One hears among other things the bleating of sheep in it as the Knight of the Doleful Countenance faces them in battle, and the wings of the windmills creak and groan portentiously while that memorable affray is in progress.

The other orchestral number will be the "Tannhauser" Overture.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 1 2 1916
Established: Lo

MUSIC OF THE WE

Monday Evening.
Boston Symphony Orchestra—Academy of Music.

Tuesday Evening.
"Haensel and Gretel" and "Pagliacci"—Metroplitan Opera House.

Wednesday Evening.
Kindler-Hammann Recital—Witherspoon Hall.

Thursday Evening.
Herman Sandby Farewell Recital—Witherspoon Hall.
Frankford Symphony Society Concert—Frankford.

Friday Afternoon.
Philadelphia Orchestra—Academy of Music.

Saturday Evening.
Philadelphia Orchestra—Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final appearance of the season in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, at 8.15. The concert promises to end a brilliant season in a most brilliant manner. The soloist will be Mme. Geraldine Farrar.

The outstanding orchestral number on the program will be Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Don Quixote." "Don Quixote—Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character," is the least known of Strauss' later orchestral works, this notwithstanding the fact that it contains some of the most beautiful music that ever sprang from his fertile fancy and in orchestral construction rises to a point of almost uncanny ingenuity.

In the Tone Poem, Strauss carries the "Melancholy Don" through various of his adventures, as for example, when the ardent knight throws himself ito battle with a flock of sheep and, again, when he struggles manfully against the wind mills.

Mme. Farrar will sing two numbers. The first will be "Elsa's Dream," from the first act of "Lohengrin." The second will be the lovely air of Marguerite from the third part of Berloiz's "The Damnation of Faust," the first words of which are, "D'amour l'ardente flamme."

The program in its entirety is as follows:—

Beethoven........Symphony No. 2 in D major
Wagner...."Elsa's Dream," from "Lohengrin"
Strauss..........................."Don Quixote"
Berloiz....."D'amour l'ardente flamme," from
"La Damnation de Faust"
Wagner...........Overture to "Tannhauser"
Soloist, Mme. Geraldine Farrar.

* * *

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 1 4 1916
Establish

CONTRASTS PRESENTED BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Ludicrous Adventures of Don Quixote, Then Marguerite's Love Song

MME. FARRAR SOLOIST

BOSTON Symphony players last night gave their audience at the Academy of Music a varied and interesting program extending from the sublimity of Geraldine Farrar's rendi-

[120]

From H
Address: New York City

"D'amour l'ardente flamme" of Berlioz, to the ludicrous orchestral translation of Don Quixote's adventures by Richard Strauss.

There was something almost too extreme in the contrast. While the audience appreciated to the fullest extent the masterful interpretation of the Strauss music, while it followed with keen interest the windmill music and traipsed with the eccentric knight through the mazes of weird sounds, that in spite of their conglomerateness produce an unpleasant sort of harmony, it drew a sigh of relief at Don Quixote's peaceful deathbed, and turned with joy to the rapture of Marguerite's love song.

Geraldine Farrar's appearance provoked tremendous applause, and after her first solo—Elsa's Dream from Lohengrin, she was recalled for half a dozen encores, which she took with smiling grace.

The orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, gave with notable effect Beethoven's symphony in D major, and Wagner's overture to Tannhauser. The symphony was played with the seasoned skill and the wonderful accord which has gained the Boston orchestra its far-reaching fame. The Tannhauser number came as a familiar musical friend after the strange experience of the Strauss number, and left the audience breathless with admiration and steeped in the wonder of its forceful beauty.

From ENQUIRER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR [illegible] 1916
Establisl

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final appearance of the season in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening at 8.15. The concert promises to end a brilliant season in a most brilliant manner. The soloist will be M Geraldine Farrar.

The outstanding orchestral number the programme will be Richard Stra tone poem, "Don Quixote." "I Quixote—Fantastic Variations on Theme of Knightly Character," is least known of Strauss' later orchest works, this notwithstanding the fact th it contains some of the most beauti music that ever sprang from his fert fancy and in orchestral constructi rises to a point of almost uncanny i genuity.

In the tone poem Strauss carries tl "Melancholy Don" through various his adventures. Parts of it are pr gramme music raised to the nth degre as, for example, when the ardent knigh throws himself in battle with a flock sheep and, again, when he struggles manfully against the windmills. From the purely technical point of view, it presents greater difficulties than any of the other poems, not even excluding the "Domestica" and "Ein Heldenleben." The beauty of the music in the parts which describe the Don's conversation with Sancho Panzo, the vigil which the good knight keeps and his death rises to exquisite heights.

Mme. Farrar will sing two numbers. The first will be "Elsa's Dream," from the first act of "Lohengrin." The second will be the lovely air of Marguerite from the third part of Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," the first words of which are, "D'amour Pardente flamme."

The programme in its entirety is as follows:

Beethoven........Symphony, No. 2, in D major
Wagner......."Elsa's Dream" from Lohengrin
Strauss........................"Don Quixote"
Berlioz—"D'amour l'ardente flamme," from "La
Damnation de Faust."
Wagner..........Overture to "Tannhaeuser"
Soloist, Mme. Geraldine Farrar.

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR [illegible] 1916
Establis

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Its Last Concert for the Season at the Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening when the presence of Geraldine Farrar as assisting artist added eclat to the occasion and when the programme comprised Strauss' "Don Quixote," the "Tannhauser" overture and Beethoven's early symphony in D Major No. 2. The latter work, which is in Beethoven's first manner, having been composed while he was still under the predominant influence of Mozart, was played by the Philadelphia Orchestra a few weeks ago and as the Boston organization makes only a few local visits one could have wished that Dr. Muck had made some other selection.

34

However, the D Major is not so often heard as to render its repetition satiating and it contains so much that is interesting and beautiful—its slow movement is one of Beethoven's best—that its performance by the Boston men last night with such an admirable quality of tone, with such a pellucid transparency of analysis, with so much finish and refinement and expression, was greatly enjoyed. Dr. Muck certainly did not permit any of its significance or a jot of its value to escape him. The other things in their different way were equally interesting. Richard Strauss' tone poem, with its extraordinary instrumentation, furnished the orchestra with a fine opportunity for the display of its virtuosity and it is impossible to imagine how the familiar "Tannhauser" overture could be better done.

Mme. Farrar's numbers were "Elsa's Dream" and the song "D'amour l'ardente flamme" from Berlioz' "Damnation de Faust." While at the first her voice showed some traces of her recent sickness it soon regained its normal strength and volume and the applause which her singing elicited was hearty and sincere. It was also well deserved. Music lovers will regret the close of the season which last night's concert completed.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 1 4 1916
Establis

FARRAR, STRAUSS AND MUCK

Singer, Composer and Conductor of Last Boston Concert.

If smiles were coins, Mme. Geraldine Farrar-Tellegen would be bankrupt. The American prima donna, dental but mental, distributed curtsies and bows to her admirers in the Academy of Music last night, the occasion being the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the current season. The singer, whose two airs were "Elsa's Dream," from "Lohengrin," and the entertainingly florid "D'Amour l'ardente flamme," from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," shared honors with Dr. Muck and Richard Strauss. The conductor had never been more true to his individuality, and was correspondingly interesting; the latter received representation through a clever performance of his amusing and photographic suite, "Don Quixote."

For the absolutists there was Beethoven, the Second Symphony. Was it a mere coincidence that the same symphony had been played by Mr. Damrosch earlier in the year? some must have asked themselves. If Dr. Muck were not a superlative artist one might suspect that a disingenuousness so sustained grazed perversity. However, this work, so curiously mingling Haydn with the later Beethoven, so like a placid, dulcet nursery, with a giant's shadow on the wall, was played with a fine clarity, a cleanness of outline, quite admirable.

Mme. Farrar-Tellegen, in silver and white, sang with the brook-cold, boylike shrillnesses that are her custom. She deftly blended the operatic with the recital mood. For finale, Dr. Muck conducted his great band in the overture to "Tannhaeuser." Dr. Muck is not a romantic, so the overture was not glamorous. But he does nothing painfully ill.

Evening
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 1 4 1916
Establish

SDAY, MARCH 1

DR. MUCK CONDUCTS IN FINAL CONCERT

Miss Geraldine Farrar Coolly Received by Academy Audience

The 31st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia was brought to a close last night, when Doctor Muck conducted at the Academy a concert devoted to Beethoven, Wagner, Berlioz and Strauss. There was only the normal demonstration.

It is unnecessary, in the case of the Boston Symphony, to undertake an analysis of the year's achievement, because from year to year, and especially in these seasons of Doctor Muck's directorate, the organization and its accomplishments vary unappreciably. This year, if one is to speak of the five concerts at all, one may question the wisdom of all the programs. Debussy, Schnelling and Strauss were the composers called upon to atone for a year of familiar and not always great works. Doctor Muck has some reason to believe that his orchestra throws strange new lights upon familiar things and that perfection of tonal production makes any music great. He is by way of being right, and yet——

Last night for variety there was little brilliance in the performance of the Beethoven symphony. Notably in the first movement one missed the beautiful soft precision of tone in the separate choirs which one had every reason to expect. Later there was exquisite grace, beautiful exercises in sudden yet shaded crescendos and the singing of the string choir in all its wonted mellowness and beauty. In Strauss and in the "Tannhaeuser" overture there was no room for caviling in the work of the orchestra. Doctor Muck's mathematical interpretation of the latter may be a work of sarcasm; but it is hard to see why, if he doesn't care for it more, Doctor Muck chooses to play it.

The "Don Quixote," with two masterly solo instruments played by Messrs Warnke and Ferir, was in many ways the most satisfying part of the program. Doctor Muck could interpret and release the spavined idealism of the mad knight as surely as his orchestra could represent the swirling dust-clouds that rose over the baaing sheep in a great rout. Fantasy has not been too often credited to Doctor Muck; last night fantasy was blended with cardonic humor, with a pathos which almost persuaded us that it was not shameful to die in futile defense of an unknown beauty. To distinguish between Strauss and his interpreter would be a fine exercise of the wit, but it is not necessary. Because Doctor Muck, in his versatility of mind and his extraordinary, secretive and profound impulses of the spirit, is a great genius.

Miss Geraldine Farrar was the assisting artist at the concert. She sang Elsa's Dream from "Lohengrin," and from her ancient repertoire, an aria of Marguerite from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." For the former she received moderate approval; for the latter, very little, indeed. Her voice lacked the quality which once it had, that of a bird poised on wing, incorporeal and motionless. In 1886 Mme. Lilli Lehmann, a teacher of Miss Farrar, sang the second of the two arias mentioned in a concert of the Boston Symphony. But the teacher never enjoyed the complete benefits of Americanization as the pupil has enjoyed them. The singing of operatic selections with a symphony orchestra is always a questionable procedure. Miss Farrar's attempt to justify the intrusion by dramatic expressions of a very high order was more interesting than satisfying.

rom PUBLIC LEDGER
ddress: Philadelphia, Pa.
ate MAR 12 1916

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final appearance of the season in the Academy of Music tomorrow (Monday) evening at 8:15. The concert promises to end a brilliant season in a most brilliant manner. The soloist will be Mme. Geraldine Farrar.

The outstanding orchestral number on the program will be Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Don Quixote." "Don Quixote—Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character" is the least known of Strauss' later orchestral works, this notwithstanding the fact that it contains some of the most beautiful music that ever sprang from his fertile fancy and in orchestral construction rises to a point of almost uncanny ingenuity.

In the Tone Poem, Strauss carries the "Melancholy Don" through various of his adventures. Parts of it are program music raised to the nth degree as, for example, when the ardent knight throws himself into battle with a flock of sheep and, again, when he struggles manfully against the windmills. From the purely technical point of view, it presents greater difficulties than any of the other poems, not even excluding the "Domestica" and "Ein Heldenleben." The beauty of the music in the parts that describe the Don's conversation with Sancho Panza, the vigil which the good knight keeps, and his death, rises to exquisite heights.

Photograph by Aime Dupont

GERALDINE FARRAR

Mme. Farrar will sing two numbers. The first will be "Elsa's Dream," from the first act of "Lohengrin." The second will be the lovely air of Marguerite, from the third part of Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," the first words of which are, "D'amour l'ardente flamme."

The program in its entirety is as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D major......Beethoven
"Elsa's Dream," from "Lohengrin"..Wagner
"Don Quixote"......................Strauss
"D'amour l'ardente Flamme," from
"La Damnation de Faust"......Berlioz
Overture to "Tannheuser"..........Wagner
Soloist, Mme Geraldine Farrar.

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date
Established:

FARRAR IS COMING

Prima Donna Startled Metropolitan Patrons.

With Boston Symphony Next Wednesday; In Lohengrin Number.

Mme. Geraldine Farrar will make her first Baltimore appearance since she became Mrs. Lou-Tellegen at the Lyric next Wednesday night, when she will be the soloist at the last Boston Symphony Concert of the season.

Farrar, for the first time in her life, is now designated by her press representatives as "Mme." Heretofore she was Miss Farrar or simply Farrar.

Nobody before the public manages to keep more securely in that position than this American girl, who has had such a remarkable career. Everything she does and says is worth reams of space and her recent temperamental gyrations at the Metropolitan Opera, when she returned to sing "Carmen," proved to be worth almost as much to the papers as a rapid-fire, death-dealing Billy Sunda[illegible]

Miss Farrar's first repetition of "Carmen" almost resulted in a "ruction." It was said, indeed, that she and Caruso had engaged in a verbal passage at arms as a result of a terrific super-Carmenesque whack delivered on the fair cheek of the majestic tenor.

This was denied and things were reported to be—as everyone knows they always are at the Metropolitan—as sweet and harmonious as possible.

Result of it all: When Mme. Farrar appeared for her second Carmen of the year, the house was packed to the doors and people were turned away.

When she sings with the Boston Orchestra here she will present an aria from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" and "Elsa's Dream" from "Lohengrin."

The principal feature of the orchestral program will be Strauss' tone poem, "Don Quichotte" which has as a sub-title, by way of description, "Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character."

This has been but seldom performed in this country and has never been heard in Baltimore. It is said to out-domestic the "Domestica" Symphony, so far as harmonic iconoclasm is concerned.

It is program music with a vengeance. One hears among other things the bleating of sheep in it as the Knight of the Doleful Countenance faces them in battle, and the wings of the windmills creak and groan portentiously while that memorable affray is in progress.

The other orchestral number will be the "Tannhauser" Overture.

---

rom PRESS
ddress: Philadelphia, Pa.
ate MAR 12 1916

MUSIC OF THE WEEK

Monday Evening.
Boston Symphony Orchestra—Academy of Music.

Tuesday Evening.
"Haensel and Gretel" and "Pagliacci"—Metroplitan Opera House.

Wednesday Evening.
Kindler-Hammann Recital—Witherspoon Hall.

Thursday Evening.
Herman Sandby Farewell Recital—Witherspoon Hall.
Frankford Symphony Society Concert—Frankford.

Friday Afternoon.
Philadelphia Orchestra—Academy of Music.

Saturday Evening.
Philadelphia Orchestra—Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final appearance of the season in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, at 8.15. The concert promises to end a brilliant season in a most brilliant manner. The soloist will be Mme. Geraldine Farrar.

The outstanding orchestral number on the program will be Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Don Quixote." "Don Quixote—Fantastic Variations ~~on~~ a Theme of Knightly Character," is the least known of Strauss' later orchestral works, this notwithstanding the fact that it contains some of the most beautiful music that ever sprang from his fertile fancy and in orchestral construction rises to a point of almost uncanny ingenuity.

In the Tone Poem, Strauss carries the "Melancholy Don" through various of his adventures, as for example, when the ardent knight throws himself ito battle with a flock of sheep and, again, when he struggles manfully against the wind mills.

Mme. Farrar will sing two numbers. The first will be "Elsa's Dream," from the first act of "Lohengrin." The second will be the lovely air of Marguerite from the third part of Berloiz's "The Damnation of Faust," the first words of which are, "D'amour l'ardente flamme."

The program in its entirety is as follows:—

Beethoven........Symphony No. 2 in D major
Wagner....."Elsa's Dream," from "Lohengrin"
Strauss..........................."Don Quixote"
Berloiz....."D'amour l'ardente flamme," from
"La Damnation de Faust"
Wagner............Overture to "Tannhauser"
Soloist, Mme. Geraldine Farrar.

* * *

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 14 1916
Establish

CONTRASTS PRESENTED BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Ludicrous Adventures of Don Quixote, Then Marguerite's Love Song

MME. FARRAR SOLOIST

BOSTON Symphony players last night gave their audience at the Academy of Music a varied and interesting program extending from the sublimity of Geraldine Farrar's rendition [illegible]

[120]

From H[illegible]
Address: New York City

[illegible] l'ardente flamme" of Berlios, to the ludicrous orchestral translation of Don Quixote's adventures by Richard Strauss.

There was something almost too extreme in the contrast. While the audience appreciated to the fullest extent the masterful interpretation of the Strauss music, while it followed with keen interest the windmill music and traipsed with the eccentric knight through the mazes of weird sounds, that in spite of their conglomerateness produce an unpleasant sort of harmony, it drew a sigh of relief at Don Quixote's peaceful deathbed, and turned with joy to the rapture of Marguerite's love song.

Geraldine Farrar's appearance provoked tremendous applause, and after her first solo—Elsa's Dream from Lohengrin, she was recalled for half a dozen encores, which she took with smiling grace.

The orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, gave with notable effect Beethoven's symphony in D major, and Wagner's overture to Tannhauser. The symphony was played with the seasoned skill and the wonderful accord which has gained the Boston orchestra its far-reaching fame. The Tannhauser number came as a familiar musical friend after the strange experience of the Strauss number, and left the audience breathless with admiration and steeped in the wonder of its forceful beauty.

From ENQUIRER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 12 1916

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final appearance of the season in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening at 8.15. The concert promises to end a brilliant season in a most brilliant manner. The soloist will be Mme. Geraldine Farrar.

The outstanding orchestral number on the programme will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Quixote." "Don Quixote—Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character," is the least known of Strauss' later orchestral works, this notwithstanding the fact that it contains some of the most beautiful music that ever sprang from his fertile fancy and in orchestral construction rises to a point of almost uncanny ingenuity.

In the tone poem Strauss carries the "Melancholy Don" through various of his adventures. Parts of it are programme music raised to the nth degree, as, for example, when the ardent knight throws himself in battle with a flock of sheep and, again, when he struggles manfully against the windmills. From the purely technical point of view, it presents greater difficulties than any of the other poems, not even excluding the "Domestica" and "Ein Heldenleben." The beauty of the music in the parts which describe the Don's conversation with Sancho Panzo, the vigil which the good knight keeps and his death rises to exquisite heights.

Mme. Farrar will sing two numbers. The first will be "Elsa's Dream," from the first act of "Lohengrin." The second will be the lovely air of Marguerite from the third part of Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," the first words of which are, "D'amour l'ardente flamme."

The programme in its entirety is as follows:

Beethoven........Symphony, No. 2, in D major
Wagner......."Elsa's Dream" from Lohengrin
Strauss..........................."Don Quixote"
Berlioz—"D'amour l'ardente flamme," from "La Damnation de Faust."
Wagner...........Overture to "Tannhaeuser"
Soloist, Mme. Geraldine Farrar.

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 14 1916
Establis

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Its Last Concert for the Season at the Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening when the presence of Geraldine Farrar as assisting artist added eclat to the occasion and when the programme comprised Strauss' "Don Quixote," the "Tannhauser" overture and Beethoven's early symphony in D Major No. 2. The latter work, which is in Beethoven's first manner, having been composed while he was still under the predominant influence of Mozart, was played by the Philadelphia Orchestra a few weeks ago and as the Boston organization makes only a few local visits one could have wished that Dr. Muck had made some other selection. 84

However, the D Major is not so often heard as to render its repetition satiating and it contains so much that is interesting and beautiful—its slow movement is one of Beethoven's best—that its performance by the Boston men last night with such an admirable quality of tone, with such a pellucid transparency of analysis, with so much finish and refinement and expression, was greatly enjoyed. Dr. Muck certainly did not permit any of its significance or a jot of its value to escape him. The other things in their different way were equally interesting. Richard Strauss' tone poem, with its extraordinary instrumentation, furnished the orchestra with a fine opportunity for the display of its virtuosity and it is impossible to imagine how the familiar "Tannhauser" overture could be better done.

Mme. Farrar's numbers were "Elsa's Dream" and the song "D'amour l'ardente flamme" from Berlioz' "Damnation de Faust." While at the first her voice showed some traces of her recent sickness it soon regained its normal strength and volume and the applause which her singing elicited was hearty and sincere. It was also well deserved. Music lovers will regret the close of the season which last night's concert completed.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 14 1916
Establis

FARRAR, STRAUSS AND MUCK

Singer, Composer and Conductor of Last Boston Concert.

If smiles were coins, Mme. Geraldine Farrar-Tellegen would be bankrupt. The American prima donna, dental but mental, distributed curtsies and bows to her admirers in the Academy of Music last night, the occasion being the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the current season. The singer, whose two airs were "Elsa's Dream," from "Lohengrin," and the entertainingly florid "D'Amour l'ardente flamme," from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," shared honors with Dr. Muck and Richard Strauss. The conductor had never been more true to his individuality, and was correspondingly interesting; the latter received representation through a clever performance of his amusing and photographic suite, "Don Quixote."

For the absolutists there was Beethoven, the Second Symphony. Was it a mere coincidence that the same symphony had been played by Mr. Damrosch earlier in the year? some must have asked themselves. If Dr. Muck were not a superlative artist one might suspect that a disingenuousness so sustained grazed perversity. However, this work, so curiously mingling Haydn with the later Beethoven, so like a placid, dulcet nursery, with a giant's shadow on the wall, was played with a fine clarity, a cleanness of outline, quite admirable.

Mme. Farrar-Tellegen, in silver and white, sang with the brook-cold, boylike shrillnesses that are her custom. She deftly blended the operatic with the recital mood. For finale, Dr. Muck conducted his great band in the overture to "Tannhaeuser." Dr. Muck is not a romantic, so the overture was not glamorous. But he does nothing painfully ill.

Nor do Messrs. Warnke, 'cellist, and Ferir, violist, who sustained the burden of "Don Quixote." Their playing was lovely in the extreme, containing poise and character.

MUCK CONDUCTS IN FINAL CONCERT

Miss Geraldine Farrar Coolly Received by Academy Audience

The 31st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia was brought to a close last night, when Doctor Muck conducted at the Academy a concert devoted to Beethoven, Wagner, Berlioz and Strauss. There was only the normal demonstration.

It is unnecessary, in the case of the Boston Symphony, to undertake an analysis of the year's achievement, because from year to year, and especially in these seasons of Doctor Muck's directorate, the organization and its accomplishments vary unappreciably. This year, if one is to speak of the five concerts at all, one may question the wisdom of all the programs. Debussy, Schnelling and Strauss were the composers called upon to atone for a year of familiar and not always great works. Doctor Muck has some reason to believe that his orchestra throws strange new lights upon familiar things and that perfection of tonal production makes any music great. He is by way of being right, and yet——

Last night for variety there was little brilliance in the performance of the Beethoven symphony. Notably in the first movement one missed the beautiful soft precision of tone in the separate choirs which one had every reason to expect. Later there was exquisite grace, beautiful exercises in sudden yet shaded crescendos and the singing of the string choir in all its wonted mellowness and beauty. In Strauss and in the "Tannhaeuser" overture there was no room for caviling in the work of the orchestra. Doctor Muck's mathematical interpretation of the latter may be a work of sarcasm; but it is hard to see why, if he doesn't care for it more, Doctor Muck chooses to play it.

The "Don Quixote," with two masterly solo instruments played by Messrs Warnke and Ferir, was in many ways the most satisfying part of the program. Doctor Muck could interpret and release the spavined idealism of the mad knight as surely as his orchestra could represent the swirling dust-clouds that rose over the baaing sheep in a great rout. Fantasy has not been too often credited to Doctor Muck; last night fantasy was blended with cardonic humor, with a pathos which almost persuaded us that it was not shameful to die in futile defense of an unknown beauty. To distinguish between Strauss and his interpreter would be a fine exercise of the wit, but it is not necessary. Because Doctor Muck, in his versatility of mind and his extraordinary, secretive and profound impulses of the spirit, is a great genius.

Miss Geraldine Farrar was the assisting artist at the concert. She sang Elsa's Dream from "Lohengrin," and from her ancient repertoire, an aria of Marguerite from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." For the former she received moderate approval; for the latter, very little, indeed. Her voice lacked the quality which once it had, that of a bird poised on wing, incorporeal and motionless. In 1886 Mme. Lilli Lehmann, a teacher of Miss Farrar, sang the second of the two arias mentioned in a concert of the Boston Symphony. But the teacher never enjoyed the complete benefits of Americanization as the pupil has enjoyed them. The singing of operatic selections with a symphony orchestra is always a questionable procedure. Miss Farrar's attempt to justify the intrusion by dramatic expressions of a very high order was more interesting than satisfying [illegible]

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 14 1916

LAST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Miss Farrar the Soloist—Strauss' "Don Quixote" the Novelty of the Program.

Beethoven	Symphony in D major, No. 2, Op. 36.
Wagner	"Elsa's Dream" from "Lohengrin."
Strauss	"Don Quixote" (Introduction, Theme with Variations and Finale); Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Op. 35. (Violoncello solo, Mr. Warnke; Viola, Mr. Ferir.)
Berlioz	"D'amour l'ardente flamme" from "La Damnation de Faust."
Wagner	Overture to "Tannhauser"
Conductor	Dr. Carl Muck
Soloist	Geraldine Farrar

Dr. Muck gave Philadelphia a wonderful program for the closing concert of the season, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The music lovers appreciated that such would be the case and turned out in such numbers that the Academy of Music was filled to its uttermost. There was the usual Boston Symphony enthusiasm, not alone the substantial tribute to the orchestra, but to the charming soloist.

Geraldine Farrar was a lovely picture to look upon. Hers is a personality that attracts, and wins. It is her art, accompanied by her remarkable grace and poise, that stirred the audience more than they were stirred by any soloist at a concert this season. Her voice in its lower register is of that sweet and mellow character that penetrates and appeals, but in the upper register it is at times harsh and strained. Her selections last evening were not chosen with the best judgment, but her audience was delighted at the fine finish she gave to them, and in the end artistry triumphs over nature, if unaccompanied by it. Farrar's was a triumph, which must have been most gratifying to her.

The Symphony Well Played.

The opening number on the program was the Beethoven Symphony No. 2. It is a long work of flowing melody. In that is its charm. It never rises to any thrilling height, but if the audience is never strongly stirred, it is delighted just the same. Dr. Muck gave his usual careful reading of the work, and the musicians responded with that unison which is alone characteristic of the Boston Symphony.

The orchestral number that attracted the most attention was the Strauss "Don Quixote" variations on a theme. This is a fantastical composition which to understand thoroughly it is necessary to have a close insight into the semi-heroic character of the Cervantes hero. Only Strauss would be able to take up such a subject and handle it in a way to make every passage interesting and of a proper meaning.

Fantastical Strauss Number.

In order to carry out his musical fantastics, like in many other of his compositions, Strauss has contrived various combinations and odd attachments to get the desired effect, and to bring out completely all the ideas he has conceived it is necessary to screen off a small section of the stage to bring in the wind effect, the method of which is kept from the knowledge of the audience.

Every here and there Strauss introduces melody of the most charming character, which is given principally to the first 'cello and the first viola, these soli being played by Mr. Warnke and Mr. Ferir. Both soloists rose in their seats in response to the enthusiasm which followed the playing of is number. The only defect in the composition is its length, for the audience, before its conclusion, shows evidence of weariness at the severe strain on the ears at the long and harsh passages.

The concluding number was Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser," which was admirably presented.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 14 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Geraldine Farrar as Soloist Attracts Large Audience.

The fifth and final concert of the series given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurred last night in the Academy of Music. The house was crowded, the entire orchestra pit being filled. The program was one of unusual length and variety. Half the selections given would have made a more appropriate and enjoyable concert.

With Beethoven's D major symphony, the "Don Quixote" of Strauss, two operatic arias, sung by Geraldine Farrar, and the "Tannhaeuser" overture, it can readily be seen that even the most ardent admirer of the Boston Orchestra might experience some degree of fatigue. Nothing could be a greater foil to the dignity and beauty of the D major symphony than the absurdity of the tone picture "Don Quixote," nor could anything serve to increase one's love of Beethoven more firmly. The manipulation of the instruments in the Strauss work is a matter for al

---

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 14 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD WITH FARRAR

Last Concert Brings Forward Warnke's 'Cello in "Don Quixote"

PROGRAM.

Beethoven	Second Symphony
Wagner	"Elsa's Dream," from "Lohengrin"
Strauss	"Don Quixote," Variations
Berlioz	Aria from "La Damnation"
Wagner	"Tannhaeuser" Overture

The Boston Symphony gave the fifth and last of its season's concerts at the Academy of Music, last evening, under Dr. Karl Muck's leadership, for an audience to whom it evidently meant much to be present. To those in the topmost gallery, at least, the two and a half crowded hours of glorious musical life meant in most cases a chilly sidewalk vigil all afternoon long. They evidently felt well rewarded by a sumptuous repast of harmonies staid and serene in the classical opening of the program, profane and bizarre at times in the fantastic idiom of Strauss and his dear fool of a hero.

Geraldine Farrar was the soloist. Attired in a shimmering delicate filminess of white satin and chiffon, half the fun of hearing her sing was to watch her undulant exits and entrances. She bowed times without number to all points of the compass in answer to repeated recalls, and at the close of the aria of Elsa remained in a Cecilia-like attitude of entranced adoration—or she was like Boutet de Monvel's Jean D'Arc communing with a vision of the angels. In the text of Wagner, or in the air of Marguerite from "La Damnation de Faust," she was demurely spiritual—between whiles there was a fascinating suggestion of the tempestuous siren of the "movies."

Deprived of the operatic opportunities for action, the voice against the strong, sure background of the orchestra, had to stand on its own merits, and it can hardly be said that the singing, per se, was of the highest order. The charm of Miss Farrar's art scarcely lies in an equalized control of her several registers, as in Mary Garden's case, with its ensemble that appeals, the sta presence of a personality defiant o analysis. The English horn for the Berlioz air was beautifully played.

Every bow or instrumental voi was alive for the stirring Allegro for t first movement of the Beethoven sympho he Lorghetto, with its theme borrowe or a hymn-tune, was an inspired simp ; the Scherzo was interpreted in the of fairy mischief evident in its frolic design. Finally the tuba and atte brasses walked with a majestic st through the measures of the "Ta hauser" overture with a temperance a a balance in their exalted mood that co manded admiration.

But midway of the program was most picturesquely arresting instrument feature, in the extraordinary series of v riations written by Strauss round th teeming experience of Don Quixote. Th Boston Orchestra has played the wor here before, and last night the same solo ists were brought forward, with Heinrich Warnke's 'cello impersonating the Don and Emil Ferir's viola in the role of the smug materialist, Sancho Panza, the squire. Much music of melting eloquence is put down for the 'cello, with its peated little high-hearted ditty of cou plucked afresh from the dust of de and the intervals of grave rumination the meaning of life and ideals of ho and glory.

The audience laughed outright in delight over the verisimilitude of the creaking windmill-wings, that was heard in the sputter of the muted brasses, and the seventh variation of the Ride through the Air brought into play a wondrous apparatus (built behind a white screen in one corner) for the productic a mighty ululation of the wind, aro the wooden horse that never leaves the ground. The finale of the death of the knight was invested with its full pathetic value, and nothing in his life became him like the leaving it, in the beautiful final declension of the 'cello as it gave up the ghost with a gentle expiring sigh. Mr. Warnke's performance, technically excellent, read between the lines into the secondary meanings of the score; and Mr. Ferir's viola, though it did not have so much to say, was masterfully handled. The men of the orchestra were called to their feet, and Doctor Muck was brought back by the applause, in a reluctant leavetaking.

F. L.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

Spring is in the air on the heels of the blizzard, and Schumann's "Spring" symphony ended the Boston Symphony nights in Carnegie Hall last evening like a benediction. The scherzo won h e applause and the final allegro "gracious and animated" brought the band upstanding. You wondered what those dancing measures would do to a Pavlowa's tiptoes. Karl Muck p yed a Roman Cornelia role by exh g one of his own men as soloist, e will a pair of them to-morrow.

A solid vio t rather than a technical athlete ned to the hour, Anton Witek, di well with the little romance midw in Joachim's Hungarian concer But the forty minute labyrinthine k was far too long and Witek on lost its slender thread of melody nea he end, quickly recovering it fror he conductor's score. An opening ov ture, Beethoven's discarded "Leonore" No. 1, could well have been spared. The carriage crush was a record uptown.

To-night in Brooklyn the Hub players have a farewell with Tschaikowsky's Fourth symphony, Brahms's "Academic Festival," Volkmann's string serenade and Wagner's prelude to "Meistersinger." To-morrow Carnegie Hall hears the last of the orchestra's thirty-fifth season in Beethoven's Second symphony, Mozart's "Concertante Symphonie" for Witek and Ferir and the Brahms and Wagner bits repeated.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date

LONG VIOLIN CONCERTO BY BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Closing Concert of Musicians Here This Season Somewhat Marred by This Feature.

One-third of last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra programme in Carnegie Hall consisted of a violin concerto that must be classed as one of the dryest, dreariest and most uninteresting musical compositions the imagination can conceive.

Joseph Joachim, the great violinist, wrote it; Anton Witek, concertmeister of the Boston Symphony played it. And while the result was an amazing exhibition of Dr. Joachim's ability to write prodigiously for the technique at amazing length and to place the utmost mechanical demands upon the interpreter, the listener derived from the music no satisfaction.

The first "Leonore" overture by Beethoven constituted an auspicious beginning, and Schumann's B flat major symphony, his No. 1, served admirably to bring the programme to a close. But the Joachim number imposed a load too weighty for the others to successfully carry.

The audience was a large one. The concert was the last to be given here this season by the Boston men.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date MAR 17 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLOSES

Anton Witek Soloist at Last Appearance of Season.

To Anton Witek, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, fell the honor last night in Carnegie Hall of being the soloist of the last evening concert given by the visiting organization in New York this season, and more than honorably did he bear his responsibilities in Joachim's rarely heard Concerto (in the Hungarian manner), opus 11.

There are pages of real beauty in the work, particularly in the rhythmically vigorous and stirring "Finale alla Zingara"—and it must be conceded that the violinist would have searched in vain for a composition calculated to set off his virtuoso skill more convincingly. How many violinists are there, one wonders, even among those who appear frequently as soloists, who could accomplish what Witek did on this ocasion in solving with finger and bow the gruelling puzzles accumulated by the famous violinist composer in his concerto?

An evening that had opened impressively with Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 1, opus 138, closed delightfully with a superlative performance of Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, No. 1, opus 138.

From HERALD
Address: New York City

Date M 7 1916

Es 1884

This "Spring" Symphony Is Frost Nipped

Boston Orchestra Not at Its Best as It Gives Last Thursday Night Concert and Plays Schumann.

Schumann's "Spring" symphony seemed a little premature last night when played at the last Thursday night concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. Perhaps when Dr. Karl Muck selected that work for his musicians to play he did not expect that snow and icy winds would greet those who heard it when they left the hall. Somehow a little of the outside coldness seemed to get into the playing of the men from Boston.

The performance was finished, the tone of the strings, wood winds and brasses was excellent and there was plenty of spirit evident, but the "vernal passion that sways men until they are very old"—to quote the composer—seemed to be lacking. However, there was much to commend in other respects. No orchestra known in New York plays Beethoven so well as the Boston Symphony, and appropriately it presented the overture "Leonore" No. 1, one of the overtures to the opera "Fidelio."

The soloist was Anton Witek, concertmeister of the orchestra. His selection was unfortunate, as Joseph Joachim's concerto in the Hungarian manner is not greatly admired here. As a technical feat his playing of the first movement was remarkable. Again in the second section he played in a most praiseworthy manner, though the music itself failed to satisfy.

The last movement, which is the best, was not so well done. In one place the soloist seemed to get mixed up in Joachim's rambling repetitions and while the orchestra continued at full speed he glanced toward Dr. Muck, who, with his finger on the score, directed him where to begin again. Mr. Witek was recalled to the stage several times after he had finished.

From SUN
Address: New York City

Date MAR 17 1916

Estab 84

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAKES LAST VISIT

Anton Witek Plays Joachim's Concerto in Hungarian Style.

SCHUMANN SPRING SONG

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and last of its evening concerts at Carnegie Hall last night. The programme consisted of the first of Beethoven's "Leonore" overtures, Josef Joachim's violin concerto "in the Hungarian manner" and Schumann's B flat symphony. The solo performer was Anton Witek, the concert master of the orchestra.

A gentleman named Andreas Moser wrote a biography of Joachim and liberally unburdened his soul as to the concerto heard last evening. He said it was the result of Joachim's intimate knowledge of the music of his own country and also that it put a heavy tax on the physical endurance of the player. It may now be added that it also strains the patience of the listener.

Without doubt the melodic materials of the composition have all the earmarks of Hungarian music. Also it can be urged in extenuation of the long rhodomontades of violin passage work that the traditional gypsy fiddler is fond of careering over the finger board. But after all the cembalon speaks the truer accents of the Magyar tunes and Liszt's Hungarian rhapsodies lie closer to the heart of this folk music than the lavishly embroidered work of Joachim.

Mr. Witek is a man of sturdy physique and he attacked the concerto confidently. He lasted admirably even to the end of the third movement. Once only he wavered, but it was his memory, not his arm, that weakened, and a glance at the score set him right. He played the whole work with immense vigor and with a brilliant display of technic. But there was little to give him opportunity for any exhibition of the [illegible] speech of his instrument.

After this concerto the Schumann symphony was indeed a delight. Schumann himself spoke of it in a letter as a "spring symphony," but in another epistle he said that when he composed it he had a longing for spring. What a glorious spring it was in his mind, so opulent, so throbbing with all the warm life of out doors, so passionate in its expression of the joy of living. It was good to hear last night, when many were longing for spring, and the orchestra played it beautifully.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City

Date MAR 17 1916

E 1884

Last Evening Concert of Symphony Orchestra

At its final evening concert, which took place last night in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought forward Anton Witek, concertmaster, as soloist. He played Joachim's Concerto written in the Hungarian fashion. The work seldom appears on concert programme, and for that reason was considered the novelty of the evening.

Beethoven's overture "Leonore" No. 1 and Schumann's First Symphony were the orchestral selections. The orchestra played with inspiration, magnificent tone quality and faultless balance.

The large audience was liberal in its appreciation of Dr. Muck and his men.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.

Date MAR 15 1916

Est 1884

Attend Symphony Concert.

Mrs. Woodrow Wilson accupied a box at the National yesterday afternoon for the last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Her guests included Mrs. Albert Sidney Burleson, Miss Agnes Hart Wilson, Miss Bertha Bolling, Mrs. William Hitz and Miss Edith Benham.

The German ambassador entertained in the adjoining box, his guests including Princess Hatzfeldt, Baron Schoen, and Miss Harriet Southerland. Lady Spring-Rice, Countess Cellere and Thomas Spring-Rice were guests of Mrs. William Crozier, in her box. Mrs. Marshall Field had a party in one of the stage boxes, including Mrs. George Howard, Miss Perin, Lawrence Townsend and Lawrence Townsend, jr. Mrs. David F. Houston, Mrs. Clarence Wilson and Mrs. J. Mandeville Carlisle were among the guests in Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's box. Mrs. I. T. Mann had guests with her, among them Mrs S. C. Neale. Mrs. Preston Gibson entertained a party in Mrs. McMillan's box, Miss Sheridan and Miss Todd being among them. Mr. and Mrs. Lisner entertained a box party.

Among others in the audience were Mrs. John Blair, Mme. Yanes, Gordon Crawford, Mrs. Beverly Williams, Mrs. David Jayne Hill, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. Frederick Chapin, Miss Valerie Padelford, Mrs. Presley M. Rixey, Mrs. James Harlan, the Turkish Charge d'Affaires and Mme. Hussein Bey, Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clover, the Rev. and Mrs F. Ward Denys, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Douglas, Mrs. Henry Brown, Congressman Towner, Mrs. Charles C. Walcutt, Mrs John Biddle, Miss Eloise Sergeant, Mr and Mrs. George P. Eustis, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Percy Quin, Mr. and Mrs Frank Reeside, Mrs. Victor Kauffmann, Miss Frances Noyes, and Mrs. Walter Tuckerman.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City

Date R 17 1916

Est 1884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS

Beethoven, Joachim and Schumann in Dr. Muck's Programme.

The orchestra from Boston was with us again last night, and this time Dr. Muck chose Beethoven, Joachim and Schumann as the composers to be represented. The programme was more interesting than has been the average of Dr. Muck's.

The "Leonore" Overture No. 1 is always of interest when played as superbly as the band played it last night, and the Schumann Symphony No. 1 will always be welcome.

The Joachim number was of far less attractiveness; that is, to all except solo violinists. It was his "Concerto in the Hungarian manner" for violin and orchestra, a work remarkable chiefly for its extraordinary technical difficulties, and hence grateful to the virtuoso. Anton Witek, the orchestra's concert master, played it with remarkable fluency. Otherwise the concerto is dull and utterly uninspired in spirit.

The Schumann First, perhaps the most beautiful and freshest of all the composer's symphonies, was given an exquisite performance by Dr. Muck, refined, perfectly articulated, crystal clear, suave in outline, yet firm and masculine in presentation. For his reading of this symphony Dr. Muck can well be forgiven his past sins in choice of programmes! Of course, the audience was of capacity size.

From
Address: New York City

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City

Date MAR 17

Establis

Famous Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard by Big Audience at Carnegie Hall.

ARE CLOSING THEIR SEASON

Dr. Muck and his men arrived in New York yesterday to offer their two farewell concerts of the season, one of which was given at Carnegie Hall last evening. They received a hearty and enthusiastic welcome, and, at a signal given by Dr. Muck, the men arose simultaneously to acknowledge the tremendous applause.

The symphony of the evening was Schumann's No. 1 in B minor, written in one of the happiest periods in the composer's life. How delightful must have been the picture that floated before the imagination of the composer, and how bright and cheerful must the dreams have been that inspired him with this sparkling music, full of gayety, life and happiness!

Dr. Muck imbued this "Spring Poem," or this "Spring Symphony," to use Schumann's own words, with a true sense of its vivacity, freshness and cheerfulness, and his delicate touches in the more somber passages, and in those of more serious moods and reflections, revealed anew the depth of musical understanding which is always associated with Dr. Muck.

A. Witek, concertmaster of the orchestra, played the solo part of the Joachim concerto (in the Hungarian manner) for violin and orchestra, with skill and taste.

Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 1, the remaining number on the program, was spiritedly rendered.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.

Date MAR 15 1916

Est 884

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN CONCERT AT NATIONAL

Dr. Karl Muck, Conducting Orchestra, Offers Program of Classical and Romantic Music.

Dr. Karl Muck, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in a felicitous mood at the National Theater yesterday afternoon.

The five composers represented on the program were all German and, excepting Wagner, all were of the classical and romantic old school. They were interpreted by the conductor with a spirit of enthusiasm and a depth of insight that made a delightfully harmonious element in the afternoon's enjoyment.

The soloist, Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, played two consecutive numbers. The fist, Mozart's Concerto in D minor, abounding in lovely melodies, with a background of splendid orchestration, semed like a rare old jewel in a setting of purest gold. It was most delicately interpreted by both pianist and orchestra with great effect. Mr. Gabrilowitsch plays with excellent singing tone and his pianissimo effects are clear but round and velvety in quality.

The concert piece in F minor by Weber was brilliantly given with the romantic spirit of the story about which it is woven. In the bravura passages Mr. Gabrilowitsch showed splendid force and ringing tone, while the wonderful "march," heralding the return of the warrior, was played with a rhymthic beat that was irresistable. The audience was extremely enthusiastic and Mr. Gabrilowitsch was recalled several times.

The orchestra gave an excellent rendition of Handel's Concerto in F Major. It is full of familiar themes from the oratorios of the same composer, and the effect is given stately and dignified harmony with very little tonal contrast and variety.

The Wagner overture from "Tannhauser" was the closing number and quite different in construction and treatment from the other compositions on the program. Dr. Muck gave this piece a wonderful interpretation, and although his orchestra needs little guidance and he generally can afford to give these artists free rein, several little points were brought out vividly and added greatly to the musical value of the overture.

The opening number of the program, Schumann's Symphony in B-flat Major, written in romantic style, was full of melodious themes and pleasing harmonies—the "Larghetto" movement is full of religious sentiment and devotional spirit. The whole symphony is of a joyous and vigorous character—and was written by Schumann to celebrate his marriage.

This was the fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. A distinguished audience, which included Mrs. Woodrow Wilson, filled the theater.

M. J. S.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 15 1916

Esta 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard

Ossip Gabrilowitsch Is Soloist at Final Concert of the Season of Organization.

With Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, as soloist, the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, was given at the National Theater yesterday afternoon before a capacity audience with many people standing. Music in the severely classic mode predominated on the program, with two orchestral works with piano, the D minor concerto by Mozart, and the Weber "Concert Piece" in F minor, and also an orchestral concerto by Handel.

Art that is finely finished and essentially pianistic is that of Mr. Gabrilowitsch. His tone is subtle and ever rich, and his delicate work combines unusual clarity with ever graceful and varied shading. With a fluent technique that he employes with broad dynamic effect, every tone in the Mozart allegro seemed given with its perfect value. In the weaving of a theme he presents it with utter simplicity, making it a finely painted gem of tone. Thus, through the lively themes of Mozart and Weber he gave tone work of great beauty, embellishments of broadest pianistic art, but they contained little of sentiment or emotion.

Dr. Muck put into the orchestral score of the Mozart all of its fairest loveliness.

The symphony was the Schumann in B flat major. Beautifully interpreted, with a wealth of finest detail were the "Larghetto" and the "Scherzo," played as one movement. The strings were richly effective in the former and the main theme was given with truly exquisite tone and a delightful legato. Charmingly diverse and melodious was the "Scherzo," with its sprightly dance spirit accented vitally, part in syncopation and part a true fantasy. Fantasy prevailed as well in the finale. It was spirited and lovely and executed with infinite and ever graceful detail

Much in the spirit of his choral works is the Handel concerto in F major, the orchestral instruments maintaining separately figures such as these in his big concerted vocal works. It was not very warmly received, despite the very lovely work of the wind choirs.

Concluding with the richly orchestrated overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser," Dr. Muck gave it with seriousness, even restraint, in the Pilgrim's music giving the Venusberg music with much beauty, but with delicacy rather than a broad and sweeping impassioned spirit.

J. MacB.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 15 1916

1884

Smart Set at Concert.

Mrs. Woodrow Wilson occupied a box at the National Theater yesterday afternoon for the last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Her guests included Mrs. Albert Sidney Burleson, Miss Agnes Hart Wilson, Miss Bertha Bolling, Mrs. William Hitz and Miss Edith Benham. The German Ambassador entertained in the adjoining box, his guests including Princess Hatzfeldt, Baron Schoen and Miss Harriet Southerland. Lady Spring Rice, Countess Cellere and Mr. Thomas Spring Rice were guests of Mrs. William Crozier, in her box. Mrs. Marshall Field had a party in one of the stage boxes, including Mrs. George Howard, Miss Perin, Mr. Lawrence Townsend and Mr. Lawrence Townsend, jr. Mrs. David F. Houston, Mrs. Clarence Wilson and Mrs. J. Mandeville Carlisle were among the guests in Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's. Mrs. I. T. Mann had guests with her, including Mrs. S. C. Neale. Mrs. Preston Gibson entertained a party in Mrs. McMillan's box, Miss Sheridan and Miss Todd being among them. Mr. and Mrs. Lisner entertained a box party. Among others in the audience were Mrs. John Blair, Mme. Yanes, Mr. Gordon, Crawford, Mrs. Beverly Williamson, Mrs. David Jayne Hill, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. Frederick Chapin, Miss Valerie Padelford, Mrs. Presley M. Rixey, Mrs. James Harlan, the Turkish charge d'affaires and Mme. Hussein Bey, Admiral and Mrs. Clover, the Rev. and Mrs. F. Ward Denys, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Douglas, Mrs. Henry Brown, Representative Horace M. Towner, Mrs. Charles C. Walcutt, Mrs. John Biddle, Miss Sargent, Mr. and Mrs. George P. Eustis, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Percy Quin, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Reeside, Mrs. Victor Kauffmann, Miss Frances Noyes, and Mrs. Walter Tuckerman.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date 1

84

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Dr. Muck hat uns geſtern wieder einmal mit den reichſten Gaben ſeiner und ſeines Orcheſters Kunſt erfreut, ein Vollgenuß, wie er beredt für die Herrlichkeit des Boſtoner Orcheſters ſpricht. Die „Leonoren"-Ouverture No. 1 fand eine einfach tadelloſe Aufführung, und die Erſte Schumann's hat man nicht häufig mit dieſer durchgeiſtigen Virtuoſität und dieſer quellenden Klangfreudigkeit ſpielen gehört. Als Soliſt ſpielte Konzertmeiſter Herr Witek Joachim's „Konzert im ungariſchen Stil", und zwar, mit Ausnahme eines Gedächtnisfehlers, mit gediegener Pracht und hinreißendem Schmiß. Der Künſtler wurde ganz enorm gefeiert, und daß Dr. Muck und ſeine Mannen wieder begeiſterten Beifall einſtrichen, wird man gern glauben.

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date 1916

Establishe

Boston Players Closing Season In New York

By Sylvester Rawling.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its farewell evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall last night. With to-morrow's matinee performance the famous organization from the Hub, unexcelled anywhere, ably directed for some years by Dr. Karl Muck, will take its leave of us until next autumn. It might go without saying that the house was crowded because, before the season began, the subscription was exhausted. The soloist was Anton Witek, the concert master of the orchestra, who acquitted himself well in the Joachim concerto, opus 11, for violin, in the Hungarian style, not too familiar nowadays. Mr. Witek is a thorough musician. At the beginning there was the Beethoven "Leonora" overture No. 1, and for the end there was Schumann's lovely Spring symphony, his first in B flat major, that served to make all the more poignant and significant our grumblings over the ice and the snow and the cold, into which we were bundled out after its splendid pronouncement by Dr. Muck and his players.

Offhand, it is odd that the big orchestras are closing the season so early. The Symphony Society, under Mr. Damrosch, already is finished. The Philharmonic Society, under Mr. Stransky, has only three more concerts to give. This week sees the last of the Boston men. The explanation is that the organizations, with the glamour of metropolitan appreciation hovering over them like aureoles, will seek to spread the light of their capacity and their achievements over the poor benighted people who were unfortunate enough to be born outside the artistic precincts of New York and Boston. Nevertheless the crowning glory of the season is reserved for the Philadelphia Orchestra, under the direction of Leopold Stokowski, at the Metropolitan Opera House on April 9, under the auspices of the Society of the Friends of Music, when Gustave Mahler's eighth symphony, which has set musical Philadelphia wild with enthusiasm, will be presented here, with a chorus of 1,000, and singers of national and international repute. All honor to Mr. Stokowski, and to his orchestra and to the music lovers of Philadelphia, who made the first presentation of the work in America possible, and also made New York and Boston sit up and take notice that Philadelphia is still on the map.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date 1916

Est, 1884

The Woman Who Saw

Musical Snobbery.

When the Woman Who Saw attended the last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra she caught a goodly number of the most musical of music-lovers napping. During the violin concerto, distinguished for nothing but its length, three enthusiasts in front of her were sound asleep; an elderly gentleman who is an authority on chamber music, was tapping the floor with his cane impatiently waiting for the end, and a well known critic muttered between his teeth: "A wasted evening." And yet, when it was all over, the sleepers awoke with a start, all applauded perfunctorily, and a buzz of gentle approval filled the house.

The Woman Who Saw longs to see a musical audience such as Jean Christophe describes—frank and sincere, capable of making up its mind quickly and, when bored, courageous to say so in no uncertain terms.

But no audience could be more polite than the one that gathers once a month to worship at the shrine of the Bostonians. It is a veritable cult. They glory in being there because there are so many outside clamoring to get in. No one who has ever subscribed would think of giving up the precious privilege of doing so again. Once established, it becomes a tradition, like the family pew in your adopted church, and the high priest presents aged and dusty compositions or ultra modern outbursts which the congregation accept unquestioningly, for does he not hail from the hub of American Kultur?

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date

Establis 4

The Boston Symphony Orchestra took leave of us for the season at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. Beethoven's second symphony and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" were the most interesting numbers on the programme, because they were played with all the perfection that this world famous band has attained. Dr. Muck's programmes this season have not always been satisfactory to the subscribers, who have filled the seats. Other faults have been found, but it is too late now to discuss the matter. If the war in Europe shall be over before next season everything may be different. In the same hall, on Saturday night, Modest Altschuler and the Russian Symphony Orchestra also closed its season. The programme included novelties that would better have been presented earlier. So next season again we must look forward to a repetition of them. At Aeolian Hall on Saturday afternoon Harold Bauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch gave a two piono recital. The names of these master players drew a large audience. The measure of enjoyment they got out of the entertainment is problematical. At the Washington Irving High School on Saturday night the People's Symphony gave a concert of chamber music, with Alfred Meyerlin, a young Belgian violinist; Pauline Mallet-Provost, pianist, and William Durieux, cellist, as the Vioelpian Trio.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 18

Following this afternoon's Boston Symphony farewell in Carnegie Hall the wise men of the Hub go home to end a more leisurely season lasting in their own northern latitude till May and continuing in this country's best "pop" concerts through June or later. Karl Muck, the conductor, has not always been happy in his choice of programmes. He has recently, however, had some thoughts on the "Music of Democracy," based on his trip with the band across America last summer. In the Craftsman he wrote:

"Who that has ever seen the Grand Canyon at sunset or in the moonlight, or those great limitless plains veiled in rose and violet and the mellowing gray of twilight, can fail to be profoundly impressed, richly influenced? Such beauty and vastness must liberate the spirit, and the free spirit must eventually express something of the force that has opened the windows of the soul.

"Already your painters have found the West and brought back some of its beauty on canvas, but as yet I have heard no poetry that repeats to me the story of sunrise in the West, no music that gives me of the yellow lights and the purple shadows that stream down that deep canyon, varied from day to day, and forever lovely."

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date MA 9

DR. MUCK GIVES FINAL CONCERT

Boston Symphony Society Closes Its Season Before Large Audience at Carnegie Hall.

SELECTIONS MOST FELICITOUS

Bauer and Gabrilowitsch Render a Delightful Program—Other Musical Events.

The Boston Symphony Society gave its last concert of the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, and it was with keen regret and genuine sorrow that the vast audience bade farewell to Dr. Muck and his men.

It must be admitted, though, that during the past Winter, Dr. Muck has presented a few programs, to say the least, that must have been almost deliberately planned to try the patience and endurance of his New York friends. New York is of a forgiving disposition, however, and only hopes that the eminent conductor will be a trifle more lenient and a little more forbearing when he visits this metropolis in the future, even though we may fail to come up to the high standards that are maintained by the distinguished music connoisseurs of Boston.

Dr. Muck chose for the symphony yesterday Beethoven's No. 2 in D and, as one commentator writes: "It shows us the composer in the normal condition of a man at peace with himself and the world, happy in his art, and not yet stirred to his very soul by the sorrows of life." Dr. Muck treated its beautiful effects with grace and understanding.

Mr. Witek and Mr. Ferir were the soloists in Mozart's "Concertante Symphonic for Violin and Viola," and their performance of Mozart's exacting music was admirable.

The remaining numbers on the program were Brahms's "Academic Festival Overture," and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger," both of which were heard to advantage under the artistic direction of Dr. Muck.

From
Address
Date AR 1

Herbert Fryer Lectures on Progra for Tonight's Concert.

Herbert Fryer, a London pian lectured yesterday afternoon at the Brooklyn Institute concerning the programme that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play this evening, under Dr. Muck's leadership. Mr. Fryer, who is a performer of fine technical equipment and musical understanding, dissected first the symphony, Tschaikowsky's No. 4 in F minor, explaining the motives of each of the four movements, and playing enough of these melodies to give a most agreeable impression of this lovely work, which was dedicated to the composer's "best friend," Nadejda Filaretovna von Meck.

After recounting several stories to show the mood of Brahms when he wrote the Academic Festival Overture, Mr. Fryer explained the work in detail, outlining the four principal themes, or "tunes" as he called them, the march, the choral, the Freshman's Song and the "Gaudeamus," which is familiar. The work abounds with students songs, many of the melodies repeated with slight disguises.

Volkmann's not so well-known Serenade for String Orchestra in F Major, was next considered, the lecturer saying that Volkmann was neither a classicist, like Mendelssohn, nor a romanticist, like Schumann, but revealing a little of both. The four movements of the composition, he said, will doubtless be played tonight, without a break. Especially charming was his playing of the dainty waltz, third movement. The march, he said, contains a prophetic idea of rag-time. A discussion of Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude and its different motives concluded the programme.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 1 9 1916

Boston Symphony Concert Series Ends

THE last concert in the Boston Symphony series was given in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Selections by Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart and Wagner comprised a programme of exceptional charm.

In his search for the unusual Dr. Muck unearthed the almost forgotten concertante symphonie of Mozart, which calls for two solo instruments, the violin and viola. These parts were sustained by Anton Witek and E. Ferir, both members of the string choirs of the orchestra.

Beethoven's Second Symphony was the large feature of the afternoon, and the audience gave hearty approval for Dr. Muck's admirable reading of this, as well as to Brahms' Academic Festival overture and prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 1 1916

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Good Programme Is Given at the Final Concert.

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series in this city took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Beethoven's second symphony, Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture, Mozart's symphonie concertante for violin and viola with orchestra and the prelude to "Die Meistersinge ." The solo players were Anton Witek, violin, and Emil Ferir, viola, both members of the orchestra.

The concert was one of pleasing if not unusual character. Its most stimulating items were the symphony and the Wagner prelude. The two other numbers were also good music, but the double concerto, as it might not improperly be called, was performed creditably, while the two orchestral numbers named brought out the most brilliant qualities of the famous orchestra.

From
Address: New York City
Date AR 1 9 1916
Established:

300,000 PERSONS HEAR 132 ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS

Review of Symphonic Programmes of the Season Shows Lack of Novelties, Although American Composers Had Numerous Hearings—Season Practically Ended.

LAST week the Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its local series of concerts in New York, and the Symphony Society is already half way across the continent on a post-season tour. There remain only three concerts of the Philharmonic Society and a few miscellaneous orchestral programmes to be played this season.

Approximately three hundred thousand persons have listened to symphonic entertainments this winter. Every year there has been a larger demand for orchestral music in New York, and the number of concerts is on the increase. This season, as usual, for the ten concerts of the Boston Symphony O
negie Hall was sold out b
At all but two of the twen
concerts of the Sympho
Aeolian Hall every seat wa
certs of the Philharmonic
negie Hall were more n
while only a few of them
houses," the total number
ers was far in excess of number who attended the
of the other two orchest
Sunday the Philharmonic
forty-four concerts and
Society thirty-one.

To date the HERALD ha
hundred and sixteen orch
in addition to sixteen Sun certs at the Metropolitan which the orchestra was prominent, making one hundred and thirty-two. This number includes also series by the People's Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall; by the Russian Symphony Orchestra, in the same place; by Victor Herbert's Orchestra, at the Cort Theatre, and by the Orchestral Society, at the Harris Theatre. Single concerts have been given by the Symphony Club, an orchestra composed of young women of society; the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Volpe Orchestra and the Scandinavian Symphony Orchestra.

While the total number of orchestra concerts was larger than in previous seasons, there was a noticeable lack of novelty in the programmes. This no doubt is a result of the European war, since the number of new American works heard was large. No extremely important orchestral composition had its first hearing here this season. Probably the best of the novelties was an American suite by John Alden Carpenter, of Chicago, called, "Adventures in a Perambulator," presented by the Symphony Society. As the title indicates, it is not a large or pretentious work, but in its way it is admirable.

In general the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were less interesting than those of the local orchestras. It presented only one new work, a suite for piano and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, which is something to elicit thankfulness, judging from the calibre of last season's novelties.

The Philharmonic presented a late work of Max Reger, variations on a theme of Mozart, and the "Pelleas and Melisande" of Schöenberg, the most important of the futuristic composers. This last, if not so futuristic as Schöenberg's Kammersinfonie, played by the Symphony Society and the Philadelphia Orchestra, was more agreeable to the ear.

It was a good year for Richard Strauss. The Philharmonic Society devoted three whole programmes to his works and other orchestras featured his symphonic poems. American composers also had more than the usual number of hearings. Among the resident composers represented on local programmes in addition to Mr. Carpenter were Victor Kolar, Fritz Stahlberg, Edmund Severn, David Stanley Smith, Seth Bingham, Daniel Gregory Mason, A. Walter Kramer, Walter Damrosch, Josef Stransky and Ernest Schelling.

A notable event was a Bach-Beethoven festival of the Philharmonic and Oratorio societies, at which Bach's "Magnificat" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony were presented.

Perhaps the most important orchestral offering is yet to come. On April 9 the Philadelphia Orchestra, with a chorus of a thousand voices and eight distinguished soloists, will present the last Gustav Mahler's Eighth (choral) Symphony at the Metropolitan Opera House under the auspices of the Society of the Friends of Music.

In general the season was notable in orchestral circles. If there was a lack of novelties, this was more than counterbalanced by the care with which the conductors selected and prepared the best of classic compositions.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date
Established:

IDEALIZED MUSIC ON THE DULCIMER

A Fairy Tale Grafted on a Russian Symphony Concert.

LAST APPEARANCE OF BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Two Saturday Concerts Which Demanded Comment—Weary Bostonians.

By H. E. KREHBIEL.

Of the two orchestral concerts given in Carnegie Hall yesterday the most interesting, because of its offerings, was that of the Russian Symphony Society in the evening. About all of the brilliancy in the last of its concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the afternoon, was confined to the last number of the programme—the prelude to the "Meistersinger." In the Beethoven symphony, No. 2 in D, the band played perfunctorily, as if Dr. Muck and his men were a-weary of the world and more thoughtful of the bean pots of Boston than the music they were making. Dr. Muck's tempo in the slow movement dragged it out one-third longer than the composer intended it should be and the rigidity of the beat robbed it of all expressive charm. The "Academic Overture" of Brahms went better, but there was not the precision to which the men from Boston have accustomed us. Interest was quickened a trifle by the unfamiliar music on the programme, a Concertante Symphony in E-flat for violin and viola by Mozart, which was played in a very agreeable manner by Anton Witek and Emile Férir. Between this work and Beethoven's symphony there was a pretty kinship in spirit, especially in the last movement, much the most charming and spontaneous of the three. Why did one of its themes call back to mind the second subject of the symphony?

[124]

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 18

Following this afternoon's Bo Symphony farewell in Carnegi the wise men of the Hub go hom end a more leisurely season lastin their own northern latitude till and continuing in this country's "pop" concerts through June Karl Muck, the conductor, has al ways been happy in his choice of grammes. He has recently, however, had some thoughts on the "Music of Democracy," based on his trip with the band across America last summer. In the Craftsman he wrote:

"Who that has ever seen the Grand Canyon at sunset or in the moonlight, or those great limitless plains veiled in rose and violet and the mellowing gray of twilight, can fail to be profoundly impressed, richly influenced? Such beauty and vastness must liberate the spirit, and the free spirit must eventually express something of the force that has opened the windows of the soul.

"Already your painters have found the West and brought back some of its beauty on canvas, but as yet I have heard no poetry that repeats to me the story of sunrise in the West, no music that gives me of the yellow lights and the purple shadows that stream down that deep canyon, varied from day to day, and forever lovely."

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date MA 9

DR. MUCK GIVES FINAL CONCERT

Boston Symphony Society Closes Its Season Before Large Audience at Carnegie Hall.

SELECTIONS MOST FELICITOUS

Bauer and Gabrilowitsch Render a Delightful Program—Other Musical Events.

The Boston Symphony Society gave its last concert of the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, and it was with keen regret and genuine sorrow that the vast audience bade farewell to Dr. Muck and his men.

It must be admitted, though, that during the past Winter, Dr. Muck has presented a few programs, to say the least, that must have been almost deliberately planned to try the patience and endurance of his New York friends. New York is of a forgiving disposition, however, and only hopes that the eminent conductor will be a trifle more lenient and a little more forbearing when he visits this metropolis in the future, even though we may fail to come up to the high standards that are maintained by the distinguished music connoisseurs of Boston.

Dr. Muck chose for the symphony yesterday Beethoven's No. 2 in D and, as one commentator writes: "It shows us the composer in the normal condition of a man at peace with himself and the world, happy in his art, and not yet stirred to his very soul by the sorrows of life." Dr. Muck treated its beautiful effects with grace and understanding.

Mr. Witek and Mr. Ferir were the soloists in Mozart's "Concertante Symphonic for Violin and Viola," and their performance of Mozart's exacting music was admirable.

The remaining numbers on the program were Brahms's "Academic Festival Overture," and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger," both of which were heard to advantage under the artistic direction of Dr. Muck.

From EAGLE
Address N. Y.
Date MAR 17

BOSTON SYMPHONY TALK.

Herbert Fryer Lectures on Programme for Tonight's Concert.

Herbert Fryer, a London pianist, lectured yesterday afternoon at the Brooklyn Institute concerning the programme that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play this evening, under Dr. Muck's leadership. Mr. Fryer, who is a performer of fine technical equipment and musical understanding, dissected first the symphony, Tschaikowsky's No. 4 in F minor, explaining the motives of each of the four movements, and playing enough of these melodies to give a most agreeable impression of this lovely work, which was dedicated to the composer's "best friend," Nadejda Filaretovna von Meck.

After recounting several stories to show the mood of Brahms when he wrote the Academic Festival Overture, Mr. Fryer explained the work in detail, outlining the four principal themes, or "tunes" as he called them, the march, the choral, the Freshman's Song and the "Gaudeamus," which is familiar. The work abounds with students songs, many of the melodies repeated with slight disguises.

Volkmann's not so well-known Serenade for String Orchestra in F Major, was next considered, the lecturer saying that Volkmann was neither a classicist, like Mendelssohn, nor a romanticist, like Schumann, but revealing a little of both. The four movements of the composition, he said, will doubtless be played tonight, without a break. Especially charming was his playing of the dainty waltz, third movement. The march, he said, contains a prophetic idea of rag-time. A discussion of Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude and its different motives concluded the programme.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 19 1916

Boston Symphony Concert Series Ends

THE last concert in the Boston Symphony series was given in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Selections by Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart and Wagner comprised a programme of exceptional charm.

In his search for the unusual Dr. Muck unearthed the almost forgotten concertante symphonie of Mozart, which calls for two solo instruments, the violin and viola. These parts were sustained by Anton Witek and E. Ferir, both members of the string choirs of the orchestra.

Beethoven's Second Symphony was the large feature of the afternoon, and the audience gave hearty approval for Dr. Muck's admirable reading of this, as well as to Brahms' Academic Festival overture and prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 1 1916

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Good Programme Is Given at the Final Concert.

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series in this city took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Beethoven's second symphony, Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture, Mozart's symphonie concertante for violin and viola with orchestra and the prelude to "Die Meistersinge." The solo players were Anton Witek, violin, and Emil Ferir, viola, both members of the orchestra.

The concert was one of pleasing if not unusual character. Its most stimulating items were the symphony and the Wagner prelude. The two other numbers were also good music, but the double concerto, as it might not improperly be called, was performed creditably, while the two orchestral numbers named brought out the most brilliant qualities of the famous orchestra.

---

y
R 19 1916

PERSONS HEAR CHESTRAL CONCERTS

ymphonic Programmes of the Season Shows Lack of Novelties, Although American Composers Had Numerous Hearings—Season Practically Ended.

LAST week the Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its local series of concerts in New York, and the Symphony Society is already half way across the continent on a post-season tour. There remain only three concerts of the Philharmonic Society and a few miscellaneous orchestral programmes to be played this season.

Approximately three hundred thousand persons have listened to symphonic entertainments this winter. Every year there has been a larger demand for orchestral music in New York, and the number of concerts is on the increase. This season, as usual, for the ten concerts of the Boston Symphony O
negie Hall was sold out b
At all but two of the twen
concerts of the Sympho
Aeolian Hall every seat wa
certs of the Philharmonic
negie Hall were more n
while only a few of them
houses," the total number
ers was far in excess of number who attended the
of the other two orchest
Sunday the Philharmonic
forty-four concerts and
Society thirty-one.

To date the HERALD has
hundred and sixteen orch
in addition to sixteen Sun
certs at the Metropolitan O
which the orchestra was prominent, making one hundred and thirty-two. This number includes also series by the People's Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall; by the Russian Symphony Orchestra, in the same place; by Victor Herbert's Orchestra, at the Cort Theatre, and by the Orchestral Society, at the Harris Theatre. Single concerts have been given by the Symphony Club, an orchestra composed of young women of society; the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Volpe Orchestra and the Scandinavian Symphony Orchestra.

While the total number of orchestra concerts was larger than in previous seasons, there was a noticeable lack of novelty in the programmes. This no doubt is a result of the European war, since the number of new American works heard was large. No extremely important orchestral composition had its first hearing here this season. Probably the best of the novelties was an American suite by John Alden Carpenter, of Chicago, called, "Adventures in a Perambulator," presented by the Symphony Society. As the title indicates, it is not a large or pretentious work, but in its way it is admirable.

In general the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were less interesting than those of the local orchestras. It presented only one new work, a suite for piano and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, which is something to elicit thankfulness, judging from the calibre of last season's novelties.

The Philharmonic presented a late work of Max Reger, variations on a theme of Mozart, and the "Pelleas and Melisande" of Schöenberg, the most important of the futuristic composers. This last, if not so futuristic as Schöenberg's Kammersinfonie, played by the Symphony Society and the Philadelphia Orchestra, was more agreeable to the ear.

It was a good year for Richard Strauss. The Philharmonic Society devoted three whole programmes to his works and other orchestras featured his symphonic poems. American composers also had more than the usual number of hearings. Among the resident composers represented on local programmes in addition to Mr. Carpenter were Victor Kolar, Fritz Stahlberg, Edmund Severn, David Stanley Smith, Seth Bingham, Daniel Gregory Mason, A. Walter Kramer, Walter Damrosch, Josef Stransky and Ernest Schelling.

A notable event was a Bach-Beethoven festival of the Philharmonic and Oratorio societies, at which Bach's "Magnificat" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony were presented.

Perhaps the most important orchestral offering is yet to come. On April 9 the Philadelphia Orchestra, with a chorus of a thousand voices and eight distinguished soloists, will present the last Gustav Mahler's Eighth (choral) Symphony at the Metropolitan Opera House under the auspices of the Society of the Friends of Music.

In general the season was notable in orchestral circles. If there was a lack of novelties, this was more than counterbalanced by the care with which the conductors selected and prepared the best of classic compositions.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date
Established:

IDEALIZED MUSIC ON THE DULCIMER

A Fairy Tale Grafted on a Russian Symphony Concert.

LAST APPEARANCE OF BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Two Saturday Concerts Which Demanded Comment—Weary Bostonians.

By H. E. KREHBIEL.

Of the two orchestral concerts given in Carnegie Hall yesterday the most interesting, because of its offerings, was that of the Russian Symphony Society in the evening. About all of the brilliancy in the last of its concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the afternoon, was confined to the last number of the programme—the prelude to the "Meistersinger." In the Beethoven symphony, No. 2 in D, the band played perfunctorily, as if Dr. Muck and his men were a-weary of the world and more thoughtful of the bean pots of Boston than the music they were making. Dr. Muck's tempo in the slow movement dragged it out one-third longer than the composer intended it should be and the rigidity of the beat robbed it of all expressive charm. The "Academic Overture" of Brahms went better, but there was not the precision to which the men from Boston have accustomed us. Interest was quickened a trifle by the unfamiliar music on the programme, a Concertante Symphony in E-flat for violin and viola by Mozart, which was played in a very agreeable manner by Anton Witek and Emile Férir. Between this work and Beethoven's symphony there was a pretty kinship in spirit, especially in the last movement, much the most charming and spontaneous of the three. Why did one of its themes call back to mind the second subject of the symphony?

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 18

Est

Following this afternoon's Bo Symphony farewell in Carneg the wise men of the Hub go h end a more leisurely season la their own northern latitude and continuing in this count "pop" concerts through June Karl Muck, the conductor, ha ways been happy in his choice grammes. He has recently, however, had some thoughts on the "Music of Democracy," based on his trip with the band across America last summer. In the Craftsman he wrote:

"Who that has ever seen the Grand Canyon at sunset or in the moonlight, or those great limitless plains veiled in rose and violet and the mellowing gray of twilight, can fail to be profoundly impressed, richly influenced? Such beauty and vastness must liberate the spirit, and the free spirit must eventually express something of the force that has opened the windows of the soul.

"Already your painters have found the West and brought back some of its beauty on canvas, but as yet I have heard no poetry that repeats to me the story of sunrise in the West, no music that gives me of the yellow lights and the purple shadows that stream down that deep canyon, varied from day to day, and forever lovely."

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date MAR 9

884

DR. MUCK GIVES FINAL CONCERT

Boston Symphony Society Closes Its Season Before Large Audience at Carnegie Hall.

SELECTIONS MOST FELICITOUS

Bauer and Gabrilowitsch Render a Delightful Program—Other Musical Events.

The Boston Symphony Society gave its last concert of the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, and it was with keen regret and genuine sorrow that the vast audience bade farewell to Dr. Muck and his men.

It must be admitted, though, that during the past Winter, Dr. Muck has presented a few programs, to say the least. that must have been almost deliberately planned to try the patience and endurance of his New York friends. New York is of a forgiving disposition, however, and only hopes that the eminent conductor will be a trifle more lenient and a little more forbearing when he visits this metropolis in the future, even though we may fail to come up to the high standards that are maintained by the distinguished music connoisseurs of Boston.

Dr. Muck chose for the symphony yesterday Beethoven's No. 2 in D and, as one commentator writes: "It shows us the composer in the normal condition of a man at peace with himself and the world, happy in his art, and not yet stirred to his very soul by the sorrows of life." Dr. Muck treated its beautiful effects with grace and understanding.

Mr. Witek and Mr. Ferir were the soloists in Mozart's "Concertante Symphonic for Violin and Viola," and their performance of Mozart's exacting music was admirable.

The remaining numbers on the program were Brahms's "Academic Festival Overture," and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger," both of which were heard to advantage under the artistic direction of Dr. Muck.

From
Address
Date MAR 17

Esta

84

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Herbert Fryer Lectures on Progra for Tonight's Concert.

Herbert Fryer, a London pianist, lectured yesterday afternoon at the Brooklyn Institute concerning the programme that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play this evening, under Dr. Muck's leadership. Mr. Fryer, who is a performer of fine technical equipment and musical understanding, dissected first the symphony, Tschaikowsky's No. 4 in F minor, explaining the motives of each of the four movements, and playing enough of these melodies to give a most agreeable impression of this lovely work, which was dedicated to the composer's "best friend," Nadejda Filaretovna von Meck.

After recounting several stories to show the mood of Brahms when he wrote the Academic Festival Overture, Mr. Fryer explained the work in detail, outlining the four principal themes, or "tunes" as he called them, the march, the choral, the Freshman's Song and the "Gaudeamus," which is familiar. The work abounds with students songs, many of the melodies repeated with slight disguises.

Volkmann's not so well-known Serenade for String Orchestra in F Major, was next considered, the lecturer saying that Volkmann was neither a classicist, like Mendelssohn, nor a romanticist, like Schumann, but revealing a little of both. The four movements of the composition, he said, will doubtless be played tonight, without a break. Especially charming was his playing of the dainty waltz, third movement. The march, he said, contains a prophetic idea of rag-time. A discussion of Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude and its different motives concluded the programme.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 1 9 1916

k, 1884

Boston Symphony Concert Series Ends

THE last concert in the Boston Symphony series was given in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Selections by Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart and Wagner comprised a programme of exceptional charm.

In his search for the unusual Dr. Muck unearthed the almost forgotten concertante symphonie of Mozart, which calls for two solo instruments, the violin and viola. These parts were sustained by Anton Witek and E. Ferir, both members of the string choirs of the orchestra.

Beethoven's Second Symphony was the large feature of the afternoon, and the audience gave hearty approval for Dr. Muck's admirable reading of this, as well as to Brahms' Academic Festival overture and prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 1 9 1916

Estab

84

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Good Programme Is Given at the Final Concert.

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series in this city took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Beethoven's second symphony, Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture, Mozart's symphonie concertante for violin and viola with orchestra and the prelude to "Die Meistersinge." The solo players were Anton Witek, violin, and Emil Ferir, viola, both members of the orchestra.

The concert was one of pleasing if not unusual character. Its most stimulating items were the symphony and the Wagner prelude. The two other numbers were also good music, but the double concerto, as it might not improperly be called, was performed creditably, while the two orchestral numbers named brought out the most brilliant qualities of the famous orchestra.

From
Address: New York City
Date AR 1 9 1916

Established:

300,000 PERSONS HEAR 132 ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS

Review of Symphonic Programmes of the Season Shows Lack of Novelties, Although American Composers Had Numerous Hearings—Season Practically Ended.

LAST week the Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its local series of concerts in New York, and the Symphony Society is already half way across the continent on a post-season tour. There remain only three concerts of the Philharmonic Society and a few miscellaneous orchestral programmes to be played this season.

Approximately three hundred thousand persons have listened to symphonic entertainments this winter. Every year there has been a larger demand for orchestral music in New York, and the number of concerts is on the increase. This season, as usual, for the ten concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Carnegie Hall was sold out by subscription At all but two of the twenty-four regula concerts of the Symphony Society a Aeolian Hall every seat was taken. Concerts of the Philharmonic Society at Carnegie Hall were more numerous, and while only a few of them drew "capacity houses," the total number of their hearers was far in excess of the combine number who attended the entertainment of the other two orchestras. By nex Sunday the Philharmonic will have play forty-four concerts and the Sympho Society thirty-one.

To date the HERALD has reviewed one hundred and sixteen orchestral concerts in addition to sixteen Sunday night concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House, in which the orchestra was prominent, making one hundred and thirty-two. This number includes also series by the People's Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall; by the Russian Symphony Orchestra, in the same place; by Victor Herbert's Orchestra, at the Cort Theatre, and by the Orchestral Society, at the Harris Theatre. Single concerts have been given by the Symphony Club, an orchestra composed of young women of society; the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Volpe Orchestra and the Scandinavian Symphony Orchestra.

While the total number of orchestra concerts was larger than in previous seasons, there was a noticeable lack of novelty in the programmes. This no doubt is a result of the European war, since the number of new American works heard was large. No extremely important orchestral composition had its first hearing here this season. Probably the best of the novelties was an American suite by John Alden Carpenter, of Chicago, called, "Adventures in a Perambulator," presented by the Symphony Society. As the title indicates, it is not a large or pretentious work, but in its way it is admirable.

In general the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were less interesting than those of the local orchestras. It presented only one new work, a suite for piano and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, which is something to elicit thankfulness, judging from the calibre of last season's novelties.

The Philharmonic presented a late work of Max Reger, variations on a theme of Mozart, and the "Pelleas and Melisande" of Schöenberg, the most important of the futuristic composers. This last, if not so futuristic as Schöenberg's Kammersinfonie, played by the Symphony Society and the Philadelphia Orchestra, was more agreeable to the ear.

It was a good year for Richard Strauss. The Philharmonic Society devoted three whole programmes to his works and other orchestras featured his symphonic poems. American composers also had more than the usual number of hearings. Among the resident composers represented on local programmes in addition to Mr. Carpenter were Victor Kolar, Fritz Stahlberg, Edmund Severn, David Stanley Smith, Seth Bingham, Daniel Gregory Mason, A. Walter Kramer, Walter Damrosch, Josef Stransky and Ernest Schelling.

A notable event was a Bach-Beethoven festival of the Philharmonic and Oratorio societies, at which Bach's "Magnificat" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony were presented.

Perhaps the most important orchestral offering is yet to come. On April 9 the Philadelphia Orchestra, with a chorus of a thousand voices and eight distinguished soloists, will present the last Gustav Mahler's Eighth (choral) Symphony at the Metropolitan Opera House under the auspices of the Society of the Friends of Music.

In general the season was notable in orchestral circles. If there was a lack of novelties, this was more than counterbalanced by the care with which the conductors selected and prepared the best of classic compositions.

---

ork City

LIZED MUSIC HE DULCIMER

A Fairy Tale Grafted on a Russian Symphony Concert.

LAST APPEARANCE OF BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Two Saturday Concerts Which Demanded Comment—Weary Bostonians.

By H. E. KREHBIEL.

Of the two orchestral concerts given in Carnegie Hall yesterday the most interesting, because of its offerings, was that of the Russian Symphony Society in the evening. About all of the brilliancy in the last of its concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the afternoon, was confined to the last number of the programme—the prelude to the "Meistersinger." In the Beethoven symphony, No. 2 in D, the band played perfunctorily, as if Dr. Muck and his men were a-weary of the world and more thoughtful of the bean pots of Boston than the music they were making. Dr. Muck's tempo in the slow movement dragged it out one-third longer than the composer intended it should be and the rigidity of the beat robbed it of all expressive charm. The "Academic Overture" of Brahms went better, but there was not the precision to which the men from Boston have accustomed us. Interest was quickened a trifle by the unfamiliar music on the programme, a Concertante Symphony in E-flat for violin and viola by Mozart, which was played in a very agreeable manner by Anton Witek and Emile Férir. Between this work and Beethoven's symphony there was a pretty kinship in spirit, especially in the last movement, much the most charming and spontaneous of the three. Why did one of its themes call back to mind the second subject of the symphony?

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date MAR 1 9 1916

Orchestra from Boston Plays Its Farewell

Only German Music on Last Programme of Season—Audience Applauds Musicians.

With an all-German programme, the ton Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, played its farewell of the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to an audience that was measured only by the capacity of the auditorium.

Although the applause of the audience was not of the most enthusiastic sort yet it was hearty, and it seemed to indicate full appreciation of those parts of the programme that were especially well played, such as the Scherzo and the finale of Beethoven's Second Symphony, with which the afternoon began. This number was followed by "Brahms' Academic Festival Overture," and then came a soloist's number with Anton Witek, violinist, and Emile Ferir, viola player, giving a scholarly and dignified interpretation of Mozart's Concertante Symphonie.

But the best number came last, the programme ending with Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg. This was brilliantly played and enthusiastically applauded and sent everybody home in the best of musical spirits.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date MAR 1 9 1916

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Close of Its New York Season at Its Fifth Afternoon Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra finished its doings in New York for the present season at its fifth concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was made up mostly of matter well known to musical amateurs, though Mozart's "Concertante Symphonie" for violin and viola is not so often played that it can be called well known. It was presented yesterday by Mr. Witek, the concertmaster, and Mr. Férir, the first viola: an admirable performance, thoroughly in sympathy with the spirit of this beautiful music, by two players who viewed it eye to eye and were in thorough understanding with each other.

The symphony was Beethoven's second, which Dr. Muck played with much spirit and with an especial beauty in the larghetto. There was humor in Brahms's "Academic Festival Overture.' The final number was the prelude to Wagner's comedy, "Die Meistersinger." Dr. Muck took the tempo rather fast, as it seemed, with not much of the moderation and yielding of the beat that some find called for in the transitions between the various sections. There was splendor of tone and an unusual clarity in passages where clarity is indispensable to let the listeners feel the force of the combinations of themes.

There was much applause for Dr. Muck and his men, and a prolonged round at the end of the concert, doubtless intended as a farewell.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Dr. Muck's Orchestra Gives Most Pleasure in Schumann's Work.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last of its Thursday evening concerts for the season at Carnegie Hall last night, though the organization will be heard again on Saturday afternoon. The program arranged by Dr. Muck consisted of Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 1, Joachim's concerto "in the Hungarian manner" for violin and orchestra, in which the solo part was played by Mr. Witek, concertmaster of the organization, and Schumann's symphony No. 1 in B flat, sometimes called the "Spring" symphony.

With the exception of Schumann's symphony this was unfamiliar matter to a certain extent. Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 1 is not often heard, for when a conductor wishes to represent Beethoven's opera, "Fidelio," on the concert stage he more often chooses out of the overtures written for it the "Leonore" No. 3, and Joachim's concerto has fallen into disuse. It has not been played in so long a time that the remembrance of when it was actually last heard does not come to light readily.

The concerto is very difficult to play. It abounds in involved passages at break-neck speed and there is frequent use of double-stopping and chord playing. Nowadays, when mere virtuosity is not at such high premium as it formerly enjoyed, the florid style of the work has not as much power as it once had. Mr. Witek's mastering of its difficulties was not entirely successful. Though there were many beautiful bits of work, especially in the second movement, toward the end there were some roughness and some unfortunate results in the double-stopping. Once his memory apparently failed for the moment—a happening one could understand in this work—and he resorted to the conductor's score.

Probably the most pleasure of the evening was given by Schumann's symphony, whose frankness, energy, and joyousness found fitting expression at the hands of the players. At the end of the concert, when there was prolonged applause which had in it something of the element of leave-taking, Dr. Muck had the orchestra rise in acknowledgment.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR 1 6

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS DON QUIXOTE

Baltimore heard something really modern in effect in music last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, played Richard Strauss' Don Quixote, Opus 35, at the Lyric, at the fifth and last of the orchestra's local concerts of the season. Once, the audience all but laughed outright at a series of unusual instrumental effects. Beethoven's second symphony and Wagner's Tannhauser overture were the other instrumental pieces played. Geraldine Farrar, soprano, was the special soloist.

Dormant and even perfunctory, upon occassions for sometime in its concerts here, the orchestra came to life last night, and gave a more definite account of itself. There was some unevenness, occasionally many intonations in the accompaniment to Elsa's Dream from Lohengrin, sung by Miss Farrar, were out of tune, and the trumpets and kettledrums exceeded the bounds of reason in the Beethoven symphony. These were outweighed, however, by countless excellencies. The reading of the symphony and overture by Dr. Muck were unusually fine, and both he and his men worked magnificently in the Strauss piece.

Miss Farrar was received cordially and sang well the Wagner aria and Berlioz's D'amour l'ardente flamme, from La Damnation de Faust. It is probable that she gave more enjoyment to the greatest number, however, when she appeared in recital numbers earlier in the season. She was recalled many times.

Another series of five concerts is announced for next season by the orchestra, to be given on Wednesday nights.

J. N. H.

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR 1 6

TREAT BY FARR

Diva Gets Warm Rece At Boston Symphony.

Voice Has Acquired Tendency To Coarseness; Lower Registers Have Richer Quality.

Geraldine Farrar's appearance as soloist was sufficient in itself to make the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last night notable. Consequently when it is considered that, in addition to two operatic arias by this brilliant artist, the program included the first local production of one of the greatest of the Strauss tone poems, "Don Quixote," it is not surprising that the event proved one of the most thoroughly delightful of the musical season.

The concert was the last of the Boston Orchestra's local series, and was attended by an enormous audience, drawn probably more by the allure of Farrar than anything the program might have to offer. The diva was looking just as lovely, just as young, just as much the complete mistress of herself, as always. She was warmly received when she stepped from the wings, and after her arias—"Elsa's Dream" from "Lohengrin" and "D'Amour de l'Ardente Flamme" from Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust"—she was called back time and again.

Her Voice Somewhat Coarse.

Her presentation of both arias was marked with the utmost dignity and a noble simplicity of expression that was most effective. Her voice, it must be said, is not what it was a few years ago. The upper tones have acquired a tendency toward coarseness and have not their former clarity and sweetness.

But what she has lost here she has gained in a much richer quality of the lower and middle registers. Her voice has apparently become lower, having at present more of the semblance of a mezzo than a dramatic soprano. Her work in the Berlioz aria, which suited her better than Elsa's heroic song, was particularly good.

The Strauss tone poem was a sheer joy. In it the composer managed in some uncanny way to embody the very spirit of Cervantes' immortal romance. It is not only rife with beauty of a sublime order, but episodes of poignant pathos are woven into it, and there are constantly recurring flashes of broad, grotesque humor.

As an example of orchestration this score is nothing short of astounding. It is one of the few pieces of program music whose descriptive passages literally describe. The "Battle Against the Hosts of the Great Emperor A fonfaron," when it sounded for all the world as if a flock of bleating sheep was stampeding across the stage, was so obvious that it treated the audience to a hearty laugh.

Wind Machine Was Realistic.

Another vividly realistic episode was the "Ride Through the Air," in which chromatic flute runs of lightning rapidity, drum rolls and, what has never before been heard at a symphony concert here, a wind machine, created the illusion of a shrieking gale.

The music throughout is most suggestive. To philistine, academic ears much of it is undoubtedly utter nonsense, a mere jumble of sounds, produced by a crowd of musicians trying out various instruments in an entirely haphazard way.

But to the serious, receptive, broadminded musician Strauss' "Don Quixote" stands forth as a masterpiece reflecting titanic genius, a work dominated by a big, vital, unfaltering purpose.

Dr. Muck is to be congratulated for giving Baltimoreans a chance to hear it, and both he and his musicians are deserving of unqualified praise for the superb manner in which it was played. The cello and violin solos of Messrs. Warnke and Ferir, respectively, contributed much to the success of the performance.

The opening number was Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D major, a work of many beauties characterized by that elevation of spirit inseparable from the master's productions, although it is by no means one of his most inspired compositions and lacks the profundity, the definite aim of the later symphonies. The concert was closed with the "Tannhauser" overture.

W. W. B.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City.
Date

Music.

The Boston Symphony Concert—Other Music.

Each time I sit down before a piece of paper to review a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I vow to myself nothing shall betray me this time into writing one word of comment on Dr. Muck's selection of a programme. And always I am false to my vow; it is not in flesh and blood to be true. Last evening the great band from Boston played once more to a capacity house in Carnegie Hall, giving its last conce here, but one, for the season. To ope the programme Dr. Muck chose t Beethoven overture that goes by t name of "Leonore" No. 1. As we a know, No. 1, as a matter of exa chronology, is really No. 3, and N 3 really No. 2, and No. 2 really No. But let us stick to the tradition nomenclature.

The "Leonore" No. 1 overture worth playing occasionally, even b the Boston Symphony Orchestra o tour, partly for historical reason partly for its own sake, though cannot compare in worth with th No. 2 or the No. 3. The No. 2, by th way, I do not recall ever hearing ex cept in the course of some Beethove festival when most of the master's important orchestral works are gone through in a manner necessarily more or less perfunctory. Why do not the conductors give it a chance some season and the overworked No. 3 a rest? But if the first "Leonore" overture is to serve as the introductory number of a general symphony concert programme, the remainder of the programme ought to be of a sort to keep the weight of the concert up to the standard.

The overture last night introduced nothing other than Joachim's "Hungarian" concerto for violin and orchestra, which, to put the matter gently, is a deadweight rather than a makeweight. Rarely has such abysmal dulness drivelled its way from an inkwell over inoffensive music paper as in this concerto. I cannot imagine why Mr. Witek picked it out for performance, unless it be the concert-master's concerto par excellence. When Willy Hess was concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he played it here. Now his latest successor does likewise. The concerto is superlatively difficult, as difficult as it is dull. Mr. Witek is a fine artist and deserves praise for his usually successful grappling with the difficulties.

After the ordeal of the concerto one found one's self beset with a frantic thirst for hell broth or Arnold Schönberg. As a substitute one had Schumann's "Spring" symphony, a pleasant work whatever the temperature in the street, but nothing one gets much excited over in these days, though I recall a performance the Boston band gave it under Mr. Gericke's direction which was something to treasure in memory. However one may regard it, it had to carry the concert last night.

PITTS SANBORN.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

LAST VISIT OF THE BOSTON ARTISTS

Symphony Orchestra Heard at the Academy.

The fifth and last of a series of concerts which has been given at the Academy of Music this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held last evening and, as usual, the artists were greeted by a crowded house of enthusiastic music lovers.

The programme was in four parts: Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4, F minor, Op. 36; Brahm's Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80; Volkmann's Serenade for String Orchestra, F major, Op. 63, and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurenberg." Tschaikowsky's symphony is in four movements, and, as he says himself, "the introduction is the kernel, the quintessence, the chief thought of the whole symphony." The whole of the first part is given over to a dream of unhappiness and the idea of the composer is very clearly brought out. The second movement shows another phase of sadness, but here the melancholy feeling is one which enwraps one when alone and exhausted by work. There is no determined feeling expressed in the third movement—the mood is gay; then mournful. The pictures are disconnected and the impressions it leaves on one's brain come and go. In the fourth movement there is neither sadness nor real happiness, but more of an absorption in one's work and imagination. The music was most appealing and was rendered last night in a manner that called for long and pronounced applause.

Brahm's Academic Festival is a combination of German university students songs done in a symphony. There are certain airs running through the symphony that are familiar to all music lovers of folk songs. It has often been described as "a long and elaborate fantasia in which one's music thoughts run wild."

Volkmann's Serenade is in four movements, as follows: Allegro moderato, molto vivace, waltz, march. The movements are simple and most appealing. It is said that the waltz of this inspired Eugene Field to write a fairy story and after hearing it as played last night one can readily believe that this is true.

The prelude to the Meistersinger, which closed the programme, is so familiar to all music lovers that criticism is unnecessary except to say that the orchestra played it last night with all the beautiful shades which have come to be under one of the most alluring things of this wonderful opera of Wagner's.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date AR 17 1916

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck chose Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture as the first number of his final evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall last night. It is interesting historically, but does not compare with the famous number three. The concert master, Mr. Witek, played the long and dreary concerto "in the Hungarian manner" of Joseph Joachim, famous as violinist, but not as composer. Subtle sarcasm probably lurked in Philip Hale's quoting, in the programme notes, an authority who wrote concerning this concerto that "it is very long." Mr. Hale also inserted an essay by Edwin Evans to beguile the "longwhilishness" of the forty-minute concerto. It was played in a dry manner, with not altogether faultless intonation, by Mr. Witek, whose memory played him false in the last movement. To his credit be it said that he did not try to bluff it out, but looked on Dr. Muck's score till he had found his place.

Schumann's "Spring Symphony" was like a breath of fresh air after coming out of a close room. It may not have coincided with the weather outside, but it was a delight to listen to from beginning to end. At its close Dr. Muck and the whole orchestra had to acknowledge the abundant applause. Schumann is still a name to conjure with.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date MAR 1 9 1916

Orchestra from Boston Plays Its Farewell

Only German Music on Last Programme of Season—Audience Applauds Musicians.

With an all-German programme, the ton Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, played its farewell of the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to an audience that was measured only by the capacity of the auditorium.

Although the applause of the audience was not of the most enthusiastic sort yet it was hearty, and it seemed to indicate full appreciation of those parts of the programme that were especially well played, such as the Scherzo and the finale of Beethoven's Second Symphony, with which the afternoon began. This number was followed by "Brahms' Academic Festival Overture," and then came a soloist's number with Anton Witek, violinist, and Emile Ferir, viola player, giving a scholarly and dignified interpretation of Mozart's Concertante Symphonie.

But the best number came last, the programme ending with Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg. This was brilliantly played and enthusiastically applauded and sent everybody home in the best of musical spirits.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date MAR 1 9 1916

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Close of Its New York Season at Its Fifth Afternoon Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra finished its doings in New York for the present season at its fifth concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was made up mostly of matter well known to musical amateurs, though Mozart's "Concertante Symphonie" for violin and viola is not so often played that it can be called well known. It was presented yesterday by Mr. Witek, the concertmaster, and Mr. Férir, the first viola: an admirable performance, thoroughly in sympathy with the spirit of this beautiful music, by two players who viewed it eye to eye and were in thorough understanding with each other.

The symphony was Beethoven's second, which Dr. Muck played with much spirit and with an especial beauty in the larghetto. There was humor in Brahms's "Academic Festival Overture." The final number was the prelude to Wagner's comedy, "Die Meistersinger." Dr. Muck took the tempo rather fast, as it seemed, with not much of the moderation and yielding of the beat that some find called for in the transitions between the various sections. There was splendor of tone and an unusual clarity in passages where clarity is indispensable to let the listeners feel the force of the combinations of themes.

There was much applause for Dr. Muck and his men, and a prolonged round at the end of the concert, doubtless intended as a farewell.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Dr. Muck's Orchestra Gives Most Pleasure in Schumann's Work.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last of its Thursday evening concerts for the season at Carnegie Hall last night, though the organization will be heard again on Saturday afternoon. The program arranged by Dr. Muck consisted of Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 1, Joachim's concerto "in the Hungarian manner" for violin and orchestra, in which the solo part was played by Mr. Witek, concertmaster of the organization, and Schumann's symphony No. 1 in B flat, sometimes called the "Spring" symphony.

With the exception of Schumann's symphony this was unfamiliar matter to a certain extent. Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 1 is not often heard, for when a conductor wishes to represent Beethoven's opera, "Fidelio," on the concert stage he more often chooses out of the overtures written for it the "Leonore" No. 3, and Joachim's concerto has fallen into disuse. It has not been played in so long a time that the remembrance of when it was actually last heard does not come to light readily.

The concerto is very difficult to play. It abounds in involved passages at break-neck speed and there is frequent use of double-stopping and chord playing. Nowadays, when mere virtuosity is not at such high premium as it formerly enjoyed, the florid style of the work has not as much power as it once had. Mr. Witek's mastering of its difficulties was not entirely successful. Though there were many beautiful bits of work, especially in the second movement, toward the end there were some roughness and some unfortunate results in the double-stopping. Once his memory apparently failed for the moment—a happening one could understand in this work—and he resorted to the conductor's score.

Probably the most pleasure of the evening was given by Schumann's symphony, whose frankness, energy, and joyousness found fitting expression at the hands of the players. At the end of the concert, when there was prolonged applause which had in it something of the element of leave-taking, Dr. Muck had the orchestra rise in acknowledgment.

TAR
Baltimore, Md.
MAR 1 6

ON ORCHESTRA PLAYS DON QUIXOTE

Baltimore heard something really modern in effect in music last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, played Richard Strauss' Don Quixote, Opus 35, at the Lyric, at the fifth and last of the orchestra's local concerts of the season. Once, the audience all but laughed outright at a series of unusual instrumental effects. Beethoven's second symphony and Wagner's Tannhauser overture were the other instrumental pieces played. Geraldine Farrar, soprano, was the special soloist.

Dormant and even perfunctory, upon occassions for sometime in its concerts here, the orchestra came to life last night, and gave a more definite account of itself. There was some unevenness, occasionally many intonations in the accompaniment to Elsa's Dream from Lohengrin, sung by Miss Farrar, were out of tune, and the trumpets and kettledrums exceeded the bounds of reason in the Beethoven symphony. These were outweighed, however, by countless excellencies. The reading of the symphony and overture by Dr. Muck were unusually fine, and both he and his men worked magnificently in the Strauss piece.

Miss Farrar was received cordially and sang well the Wagner aria and Berlioz's D'amour l'ardente flamme, from La Damnation de Faust. It is probable that she gave more enjoyment to the greatest number, however, when she appeared in recital numbers earlier in the season. She was recalled many times.

Another series of five concerts is announced for next season by the orchestra, to be given on Wednesday nights.

J. N. H.

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR 1 6

TREAT BY FARRAR

Diva Gets Warm Reception At Boston Symphony.

Voice Has Acquired Tendency To Coarseness; Lower Registers Have Richer Quality.

Geraldine Farrar's appearance as soloist was sufficient in itself to make the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last night notable. Consequently when it is considered that, in addition to two operatic arias by this brilliant artist, the program included the first local production of one of the greatest of the Strauss tone poems, "Don Quixote," it is not surprising that the event proved one of the most thoroughly delightful of the musical season.

The concert was the last of the Boston Orchestra's local series, and was attended by an enormous audience, drawn probably more by the allure of Farrar than anything the program might have to offer. The diva was looking just as lovely, just as young, just as much the complete mistress of herself, as always. She was warmly received when she stepped from the wings, and after her arias—"Elsa's Dream" from "Lohengrin" and "D'Amour de l'Ardente Flamme" from Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust"—she was called back time and again.

Her Voice Somewhat Coarse.

Her presentation of both arias was marked with the utmost dignity and a noble simplicity of expression that was most effective. Her voice, it must be said, is not what it was a few years ago. The upper tones have acquired a tendency toward coarseness and have not their former clarity and sweetness.

But what she has lost here she has gained in a much richer quality of the lower and middle registers. Her voice has apparently become lower, having at present more of the semblance of a mezzo than a dramatic soprano. Her work in the Berlioz aria, which suited her better than Elsa's heroic song, was particularly good.

The Strauss tone poem was a sheer joy. In it the composer managed in some uncanny way to embody the very spirit of Cervantes' immortal romance. It is not only rife with beauty of a sublime order, but episodes of poignant pathos are woven into it, and there are constantly recurring flashes of broad, grotesque humor.

As an example of orchestration this score is nothing short of astounding. It is one of the few pieces of program music whose descriptive passages literally describe. The "Battle Against the Hosts of the Great Emperor Alifonfaron," when it sounded for all the world as if a flock of bleating sheep was stampeding across the stage, was so obvious that it treated the audience to a hearty laugh.

Wind Machine Was Realistic.

Another vividly realistic episode was the "Ride Through the Air," in which chromatic flute runs of lightning rapidity, drum rolls and, what has never before been heard at a symphony concert here, a wind machine, created the illusion of a shrieking gale.

The music throughout is most suggestive. To philistine, academic ears much of it is undoubtedly utter nonsense, a mere jumble of sounds, produced by a crowd of musicians trying out various instruments in an entirely haphazard way.

But to the serious, receptive, broad-minded musician Strauss' "Don Quixote" stands forth as a masterpiece reflecting titanic genius, a work dominated by a big, vital, unfaltering purpose.

Dr. Muck is to be congratulated for giving Baltimoreans a chance to hear it, and both he and his musicians are deserving of unqualified praise for the superb manner in which it was played. The cello and violin solos of Messrs. Warnke and Ferir, respectively, contributed much to the success of the performance.

The opening number was Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D major, a work of many beauties characterized by that elevation of spirit inseparable from the master's productions, although it is by no means one of his most inspired compositions and lacks the profundity, the definite aim of the later symphonies. The concert was closed with the "Tannhauser" overture.

W. W. B.

EVENING GLOBE
ss: New York City.

Music.

The Boston Symphony Concert—Other Music.

Each time I sit down before a piece of paper to review a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I vow to myself nothing shall betray me this time into writing one word of comment on Dr. Muck's selection of a programme. And always I am false to my vow; it is not in flesh and blood to be true. Last evening the great band from Boston played once more to a capacity house in Carnegie Hall, giving its last concert here, but one, for the season. To open the programme Dr. Muck chose the Beethoven overture that goes by the name of "Leonore" No. 1. As we all know, No. 1, as a matter of exact chronology, is really No. 3, and No. 3 really No. 2, and No. 2 really No. 1. But let us stick to the traditional nomenclature.

The "Leonore" No. 1 overture is worth playing occasionally, even by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on tour, partly for historical reasons, partly for its own sake, though it cannot compare in worth with the No. 2 or the No. 3. The No. 2, by the way, I do not recall ever hearing except in the course of some Beethoven festival when most of the master's important orchestral works are gone through in a manner necessarily more or less perfunctory. Why do not the conductors give it a chance some season and the overworked No. 3 a rest? But if the first "Leonore" overture is to serve as the introductory number of a general symphony concert programme, the remainder of the programme ought to be of a sort to keep the weight of the concert up to the standard.

The overture last night introduced nothing other than Joachim's "Hungarian" concerto for violin and orchestra, which, to put the matter gently, is a deadweight rather than a makeweight. Rarely has such abysmal dulness drivelled its way from an inkwell over inoffensive music paper as in this concerto. I cannot imagine why Mr. Witek picked it out for performance, unless it be the concert-master's concerto par excellence. When Willy Hess was concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he played it here. Now his latest successor does likewise. The concerto is superlatively difficult, as difficult as it is dull. Mr. Witek is a fine artist and deserves praise for his usually successful grappling with the difficulties.

After the ordeal of the concerto one found one's self beset with a frantic thirst for hell broth or Arnold Schönberg. As a substitute one had Schumann's "Spring" symphony, a pleasant work whatever the temperature in the street, but nothing one gets much excited over in these days, though I recall a performance the Boston band gave it under Mr. Gericke's direction which was something to treasure in memory. However one may regard it, it had to carry the concert last night.

PITTS SANBORN.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

LAST VISIT OF THE BOSTON ARTISTS

Symphony Orchestra Heard at the Academy.

The fifth and last of a series of concerts which has been given at the Academy of Music this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held last evening and, as usual, the artists were greeted by a crowded house of enthusiastic music lovers.

The programme was in four parts: Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4, F minor, Op. 36; Brahm's Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80; Volkmann's Serenade for String Orchestra, F major, Op. 63, and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurenberg." Tschaikowsky's symphony is in four movements, and, as he says himself, "the introduction is the kernel, the quintessence, the chief thought of the whole symphony." The whole of the first part is given over to a dream of unhappiness and the idea of the composer is very clearly brought out. The second movement shows another phase of sadness, but here the melancholy feeling is one which enwraps one when alone and exhausted by work. There is no determined feeling expressed in the third movement—the mood is gay; then mournful. The pictures are disconnected and the impressions it leaves on one's brain come and go. In the fourth movement there is neither sadness nor real happiness, but more of an absorption in one's work and imagination. The music was most appealing and was rendered last night in a manner that called for long and pronounced applause.

Brahm's Academic Festival is a com-bination of German university studen songs done in a symphony. There a certain airs running through the sym-phony that are familiar to all music lovers of folk songs. It has often been described as "a long and elaborate fantasia in which one's music thoughts run wild."

Volkmann's Serenade is in four movements, as follows: Allegro moderato, molto vivace, waltz, march. The movements are simple and most appealing. It is said that the waltz of this inspired Eugene Field to write a fairy story and after hearing it as played last night one can readily believe that this is true.

The prelude to the Meistersinger, which closed the programme, is so familiar to all music lovers that criticism is unnecessary except to say that the orchestra played it last night with all the beautiful shades which have come to b under one of the most alluring things this wonderful opera of Wagner's.

---

m EVENING POST
lress: New York City
te 17 1916

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck chose Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture as the first number of his final evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall last night. It is interesting historically, but does not compare with the famous number three. The concert master, Mr. Witek, played the long and dreary concerto "in the Hungarian manner" of Joseph Joachim, famous as violinist, but not as composer. Subtle sarcasm probably lurked in Philip Hale's quoting, in the programme notes, an authority who wrote concerning this concerto that "it is very long." Mr. Hale also inserted an essay by Edwin Evans to beguile the "longwhilishness" of the forty-minute concerto. It was played in a dry manner, with not altogether faultless intonation, by Mr. Witek, whose memory played him false in the last movement. To his credit be it said that he did not try to bluff it out, but looked on Dr. Muck's score till he had found his place.

Schumann's "Spring Symphony" was like a breath of fresh air after coming out of a close room. It may not have coincided with the weather outside, but it was a delight to listen to from beginning to end. At its close Dr. Muck and the whole orchestra had to acknowledge the abundant applause. Schumann is still a name to conjure with.

WORLD

New York City

MAR 19 1916

By PIERRE V. R. KEY.

NOW that the New York and the Boston Symphony Orchestras have closed their regular seasons in this city, and with the schedule of the Philharmonic to be completed during the week, a good many people are undergoing a reflective process. Some feel that the community has had all that it should wish for, others that deficiencies have prevailed which might have been remedied. So far as quantity goes, New York has been abundantly supplied. Many of the best orchestra compositions ever written have been played, but too many were performed which are not what the majority of the public desires to be fed upon. In the main, the interpretative accomplishment has given satisfaction, with the Boston organization leading and the two local orchestras fighting valiantly for a position close up. Adherents of each of these musical bodies have stood stanchly for the one particularly admired, and those strongly in favor either of the Philharmonic or the New York musicians declare that substantial artistic progress has ensued.

With respect to the Philharmonic this is true. This orchestra has undergone a gradual change in personnel in the last three years, and the marked improvement noticeable this season came after several new members took their places. The New York Symphony Society disclosed no conspicuous growth in the season just concluded, nor did the Boston Symphony. What the latter organization did disclose, however, was a weakness in the making of programmes that tried the souls of even the most enthusiastic devotees of the so-called "greatest orchestra in the world," a title which is causing some people to wonder a bit.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been coming to this city for thirty years, and during a large part of this time ten programmes a season have been divided among the five evening and five afternoon concerts. For a decade it has been difficult for persons other than subscribers to secure tickets of admission because the patronage has reached the high-water mark. But during last season and this the programmes Dr. Muck has arranged have begun to pall. Many old-time patrons would not wish to openly admit that they have been bored, but quite a number do admit it. Some go so far even as to state that an interesting Boston Symphony programme in this city is an exception—which is entirely correct.

Whether Dr. Muck will not or cannot prepare programmes that impress most of the people as desirable we do not know. What bothers those who have long admired this splendid aggregation of musicians is that he does not. Occasional deviations from the ideal choice and arrangement of compositions must be expected in any series of orchestral concerts. It is only when these deviations become seemingly permanent that the public frets and complains.

While neither Josef Stransky nor Walter Damrosch are great conductors, in the superlative sense, eacsh provides his patrons with works that are generally welcome to hear. Mr. Damrosch is one of the ablest programme-makers living, a fine musician, with the gift of selecting appropriate compositions and putting them in their right places. And while the Philharmonic's musical leader has not this unerring sense of his colleague he is at least successful in a moderate degree.

What New York needs for its fullest orchestral development, and what it deserves to have, is the greatest of symphony orchestras directed by a supreme conductor with ability and prestige that match perfectly. Messrs. Damrosch and Stransky are able up to a certain point, they have done considerable for music in this community and they are striving conscientiously to broaden the undoubted usefulness of their respective institutions. Dr. Muck has done far less for New Yorkers, despite his scholarly qualities.

Consistently superlative playing of approximately perfectly-made orchestral programmes is possible only with a body of instrumentalists of the finest quality, drilled and led by a truly great conductor. The Philharmonic is playing this year better than ever before, yet attacks are often ragged and its execution of an entire number is seldom up to its occasional best efforts. The New York Symphony, though often admirable in tone and precision, likewise shines only in spots. The Boston Orchestra attains a slightly higher degree of perfection in technique and unanimity and its tone is pure, but there is lacking that enthusiasm which a conductor might infuse with more temperament than Dr. Muck displays.

For what we have there should be, and is, a feeling of gratitude. Yet that should not restrain those who recognize New York as the music centre of the world from a desire to see it improve where improvement should come. The city is entitled to an orchestral conductor who can command the unswerving support of all, regardless of factional tendencies. Such a man, for instance, as Arthur Nikisch, were he at the head of the finest orchestra possible to assemble, could earn the high salary he asks. And some day, perhaps, New York will have such a pre-eminent conductor and such an orchestra, an organization giving concerts in its own auditorium and on a scale of artistic breadth still to be attained.

* * *

From

Address

Date

EAGLE
, N. Y.

Estab

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Last of the Season, in a Capital Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed this season's series of concerts in Brooklyn last evening at the Academy of Music with a programme devoted entirely to orchestral music, no soloist appearing. This is a form of entertainment preferred, one is assured, by thoroughly scholarly musicians; there are a few people in Brooklyn who are so "high-browed" that they patronize the Manhattan concerts of the Boston Symphony, in order to avoid this catering to the popular preference in the matter of soloists. The programme offered by Dr. Muck, while it presented nothing striking in the way of novelty, was thoroughly interesting and far from hackneyed. The first half was given over to Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, which has been heard less frequently than any of his other symphonies, except, perhaps, the two early ones. This work, written in the happiest of the composer's somber moods, contains some wonderfully beautiful passages, although they are less compelling than the eloquence of the "Pathetique." The themes given to the wood-winds in the first movement were especially beautiful, while the entire second and third movements met with enthusiastic applause by the audience. Of the two, the "Scherzo" movement is much more unusual, since all of the strings are played "pizzicati," giving an effect not only of whimsical loveliness, but, at the same time, suggesting the peasant music of Southeastern Russia. The fourth movement introduces the folk-song theme, without which no composition of Tschaikowsky's is complete.

Brahms' "Academic Overture" introduced the second half of the programme. That orchestral tour de force was written on the occasion of his receiving a Ph. D. degree from Breslau University. Employing student songs as themes, Brahms regarded it as a sort of musical joke, and for delicate, scholarly, musical satire, the work is, perhaps, unexcelled. As a joke, it is hardly a very rollicking one; it is humor for the intellectuals, and not for the comic supplement. Much of the amusing quality is, doubtless, lost on American audiences, who do not know the German student songs, phrases from which are used as thematic material.

The greatest novelty of the evening was the "Serenade for String Orchestra," by Friederick Robert Volkmann, a Saxon composer, the hundredth anniversary of whose birth was celebrated last April in Budapest, where for years he taught composition at the Royal Musical Academy. The dainty and rather formal selection, for strings only, suffered in being played between Brahms and Wagner, as a finely finished verse of Stedman's would, if read between selections from Milton and Browning. In contrast with those two giants, the pleasing character of Volkmann's waltzes had a suspiciously sugar-and-water flavor. The serenade has not been given by the Boston Symphony since 1909.

The Meistersinger Overture, good old favorite that it is, rounded out a typical Boston Symphony programme, and, when all is said, there is nothing quite like the Boston Symphony. Needless to state, practically every the Academy was filled.

From STANDARD UNION

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date MAR 18 1916

1884

BOSTONIANS CLOSE SYMPHONIC SEASON

Following by five days the farewell of the Philharmonic Orchestra, the Boston Symphony players last night gave their last concert of the season at the Academy of Music. The concert ended the symphonic season in Brooklyn. Dr. Karl Muck had selected a programme for his "good-bye" that strongly resembled the one given on Sunday by Conductor Stransky, opening with a Tschaikowsky symphony and closing with the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." It was a programme more on the "popular" order than Dr. Muck has given in a long time and drew one of the biggest audiences. Between the symphony and the prelude, the Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture" and Volkmann's serenade for string orchestra were played.

The Bostonians have been coming to Brooklyn for the past twenty-eight years, and in recent years their playing has been of such perfection that it has called for nothing but admiration, except for occasional coldness and too much restraint. But last night, playing the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, most emotional of composers, they swept through it with a warm-blooded passion that stirred the usually sedate audience to tumults of applause. The whole band was called to rise and bow after the pizzacato scherzo, which was plucked on the strings superbly. The brasses rang out the "Fate Theme" with unapproachable beauty of tone and Dr. Muck kept the instruments so well balanced that not a note was lost. This balance of instruments was best exemplified, however, in the counterpoint of the "Meistersinger" prelude, where the five motives were always audible, not clouded in the usual thickness of tone. The Brahms overture, with its basic student songs showed the composer far from the "high-priest" mood that has caused the dictum of "exit in case of Brahms." It was Brahms on a holiday and a most delightful one. The Volkmann serenade was unimportant, but restful. A bit of syncopation in the second movement lent a little rag-time gaiety to an otherwise perfectly decorous work.

The concert ended a series of five, in which Dr. Muck gave a wide variety of compositions. The only composers whose names appear twice in the list are Beethoven, Brahms and Mozart. The only new composition was Schelling's exciting "Impressions from an Artist's Life."

From TIMES

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date MAR 18 1916

k, 1884

THE BOSTON CONCERT.

No Soloist, But Orchestra Delights the Audience.

The fifth and last of a series of concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard by a large and fashionable audience at the Academy of Music last night. TShe program consisted of four parts: Tschaikowsky's symphony, No. 4, in four movements; Volkmann's "Serenade for Strings in F Major, No. 2;" Brahm's "Academic Festival" overture and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The first selection seemed to make the greatest appeal to the audience, and there were several encores. There was no soloist last night, but the work of the orchestra was so appealing that nothing of the delight of the most unusual musical organization was missing.

From PRESS

Address: New York City

Date MAR 19 1916

Est 1884

MUCK GIVES FINAL CONCERT

Unusual Gayety Marks Programme of Boston Symphony.

In a mood of unusual gayety, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony, yesterday afternoon gave the audience which filled Carnegie Hall for his last concert of the season a fine programme, marred only by its arrangement.

Beethoven's Second symphony, that naive, joyful symphony, was the first piece, played with consummate artistry. There followed Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture, with its rollicking song-themes, and after that came Mozart's "Concertante Symphonie," for violin and viola, in E flat major. The prelude to "Die Meistersinger" concluded.

After the Beethoven, Brahms sounded more trivial than it is, and after Brahms, Mozart seemed unnaturally thin; and yet all might have stood in their proper light by simply playing them in a different order. Of course, the numbers were given with the utmost finish and animation.

In the Mozart "symphony" Anton Witek, violin, and Emile Ferir, viola, showed again the truth of the saying that "every player in the Boston orchestra is a virtuoso."

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 19 1916

The season of orchestral concerts is practically at an end. Some few special entertainments are still to come, but the Symphony Society and the Boston organization have finished and the Philharmonic has three more dates to fill. The Russian Symphony performers closed their subscription series last night. The Philadelphians are to descend upon us once more, bringing the eighth symphony of Gustave Mahler. This work has already been produced in the city of brotherly scrapple, and it is announced for repetitions on the evenings of April 3, 4 and 5. A symphony put on for a run! What can Mr. Brady think of that?

However that is not the matter of this moment. What should be in the mind just now is a humble supplication to Dr. Muck that he will use his most vigorous resolution in the course of the summer to persuade himself to abandon his campaign against us. As he and all other Prussians know we are an excessively long suffering people, easy going, helpless to defend ourselves, and in general the "easiest mark" in the civilized world.

But we do not have to go to concerts for which programmes appear to have been prepared chiefly for the purpose of boring us. We respectfully submit that a triumphant German propaganda would be more certainly founded on a process of skilful delusion. The distinguished Count Johann von Bernstorff could give Dr. Muck many valuable lessons in the art of fooling the American people to the top of their bent without driving them to hostile activities.

It is whispered that Dr. Muck's public attitude of discontent is the outcome of his inner fuming over the publicly expressed anti-Germanism of so many Americans. His programmes have sometimes been badly made, and he has compelled us sometimes to listen to dull and uninteresting music.

Now music lovers of this town are addicted to the Boston Symphony habit, and they get great joy from hearing the polished and exquisite performances of the players from the East; but it is possible to make them tired, and many of them complain to this writer that Dr. Muck has done so this season.

Perhaps the war will end before the next season of music begins. Many expert military judges fear it will last another year or two. But whatever may be the outcome, will not the good Dr. Muck let us off from the Bruckner and the "Antar" and the things one hears on a mountain and all those variations? Or if we must swallow such food let us have it better sandwiched.

Herald
- Sun. Mar. 26 -

Mr. Josef Hofmann, talking with Miss Harriette Brower about pianists and piano playing, was reported in Musical America of March 18.

"I am playing a number of times with orchestras here (New York). You have good ones in America."

"The Boston Symphony, for instance?"

"A very fine orchestra, but I do not enjoy playing with it, as the conductor, Dr. Muck, has little regard for the soloist. Indeed he does not greatly care to have a soloist, as he considers his orchestra sufficient without. The soloist receives little or no consideration. That is the reason I shall not again play with the organization. An orchestra should take the part of an accompaniment, and although the conductor directs it, he should not make himself prominent enough to detract from the soloist, but should, for the time being, efface himself. This the conductor of the New York Symphony is able to do. After we have played together five or six times, we come to be in perfect accord."

These remarks will amuse those that remember Mr. Hofmann's extraordinary behavior in Boston when he last played at the Symphony concerts.

On Dec. 12, 1913, he gave a fine performance of Schumann's Concerto, a performance that is still remembered with pleasure, although Mr. Hofmann for some reason or other saw fit to absent himself from rehearsal, and did not even meet Dr. Muck beforehand to explain his interpretation, when Dr. Muck had gone out of his way to make an engagement.

At the following concert Dec. 13 Mr. Hofmann took incredible liberties with the music, making grotesque changes in tempi and in the manner of phrasing. But Dr. Muck is not easily confused, and the performance ended without a serious accident. When Mr. Hofmann left the stage he was hissed by certain members of the orchestra, who were justly indignant.

Mr. Hofmann afterwards justified his conduct by saying that he had heard of Dr. Muck's dislike of soloists. He not only justified his behavior, but rather boasted of the "joke" he had played on the conductor.

Strange as it may seem, Dr. Muck and Mr. Hofmann had not met until the latter appeared at these concerts.

"The soloist receives little or no consideration," says Mr. Hofmann. We should like to hear from Messrs. Kreisler, Paderewski, Bauer, Gabrilowitsch, Mmes. Melba, Culp, not to mention others who have been accompanied by this orchestra under Dr. Muck's direction.

And there are less famous soloists, young singers and pianists, who could tell of the pains taken by Dr. Muck in rehearsal, of his kindness toward them. We know of one instance where he spent over an hour with a pianist after the orchestra had been dismissed, and gave her practically a piano lesson that was of great advantage to her in the performance.

Mr. Hofmann says: "I shall not again play with the organization." This is in all probability true.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
FRIDAY, MARCH 24,

SOLOIST REVIVES PIANO CONCERTO OF MACDOWELL

SANDERS THEATER, Cambridge—Seventh concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, with Miss Alice Eldridge as soloist; evening of March 23. The program: Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 4 in F minor, op. 36; MacDowell, concerto for piano and orchestra in D minor, No. 2, op. 23; Dvorak, "Husitska" overture, op. 67.

MacDowell wrote his concerto in the eighties, a time when his countrymen were breaking away from post-bellum, reconstruction ideals and were taking hold of the ideals of industrial organization and trade exploitation. The composer was a youth and a student exile at this period when the people of the United States were undergoing a change of national sentiment. Yet he knew something of what was stirring in the hearts of those at home and he expressed it in his music. Had he not been so far away he might have got the thing a good deal better. For as it was, his expression was incomplete and one-sided.

From the middle to the end of the eighties was one of the most self-confident times the country ever knew. It was also one of the most self-distrustful; for while the people welcomed new opportunities for expressing themselves, they parted regretfully with old ones. So there was a certain undercurrent of melancholy, ranging from wistful doubt up to complete skepticism, observable in the popular thought. And this gloomy side of the situation is what MacDowell felt and recorded in his second piano concerto.

As one of the very few documents in the larger forms of music that contain American sentiment, this work is well worth being kept in the repertory of the Symphony orchestra. Even from general considerations of artistic plan and workmanship, its pages are as well worth while as those of the opening and closing movements of the fourth Tschaikowsky symphony and far more worth while than those of the Dvorak "Hutsiska" overture. So the concerto did not suffer by comparison with the standard works between which it stood, barring mention, of course, of the incomparable scherzo of the Tschaikowsky fourth symphony.

BOSTON HERALD,
MARCH 25.

SYMPHONY PLAYERS GIVE 18TH CONCERT

Performance Is of Highest Order—Dr. Muck Especially Succesful in Bringing Out Best Efforts of Hill's Symphonic Poem — Heinrich Warnke Is Soloist.

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Heinrich Warnke, first violoncellist of the orchestra, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Overture, "The Barber of Bagdad" .... Cornelius
Concerto in A minor, for 'cello and orchestra .... Volkmann
"The Parting of Lancelot and Guinevere, "Symphonic Poem after Stephen Phillips, First time in Boston .... Hill
Symphony in A major, "Italian." ...... Mendelssohn

Mr. Hill's symphonic poem, composed in 1914-15, was performed for the first time in St. Louis by the St. Louis Symphonic Orchestra on the 31st of last December.

Few composers have been fortunate in the treatment of any subject taken from the Arthurian legends. With the exception of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde"—what is there? "Merlin," "Elaine," "Le Roi Arthus," Jonciere's "Lancelot," other operas by Germans or Englishmen have at once failed, or have had no long life in the theatre. The purely orchestral pieces inspired by the legends have scarcely had a better fate. Chausson's "Viviane" is at the best a pretty pastel. MacDowell's "Lancelot and Elaine" is not among his more important works, and the composer said to us more than once, that not satisfied with it, he proposed to re-write it. "All I remember about it is that it was too full of horns." Who now knows Averkamp's symphonic poem or the cantatas by Englishmen? Guinevere, Elaine, Vivien, have been as unfortunate as Joan of Arc in music, whether they appeared in flesh and blood on the stage or were typified by themes in the concert hall.

A poem of Stephen Phillips moved Mr. Hill to write his music. Mr. Hill is known here and in other cities as a musician of pure taste and high ideals. His music for "Pan and the Star" contained pages of true fancy, music that was delicately and dexterously scored. In the symphonic poem played yesterday there are some fine moments, harmonic and orchestral. This was to be expected of a composer who has studied intelligently the compositions of the ultra-modern French. It would have been better if in writing this poem he had resolutely put out of his head any thought of modern French schemes and methods; if he had written boldly and in his own way what was within him and must out. There might then have been crudities in expression, but there might also have been a broader plan, a more virile expression, bold tonal painting instead of tints and demi-tints. The poem as it stands is lacking in line and substance. The music is too vague, too preparatory of something that does not come. There is one charming episode. The one that presumably tells of the past love scene. On the other hand there are vexing repetitions of unimportant phrases, melodic sequences that do not come to an effective climax, and an abuse of figures for horns and trumpets.

The overture of Cornelius is an agreeable pot-porri with pleasing patter, with warm and tender themes. Why did Mr. Warnke exhume the concerto of Volkmann? He had already played it at a Symphony concert, so we all knew it was in his repertoire. This concerto is amiable and weak, now sugary, now groping and dull, dismally sentimental. Mr. Warnke played with a devotion worthy of a better cause.

Nor is the symphony of Mendelssohn an inspiring one. It is known as the "Italian," probably because there is so little of Italy in it. The music is smug, always genteel in Mendelssohn's polished manner. At the Carnival at Rome he was embarrassed because some young women, whom he hardly knew, threw confetti at him. He summoned up courage to take off his hat to them, and at last, when a "delicate young English woman" pelted him, he "became quite desperate" and, clutching the confetti, he "flung them back bravely." In the same spirit he wrote this symphony. It had not been played here for nearly ten years. Let us hope that it will not be played again until 1936. Then many of us who were at the concert yesterday can say with Barzillai, the Gileadite, to the King inviting him:

"I am this day fourscore years old; and can I discern between good and evil? Can thy servant taste what I eat, or what I drink? Can I hear any more the voice of singing men and singing women?"

The orchestral performance throughout was of a high order. Dr. Muck took great pains with Mr. Hill's Symphonic poem, to bring out all possible effects. American composers owe Dr. Muck a heavy debt of gratitude. No conductor labored more

---

BOSTON POST,
MARCH 25, 1916

TONE POEM BY BOSTON COMPOSER

Symphony Performs Hill's Work for First Time

BY OLIN DOWNES

Edward Burlingame Hill's symphonic poem, "The Parting of Launcelot and Guinevere," after the poem of Stephen Phillips, was played for the first time anywhere, at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon, in Symphony Hall. There was more than ordinary curiosity about this work, because of Mr. Hill's already unusual accomplishments as a composer. Few American musicians have become so finely masters of their craft. Mr. Hill, solidly grounded as a musician, has been a curious and earnest student of all modern music. He has investigated with the broadest appreciation. He has acquainted himself with the most significant discoveries of contemporaneous composers of all schools. He has an exceptional mastery of the orchestra, and a native refinement of style. He had chosen a subject which invited musical expression.

ROMANCE AND TRAGEDY

In the poem of Phillips, Launcelot and Guinevere meet once more, after Guinevere has immured herself in a convent. Launcelot rides out of the night—there is momentary suggestion in the music of hoof beats, a suggestion rather fanciful than literal—and in the shadow of the convent walls implores a kiss. It is denied him.

There is the memory of a May night and of the kisses that brought ruin. Guinevere hopes yet to see God. As two trees sway in the night wind, these lovers bend longingly toward each other. But Launcelot departs, weeping, through the forest, and Guinevere, like one dead, is born away.

The music suggests the quivering night, when every flower is a menace to the peace of the soul, and the appearance of Launcelot, whose theme is a fanfare given to trumpets and horns. The music rises and falls in climaxes of emotion. There is the suggestion of the leave taking, the parting of fate that rules with a merciless hand.

Mosaic of Small Motifs

The longing theme of Guinevere, the knightly music of Launcelot, are combined and developed, in modern fashion, with the aid of the myriad colors of the modern orchestra. In this tone-poem there are passages of value, moments when the music takes flight and carries the hearer on its wings. The introduction and the preparation of the Launcelot theme, certain climatic passages which immediately follow, the scene of the farewell—all this is conceived with sincerity and at times with real expressive power. But the work as a whole does not correspond to the best of its component parts. The composer's flight is not sustained. The music, which at times develops a broad line, remains, in the writer's opinion, a mosaic of small motifs, combined in sections [illegible]

Mr. Hill has written honorably, sometimes with true and moving eloquence and with a quality of workmanshi which must command the respect o every musician. But we prefer othe of Mr. Hill's compositions.

Refuses to Bow

There was prolonged applause afte this performance. Dr. Muck returne several times to the stage, but th composer, who was present, did no show himself to the multitude. Many composers have done this at Symphony concerts, and with less occasio for doing so.

The remainder of the programm consisted of Cernelius' overture to "Th Barber of Bagdad"; Volkmann's 'cell concerto in A minor, and Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony. One suspect Liszt of more than a little editing o Cornelius music, which, in its best estate, is excellent music for a comedy. It has piquant rhythms and harmonies and the instrumentation, in whic Liszt had a hand, is truly modern, ful of brilliancy and color. Dr. Muck conducted an excellent performance.

Mr. Warnke set himself a difficul task. Volkmann's concerto is by no thoroughly a bore, with a pervadin monotory of mood and tonality, an many passages of a wholly conventional character. The instrumentatio is also dull, relieved by incongruou and a unintentional humor when a flut answers a basson or some other instrument of low register and the 'cell interjects short phrases, also in a lo register, as suggestive of the gruntin of a dissatisfied porker as of anything else. Mr. Warnke's performance, in itself, was admirable. It was righteous to perform again the genial symphony of Mendelssohn, which found much favor.

[127]

1

Herald – Sun. M. 26

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 19 1916

The season of orchestral concerts is practically at an end. Some few special entertainments are still to come, but the Symphony Society and the Boston organization have finished and the Philharmonic has three more dates to fill. The Russian Symphony performers closed their subscription series last night. The Philadelphians are to descend upon us once more, bringing the eighth symphony of Gustave Mahler. This work has already been produced in the city of brotherly scrapple, and it is announced for repetitions on the evenings of April 3, 4 and 5. A symphony put on for a run! What can Mr. Brady think of that?

However that is not the matter of this moment. What should be in the mind just now is a humble supplication to Dr. Muck that he will use his most vigorous resolution in the course of the summer to persuade himself to abandon his campaign against us. As he and all other Prussians know we are an excessively long suffering people, easy going, helpless to defend ourselves, and in general the "easiest mark" in the civilized world.

But we do not have to go to concerts for which programmes appear to have been prepared chiefly for the purpose of boring us. We respectfully submit that a triumphant German propaganda would be more certainly founded on a process of skilful delusion. The distinguished Count Johann von Bernstorff could give Dr. Muck many valuable lessons in the art of fooling the American people to the top of their bent without driving them to hostile activities.

It is whispered that Dr. Muck's public attitude of discontent is the outcome of his inner fuming over the publicly expressed anti-Germanism of so many Americans. His programmes have sometimes been badly made, and he has compelled us sometimes to listen to dull and uninteresting music.

Now music lovers of this town are addicted to the Boston Symphony habit, and they get great joy from hearing the polished and exquisite performances of the players from the East; but it is possible to make them tired, and many of them complain to this writer that Dr. Muck has done so this season.

Perhaps the war will end before the next season of music begins. Many expert military judges fear it will last another year or two. But whatever may be the outcome, will not the good Dr. Muck let us off from the Bruckner and the "Antar" and the things one hears on a mountain and all those variations? Or if we must swallow such food let us have it better sandwiched.

Mr. Josef Hofmann, talking with Miss Harriette Brower about pianists and piano playing, was reported in Musical America of March 18.

"I am playing a number of times with orchestras here (New York). You have good ones in America."

"The Boston Symphony, for instance?"

"A very fine orchestra, but I do not enjoy playing with it, as the conductor, Dr. Muck, has little regard for the soloist. Indeed he does not greatly care to have a soloist, as he considers his orchestra sufficient without. The soloist receives little or no consideration. That is the reason I shall not again play with the organization. An orchestra should take the part of an accompaniment, and although the conductor directs it, he should not make himself prominent enough to detract from the soloist, but should, for the time being, efface himself. This the conductor of the New York Symphony is able to do. After we have played together five or six times, we come to be in perfect accord."

These remarks will amuse those that remember Mr. Hofmann's extraordinary behavior in Boston when he last played at the Symphony concerts.

On Dec. 12, 1913, he gave a fine performance of Schumann's Concerto, a performance that is still remembered with pleasure, although Mr. Hofmann for some reason or other saw fit to absent himself from rehearsal, and did not even meet Dr. Muck beforehand to explain his interpretation, when Dr. Muck had gone out of his way to make an engagement.

At the following concert Dec. 13 Mr. Hofmann took incredible liberties with the music, making grotesque changes in tempi and in the manner of phrasing. But Dr. Muck is not easily confused, and the performance ended without a serious accident. When Mr. Hofmann left the stage he was hissed by certain members of the orchestra, who were justly indignant.

Mr. Hofmann afterwards justified his conduct by saying that he had heard of Dr. Muck's dislike of soloists. He not only justified his behavior, but rather boasted of the "joke" he had played on the conductor.

Strange as it may seem, Dr. Muck and Mr. Hofmann had not met until the latter appeared at these concerts.

"The soloist receives little or no consideration," says Mr. Hofmann. We should like to hear from Messrs. Kreisler, Paderewski, Bauer, Gabrilowitsch, Mmes. Melba, Culp, not to mention others who have been accompanied by this orchestra under Dr. Muck's direction.

And there are less famous soloists, young singers and pianists, who could tell of the pains taken by Dr. Muck in rehearsal, of his kindness toward them. We know of one instance where he spent over an hour with a pianist after the orchestra had been dismissed, and gave her practically a piano lesson that was of great advantage to her in the performance.

Mr. Hofmann says: "I shall not again play with the organization." This is in all probability true.

MONITOR, BOSTON
FRIDAY, MARCH 24,

SOLOIST REVIVES PIANO CONCERTO OF MACDOWELL

SANDERS THEATER, Cambridge—Seventh concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, with Miss Alice Eldridge as soloist; evening of March 23. The program: Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 4 in F minor, op. 36; MacDowell, concerto for piano and orchestra in D minor, No. 2, op. 23; Dvorak, "Husitska" overture, op. 67.

MacDowell wrote his concerto in the eighties, a time when his countrymen were breaking away from post-bellum, reconstruction ideals and were taking hold of the ideals of industrial organization and trade exploitation. The composer was a youth and a student exile at this period when the people of the United States were undergoing a change of national sentiment. Yet he knew something of what was stirring in the hearts of those at home and he expressed it in his music. Had he not been so far away he might have got the thing a good deal better. For as it was, his expression was incomplete and one-sided.

From the middle to the end of the eighties was one of the most self-confident times the country ever knew. It was also one of the most self-distrustful; for while the people welcomed new opportunities for expressing themselves, they parted regretfully with old ones. So there was a certain undercurrent of melancholy, ranging from wistful doubt up to complete skepticism, observable in the popular thought. And this gloomy side of the situation is what MacDowell felt and recorded in his second piano concerto.

As one of the very few documents in the larger forms of music that contain American sentiment, this work is well worth being kept in the repertory of the Symphony orchestra. Even from general considerations of artistic plan and workmanship, its pages are as well worth while as those of the opening and closing movements of the fourth Tschaikowsky symphony and far more worth while than those of the Dvorak "Hutsiska" overture. So the concerto did not suffer by comparison with the standard works between which it stood, barring mention, of course, of the incomparable scherzo of the Tschaikowsky fourth symphony.

BOSTON HERALD,
MARCH 25.

SYMPHONY PLAYERS GIVE 18TH CONCERT

Performance Is of Highest Order—Dr. Muck Especially Succesful in Bringing Out Best Efforts of Hill's Symphonic Poem — Heinrich Warnke Is Soloist.

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Heinrich Warnke, first violoncellist of the orchestra, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Overture, "The Barber of Bagdad"....Cornelius
Concerto in A minor, for 'cello and orchestra ....Volkmann
"The Parting of Lancelot and Guinevere," Symphonic Poem after Stephen Phillips. First time in Boston.......Hill
Symphony in A major, "Italian."......Mendelssohn

Mr. Hill's symphonic poem, composed in 1914-15, was performed for the first time in St. Louis by the St. Louis Symphonic Orchestra on the 31st of last December.

Few composers have been fortunate in the treatment of any subject taken from the Arthurian legends. With the exception of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde"—what is there? "Merlin," "Elaine," "Le Roi Arthus," Jonciere's "Lancelot," other operas by Germans or Englishmen have at once failed, or have had no long life in the theatre. The purely orchestral pieces inspired by the legends have scarcely had a better fate. Chausson's "Viviane" is at the best a pretty pastel. MacDowell's "Lancelot and Elaine" is not among his more important works, and the composer said to us more than once, that, not satisfied with it, he proposed to re-write it. "All I remember about it is that it was too full of horns." Who now knows Averkamp's symphonic poem or the cantatas by Englishmen? Guinevere, Elaine, Vivien, have been as unfortunate as Joan of Arc in music, whether they appeared in flesh and blood on the stage or were typified by themes in the concert hall.

A poem of Stephen Phillips moved Mr. Hill to write his music. Mr. Hill is known here and in other cities as a musician of pure taste and high ideals. His music for "Pan and the Star" contained pages of true fancy, music that was delicately and dexterously scored. In the symphonic poem played yesterday there are some fine moments, harmonic and orchestral. This was to be expected of a composer who has studied intelligently the compositions of the ultra-modern French. It would have been better if in writing this poem he had resolutely put out of his head any thought of modern French schemes and methods; if he had written boldly and in his own way what was within him and must out. There might then have been crudities in expression, but there might also have been a broader plan, a more virile expression, bold tonal painting instead of tints and demi-tints. The poem as it stands is lacking in line and substance. The music is too vague, too preparatory of something that does not come. There is one charming episode. The ne that presumably tells of the past ve scene. On the other hand there re vexing repetitions of unimportant hrases, melodic sequences that do not ome to an effective climax, and an buse of figures for horns and trum- ts.

The overture of Cornelius is an agre- le pot-porri with pleasing patter, with rm and tender themes. Why did Mr. rnke exhume the concerto of Volk- n? He had already played it at a phony concert, so we all knew it in his repertoire. This concerto is ble and weak, now sugary, now ng and dull, dismally sentimental. Warnke played with a devotion y of a better cause.

is the symphony of Mendelssohn piring one. It is known as the n," probably because there is so Italy in it. The music is smug, genteel in Mendelssohn's po- manner. At the Carnival at Rome embarrassed because some omen, whom he hardly knew, onfetti at him. He summoned ge to take off his hat to them. ast, when a "delicate young oman" pelted him, he "became erate" and, clutching the con- flung them back bravely." In spirit he wrote this symphony. t been played here for nearly Let us hope that it will not again until 1936. Then many were at the concert yester- y with Barzillai, the Gilea- King inviting him: is day fourscore years old; discern between good and thy servant taste what I eat rink? Can I hear any more singing men and singing performance through- high order. Dr. Muck took with Mr. Hill's Symphonic at all possible effects. composers owe Dr. Muck a of gratitude. No conductor

---

BOSTON POST,
MARCH 25, 1916

TONE POEM BY BOSTON COMPOSER

Symphony Performs Hill's Work for First Time

BY OLIN DOWNES

Edward Burlingame Hill's symphonic poem, "The Parting of Launcelot and Guinevere," after the poem of Stephen Phillips, was played for the first time anywhere, at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon, in Symphony Hall. There was more than ordinary curiosity about this work, because of Mr. Hill's already unusual accomplishments as a composer. Few American musicians have become so finely masters of their craft. Mr. Hill, solidly grounded as a musician, has been a curious and earnest student of all modern music. He has investigated with the broadest appreciation. He has acquainted himself with the most significant discoveries of contemporaneous composers of all schools. He has an exceptional mastery of the orchestra, and a native refinement of style. He had chosen a subject which invited musical expression.

ROMANCE AND TRAGEDY

In the poem of Phillips, Launcelot and Guinevere meet once more, after Guinevere has immured herself in a convent. Launcelot rides out of the night—there is momentary suggestion in the music of hoof beats, a suggestion rather fanciful than literal—and in the shadow of the convent walls implores a kiss. It is denied him.

There is the memory of a May night and of the kisses that brought ruin. Guinevere hopes yet to see God. As two trees sway in the night wind, these lovers bend longingly toward each other. But Launcelot departs, weeping, through the forest, and Guinevere, like one dead, is born away.

The music suggests the quivering night, when every flower is a menace to the peace of the soul, and the appearance of Launcelot, whose theme is a fanfare given to trumpets and horns. The music rises and falls in climaxes of emotion. There is the suggestion of the leave taking, the parting of fate that rules with a merciless hand.

Mosaic of Small Motifs

The longing theme of Guinevere, the knightly music of Launcelot, are combined and developed, in modern fashion, with the aid of the myriad colors of the modern orchestra. In this tone-poem there are passages of value, moments when the music takes flight and carries the hearer on its wings. The introduction and the preparation of the Launcelot theme, certain climatic passages which immediately follow, the scene of the farewell—all this is conceived with sincerity and at times with real expressive power. But the work as a whole does not correspond to the best of its component parts. The composer's flight is not sustained. The music, which at times develops a broad line, remains, in the writer's opinion, a mosaic of small motifs, combined in sections rather than a [illegible]

Mr. Hill has written honorably, sometimes with true and moving eloquence and with a quality of workmanship which must command the respect of every musician. But we prefer other of Mr. Hill's compositions.

Refuses to Bow

There was prolonged applause after this performance. Dr. Muck returned several times to the stage, but the composer, who was present, did not show himself to the multitude. Many composers have done this at Symphony concerts, and with less occasion for doing so.

The remainder of the programme consisted of Cornelius' overture to "The Barber of Bagdad"; Volkmann's 'cello concerto in A minor, and Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony. One suspects Liszt of more than a little editing of Cornelius music, which, in its best estate, is excellent music for a comedy. It has piquant rhythms and harmonies, and the instrumentation, in which Liszt had a hand, is truly modern, full of brilliancy and color. Dr. Muck conducted an excellent performance.

Mr. Warnke set himself a difficult task. Volkmann's concerto is by now thoroughly a bore, with a pervading monotory of mood and tonality, and many passages of a wholly conventional character. The instrumentation is also dull, relieved by incongruous and a unintentional humor when a flute answers a basson or some other instrument of low register and the 'cello interjects short phrases, also in a low register, as suggestive of the grunting of a dissatisfied porker as of anything else. Mr. Warnke's performance, in itself, was admirable. It was righteous to perform again the genial symphony of Mendelssohn, which found much favor.

[127]

Y
GIVE NCERT

Highest Or-Especially nging Out of Hill's — Heinrich

TRANSCRIPT.

MARCH 25.

HE SYMPHONY CONCERT

OUTINE RELIEVED BY BAND AND CONDUCTOR

greeable Music from Cornelius, Mendelssohn and Volkmann Much Glamored by the Performance—Mr. Warnke as the Poised 'Cellist—For Novelty Mr. Hill's Cerebral Tone-Poem

BETWEEN them, yesterday, Dr. Muck, Mr. Warnke and the orchestra clothed with mild interest a Symphony Concert that might otherwise have been routine. The tradition of occasional "homage" to Mendelssohn by the performance of one of his symphonies still lingers, and it is possible to recall with amusement the excited discovery of Mr. Fiedler that none had been played for many a season and the clapping of "The Scotch" forthwith into almost the final programme of the year. For this intermittent "homage" that same "Scotch" has gradually become the serviceable symphony; no one nowadays thinks twice about "The Reformation"; while, for ten years until yesterday Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler had equally overlooked "The Italian." Like much other music, so labelled and written in a day when the pursuit of local color and the impression of place is much keener than it was in Mendelssohn's time, the symphony belies its name. Though he conceived it and worked upon it in Italy, he might seemingly have written it as plausibly in his own Berlin or his cherished London. The Victorian commentators liked to say that the first movement expressed the joy of living; but even in Boston it is possible to feel and—in a measure—release that mood. The second—they affirmed—was akin in sentiment to the recounting in tones of old romantic tales; but they may be retold in any time and place when the impulse possesses the teller. The minuet—they suggested—is a lyric of warm and musing content, a temper that does not necessarily imply local color. The truth is that the only Italian suggestion in Mendelssohn's symphony springs from the saltarello out of which he builds his Finale. He heard the dance that he transmutes into "art-music" in the highways of Naples or Rome; but he might as readily have read it off an engraved page in Berlin and decked and developed it in his father's garden.

In this twentieth century, most of us listen to the "Italian" symphony as so much "absolute" music and find it pretty, pleasing and dexterously made. The melodic ideas are lucid, limpid, flowing, ingratiatingly mellifluous, agreeably touched with sentiment, developed with smiling orthodoxy, ready resource and amiable detail. About it, as about so much of Mendelssohn's music even to this day, hangs the suggestion of high-spirited, sensitive and sentimental youth, very well-bred, very much at ease with itself, with an engaging aptitude for the invention and the manipulation of tones. In spite of "Elijah" and other pieces of his final years, Mendelssohn seems sometimes the composer "who never grew up," and not a little of his music that the twentieth-century likes best to hear—the "Sea-Calm" overture, for example, or the prelude and intermezzi for "A Midsummer Night's Dream"—is fullest of this youthful freshness of impression and eagerness of voice Yet with all its spirit, the speech is always suave and elegant. Because Mendelssohn's music is so smoothly and skilfully made, and because the symphonie at least are played in these days only as "fitting homage," the temptation is stron upon conductor and orchestra merely t reel them off and have done. Dr. Muc is too intelligent and conscientious, t resolved to give any and all music vitalizing and characteristic speech, to let eve the Mendelssohn of the symphonies merely "slide." The euphonies of the orchestra yesterday might have melted the composer's ear; the zest of the rhythms might have warmed his spirit; the pure and plastic flow of his instrumental song, with little heightening strokes sparkling like ripples upon it, might have seemed the music of his imagination as well as of his pen. The performance did more than reanimate and glamor the symphony. It gave it character and not altogether faded glory.

Conductor and orchestra did like service to Cornelius's overture to his operatic comedy, "The Barber of Bagdad," which somehow gained and has somehow kept—perhaps through illustrious eulogists—a reputation hard to discover in intrinsic deserts. It is all very well to write, as Mr. Weingartner does, of "the poet-musician, Peter Cornelius"; now and then audiences hear one or another of his songs that mildly justifies the designation; but this overture to "The Barber of Bagdad" is no more than happily imagined and skilfully conducted preluding to an amusing light opera that happens to be of Oriental scene and episode—exuberant patter at the beginning; pompous parody at the end; light energy and chortling vivacity throughout, diversified here and there with sentimental, fanciful and tender song. A pleasurable piece but hardly more in the routine of opera house or concert-room, but yesterday sounding like a brilliant little masterpiece of spirited and sparkling improvisation, when the strings raced and twittered through the patter in the lightest of rhythmic stroke; when the brasses paid mellow homage to the barber; when the horns and the wood-winds lent their gentle and colorful song; when the whole orchestra glinted with the gaiety of the music and the gaiety of its own virtuosity. Once more as in not a few Symphony Concerts of the year, the performanc was more stimulating than the piece.

It was so again with the concerto that Mr. Warnke played, according to the annual lot of the first 'cellist of the band; becomingly rising from his place when his turn came and as becomingly resuming it as soon as the hearty and friendly applause of the audience gave him leave. He chose Volkmann's concerto, again mellifluous, sentimental, dexterous music, easy to scorn yet not displeasing pastime to hear. The piece is not so long as to make the limited speech of the 'cello tedious; it does not waste instrument and virtuoso on dry and tricky passage-work for the expert ear and none other; it keeps songful measures and bravura episodes within the normal voice of the bass of the string choir; unlike most such concertos—and played as it was yesterday—it has a distinct, if faded charm. Over-emphasis would make it saccharine; routine would make it dull; but Mr. Warnke, as his way is when he turns "soloist," played it in perfect poise—with edgeless and lustrous tone, flowing always yet plastic to every impulse of the music; with light ease and sureness in running ornament, displayful interval or artful transition; with agreeable sentiment for the music and much finer feeling for the gentle and grave voice of the violoncello itself. Mr. Warnke is no forthputting and showy virtuoso; those who must have a big thing in a big way would call him ineffective; yet few 'cellists of our day have his sensibility and skill with the subtleties and the suavities of the 'cello. They are quite as interesting as its large and orotund voice and a deal more unusual.

The contrasting piece to these three was Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill's tone-poem, "The Parting of Lancelot and Guinevere," originally heard at St. Louis three months ago, then described in these columns and now deservedly played at the Symphony Concerts. Not that it is remarkable music in itself; probably Mr. Hill himself would not so contend; but it is as interesting and individual in its kind and degree as many a composition from German, French, Russian and English pens that easily gained room in orchestral concerts in the United States when scores and parts came readily over-sea. Confronted by notable music, Dr. Muck, Mr. Stock, Mr. Damrosch, Mr. Stokowski and the other conductors have been quick to play it whatever the hand that fashioned it. Before new music that, so to say, was all in the day's work, they have sometimes seemed—perhaps by unconscious impulse—to prefer the foreign to the native composer. Agreed that not a measure of music should be played because an American has written it, unless it also deserves performance for its own intrinsic sake. But the error of conductors in the past—an error, however, into which Dr. Muck has seldom fallen—was to prefer the average foreign product to the average American product, half by natural inclination and half because it was usually better made. Not a few pieces by European hands have been played in Boston and in many another American city that were not one whit more interesting and impressive than Mr. Hill's tone-poem. As many have been played that fell far below the accomplishment of Mr. Carpenter in his recent suite of the tone-baby or of Mr. Schelling in his remembered variations. We might not have heard either had not the publishing and the exportation of music nearly ceased in Europe; while, but for that corrective condition, Mr. Hill's piece would hardly have been produced at all. This equalized opportunity for American composers of interest and individuality, even though they be of second and the third rank, is one of the consequences of war-time that deserves to outlast it.

Verses by Stephen Phillips, of like title with the tone-poem, suggested Mr. Hill's music. They record graphically and movingly the final parting of the lovers, in the pale moonlight that makes them and the convent-court shine ghostly against the surrounding darkness. Memories of meetings that were not partings haunt them; they cling together and speak their longing and their ruin, their soft ecstasies and their bitter woe. The queer swoons into the arms of her women. All the May night, distraught, the knight rides the forest. . . . Source and cause for music, surely, and for music best cast into the free body and march of a tone-poem. Mr. Hill has written it in modern and even ultra-modern wise. Short and impinging motives characterize Lancelot, Guinevere and, as it seems in the epilogue, their fate. These motives are not developed and interwoven in intricate polyphony, saturated with harmonic elaboration or drenched in instrumental color in the fashion of which may now be fairly called the Straussian generation. In the newer and current mode, which flows out of Paris rather than Munich, they are wrought, bit by bit, into a fabric of tones that is more sensitive and incisive; that seeks harmonic subtlety rather than opulence; that prefers sharp or shaded instrumental tints to ornate vesture; that relies more upon adroit modulation and sharp-set juxtaposition than upon large and emphatic manipulation of the musical mass; that addresses itself to the comprehending mind and the sympathetic imagination of the hearer rather than to his nervous excitement.

Mr. Hill is learned and apt in the new manner; he practises it out of warm and sincere conviction. He may even, with all his skill and intelligence, occasionally overdo it. His misfortune in his tone-poem is of another sort. Neither his motives nor the tonal fabric that he thus weaves out of them awakens more than answering comprehension in the hearer. Here and there, it is true, the music for an instant summons the suggestion that poet and composer would gain; for a moment there is illusion of scene, mood, passion. Then, for long, long intervals, Mr. Hill seems to be mentally working out the emotions of Lancelot and Guinevere, his own sensations from them and the music in which he would embody them. The inevitable result is as cerebral a response from his audience.

H. T. P.

MONITOR BOSTON

MARCH 25, 1916

RCHESTRA GIVES HILL'S "LANCELOT" SYMPHONIC POEM

SYMPHONY HALL—Eighteenth progra of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Ka Muck conductor, with Heinrich Warnke soloist; afternoon of March 24. The pr gram: Cornelius, "Barber of Bagdad overture; Volkmann, concerto for violo cello and orchestra in A minor, op. 33; E ward Burlingame Hill, "The Parting Lancelot and Guinevere," symphonic poe after Stephen Phillips, op. 22 (first time Boston); Mendelssohn, symphony in A m jor, "Italian," op. 90.

The writer of the new symphonic poe proves himself, as another representati of the Boston school, P. G. Clapp, on a little while ago proved himself, master of the art of modern instrume tation. He goes farther. He prov himself capable of using his techniq in setting forth idea; not of telling story and painting a picture merely, b besides that of putting on record t sentiment of his time and voicing h own convictions about it. In revivi the Lancelot and Guinevere legend does more than get up a splendid to pageant and make a parade of fine c chestral clothes and millinery. I describes the humanity amidst which lives and he states in the musicia phraseology the hopes of that humanit

Broadly speaking, Mr. Hill is the s cessor of MacDowell. He is doing mo than make the string, wood and bra choirs of the orchestra, like classes, cite lessons. He makes them, like ordinating groups of society, tell th aspirations and regulate their wills one another. He is not to be count then, among those musical arithmeticia those tone cipherers, who have tried evolve an American symphony from n combinations of Brahms, Franck, Strau and Debussy formulas. He began write his "Lancelot" poem because had something to say; and he organiz themes, rhythms, colors, moods a climaxes into a communication whi says it.

This is a symphony of contradiction a symphony of complaints and assu ances set off against each other. It at one and the same time a drama haughty egotism and of humble altr ism. Its hero is full of disdain for th world and of pity for it too. He goe on an adventure of service to the peopl and he rides rough-shod over the multitude that comes out to greet him. Suc indeed, is not the story of the music i parallel with the passage from th poetry of Phillips which the compose gives as his program. But the meanin of the poet himself is not in his actua narrative. For Phillips did not gathe up the scattered pictures of Tennyson's parting of the Knight of the Lake an Arthur's queen and unify them into hi scene just for the sake of telling wha must have actually happened. No mor did the writer of the orchestral piec turn Lancelot into a theme for trumpets and Guinevere into a theme fo English horn for the sake of getting an advantage of verity over Phillips. The message of a symphony written within the last two years by a man of alert sensibilities and of mastered technical resources would necessarily be one of a very few things. It would only be a question of the composer yielding to the impulse to record his feelings. He might pick a figure from the Round Table or from a present-day governmental cabinet and call it his subject, the course of the music would be about the same.

The new piece had the advantage of position in the middle of the program and therefore it had all possible chance of attentive hearing. It was received with favor and the composer was there to hear the applause. The music of "Lancelot," it must be admitted, was rather consistently serious. Accordingly it had to be relieved by something lively, like the Cornelius overture, by something sentimental, like the Volkmann concerto, and by something generally good humored, like the "Italian" symphony of Mendelssohn. The concerto as presented by Mr. Warnke, the 'cellist, and the orchestra was an unusually successful example of a solo piece. The 'cellist's playing was perfectly in agreement with the style of the composition and the whole performance had extraordinary symphonic quality.

BOSTON GLOBE

MARCH 25.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Edward Burlingame Hill Offers New Poem

Mrs Warnke Is Soloist in Volkmann Concerto—"Italian" Symphony

"The Parting of Lancelot and Guinevere," a symphonic poem by Edward Burlingame Hill of Harvard University, played yesterday by Dr Muck at the Symphony Orchestra concert for the first time in Boston, is based upon the lines by Stephen Phillips, the later poems have not kept the promise made by his "Herod." These empurpled, at times flamboyant lines do not add nobility to the Arthurian legend as related by Tennyson.

Lancelot, whom the older poet saw "rushing out lionlike" on Modred—"leapt on him and hurl'd him headlong"—when he trapped the lovers, is heard by Stephen Phillips to say:

> Suffer me, lady, but to kiss thy lips
> Once, and to go away for evermore.

Gentle and decorous words, suitable for a parlor drama and musical comedy. Mr Phillips evidently believed the knight a well mannered and exemplary person. Mr Hill has not taken his conception too literally from the text. His theme is the trumpets for Laicelot, the notes daring, animation, considerable boldness, if not sweeping passion, and it must not be forgotten that the hero of Arthur's tournaments failed only in this, that he went back to his own land and permited the Queen to go on to a cloister at Almesbury.

The score is laid out on a large scale. The dramatic conflict is kept uppermost in the hearer's mind. It may be said that the periods of stress would be the more intense, if they were balanced in greater degree by those of repose. The plaintive melody of Guinivere in the English horn is feminine in its distress, yet preserves the calmness expected of noble birth. There is romantic if not impassioned ardor in the parting and the gentle accents of grief. Mr Hill has treated the subject as legend, without apparent desire to emphasize the depths of tragedy.

There are ideas of pleasing, impressive character, but the orchestral treatment, combining harmonic and contrapuntal richness with clarity of scoring, the poetic quality released through the admirable instrumental coloring go farther to establish a romantic atmosphere. The performance was brilliant.

The Volkmann concerto in A minor for cello, a work with songful passages far outnumbered by pages of artificial embellishment, tedious with flourish and decoration, was played by Mr Warnke. Less given to lapses in intonation than ordinarily he played with breadth of tone and style and won warm applause.

The overture to Peter Cornelius' "The Barber of Bagdad," the opera for which Liszt fought valiantly at Weimar, and Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony were the remaining numbers of the program.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

MARCH 25, 1916.

SYMPHONY PLAYS HILL'S TONE POEM

Included in the Symphony program this week is a new tone poem composed by a Boston musician, Edward Burlingame Hill, Harvard, '94, and now on the teaching staff of his alma mater. The composition bears the title, "The Parting of Lancelot and Guinevere," and it is based upon the poem of the same title that Stephen Phillips, the English poet, wrote a decade ago. It was played in St. Louis last December by Max Zach's orchestra.

The verses are brief and to the point, and so is the music, which at times is like unto a literal translation into tones of the dramatic scene described so concisely yet vividly in Phillips' blank verse. The composition is strongest in the vision it presents of the moment of the dolorous parting, but it hardly does justice to the scene where Lancelot enters the nunnery and, as he catches sight of Guinevere, recalls that "night in May, with pulsing stars," and "perfumed darkness," and loving intercourse. The ardor and the ecstacy were painted academically by the composer. The music did not suggest any great and glowing passion.

Mr. Hill's success, in this instance, is rather a matter of technic than of temperament. The poem is expertly scored and in the latest style. It evoked but faint applause yesterday.

Volkmann's exceptionally interesting concerto for 'cello and orchestra was performed yesterday for the first time since 1907 and with the same soloist who appeared then—Heinrich Warnke, leader of the 'cello section of the orchestra. Mr. Warnke's smooth and musicianly performance was heartily applauded.

Dr. Muck read the other two numbers on the program, "The Barber of Bagdad" overture, by Cornelius, and Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, in masterly fashion.

One of the most important novelties of the season, a symphony by Frederick A. Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, will be played at next week's concerts. It is a long and difficult composition. There will be only one more number on this 19th program, Bizet's first "L'Arlesienne" suite.

DAILY ADVERTISER,

MARCH 25, 1916

SYMPHONY CONCERT WITH NEW WORK

BOSTON COMPOSER, E. B. HILL, WINS SUCCESS

Fine 'Cello Soloist Another Feature of Unexciting Program

BY LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Cornelius—"Barber of Bagdad" Overture.
Volkmann Concerto, Violoncello and Orchestra.
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.
E. B. Hill—"Lancelot and Guinevere." Symphonic Poem.
Mendelssohn—Italian Symphony.

The "Barber of Bagdad" overture is not the one that was originally composed for the opera. The first performance of the opera was a failure, and the overture failed along with the rest of the undramatic work. But in the matter of the overtrue Liszt agreed with the critics and urged young Cornelius to write another one introducing typical themes from the work. Liszt himself retouched the orchestration. The result was a work which has held its place upon the repertoire.

The theme which begins the overture and is used freely thereafter as thematic material, is the bombastic song of the barber in which he vaunts all his wonderful accomplishments. That witty Viennese bonehead, Dr. Eduard Hanslick, found this quite unfitting and said: "Such a grandiloquent barber probably shaves with guillotines instead of with ordinary razors." He had probably never read "The Tale of the Tailor" in the Arabian Nights, or he would have found the theme eminently fitting. There were contrasts against this "patter-song" and the wood-wind had some charming work to do and did it well.

Had the "Barber of Bagdad" had more stage action it would have been a great success, for the libretto is witty and the music charming, but the modern opera demands more than this. Nevertheless we do not find sufficient basis for hailing Cornelius as "the German Cherubini," as some of the Lisztians and Wagnerians did.

Volkmann's Violoncello Concerto had more to say for itself than the rather tepid Suite of three weeks ago, and its suave measures suited well to that conservative and sterling artist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke. Mr. Warnke's tone is always pure and sympathetic. His technique is without flaw: his playing never sensational. One feels a sense of security in listening to such an artist, which, in itself, is a delight. Mr. Warnke is evidently in sympathy with Volkmann, for it is not so very long ago since we heard him in the 'cello part of the Serenade by that composer, and he has played this concerto at the concerts once before.

There was much to admire in the work and in the serene manner in which it was played. It transported us to a world where diminished chords of the thirteenth, dissonances resolving into worse dissonances, and 15-8 rhythms were unknown, where the laws laid down by Albrechtsberger or Richter were still observed. Yet we must not give the impression that Volkmann was a case-hardened harmonic martinet; he was too much a disciple of Schumann for that; but his Muse seems very gentle in these modern days. The last section of the concerto (the movements are joined together) had a few touches of the composer of the "Richard III." overture, but the work as a whole was very self-restrained. Mr. Warnke was twice recalled with very spontaneous enthusiasm and his excellent playing deserves this tribute.

About all that is left of Mendelssohn orchestrally is his overtures, and perhaps his Scotch symphony. His Reformation symphony slumbers upon the shelf, and his Italian symphony is seldom dusted and taken down as it was yesterday afternoon. Yet, there are mighty few men alive who can write such fluent and melodic counterpoint as is found in the slow movement of this work. Its gently saddened measures suit admirably to the violas and these instruments played most exquisitely in this movement, which remains the best part of the symphony. Usually Mendelssohn was the best of Scherzo composers. He caught up the dainty humor of this movement much better than the massive power of other portions of symphonic work, yet, in this symphony the Scherzo is not equal to those of the Reformation or the Scotch symphonies. Perhaps he concentrated his merry-making upon the finale, but this Saltarello is not half as good a picture of a Roman Carnival as that created by Berlioz. Even though the work was applauded, we see no good reason for resuscitating the Italian symphony any more than there would be for reviving Maria Edgeworth's novels. The Saltarello was whipped up to a high speed, which made it seem more spicy than it really is.

Dr. Muck is certainly not neglecting the native composer and we had a pleasant surprise yesterday in hearing a new Symphonic poem by a resident Boston composer, Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill. A student who has been with Chadwick and with the incipient American Bizet, Frederic F. Bullard, could scarcely avoid obtaining some strength of expression and emotional power. But we confess that we did not know that Mr. Hill had such a grasp upon the modern orchestra as he exhibits in this score. The story of "The Parting of Lancelot and Guinevere" is founded upon a poem by Stephen Phillips, the English poet who has scarcely yet won the fame that he deserves.

The work was short, as modern compositions go, and was heavily scored. It dealt with an intense subject, too intense for any but the greatest composer. It has a disadvantage in the fact that the emotions of the hero and heroine are similar and the composer can only contrast despair against despair, but a contrast is gained by portraying memories of their past happiness:—

> "Deep as first love,
> And wild with all regret,"

(to quote Tennyson instead of Phillips) and Mr. Hill managed to attain good coherency in his work in spite of much tortuous harmony. There were guiding themes which were afterwards skilfully interwoven and developed. There was dissonance enough to picture all the shrieks, cries and swoonings of the unhappy pair who often shed very chromatic tears. At times the brasses seemed muted permanently.

There is more in this composition than a first hearing can possibly reveal to the average auditor, and we were glad to see Dr. Muck twice recalled at the end of its performance.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date ____ MA
Esta 384

The Season's Orchestral Concerts---A Total of More Than 125 Given in New York---New Compositions That Were Heard.

THE orchestras of New York have all brought their series of concerts to a close. The season of music is thereby known to be near its end; though the givers of recitals seem to be no more aware of the coming of Spring, nor to feel the need of discontinuing their activities, than the snow-laden storm clouds have been aware of the vernal equinox. Orchestral music has been intensively cultivated in New York this season, as it has been in recent years. Within the compass of less than twenty-two weeks there have been well over a hundred orchestral concerts given in the city. The provision might be supposed to be ample, and perhaps too ample. Yet the fact seems to be that the audiences for orchestral music are steadily increasing in size and in the eagerness with which they listen; presumably, also, in their willingness to pay for tickets.

The established orchestras have had large audiences. The New York Symphony Orchestra, playing in Aeolian Hall, felt obliged to print an announcement on its Bulletin to the effect that "not only was the hall completely sold out for all the Symphony Society's concerts, but hundreds of people have been turned away on the days of the concerts." The Philharmonic Society, giving many more concerts in the much larger Carnegie Hall, has had large audiences—especially at concerts when the soloist exerted an unusual attraction. The hall was often practically full. As has been the case for a good many years, at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall every seat has been subscribed for the whole of the two series, and there is a large and impatient waiting list of would-be subscribers. There have been very large audiences frequently at the concerts given on Sunday nights in the Metropolitan Opera House; but any who should deduce a strong love for orchestral music from this fact would be overlooking the drawing powers of the operatic and other soloists.

The Philharmonic Society has given 46 concerts in Manhattan, including 4 Saturday evening concerts and 2 intended for "young people." The New York Symphony Society's two regul subscription series numbered 24, besides which it gave 3 so-called gala concerts, 2 of which were preceded by so-called public rehearsals, making the total of its performances 29. There were 6 Young People's Concerts. The Russian Symphony Orchestra gave a subscription series of 4 and appeared in others. The People's Symphony Society gave 3. The series on Sunday nights at the Metropolitan Opera House will have numbered 19. These make a total of 117. Besides these there were others. Several were given by such organizations as the Young Men's Symphony Society and the Orchestral Society. The Minneapolis Orchestra came a long way to add one to New York's abundance. The Philadelphia Orchestra is coming next month to play Mahler's gigantic symphony. No doubt there have been more than 125 orchestral concerts of high class in New York in the present season.

⁂

It is perhaps needless to say that if these orchestral concerts are regarded in the light of "business," most of the business has been conducted at a loss, and generally a very large loss. How large a loss is not always set forth in the reports of the several organizations. It is well known that the two principal orchestras of New York, the Philharmonic and the New York Symphony, are obliged to meet an annual deficit. They do this, as everybody knows, on the ground that the giving of orchestral concerts is not a business like another, but the provision of artistic nutriment for which the public will not and cannot be expected to pay at a rate to cover the cost; an educational enterprise, such as are the great universities, that are carried on at a cost far beyond any sum that their tuition fees bring them in, and that must be heavily endowed; or it could be compared to the great museums and public libraries, which are for the public benefit, and in this country acquire most of their resources from private endowment or are aided by large grants of public money.

It will therefore be said by the supporters of the orchestras that their deficits do not indicate a bad adjustment of supply to demand. If the concerts are largely attended and properly enjoyed, the whole object has been attained, and the cost is cheerfully met by public-spirited people of wealth as their contribution to the general good. The Philharmonic Society has the great bequest of the late Joseph Pulitzer and the added income of the "membership," who contribute, as members of the Metropolitan Museum of Art and the Natural History Museum contribute, to carry on an edifying work. The New York Symphony Society has H. H. Flagler, who has undertaken to supply the difference between the public's contribution in the purchase of tickets and the cost of running the orchestra. Henry L. Higginson does the same in the case of the Boston Orchestra. The vast audiences which attend the concerts in New York bring in a balance which may very likely not pay the cost of bringing the concerts to New York, and which, even if it does, must be some-ow adjusted on his books as a part f the profit and loss account of the vhole enterprise. The People's Symphony Concerts are more ostensibly a philanthropic undertaking than any others of the kind in New York; and he Russian Symphony concerts have been a method of propaganda in which somebody has had enough interest to pay for.

The fact that the principal orchestral series in New York have been largely attended and have gradually acquired a large body of faithful followers will go far toward allaying the suspicion that the city has been supplied with music beyond its needs. There might, indeed, be discussion as to how much music a city like New York "needs"; how much it can assimilate; whether it is oversupplied, whether less would be more fully appreciated, more highly valued. Indeed, an announcement made last week shows a belief on the part of some that the less prosperous citizens of New York are under present conditions not sufficiently provided with orchestral music. Certain wealthy philanthropists are arranging for a fund with which to give a series of twenty concerts of high quality at prices of admission ranging from 10 to 50 cents. The idea is, of course, not new, though it has never been carried out here on so extensive a scale. Its value will be tested by its results, and its permanence will depend on the lasting quality of the philanthropic promptings behind it. For such an undertaking is, of course, purely philanthropic, and has even less to do with business than the orchestral concerts at present given in New York.

⁂

An unusually large number of new compositions have been presented by the orchestras this season. The American composer has been benefited by this activity; and in a natural and wholesome way, as the peers of other modern composers, needing no special devices for nursing, coddling, or exploiting.

The Philharmonic Society gave a belated first performance, so far as relates to New York, of Edward MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lancelot and Elaine." Seth Bingham's Fantasy for orchestra, A. Walter Kramer's two symphonic sketches, "Chant Nêgre" and "Valse Triste"; Fritz Stahlberg's suite for orchestra, and Edmund Severn's concerto for violin (heard for the first time with orchestra) are more contemporaneous, and were all done in the presence and no doubt to the encouragement of their composers. Besides these, Mr. Stransky produced for the first time Max Reger's Variations on a theme of Mozart, Op. 132, one of the most recent productions of the too fecund Bavarian; Arnold Schoenberg's "Pelléas et Mélisande," an important contribution to the discussion of the question whether its composer is one of the great men of the future, though it is not in his latest "manner." Less important were Jean Sibelius's "Die Okeaniden," Zdenko Fibich's idyll, "At Evening"; Dargomijsky's "Casatchoque." Mr. Grainger played Frederick Delius's remarkable pianoforte concerto for the first time in New York.

Mr. Damrosch made some interesting expositions of current American production. John A. Carpenter's suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," showed most ingratiatingly the talent and skill and originality of the young Chicago musician. The first symphony of Victor Kolar, one of the first violin players of the orchestra, whose music has been played by it before, showed at once his nationality as a Bohemian and his study with Dvorak, through its finely effective qualities. The excerpts from Mr. Damrosch's own music to "Iphigenia in Aulis" and the prelude to Daniel Gregory Mason's music for "The Pageant of Cape Cod" were both incidental music and music for an occasion; yet both showed qualities of distinction and permanent value. Mr. Damrosch likewise made his contribution to the great Schoenberg discussion by performing his "Kammersinfonie." The excerpts from Maurice Ravel's pantomime ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe," were a sequel to excerpts from the same work performed last season. Also of the French school were Alfred Bruneau's suite from "L'Attaque du Moulin," Florent Schmitt's "Pupazzi." Delius had his representation on these programs, too, with his two "mood pictures," "Summer Night on the River" and "On Hearing the First Cuckoo." Almost as significant as a first performance was the repetition of David Stanley Smith's overture, "Prince Hal," which was played for the first time publicly, though it had been heard last season at a concert given for the meeting of the National Institute of Arts and Letters. Miss Marcia Van Dresser's singing of Gustav Mahler's set of songs with orchestra, "Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen," showed them to be one of the most original of the composer's works.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's sole contribution of new compositions was Ernest Schelling's "Impressions from an Artist's Life, in form of Variations on an Original Theme," a brilliant and imaginative composition. The Russian Symphony Orchestra may be counted to add to the list of new works by Russian composers. This season it has played Igor Stravinsky's First Symphony, Moussorgsky's extravagant and striking six tableaux, "Exhibition Pictures"; Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Serbian Fantasy," Glazunoff's "Overture on Three Grecian Themes," and an orchestral arrangement of Rachmaninoff's fantasia for two pianos.

Mr. Stransky has gone ahead with due caution in the performance of Liszt's works, for which the Pulitzer bequest is in part a direct subsidy. He has found it prudent to confine himself to four of the symphonic poems, "Tasso," the "Battle of the Huns," "Orpheus," besides the popular "Préludes," the noisy orchestration of the Second Hungarian Rhapsody, and the Hungarian "Sturmmarsch"—matter for Sunday popular concerts. A few of the songs have appeared on the programs, the concerto in A, and the Hungarian Fantasy. So long as Mr. Stransky avoided the portentous symphonies, the rest of the symphonic poems, and other orchestral works that are seldom aroused from their slumbers, the letter of the law will be fulfilled and the audiences much relieved.

One more important orchestral concert is impending that will add a new work to the list of orchestral music heard for the first time in New York. The Philadelphia Orchestra comes, under the auspices of the Society of the [129]

DAILY ADVERTISER,

MARCH 25, 1916

SYMPHONY CONCERT WITH NEW WORK

BOSTON COMPOSER, E. B. HILL, WINS SUCCESS

Fine 'Cello Soloist Another Feature of Unexciting Program

BY LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Cornelius—"Barber of Bagdad" Overture.
Volkmann Concerto, Violoncello and Orchestra. Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.
E. B. Hill—"Lancelot and Guinevere." Symphonic Poem.
Mendelssohn—Italian Symphony.

The "Barber of Bagdad" overture is not the one that was originally composed for the opera. The first performance of the opera was a failure, and the overture failed along with the rest of the undramatic work. But in the matter of the overtrue Liszt agreed with the critics and urged young Cornelius to write another one introducing typical themes from the work. Liszt himself retouched the orchestration. The result was a work which has held its place upon the repertoire.

The theme which begins the overture and is used freely thereafter as thematic material, is the bombastic song of the barber in which he vaunts all his wonderful accomplishments. That witty Viennese bonehead, Dr. Eduard Hanslick, found this quite unfitting and said: "Such a grandiloquent barber probably shaves with guillotines instead of with ordinary razors." He had probably never read "The Tale of the Tailor" in the Arabian Nights, or he would have found the theme eminently fitting. There were contrasts against this "patter-song" and the wood-wind had some charming work to do and did it well.

Had the "Barber of Bagdad" had more stage action it would have been a great success, for the libretto is witty and the music charming, but the modern opera demands more than this. Nevertheless we do not find sufficient basis for hailing Cornelius as "the German Cherubini," as some of the Lisztians and Wagnerians did.

Volkmann's Violoncello Concerto had more to say for itself than the rather tepid Suite of three weeks ago, and its suave measures suited well to that conservative and sterling artist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke. Mr. Warnke's tone is always pure and sympathetic. His technique is without flaw: his playing never sensational. One feels a sense of security in listening to such an artist, which, in itself, is a delight. Mr. Warnke is evidently in sympathy with Volkmann, for it is not so very long ago since we heard him in the 'cello part of the Serenade by that composer, and he has played this concerto at the concerts once before.

There was much to admire in the work and in the serene manner in which it was played. It transported us to a world where diminished chords of the thirteenth, dissonances resolving into worse dissonances, and 15-8 rhythms were unknown, where the laws laid down by Albrechtsberger or Richter were still observed. Yet we must not give the impression that Volkmann was a case-hardened harmonic martinet; he was too much a disciple of Schumann for that; but his Muse seems very gentle in these modern days. The last section of the concerto (the movements are joined together) had a few touches of the composer of the "Richard III." overture, but the work as a whole was very self-restrained. Mr. Warnke was twice recalled with very spontaneous enthusiasm and his excellent playing deserves this tribute.

About all that is left of Mendelssohn orchestrally is his overtures, and perhaps his Scotch symphony. His Reformation symphony slumbers upon the shelf, and his Italian symphony is seldom dusted and taken down as it was yesterday afternoon. Yet, there are mighty few men alive who can write such fluent and melodic counterpoint as is found in the slow movement of this work. Its gently saddened measures suit admirably to the violas and these instruments played most exquisitely in this movement, which remains the best part of the symphony. Usually Mendelssohn was the best of Scherzo composers. He caught up the dainty humor of this movement much better than the massive power of other portions of symphonic work, yet, in this symphony the Scherzo is not equal to those of the Reformation or the Scotch symphonies. Perhaps he concentrated his merry-making upon the finale, but this Saltarello is not half as good a picture of a Roman Carnival as that created by Berlioz. Even though the work was applauded, we see no good reason for resuscitating the Italian symphony any more than there would [illegible] reviving Maria Edgeworth's novels. The Saltarello was whipped up to a high speed, which made it seem more spicy than it really is.

Dr. Muck is certainly not neglecting the native composer and we had a pleasant surprise yesterday in hearing a new Symphonic poem by a resident Boston composer, Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill. A student who has been with Chadwick and with the incipient American Bizet, Frederic F. Bullard, could scarcely avoid obtaining some strength of expression and emotional power. But we confess that we did not know that Mr. Hill had such a grasp upon the modern orchestra as he exhibits in this score. The story of "The Parting of Lancelot and Guinevere" is founded upon a poem by Stephen Phillips, the English poet who has scarcely yet won the fame that he deserves.

The work was short, as modern compositions go, and was heavily scored. It dealt with an intense subject, too intense for any but the greatest composer. It has a disadvantage in the fact that the emotions of the hero and heroine are similar and the composer can only contrast despair against despair, but a contrast is gained by portraying memories of their past happiness:—

> "Deep as first love,
> And wild with all regret,"

(to quote Tennyson instead of Phillips) and Mr. Hill managed to attain good coherency in his work in spite of much tortuous harmony. There were guiding themes which were afterwards skilfully interwoven and developed. There was dissonance enough to picture all the shrieks, cries and swoonings of the unhappy pair who often shed very chromatic tears. At times the brasses seemed muted permanently.

There is more in this composition than a first hearing can possibly reveal to the average auditor, and we were glad to see Dr. Muck twice recalled at the end of its performance.

IMES

New York City

he Season's Orchestral Concerts---A Total of More Than 125 Given in New York---New Compositions That Were Heard.

THE orchestras of New York have all brought their series of concerts to a close. The season of music is thereby known to be near its end; though the givers of recitals seem to be no more aware of the coming of Spring, nor to feel the need of discontinuing their activities, than the snow-laden storm clouds have been aware of the vernal equinox. Orchestral music has been intensively cultivated in New York this season, as it has been in recent years. Within the compass of less than twenty-two weeks there have been well over a hundred orchestral concerts given in the city. The provision might be supposed to be ample, and perhaps too ample. Yet the fact seems to be that the audiences for orchestral music are steadily increasing in size and in the eagerness with which they listen; presumably, also, in their willingness to pay for tickets.

The established orchestras have had large audiences. The New York Symphony Orchestra, playing in Aeolian Hall, felt obliged to print an announcement on its Bulletin to the effect that "not only was the hall completely sold out for all the Symphony Society's concerts, but hundreds of people have been turned away on the days of the concerts." The Philharmonic Society, giving many more concerts in the much larger Carnegie Hall, has had large audiences—especially at concerts when the soloist exerted an unusual attraction. The hall was often practically full. As has been the case for a good many years, at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall every seat has been subscribed for the whole of the two series, and there is a large and impatient waiting list of would-be subscribers. There have been very large audiences frequently at the concerts given on Sunday nights in the Metropolitan Opera House; but any who should deduce a strong love for orchestral music from this fact would be overlooking the drawing powers of the operatic and other soloists.

The Philharmonic Society has given 46 concerts in Manhattan, including 4 Saturday evening concerts and 2 intended for "young people." The New York Symphony Society's two [illegible] subscription series numbered 24, besides which it gave 3 so-called gala concerts, 2 of which were preceded by so-called public rehearsals, making the total of its performances 29. There were 6 Young People's Concerts. The Russian Symphony Orchestra gave a subscription series of 4 and appeared in others. The People's Symphony Society gave 3. The series on Sunday nights at the Metropolitan Opera House will have numbered 19. These make a total of 117. Besides these there were others. Several were given by such organizations as the Young Men's Symphony Society and the Orchestral Society. The Minneapolis Orchestra came a long way to add one to New York's abundance. The Philadelphia Orchestra is coming next month to play Mahler's gigantic symphony. No doubt there have been more than 125 orchestral concerts of high class in New York in the present season.

⁂

It is perhaps needless to say that if these orchestral concerts are regarded in the light of "business," most of the business has been conducted at a loss, and generally a very large loss. How large a loss is not always set forth in the reports of the several organizations. It is well known that the two principal orchestras of New York, the Philharmonic and the New York Symphony, are obliged to meet an annual deficit. They do this, as everybody knows, on the ground that the giving of orchestral concerts is not a business like another, but the provision of artistic nutriment for which the public will not and cannot be expected to pay at a rate to cover the cost; an educational enterprise, such as are the great universities, that are carried on at a cost far beyond any sum that their tuition fees bring them in, and that must be heavily endowed; or it could be compared to the great museums and public libraries, which are for the public benefit, and in this country acquire most of their resources from private endowment or are aided by large grants of public money.

It will therefore be said by the supporters of the orchestras that their deficits do not indicate a bad adjustment of supply to demand. If the concerts are largely attended and properly enjoyed, the whole object has been attained, and the cost is cheerfully met by public-spirited people of wealth as their contribution to the general good. The Philharmonic Society has the great bequest of the late Joseph Pulitzer and the added income of the "membership," who contribute, as members of the Metropolitan Museum of Art and the Natural History Museum contribute, to carry on an edifying work. The New York Symphony Society has H. H. Flagler, who has undertaken to supply the difference between the public's contribution in the purchase of tickets and the cost of running the orchestra. Henry L. Higginson does the same in the case of the Boston Orchestra. The vast audiences which attend the concerts in New York bring in a balance which may very likely not pay the cost of bringing the concerts to New York, and which, even if it does, must be somehow adjusted on his books as a part of the profit and loss account of the whole enterprise. The People's Symphony Concerts are more ostensibly a philanthropic undertaking than any others of the kind in New York; and the Russian Symphony concerts have been a method of propaganda in which somebody has had enough interest to pay for.

The fact that the principal orchestral series in New York have been largely attended and have gradually acquired a large body of faithful followers will go far toward allaying the suspicion that the city has been supplied with music beyond its needs. There might, indeed, be discussion as to how much music a city like New York "needs"; how much it can assimilate; whether it is oversupplied, whether less would be more fully appreciated, more highly valued. Indeed, an announcement made last week shows a belief on the part of some that the less prosperous citizens of New York are under present conditions not sufficiently provided with orchestral music. Certain wealthy philanthropists are arranging for a fund with which to give a series of twenty concerts of high quality at prices of admission ranging from 10 to 50 cents. The idea is, of course, not new, though it has never been carried out here on so extensive a scale. Its value will be tested by its results, and its permanence will depend on the lasting quality of the philanthropic promptings behind it. For such an undertaking is, of course, purely philanthropic, and has even less to do with business than the orchestral concerts at present given in New York.

⁂

An unusually large number of new compositions have been presented by the orchestras this season. The American composer has been benefited by this activity, and in a natural and wholesome way, as the peers of other modern composers, needing no special devices for nursing, coddling, or exploiting.

The Philharmonic Society gave a belated first performance, so far as relates to New York, of Edward MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lancelot and Elaine." Seth Bingham's Fantasy for orchestra, A. Walter Kramer's two symphonic sketches, "Chant Nêgre" and "Valse Triste"; Fritz Stahlberg's suite for orchestra, and Edmund Severn's concerto for violin (heard for the first time with orchestra) are more contemporaneous, and were all done in the presence and no doubt to the encouragement of their composers. Besides these, Mr. Stransky produced for the first time Max Reger's Variations on a theme of Mozart, Op. 132, one of the most recent productions of the too fecund Bavarian; Arnold Schoenberg's "Pelléas et Mélisande," an important contribution to the discussion of the question whether its composer is one of the great men of the future, though it is not in his latest "manner." Less important were Jean Sibelius's "Die Okeaniden," Zdenko Fibich's idyll, "At Evening"; Dargomijsky's "Casatchoque." Mr. Grainger played Frederick Delius's remarkable pianoforte concerto for the first time in New York.

Mr. Damrosch made some interesting expositions of current American production. John A. Carpenter's suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," showed most ingratiatingly the talent and skill and originality of the young Chicago musician. The first symphony of Victor Kolar, one of the first violin players of the orchestra, whose music has been played by it before, showed at once his nationality as a Bohemian and his study with Dvorak, through its finely effective qualities. The excerpts from Mr. Damrosch's own music to "Iphigenia in Aulis" and the prelude to Daniel Gregory Mason's music for "The Pageant of Cape Cod" were both incidental music and music for an occasion; yet both showed qualities of distinction and permanent value. Mr. Damrosch likewise made his contribution to the great Schoenberg discussion by performing his "Kammersinfonie." The excerpts from Maurice Ravel's pantomime ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe," were a sequel to excerpts from the same work performed last season. Also of the French school were Alfred Bruneau's suite from "L'Attaque du Moulin," Florent Schmitt's "Pupazzi." Delius had his representation on these programs, too, with his two "mood pictures," "Summer Night on the River" and "On Hearing the First Cuckoo." Almost as significant as a first performance was the repetition of David Stanley Smith's overture, "Prince Hal," which was played for the first time publicly, though it had been heard last season at a concert given for the meeting of the National Institute of Arts and Letters. Miss Marcia Van Dresser's singing of Gustav Mahler's set of songs with orchestra, "Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen," showed them to be one of the most original of the composer's works.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's sole contribution of new compositions was Ernest Schelling's "Impressions from an Artist's Life, in form of Variations on an Original Theme," a brilliant and imaginative composition. The Russian Symphony Orchestra may be counted to add to the list of new works by Russian composers. This season it has played Igor Stravinsky's First Symphony, Moussorgsky's extravagant and striking six tableaux, "Exhibition Pictures"; Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Serbian Fantasy," Glazunoff's "Overture on Three Grecian Themes," and an orchestral arrangement of Rachmaninoff's fantasia for two pianos.

Mr. Stransky has gone ahead with due caution in the performance of Liszt's works, for which the Pulitzer bequest is in part a direct subsidy. He has found it prudent to confine himself to four of the symphonic poems, "Tasso," the "Battle of the Huns," "Orpheus," besides the popular "Préludes," the noisy orchestration of the Second Hungarian Rhapsody, and the Hungarian "Sturmmarsch"—matter for Sunday popular concerts. A few of the songs have appeared on the programs, the concerto in A, and the Hungarian Fantasy. So long as Mr. Stransky avoided the portentous symphonies, the rest of the symphonic poems, and other orchestral works that are seldom aroused from their slumbers, the letter of the law will be fulfilled and the audiences much relieved.

One more important orchestral concert is impending that will add a new work to the list of orchestral music heard for the first time in New York. The Philadelphia Orchestra comes, under the auspices of the [illegible]

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 19 1916
Establishe

VISITING ORCHESTRA HAD POOR PROGRAM

Unrelated Compositions Made Boston Symphony Concert Unsatisfactory to Audience.

SUGGESTION FOR OPERA

Institution Devoted to Noteworthy Productions Would Be Benefit to City.

The Boston Orchestra closed its series of concerts for the present season in the Academy of Music last Monday night. During the 31 years in which this great organization has visited Philadelphia, there has been a public response indicating the love of good music abroad in this city and the eagerness with which people support what they are assured is worthy of support. The orchestra has appeared under a number of leaders, all of them men distinguished as musicians and conductors. The Boston Orchestra has never been an aggressive institution, but has stood for dignity, poise and a catholic distribution of the best music of classic and modern composers.

As a class the conductors have endeavored to present, regardless of personal taste or conviction, such music as would meet the needs of the community, without sacrificing the highest standards. Under Dr. Karl Muck, Philadelphia audiences have been given some delightful programs. This season, however, with the exception of one or two concerts, the things offered have not been of compelling interest to a public accustomed to the best music from the Philadelphia Orchestra and other sources. The programs have not been attractively arranged, that of last Monday night, for instance, was a frightful assembling of incongruous and unrelated stuff. Much too extended, the Beethoven Symphony alone, with the arias done by Geraldine Farrar, would have been sufficient to satisfy the average concert goer. The Strauss "Don Quixote," if it must be played, should be put last on a program, giving those who do not care for nerve-racking noises an opportunity of escape. One aria from Miss Farrar would have met all the demands beautifully, although to be sure, her costume or rather lack of costume, is always a matter of absorbing interest sufficient to entertain those who are not engrossed by the crudities of her vocal style. Perhaps Dr. Muck wished to close his Philadelphia season with a concert that would be remembered. If so, he succeeded admirably. Monday night's performance was unforgetable. It lingers in the memory like a nightmare. Like the concert given earlier in the season, at which the Bruckner symphony was brought forward, there is little chance for the mind to shake the impression made. Considering the splendid orchestra and the wonderful conductor, the Boston Orchestra should leave at the close of a season, a feeling of gratitude, and of an artistic height reached, instead of a tendency to criticise the arrangement of program and the lack of judgment displayed in presenting them.

* * *

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 19 1916
Establish

JOSEF HOFMANN WON'T PLAY AGAIN WITH MUCK

Distinguished Pianist Thinks Boston Symphony Leader Puts Soloist in the Background

Special to The Inquirer.

BOSTON, March 18.—Josef Hofmann, the pianist, will not appear again as a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Possibly the orchestra will not ask him again to be its guest artist, but even if he is invited he will not appear with the most distinguished band in America. Tonight Mr. Hofmann said:

"The Boston Symphony is a very fine orchestra, indeed, but I do not enjoy playing with it, as the conductor, Dr. Muck, has little regard for the soloist.

"Indeed, he does not greatly care to have a soloist, as he considers the orchestra sufficient without one. The soloist receives little or no consideration."

From COURANT
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date MAR 18 1916

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the urgent requests of the patrons of the Boston Symphony concerts in Hartford, Dr. Karl Muck has consented to make for the last concert in the season in Hartford a Wagner program. This concert will be given in Parsons Theater, Monday evening, March 27.

Est 884

Dr. Muck is admittedly one of the greatest, if not the greatest authority on Wagner's music now living. From 1901 until 1914 he conducted all of the performances of "Parsifal" in Bayreuth. During his long tenure as general music director of the Royal Opera in Berlin, most of the important Wagner work fell to him. Before that, as a young man, he was largely responsible for the introduction of Wagner in Russia, for he was conductor of the company which the late Angelo Neumann of Prague took to Petrograd, Moscow and other Russian cities in the mid 80's. This will be the first time that Dr. Muck has given a Wagner program in a regular symphony course. He has often made such programs for the pension fund concerts of the orchestra in Boston, and he made two such performances for the series of concerts which the orchestra gave at the Panama Pacific International Exposition in San Francisco last May. In every respect, therefore, this concert will be one of unusual importance.

The pieces he will play will be the overture to "The Flying Dutchman;" , Siegfried idyll; the introduction to Act 3, "Dance of the Apprentices;" entrance of the Mastersingers, and Homage from Hans Sachs (all from the third act) from "Die Meistersingers of Nuremberg;" the prelude to "Lohengrin;" the Good Friday Magic from "Parsifal" and the overture to "Tannhauser." Reserved seats

---

From TIMES
Address Hartford, Conn. MAR 17 1916
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

March 27, Dr. Muck's Organization Will Be Here.

Esta 884

At the urgent and repeated requests of the patrons of the Boston Symphony concerts in Hartford, Dr. Muck has consented to make for the last concert in the season in Hartford a Wagner program. This concert will be given in Parsons's theater, Monday evening, March 27.

Dr. Muck is admittedly one of the greatest, if not the greatest, authority on Wagner now living. From 1901 until 1914 he conducted all the performances of "Parsifal" in Bayreuth. During his long tenure as general music director of the Royal opera in Berlin, most of the important Wagner work fell to him. Before that, as a young man, he was largely responsible for the introduction of Wagner in Russia, for he was conductor of the company which the late Angelo Neumann of Prague took to Petrograd, Moscow and other Russian cities in the mid '80s. This will be the first time that Dr. Muck has given a Wagner program in a regular symphony course. He has often made such programs for the pension fund concerts of the orchestra in Boston, and he made two such performances for the series of concerts which the orchestra gave at the Panama-Pacific exposition in San Francisco last May.

The pieces he will play will be the overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; a Siegfried idyll; the introduction to Act 3, "Dance of the Apprentices"; entrance of the mastersingers, and homage from Hans Sachs (all from the third act) from "Die Meistersingers of Nuremberg"; the prelude to "Lohengrin"; the Good Friday magic from "Parsifal" and the overture to "Tannhauser." Reserved seats are now on sale at Gallup & Alfred's music store, No. 201 Asylum street.

From COURANT
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date MAR 21 191

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Es 84

Fifty years ago it seemed highly improbable that the time would arrive when Richard Wagner would be the most popular among composers. This, however, has become a fact, proven by the attendance at performances of Wagner programs. At the Panama Exposition, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave thirteen concerts last May the German composer and Dr. Muck's Orchestra drew the largest audience ever seen in San Francisco. The "Call" critic wrote of the entertainment, as follows: "Filling Festival Hall to overflowing, Wagnerian enthusiasts left no doubt last night that there is full appreciation here of the masterly performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The house was sold out for the first time since the series began. Favorable weather may have had something to do with this, but Wagner had more. It is asserted today that the audience and receipts were the largest known for a symphony Orchestra concert in America. It was the public's night to do homage to its popular composer and the program was to its liking." Selections from Wagners most popular operas will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of about ninety players, under Dr. Muck's direction at the Parsons Theater next Monday night, making the first Wegnerian concert by the Boston orchestra in our city and undoubtedly a memorable

---

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date MAR 19 1916
Est

Konzerte.

Geſtern Nachmittag nahm Dr. Muck an der Spitze der Boſtoner Meiſterſpieler Abſchied für dieſe Saiſon von ſeinem treuen, begeiſtert anerkennenden Publikum New Yorks in Carnegie Hall. Das berühmte Orcheſter unter dem nicht minder berühmten Dirigenten bot wieder ganz Ausgezeichnetes. Kaum je konnte man eine ſo wundervoll abſchattierte, in großen Stößen dahinfliegende Ausarbeitung von Beethovens nicht eben bedeutender Zweiter Symphonie bewundern. Da hat der Dirigent mächtig nachgeholfen und auf ſeinem perfekten Inſtrument wundervoll geſpielt. Emotionell war die Wiedergabe von Brahms' hinreißender „Akademiſcher Feſtouverture"; das Vorſpiel zu den „Meiſterſingern" weckte durch die meiſterſchafte Darlegung ſtürmiſchen Beifall. Nach vielen Jahren hörte man wieder Mozart's „Konzertante Symphonie", ein lange nicht genug gewürdigtes Meiſterſtück, das den Herren Witek und Ferir Gelegenheit zu wahren Muſterleiſtungen bot, vom Orcheſter prächtig umſpielt und umſchmeichelt. Diejenigen, die an dieſem Programm manches auszuſetzen hatten, wurden durch den Glanz und die ſolide Farbenpracht der Ausführung entwaffnet. Der Beifall klang warm und überzeugungstreu und mündete in das ſichere Gefühl des „Wiederſehens" aus.

Newspaper [illegible] Bureau in the World
From TRADE UNION NEWS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 16 1916
E 1884

BEETHOVEN CROWDS HOUSE

The fifth and final concert of the series given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurred last night in the Academy of Music.

The house was crowded, the entire orchestra pit being filled.

The program was one of unusual length and variety.

Half the selections given would have made a more appropriate and enjoyable concert.

With Beethoven's D major symphony, the "Don Quixote" of Strauss, two operatic arias, sung by Geraldine Farrar, and the "Tannhaeuser" overture, it can readily be seen that even the most ardent admirer of the Boston Orchestra might experience some degree of fatigue.

Nothing could be a greater foil to the dignity and beauty of the D major symphony than the aburdity of the tone picture "Don Quixote," nor could anything serve to increase one's love of Beethoven more firmly.

The manipulation of the instruments in the Strauss work is a matter for almost ceaseless interest, but the amount of labor necessitated by such a production is not justified by the merits of the composition.

Miss Farrar in "Elsa's Dream," and Berlioz's "D'amour L'ardente flamme," from "The Damnation of Faust," was given a royal reception.

[130]

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 19 1916
k, 1884

Dr. Muck's Contract.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

Will you please state whether the widely circulated report is true, that the contract of Dr. Muck with the Boston Symphony Orchestra calls for only four appearances with the orchestra in Providence each season, or whether he has an agreement to that effect with the management? SUBSCRIBER.

Providence.

(An authoritative reply to this question was sought from the management of the orchestra in Boston, which replies as follows: "Dr. Muck's contract calls for his appearance as conductor at every concert given during the season by the orchestra, in whatever city it may appear, unless illness prevents. It has happened this year and last that Dr. Muck has been compelled to give up two of the Providence concerts. Each time he has missed a concert it has been due to the direct orders of his physician. Incidentally, he has conducted concerts against such orders. It is hardly necessary to tell you that the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck regard the series of concerts in Providence as among the most important that they give. In quality of soloists and programmes Providence is second to none of the cities where the orchestra gives such a series. It is unfortunate that Dr. Muck has been compelled to miss some of the concerts, but it has been

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 19 1916

Establishe

VISITING ORCHESTRA HAD POOR PROGRAM

Unrelated Compositions Made Boston Symphony Concert Unsatisfactory to Audience.

SUGGESTION FOR OPERA

Institution Devoted to Noteworthy Productions Would Be Benefit to City.

The Boston Orchestra closed its series of concerts for the present season in the Academy of Music last Monday night. During the 31 years in which this great organization has visited Philadelphia, there has been a public response indicating the love of good music abroad in this city and the eagerness with which people support what they are assured is worthy of support. The orchestra has appeared under a number of leaders, all of them men distinguished as musicians and conductors. The Boston Orchestra has never been an aggressive institution, but has stood for dignity, poise and a catholic distribution of the best music of classic and modern composers.

As a class the conductors have endeavored to present, regardless of personal taste or conviction, such music as would meet the needs of the community, without sacrificing the highest standards. Under Dr. Karl Muck, Philadelphia audiences have been given some delightful programs. This season, however, with the exception of one or two concerts, the things offered have not been of compelling interest to a public accustomed to the best music from the Philadelphia Orchestra and other sources. The programs have not been attractively arranged, that of last Monday night, for instance, was a frightful assembling of incongruous and unrelated stuff. Much too extended, the Beethoven Symphony alone, with the arias done by Geraldine Farrar, would have been sufficient to satisfy the average concert goer. The Strauss "Don Quixote," if it must be played, should be put last on a program, giving those who do not care for nerve-racking noises an opportunity of escape. One aria from Miss Farrar would have met all the demands beautifully, although to be sure, her costume or rather lack of costume, is always a matter of absorbing interest sufficient to entertain those who are not engrossed by the crudities of her vocal style. Perhaps Dr. Muck wished to close his Philadelphia season with a concert that would be remembered. If so, he succeeded admirably. Monday night's performance was unforgettable. It lingers in the memory like a nightmare. Like the concert given earlier in the season, at which the Bruckner symphony was brought forward, there is little chance for the mind to shake the impression made. Considering the splendid orchestra and the wonderful conductor, the Boston Orchestra should leave at the close of a season, a feeling of gratitude, and of an artistic height reached, instead of a tendency to criticise the arrangement of program and the lack of judgment displayed in presenting them.

* * *

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date MAR 1 9 1916

Est

Konzerte.

Geſtern Nachmittag nahm Dr. Muck an der Spitze der Boſtoner Meiſterſpieler Abſchied für dieſe Saiſon von ſeinem treuen, begeiſtert anerkennenden Publikum New Yorks in Carnegie Hall. Das berühmte Orcheſter unter dem nicht minder berühmten Dirigenten bot wieder ganz Ausgezeichnetes. Kaum je konnte man eine ſo wundervoll abſchattierte, in großen Stößen dahinfliegende Ausarbeitung von Beethovens nicht eben bedeutender Zweiter Symphonie bewundern. Da hat der Dirigent mächtig nachgeholfen und auf ſeinem perfekten Inſtrument wundervoll geſpielt. Emotionell war die Wiedergabe von Brahms' hinreißender „Akademiſcher Feſtouverture"; das Vorſpiel zu den „Meiſterſingern" weckte durch die meiſterſchafte Darlegung ſtürmiſchen Beifall. Nach vielen Jahren hörte man wieder Mozart's „Konzertante Symphonie", ein lange nicht genug gewürdigtes Meiſterſtück, das den Herren Witek und Ferir Gelegenheit zu wahren Muſterleiſtungen bot, vom Orcheſter prächtig umſpielt und umſchmeichelt. Diejenigen, die an dieſem Programm manches auszuſetzen hatten, wurden durch den Glanz und die ſolide Farbenpracht der Ausführung entwaffnet. Der Beifall klang warm und überzeugungstreu und mündete in das ſichere Gefühl des „Wiederſehens" aus.

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 19 1916

Establish

JOSEF HOFMANN WON'T PLAY AGAIN WITH MUCK

Distinguished Pianist Thinks Boston Symphony Leader Puts Soloist in the Background

Special to The Inquirer.

BOSTON, March 18.—Josef Hofmann, the pianist, will not appear again as a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Possibly the orchestra will not ask him again to be its guest artist, but even if he is invited he will not appear with the most distinguished band in America. Tonight Mr. Hofmann said:

"The Boston Symphony is a very fine orchestra, indeed, but I do not enjoy playing with it, as the conductor, Dr. Muck, has little regard for the soloist.

"Indeed, he does not greatly care to have a soloist, as he considers the orchestra sufficient without one. The soloist receives little or no consideration."

From COURANT
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date MAR 18 1916

Est 884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the urgent requests of the patrons of the Boston Symphony concerts in Hartford, Dr. Karl Muck has consented to make for the last concert in the season in Hartford a Wagner program. This concert will be given in Parsons Theater, Monday evening, March 27.

Dr. Muck is admittedly one of the greatest, if not the greatest authority on Wagner's music now living. From 1901 until 1914 he conducted all of the performances of "Parsifal" in Bayreuth. During his long tenure as general music director of the Royal Opera in Berlin, most of the important Wagner work fell to him. Before that, as a young man, he was largely responsible for the introduction of Wagner in Russia, for he was conductor of the company which the late Angelo Neumann of Prague took to Petrograd, Moscow and other Russian cities in the mid 80's. This will be the first time that Dr. Muck has given a Wagner program in a regular symphony course. He has often made such programs for the pension fund concerts of the orchestra in Boston, and he made two such performances for the series of concerts which the orchestra gave at the Panama Pacific International Exposition in San Francisco last May. In every respect, therefore, this concert will be one of unusual importance.

The pieces he will play will be the overture to "The Flying Dutchman;" , Siegfried idyll; the introduction to Act 3, "Dance of the Apprentices;" entrance of the Mastersingers, and Homage from Hans Sachs (all from the third act) from "Die Meistersingers of Nuremberg;" the prelude to "Lohengrin;" the Good Friday Magic from "Parsifal" and the overture to "Tannhauser." Reserved seats [illegible]

Newspaper C[illegible] Bureau in the World

From TRADE Union NEWS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 16 1916

E 1884

BEETHOVEN CROWDS HOUSE

The fifth and final concert of the series given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurred last night in the Academy of Music.

The house was crowded, the entire orchestra pit being filled.

The program was one of unusual length and variety.

Half the selections given would have made a more appropriate and enjoyable concert.

With Beethoven's D major symphony, the "Don Quixote" of Strauss, two operatic arias, sung by Geraldine Farrar, and the "Tannhaeuser" overture, it can readily be seen that even the most ardent admirer of the Boston Orchestra might experience some degree of fatigue.

Nothing could be a greater foil to the dignity and beauty of the D major symphony than the aburdity of the tone picture "Don Quixote," nor could anything serve to increase one's love of Beethoven more firmly.

The manipulation of the instruments in the Strauss work is a matter for almost ceaseless interest, but the amount of labor necessitated by such a production is not justified by the merits of the composition.

Miss Farrar in "Elsa's Dream," and Berlioz's "D'amour L'ardente flamme," from "The Damnation of Faust," was [illegible] royal reception.

From TIMES
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date MAR 17 1916

Esta 884

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

March 27, Dr. Muck's Organization Will Be Here.

At the urgent and repeated requests of the patrons of the Boston Symphony concerts in Hartford, Dr. Muck has consented to make for the last concert in the season in Hartford a Wagner program. This concert will be given in Parsons's theater, Monday evening, March 27.

Dr. Muck is admittedly one of the greatest, if not the greatest, authority on Wagner now living. From 1901 until 1914 he conducted all the performances of "Parsifal" in Bayreuth. During his long tenure as general music director of the Royal opera in Berlin, most of the important Wagner work fell to him. Before that, as a young man, he was largely responsible for the introduction of Wagner in Russia, for he was conductor of the company which the late Angelo Neumann of Prague took to Petrograd, Moscow and other Russian cities in the mid '80s. This will be the first time that Dr. Muck has given a Wagner program in a regular symphony course. He has often made such programs for the pension fund concerts of the orchestra in Boston, and he made two such performances for the series of concerts which the orchestra gave at the Panama-Pacific exposition in San Francisco last May.

The pieces he will play will be the overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; a Siegfried idyll; the introduction to Act 3, "Dance of the Apprentices"; entrance of the mastersingers, and homage from Hans Sachs (all from the third act) from "Die Meistersingers of Nuremberg"; the prelude to "Lohengrin"; the Good Friday magic from "Parsifal" and the overture to "Tannhauser." Reserved seats are now on sale at Gallup & Alfred's music store, No. 201 Asylum street.

From COURANT
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date

Est 84

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Fifty years ago it seemed highly improbable that the time would arrive when Richard Wagner would be the most popular among composers. This, however, has become a fact, proven by the attendance at performances of Wagner programs. At the Panama Exposition, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave thirteen concerts last May the German composer and Dr. Muck's Orchestra drew the largest audience ever seen in San Francisco. The "Call" critic wrote of the entertainment, as follows: "Filling Festival Hall to overflowing, Wagnerian enthusiasts left no doubt last night that there is full appreciation here of the masterly performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The house was sold out for the first time since the series began. Favorable weather may have had something to do with this, but Wagner had more. It is asserted today that the audience and receipts were the largest known for a symphony Orchestra concert in America. It was the public's night to do homage to its popular composer and the program was to its liking." Selections from Wagners most popular operas will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of about ninety players, under Dr. Muck's direction at the Parsons Theater next Monday night, making the first Wegnerian concert by the Boston orchestra in our city and undoubtedly a memorable event in the [illegible]

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 19 1916

k, 1884

Dr. Muck's Contract.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

Will you please state whether the widely circulated report is true, that the contract of Dr. Muck with the Boston Symphony Orchestra calls for only four appearances with the orchestra in Providence each season, or whether he has an agreement to that effect with the management?

SUBSCRIBER.

Providence.

(An authoritative reply to this question was sought from the management of the orchestra in Boston, which replies as follows: "Dr. Muck's contract calls for his appearance as conductor at every concert given during the season by the orchestra, in whatever city it may appear, unless illness prevents. It has happened this year and last that Dr. Muck has been compelled to give up two of the Providence concerts. Each time he has missed a concert it has been due to the direct orders of his physician. Incidentally, he has conducted concerts against such orders. It is hardly necessary to tell you that the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck regard the series of concerts in Providence as among the most important that they give. In quality of soloist and programmes Providence is second to none of the cities where the orchestr gives such a series. It is unfortunat that Dr. Muck has been compelled t miss some of the concerts, but it has bee [illegible]—Ed.)

From SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date

Establ 84

"FANTASTICAL VARIATIONS ON A THEME OF A KNIGHTLY CHARACTER"

THE children had retired with a riddle book and a plate of cookies to the sunny alcove of the bay window. Silence had fallen upon the adult group about the fireside.

"When is a door not a door?" The question came in stern tones from the infantile catechetical leader in the alcove.

"When it's ajar!" was the immediate and eager reply.

"When is a noise not a noise?" asked one of the fireside group, to be rewarded with the prompt and emphatic answer: "When it's a Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Everybody laughed, everybody had attended the last Boston symphony concert, everybody knew, without being told, that the speaker referred to the Don Quixote fantasia by Richard Strauss, which had conspicuous place in an otherwise brilliant musical program.

"Wasn't it deliciously humorous?" cried the man who fraternizes with musical critics.

"Shriekingly humorous, like the gargoyles on the roof of Notre Dame Cathedral—the grotesque in sound instead of the grotesque in outline," said the man who sat opposite him.

"No, no," protested the advocate. "The 'Don Quixote' is real comedy, like 'Die Meistersingers von Nurnberg,' the opera by Richard Wagner."

"Not musical comedy," objected the one who had proposed the riddle; "the Don Quivote fantasia is 'sound and fury, signifying nothing' save madness, and madness is not pleasurable nor artistic."

"I have known a Christmas Eve crowd on Lexington street threatened with arrest for making less noise," whimsically interposed a barytone singer who has followed the ways of Melpomene from his wouth up.

"Perhaps you all did not fully grasp the significance of the sound-painting, the method in the composer's seeming madness," suggested the Don Quixote advocate mildly. But they flaunted his rebuke with scorn.

"We are as well acquainted with the misadventure of the Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance as you are, we realized he was tilting at wind mills and charging at sheep quite as well as you," they chorused, "but we decline to accept premeditated and shrilly invented noise as music. We object to a finished orchestra of 100 instruments perverting its ability in order to produce 'confusion worse confounded' instead of the music of the spheres."

"I hold it was brilliantly descriptive musical art," persisted the counsel for the defense.

"Futurist music, after the fashion of futurist art, cubist art," taunted his opponents.

"Well, why then did it receive enthusiastic applause?"

"Because folk were so glad it was ended, because people like noise, because they understood neither its purpose nor rendering and wished to hide their bewilderment under the guise of enthusiasm."

"There were many who did not applaud," said the singer. "I sat with folded arms. At the conclusion I heard a lady, literally steeped in musical environment, remark that the Don Quixote number deserved to be received in silence."

"The trouble with a good deal of modern music," observed a listener who had heard the songs of Venice from the lips of gondoliers, "is that contemporary composers appeal to the intellect rather than to the heart. They try to paint pictures in sound, whereas the spell of music is its power to excite emotions. What did you think of it, my dear?" he asked suddenly of the only debutante present. "You are young and impressionable."

"I was reading the interesting sketch of the Don Quixote theme in the program," she replied with a vivid blush. "I did not listen to the orchestra."

The hostess rang for a fresh brewing of tea. "It may have ben music, it may have been clamor," she remarked as she sliced a California lemon, "I only know I have never even in my maddest moments been able to slam a door because of my sensitiveness to noise, and

---

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City.
Date

Established: L

Music.

A Shame for the Orchestras—Paderewski.

Trailing after the Symphony Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Philharmonic Society has now finished its New York season, and that means that serious symphony concerts are at an end for us until October reddens the leaves that have not yet sprouted. No, I am wrong. There is the Mahler eighth symphony, chorused a thousand strong. But will that colossal occurrence at the Metropolitan Opera House a week from Sunday night be a symphony concert? I know not, yet. For practical, and unpractical, purposes, what we mean by the orchestral division of the music season of 1915-16 is over now.

The reviewer of that season will be obliged to record that in the essential matter of playing new music the orchestras, in spite of the hosts of concerts they give, have made a rather lamentable showing. The credit of introducing new music that is novel, and interesting, and, for the moment at least, important must go not to the orchestras or to the Metropolitan Opera Company, but to the Diaghileff ballet, the chamber music organizations, and the formidable Mr. Ornstein. It is true the Philharmonic introduced Arnold Schönberg's "'Pelléas et Mélisande" and the Symphony his "Kammersymphonie" (after a private performance at a concert of the Society of the Friends of Music).

The latter, to which Mr. Damrosch had the strange idea of administering a preliminary knock in a few words of warning to his audience, turned out "old stuff" and intrinsically dull. did not hear the former, but it is n recent Schönberg. The orchestr work of Schönberg's we ought by a that is holy or unholy in moder music to be given the chance to hea the notorious "Five Pieces," no co ductor has put on a local programm Dr. Muck did the "Five Pieces" Boston last season. In New York D Muck does not hesitate to make h men play us music that is as desi able as a hair shirt, but never a o of the "Five Pieces." Noticing th Mr. Stock in Chicago was moved put Richard Strauss's "Macbeth" o programme of his orchestra mak me ask for the thousandth time w no conductor has ever put it o programme for New York. The fa that Mr. Stransky says it is bad, th fact that Mr. Stransky says Richard Strauss says it is bad, the fact that Philip Hale omits it from his enthusiasm for Strauss have nothing to do with the case.

No music that has not been heard can be bad. New York has not heard Richard Strauss's "Macbeth."

New music, however, is only part of the matter. So much old music is played until it is a nuisance, and so much old music that thoroughly deserves playing is not played at all. When the Philharmonic is not playing Beethoven, Wagner, or Liszt, the three composers it is in part paid to play, it is pretty sure to be playing Tschaikowsky or Richard Strauss. If for five years Tschaikowsky could be relegated to concerts of a popular nature it would be a great thing for symphony concert audiences and for Tschaikowsky. A score of years ago the name of Richard Strauss was a terror by night. To-day it is rapidly becoming a household word. And some of his works are as overplayed as Tschaikowsky's "Pathétique." His "Death and Transfiguration" has passed from the caviar class to the chocolate ice cream soda. But the Philharmonic Society, which has brought forward at its concerts this season ten compositions of Richard Strauss, has not ventured on the more difficult of his works, the "Don Quixote," the "Thus Spake Zarathustra," the "Sinfonia Domestica." The first of them we have had here in the period under discussion, because the Boston Symphony Orchestra did it.

No one can accuse the Philharmonic of the Brahms habit. Others have that, showing no kind of mercy to Brahms, and then there are the Weber overtures, the three Weber overtures a Bostonian they tell of was born hating—without their unfailing succor no conductor seemingly could exist through a season. Mr. Stransky did them all. Meanwhile so much music is not played.

I began going to symphony concerts in childhood, and for a number of years I have reported them professionally, and yet I cannot recall ever hearing a performance of the second of Beethoven's "Leonore" overtures. Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony is likewise a name to me. Meyerbeer wrote an overture to a play called "Struensee." It is probably of less intrinsic merit than any of the Weber overtures, but the symphony orchestras used to play it, even the Boston Symphony. I have never heard it, though as to how many times I have heard the Weber overtures I would not like to hazard a guess. Noticing that Dr. Muck recently put Goldmark's "Sappho" overture on the programme of one of his Boston concerts, I reflected that twenty years ago that work was regarded as absolutely the last word in dissonance and in orchestral weight. Obviously it would be interesting to hear it to-day, but I do not t that in my time it has been playe New York. Then there are the "I thesilea" and the "Prometheus" o tures of Goldmark, though I w half the concert-goers in this t know him only by the "Sakunt overture and the "Rustic Wedd symphony.

Some of the little Mozart s phonies would surely be worth p ing. Mr. Damrosch in Aeolian might give them with the old in mental balance, the old cha music spirit, restored. In silence one is sometimes fo to wonder if the Boston S phony is the only band to that would venture to try one Dr. Muck the only conductor who believes he could lead one to success. At the other antipode is Vincent d'Indy. Where is his B flat symphony to-day (which Philip Hale puts with the greatest of Beethoven), where is his "Symphony on a Mountain Air," and his superb "Istar" variations, why are they silent? Bruckner we are still largely ignorant of in this town. In view of the rough treatment given Dr. Muck for bringing forward one of his symphonies this season in Carnegie Hall I cannot take Messrs. Damrosch and Stransky too severely to task for shying at his awful name, but the fact remains we of New York have not been permitted by our amiable orchestral censors to know Bruckner—just as if we of New York were all busy with the rattle and the teething-ring.

It is a case of shame that in this town of a thousand concerts our orchestras—some of which would play better if they played less—are hampered to the extent they evidently are by the tyranny of that most doubtful quantity "what the public wants"

For my sins, or another's, I did not reach Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon till Mr. Paderewski was striking the final chord of the final piece on his programme. But I was in time for the post-recital, and that was a miniature concert of Chopin, with a Liszt rhapsodie for measure. Why talk about color and singing tone, about legato, staccato, rubato, and all the rigmarole that means everything and nothing? In the minutes it lasted I knew again that as there is one violinist and he spells his name Ysaye, there is one pianist, the superpianist, Ignace Jan Paderewski. PITTS SANBORN.

From Bulletin
Address Prov R. I.
Date MA 191

Estab 84

ORCHESTRAL MUSIC

Subject of Lecture by Prof. John P. Marshall of Boston University.

Prof. John P. Marshall of Boston University in his course on "How to Listen to Orchestral Music," in Manning Hall, Brown University, last evening, continued the subject of Beethoven; renewing the Fifth Symphony, which he classified as the greatest example of the classical period of music, explaining again its construction, themes, motives and transitions, illustrating with brief excerpts from the symphony, after which he called upon two members of the Chaminade Club to play the last movement, which was given with much spirit.

When this was finished, Prof. Marshall briefly reviewed the three stages of Beethoven's development; the first, when his works show the influence of Haydn and Mozart; the middle period between his 30th and 40th years, during which the Fifth Symphony was written, and the third period, when his work overbalanced by self-expression, became more polyphonic, more complex in rhythm, and more difficult to understand and perform. By this time his deafness had so increased that he was unable to hear, and he had done with classical construction and become a romanticist. His last sonata, the string quartets and the Ninth Symphony were placed in this period.

The Sixth Symphony was briefly outlined and the others were touched upon, with a short analysis and description of the Ninth Symphony, which is widely hailed as his greatest work.

Schubert, the successor of Beethoven, was then taken up by the lecturer, who said: "Melody is the feature of music which causes it to live longest, and Schubert's melodies belong to the rarest class, the spontaneous type, which wears well. The chief interest in his music is his themes, which he lacked the knowledge to develop, but which for pure spontaneous rhythm, approach as near to the true source of melody as any music yet written, showing great depth of meaning.

"His Ninth, the 'unfinished' symphony, shares with Beethoven's Fifth and Tschaikowski's Pathetique, the favor of concert audiences. To melody Schubert added a fine sense of harmonic coloring, of which the second movement of this symphony is one of the most beautiful examples in musical literature." To illustrate its extensive modulation, Prof. Marshall played several bars, mentioning each key through which the subtle changes carried the development of the theme.

For the next lecture, next Wednesday evening, Schumann's life and other of his works will be taken up, and the unfinished spmphony analyzed. This will be the last symphony to be analyzed in this course.

At the last concert in the present series of six by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall on April 11, the programme is to be devoted exclusively to music by Richard Wagner, upon which Dr. Muck is acknowledged to be the chief authority now living. His Wagner programmes for the pension fund concerts of the orchestra in Boston always fill Symphony Hall, but this is the first time since he became conductor of the orchestra, that it has given an extra concert of Wagnerian music in this city.

From
Address TIMES Hartford, Conn.
Date MAR 24 191

Establ 84

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The last appearance this season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will take place next Monday night at Parsons's theater. The concert will be one of the most brilliant the orchestra has ever given here, for Dr. Muck has made his program entirely from the works of Richard Wagner. With the Boston orchestra to bring out the gorgeous tone color for which Wagner's music is famous, and with Dr. Muck, the greatest Wagnerian conductor in the world, the concert at once attains proportions of most unusual interest.

The program includes the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," "A Seigfried Idyl," selections from "The Mastersingers," prelude to "Lohengrin," "Good Friday Magic" from "Parsifal" and the overture to "Tannhauser."

There will be no soloist. The program will be performed by an enlarged orchestra. The demand for tickets is unusual and in order to serve the public better no reservations will be held after Saturday evening, March 25. Tickets are at Gallup & Alfred's music store.

The great trouble with glittering generalities is that they so soon tarnish.

[131]

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 26 1916

Establishe

It was more than amusing to learn, from a New York music journal, that Mr. Stokowski had serious designs on the leadership of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, and might even have the temerity to aspire to the dizzy height of conducting the Boston aggregation. Surely our hell-fire-and-brimstone confrere of Musical America cannot seriously believe that Mr. Stokowski would regard a conductorship of the Philharmonic as being an advance over his present position! The Philadelphia Orchestra is attaining a reputation throughout the country second to none. We all admit the superiority of the Boston Orchestra over any other, but it is largely due to the fine instruments known to be in the possession of the players, it being the custom of the supporter of the orchestra to see that each musician is supplied with the best possible instrument. Then, too, the rarefied atmosphere of Boston imparts some subtle power to the players, an aid not available in the inferior air of our great manufacturing centre. But who can seriously affirm the superiority of the New York Philharmonic organization? We are all willing to believe it is a fine orchestra, with an interesting and picturesque history. Those familiar with Mr. Stokowski's work might credit him with ambition to conduct the Boston Orchestra, and might even believe him capable of conducting it well, certainly of improving the programs inflicted on Philadelphia audiences; but no one will believe him guilty of Macchiavelan designs on New York's pride and glory.

AGNES GORDON HOGAN.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

1884

be open to the public.

For the first time since Dr. Muck became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Providence is to have from that orchestra a programme devoted exclusively to music by Richard Wagner. This will be given at the last concert of the series Tuesday evening, April 11, in Infantry Hall. It will be an occasion of wide interest. Dr. Muck is admittedly the chief Wagnerian authority now living and his Wagner programmes for the pension fund concerts of the orchestra in Boston always fill Symphony Hall to overflowing.

From
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date

Esta 84

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert at the Parsons Theater next Monday marks the ending of the season's series by the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is the first appearance here of this orchestra without a soloist, although a custom in Boston, and the demand for tickets indicates the desire to hear this wonderful body of instrumentalists under Dr. Karl Muck, its celebrated conductor. Doubtless the announcement of an all-Wagner program and an enlarged orchestra have made the event doubly attractive. All tickets reserved and uncalled for before 9 o'clock this evening will be put on sale Monday morning at 8:30 o'clock at the theater box office, where tickets of admission to the gallery may be obtained during the day.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

18

For the first time since Dr. Muck became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Providence is to have from that orchestra a programme devoted exclusively to music by Richard Wagner. This will be given at the last concert of the series Tuesday evening, April 11, in Infantry Hall. It will be an occasion of wide interest. Dr. Muck is admittedly the chief Wagnerian authority now living and his Wagner programmes for the pension fund concerts of the orchestra in Boston always fill Symphony Hall to overflowing.

From SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date

"FANTASTICAL VARIATIONS ON A THEME OF A KNIGHTLY CHARACTER"

THE children had retired with a riddle book and a plate of cookies to the sunny alcove of the bay window. Silence had fallen upon the adult group about the fireside.

"When is a door not a door?" The question came in stern tones from the infantile catechetical leader in the alcove.

"When it's ajar!" was the immediate and eager reply.

"When is a noise not a noise?" asked one of the fireside group, to be rewarded with the prompt and emphatic answer: "When it's a Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Everybody laughed, everybody had attended the last Boston symphony concert, everybody knew, without being told, that the speaker referred to the Don Quixote fantasia by Richard Strauss, which had conspicuous place in an otherwise brilliant musical program.

"Wasn't it deliciously humorous?" cried the man who fraternizes with musical critics.

"Shriekingly humorous, like the gargoyles on the roof of Notre Dame Cathedral—the grotesque in sound instead of the grotesque in outline," said the man who sat opposite him.

"No, no," protested the advocate. "The 'Don Quixote' is real comedy, like 'Die Meistersingers von Nurnberg,' the opera by Richard Wagner."

"Not musical comedy," objected the one who had proposed the riddle; "the Don Quivote fantasia is 'sound and fury, signifying nothing' save madness, and madness is not pleasurable nor artistic."

"I have known a Christmas Eve crowd on Lexington street threatened with arrest for making less noise," whimsically interposed a barytone singer who has followed the ways of Melpomene from his wouth up.

"Perhaps you all did not fully grasp the significance of the sound-painting, the method in the composer's seeming madness," suggested the Don Quixote advocate mildly. But they flaunted his rebuke with scorn.

"We are as well acquainted with the misadventure of the Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance as you are, we realized he was tilting at wind mills and charging at sheep quite as well as you," they chorused, "but we decline to accept premeditated and shrilly invented noise as music. We object to a finished orchestra of 100 instruments perverting its ability in order to produce 'confusion worse confounded' instead of the music of the spheres."

"I hold it was brilliantly descriptive musical art," persisted the counsel for the defense.

"Futurist music, after the fashion of futurist art, cubist art," taunted his opponents.

"Well, why then did it receive enthusiastic applause?"

"Because folk were so glad it was ended, because people like noise, because they understood neither its purpose nor rendering and wished to hide their bewilderment under the guise of enthusiasm."

"There were many who did not applaud," said the singer. "I sat with folded arms. At the conclusion I heard a lady, literally steeped in musical environment, remark that the Don Quixote number deserved to be received in silence."

"The trouble with a good deal of modern music," observed a listener who had heard the songs of Venice from the lips of gondoliers, "is that contemporary composers appeal to the intellect rather than to the heart. They try to paint pictures in sound, whereas the spell of music is its power to excite emotions. What did you think of it, my dear?" he asked suddenly of the only debutante present. "You are young and impressionable."

"I was reading the interesting sketch of the Don Quixote theme in the program," she replied with a vivid blush. "I did not listen to the orchestra."

The hostess rang for a fresh brewing of tea. "It may have ben music, it may have been clamor," she remarked as she sliced a California lemon, "I only know I have never even in my maddest moments been able to slam a door because of my sensitiveness to noise, and that fantasia of Don Quixote gave me a distinctly mauvais quart d'heure."

Date

Established:

Music.

A Shame for the Orchestras—Paderewski.

Trailing after the Symphony Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Philharmonic Society has now finished its New York season, and that means that serious symphony concerts are at an end for us until October reddens the leaves that have not yet sprouted. No, I am wrong. There is the Mahler eighth symphony, chorused a thousand strong. But will that colossal occurrence at the Metropolitan Opera House a week from Sunday night be a symphony concert? I know not, yet. For practical, and unpractical, purposes, what we mean by the orchestral division of the music season of 1915-16 is over now.

The reviewer of that season will be obliged to record that in the essential matter of playing new music the orchestras, in spite of the hosts of concerts they give, have made a rather lamentable showing. The credit of introducing new music that is novel, and interesting, and, for the moment at least, important must go not to the orchestras or to the Metropolitan Opera Company, but to the Diaghileff ballet, the chamber music organizations, and the formidable Mr. Ornstein. It is true the Philharmonic introduced Arnold Schönberg's "Pelléas et Mélisande" and the Symphony his "Kammersymphonie" (after a private performance at a concert of the Society of the Friends of Music).

The latter, to which Mr. Damrosch had the strange idea of administering a preliminary knock in a few words of warning to his audience, turned out "old stuff" and intrinsically dull. I did not hear the former, but it is not recent Schönberg. The orchestral work of Schönberg's we ought by all that is holy or unholy in modern music to be given the chance to hear, the notorious "Five Pieces," no conductor has put on a local programme. Dr. Muck did the "Five Pieces" in Boston last season. In New York Dr. Muck does not hesitate to make his men play us music that is as desirable as a hair shirt, but never a one of the "Five Pieces." Noticing that Mr. Stock in Chicago was moved to put Richard Strauss's "Macbeth" on a programme of his orchestra makes me ask for the thousandth time why no conductor has ever put it on a programme for New York. The fact that Mr. Stransky says it is bad, the fact that Mr. Stransky says Richard Strauss says it is bad, the fact that Philip Hale omits it from his enthusiasm for Strauss have nothing to do with the case.

No music that has not been heard can be bad. New York has not heard Richard Strauss's "Macbeth."

New music, however, is only part of the matter. So much old music is played until it is a nuisance, and so much old music that thoroughly deserves playing is not played at all. When the Philharmonic is not playing Beethoven, Wagner, or Liszt, the three composers it is in part paid to play, it is pretty sure to be playing Tschaikowsky or Richard Strauss. If for five years Tschaikowsky could be relegated to concerts of a popular nature it would be a great thing for symphony concert audiences and for Tschaikowsky. A score of years ago the name of Richard Strauss was a terror by night. To-day it is rapidly becoming a household word. And some of his works are as overplayed as Tschaikowsky's "Pathétique." His "Death and Transfiguration" has passed from the caviar class to the chocolate ice cream soda. But the Philharmonic Society, which has brought forward at its concerts this season ten compositions of Richard Strauss, has not ventured on the more difficult of his works, the "Don Quixote," the "Thus Spake Zarathustra," the "Sinfonia Domestica." The first of them we have had here in the period under discussion, because the Boston Symphony Orchestra did it.

No one can accuse the Philharmonic of the Brahms habit. Others have that, showing no kind of mercy to Brahms, and then there are the Weber overtures, the three Weber overtures a Bostonian they tell of was born hating—without their unfailing succor no conductor seemingly could exist through a season. Mr. Stransky did them all. Meanwhile so much music is not played.

I began going to symphony concerts in childhood, and for a number of years I have reported them professionally, and yet I cannot recall ever hearing a performance of the second of Beethoven's "Leonore" overtures. Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony is likewise a name to me. Meyerbeer wrote an overture to a play called "Struensee." It is probably of less intrinsic merit than any of the Weber overtures, but the symphony orchestras used to play it, even the Boston Symphony. I have never heard it, though as to how many times I have heard the Weber overtures I would not like to hazard a guess. Noticing that Dr. Muck recently put Goldmark's "Sappho" overture on the programme of one of his Boston concerts, I reflected that twenty years ago that work was regarded as absolutely the last word in dissonance and in orchestral weight. Obviously it would be interesting to hear it to-day, but I do not think that in my time it has been played in New York. Then there are the "Penthesilea" and the "Prometheus" overtures of Goldmark, though I wager half the concert-goers in this town know him only by the "Sakuntala" overture and the "Rustic Wedding" symphony.

Some of the little Mozart symphonies would surely be worth playing. Mr. Damrosch in Aeolian Hall might give them with the old instrumental balance, the old chamber music spirit, restored. In the silence one is sometimes forced to wonder if the Boston Symphony is the only band to-day that would venture to try one and Dr. Muck the only conductor who believes he could lead one to success. At the other antipode is Vincent d'Indy. Where is his B flat symphony to-day (which Philip Hale puts with the greatest of Beethoven), where is his "Symphony on a Mountain Air," and his superb "Istar" variations, why are they silent? Bruckner we are still largely ignorant of in this town. In view of the rough treatment given Dr. Muck for bringing forward one of his symphonies this season in Carnegie Hall I cannot take Messrs. Damrosch and Stransky too severely to task for shying at his awful name, but the fact remains we of New York have not been permitted by our amiable orchestral censors to know Bruckner—just as if we of New York were all busy with the rattle and the teething-ring.

It is a case of shame that in this town of a thousand concerts our orchestras—some of which would play better if they played less—are hampered to the extent they evidently are by the tyranny of that most doubtful quantity "what the public wants"

For my sins, or another's, I did not reach Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon till Mr. Paderewski was striking the final chord of the final piece on his programme. But I was in time for the post-recital, and that was a miniature concert of Chopin, with a Liszt rhapsodie for measure. Why talk about color and singing tone, about legato, staccato, rubato, and all the rigmarole that means everything and nothing? In the minutes it lasted I knew again that as there is one violinist and he spells his name Ysaye, there is one pianist, the superpianist, Ignace Jan Paderewski. PITTS SANBORN.

Bulletin
Providence, R. I.
MA[illegible] 191

RCHESTRAL MUSIC

of Lecture by Prof. John P. rshall of Boston University.

ohn P. Marshall of Boston Uni- n his course on "How to Listen stral Music," in Manning Hall, University, last evening, continued the subject of Beethoven; renewing the Fifth Symphony, which he classified as the greatest example of the classical period of music, explaining again its construction, themes, motives and transitions, illustrating with brief excerpts from the symphony, after which he called upon two members of the Chaminade Club to play the last movement, which was given with much spirit.

When this was finished, Prof. Marshall briefly reviewed the three stages of Beethoven's development; the first, when his works show the influence of Haydn and Mozart; the middle period between his 30th and 40th years, during which the Fifth Symphony was written, and the third period, when his work overbalanced by self-expression, became more polyphonic, more complex in rhythm, and more difficult to understand and perform. By this time his deafness had so increased that he was unable to hear, and he had done with classical construction and become a romanticist. His last sonata, the string quartets and the Ninth Symphony were placed in this period.

The Sixth Symphony was briefly outlined and the others were touched upon, with a short analysis and description of the Ninth Symphony, which is widely hailed as his greatest work.

Schubert, the successor of Beethoven, was then taken up by the lecturer, who said: "Melody is the feature of music which causes it to live longest, and Schubert's melodies belong to the rarest class, the spontaneous type, which wears well. The chief interest in his music is his themes, which he lacked the knowledge to develop, but which for pure spontaneous rhythm, approach as near to the true source of melody as any music yet written, showing great depth of meaning.

"His Ninth, the 'unfinished' symphony, shares with Beethoven's Fifth and Tschaikowski's Pathetique, the favor of concert audiences. To melody Schubert added a fine sense of harmonic coloring, of which the second movement of this symphony is one of the most beautiful examples in musical literature." To illustrate its extensive modulation, Prof. Marshall played several bars, mentioning each key through which the subtle changes carried the development of the theme.

For the next lecture, next Wednesday evening, Schumann's life and other of his works will be taken up, and the unfinished spmphony analyzed. This will be the last symphony to be analyzed in this course.

At the last concert in the present series of six by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall on April 11, the programme is to be devoted exclusively to music by Richard Wagner, upon which Dr. Muck is acknowledged to be the chief authority now living. His Wagner programmes for the pension fund concerts of the orchestra in Boston always fill Symphony Hall, but this is the first time since he became conductor of the orchestra, that it has given an extra concert of Wagnerian music in this city.

TIMES
Hartford, Conn.
191

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

last appearance this season Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, will take place onday night at Parsons's the- The concert will be one of the brilliant the orchestra has ven here, for Dr. Muck has his program entirely from the works of Richard Wagner. With the Boston orchestra to bring out the gorgeous tone color for which Wagner's music is famous, and with Dr. Muck, the greatest Wagnerian conductor in the world, the concert at once attains proportions of most unusual interest.

The program includes the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," "A Seigfried Idyl," selections from "The Mastersingers," prelude to "Lohengrin," "Good Friday Magic" from "Parsifal" and the overture to "Tannhauser."

There will be no soloist. The program will be performed by an enlarged orchestra. The demand for tickets is unusual and in order to serve the public better no reservations will be held after Saturday evening, March 25. Tickets are at Gallup & Alfred's music store.

The great trouble with glittering generalities is that they so soon tarnish.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 26 1916

* * *

It was more than amusing to learn, from a New York music journal, that Mr. Stokowski had serious designs on the leadership of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, and might even have the temerity to aspire to the dizzy height of conducting the Boston aggregation. Surely our hell-fire-and-brimstone confrere of Musical America cannot seriously believe that Mr. Stokowski would regard a conductorship of the Philharmonic as being an advance over his present position! The Philadelphia Orchestra is attaining a reputation throughout the country second to none. We all admit the superiority of the Boston Orchestra over any other, but it is largely due to the fine instruments known to be in the possession of the players, it being the custom of the supporter of the orchestra to see that each musician is supplied with the best possible instrument. Then, too, the rarefied atmosphere of Boston imparts some subtle power to the players, an aid not available in the inferior air of our great manufacturing centre. But who can seriously affirm the superiority of the New York Philharmonic organization? We are all willing to believe it is a fine orchestra, with an interesting and picturesque history. Those familiar with Mr. Stokowski's work might credit him with ambition to conduct the Boston Orchestra, and might even believe him capable of conducting it well, certainly of improving the programs inflicted on Philadelphia audiences; but no one will believe him guilty of Macchiavelan designs on New York's pride and glory.

AGNES GORDON HOGAN.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

open to the public.

For the first time since Dr. Muck became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Providence is to have from that orchestra a programme devoted exclusively to music by Richard Wagner. This will be given at the last concert of the series Tuesday evening, April 11, in Infantry Hall. It will be an occasion of wide interest. Dr. Muck is admittedly the chief Wagnerian authority now living and his Wagner programmes for the pension fund concerts of the orchestra in Boston always fill Symphony Hall to overflowing.

From [illegible]
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date 191

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert at the Parsons Theater next Monday marks the ending of the season's series by the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is the first appearance here of this orchestra without a soloist, although a custom in Boston, and the demand for tickets indicates the desire to hear this wonderful body of instrumentalists under Dr. Karl Muck, its celebrated conductor. Doubtless the announcement of an all-Wagner program and an enlarged orchestra have made the event doubly attractive. All tickets reserved and uncalled for before 9 o'clock this evening will be put on sale Monday morning at 8:30 o'clock at the theater box office, where tickets of admission to the gallery may be obtained during the day.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

For the first time since Dr. Muck became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Providence is to have from that orchestra a programme devoted exclusively to music by Richard Wagner. This will be given at the last concert of the series Tuesday evening, April 11, in Infantry Hall. It will be an occasion of wide interest. Dr. Muck is admittedly the chief Wagnerian authority now living and his Wagner programmes for the pension fund concerts of the orchestra in Boston always fill Symphony Hall to overflowing.

[131]

BLANK PAGE

BOSTON HERALD.

IARCH 31, 1916.

Orchestral Behavior.

World Wags:

A v days ago you published a letter of m e in which I asked if you were not moyed as I have been by the yawn g, talking and inattention which has become rather common with a few members of the Symphony Orchestra. In your editorial comment you replied: "We did not notice any reading, yawning and talking on the stage at this afternoon Symphony concert; perhaps because we were listening to the music." I appreciate perfectly the implied rebuke and I confess to an over-sensitiveness to disturbances such as have been described. I have perhaps no right to endanger the peace of some quiet listener who may now be on the lookout for irregularities in orchestral behavior. Still I feel that a useful purpose may be served by further discussion of the subject. I would like very much to know as a matter of psychological interest how important is the appearance and demeanor of the orchestra to the average listener. To me the orchestra and the music are one. I cannot separate the two. The personality of the men, their facial expression, their manner of dressing, their handling of the instruments, all these factors when they are in keeping, contribute to my enjoyment of the music. This being so, the slightest incongruity of behavior in any individual, mars the performance and jars like a false note.

No one questions the importance of personal conduct in a soloist. The best of the musical critics denounce mannerisms and affectations in the single performer. Why then should we expect less from the component parts of an orchestra? One violin may not without danger play out of tune though there are twenty-nine others to cover the mistake. If we are striving for an artistic whole, is it quite safe for one player to fail in attention or, worse than that, to distract the attention of his neighbor?

It seems to me quite possible that members of the orchestra may themselves be interested in an expression of opinion on this subject. Certainly it may be trying for a musician who is not playing, to sit out the long blank pages. If the man who does this with strict attention and with an air of readiness were to realize that he is contributing to the general musical effect he might meet the situation with greater fortitude.

H. J. H.

Marblehead.

Concert Reforms.

We did not for a moment intend to "rebuke" our correspondent. It is not our mission in life to rebuke anyone. On the contrary it is our purpose to incite in the community a "gentlemanlike joy," as Athenaeus put it.

Ten or twelve years ago there were articles and even pamphlets published in Germany advocating reforms in concert life. One writer wished the orchestra conductor, also the soloist—singer, fiddler or pianist—to be hidden from the sight of the hearer. Another thought the hall should be dimly lighted. Still another believed that the audience would be more receptive if the concerts took place in the morning. There was talk about a more aesthetic dress for the players than the conventional suit of solemn black. Thus, like chorus girls, the members of the orchestra might make lightning changes in the course of the program. Playing music by Mozart, Haydn, Gluck, Bach, Handel, the orchestra should wear the dress of the period, with wigs. The conductor should have a sword by his side—useful in case of an inefficient soloist, or a refractory one—as Mr. Josef Hofmann, for example.

And so on, down the periods. When music by Schoenberg and other ultra-radicals is played, the orchestral members might have straw in their hair and rent garments, like the mad lady of the village.

When we heard the Meiningen orchestra led by Buelow, the players all stood, except the 'cellists, and played without notes. The Gewandhaus orchestra stood for years. Perhaps the tradition is still observed in Leipsic.

Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch in his concerts of ancient music dressed the part. Unfortunately he was not an imposing figure. In fact, he was a sight.

Concerts an

MR. STOCK'S SYMPHONY

THE CONDUCTOR TO BE HEARD AS COMPOSER

The Novel and Long-Prepared Piece for the Symphony Concerts of This Week—The Man and His Work in Chicago—Previous Compositions—The Course and Quality of the Music

LIKE Terence Mulvaney's friend, Jock Learoyd, Frederick A. Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, is "a deceivin' fighter." Before an audience, his manner is almost distrait, and his smile, a bit patient and gentle. On rare occasions, when he must announce the title of an encore number at a "pop" concert, for instance, the audience invariably starts in its chairs. For underneath the precise, brief speech is a deep tone, a virility of timbre typical only of men who have wrought mightily in some line of endeavor. No one ever mistakes that tone, for it is the sign of success. And it is a real, a throbbing pleasure to hear him swear—a good fortune mine only once, but a memorable occasion!

The measure of Frederick A. Stock is given in his service with the Chicago orchestra. From the first viola stand, where he sat for several years, he emerged to conduct accompaniments for soloists, a few times only, until called upon suddenly to take the mantle from the shoulders of the "great pioneer," Theodore Thomas. That he has held it with honor to its traditions for more than a decade, retaining meanwhile the friendship of the men still behind the stands, tells much of the story. Not always have conditions been most pleasant for him; but not one crisis has he failed to meet.

It is easy to see the development by which he has come to prominence both as composer and conductor, now that one begins to gain perspective. When he joined the Chicago orchestra, the vogues of Richard Strauss and of Debussy were just beginning in this country. The son of a German army bandmaster, a Cologne conservatory graduate, a student of composition under Humperdinck, Zoellner and Franz Wullner, he came to this country with the lore of European schools at his tongue's end. Barely had the new music of Germany and France begun to find appreciation when he was called to the conductor's stand.

Previous to that day, he had written voluminously, after the German style. Some of it—mainly chamber music and anonymous instrumentations for occasional soloists—was heard in public. Long afterwards he told of taking to Theodore Thomas the score a "Dramatic Overture," I believe it was called. He laughs now about it, but it was no laughing matter then. "Suppose it should fail," he was asked; "what about your future with the orchestra?" So he put it away, for bread and butter held a certain attraction.

Finally, in 1905, his Symphonic Variations came to performance, under Theodore Thomas's direction, if memory fails not. The work made a deep impression on the audience. Variations, Mr. Stock himself says today, are for the school-room, but those variations established him as a quantity to be reckoned with. For, without much melody though they were, their facility with the modern orchestra and their inventive skill would not be denied.

Almost immediately Mr. Stock assumed the direction of the orchestra, and he was little heard as a composer, excepting for the performance the next season of a long, philosophical tone-poem "Eines Menschenlebens Morgen, Mittag und Abend." An Improvisation, frankly, a study in cantilene; a symphonic sketch, "A Summer Evening"; a symphonic waltz, which ha become popular; a Festival March; the minor symphony, and an overture, "Life' Springtide;" have been his own contribu tions to the repertory since then.

During that time, Mr. Stock's greates achievements as conductor had been hi interpretations of the Brahms symphonie and the tone-poems of Richard Strauss

Frederick A. Stoc

His composition developed along ines. In each successive work iscerned a tendency toward themes of greater simplicity and entrated strength, so to speak.
ame time, and by the same t kill in instrumentation grew ou ounds. In the Variations were everness, fecundity of device, a

BOSTON POST,

APRIL 1, 1916

SYMPHONY CREATES A SENSATION

Stock's Immense Work Given Superb Performance

BY OLIN DOWNES

An immense symphony, a work which may fairly be called monumental, the symphony in C minor, op. 18, of Frederick Stock, the present conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, was heard for the first time [illegible] and was the sensation of the 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The audience applauded for nearly half of the intermission after the performance, and probably for the first time in the history of symphony concerts in this country, the kettle-drummer was called to the front of the stage, while the applause continued, and some even whistled.

DESERVES OVATION

In truth, Mr. Neumann, whose name must be preserved to fame, deserved his ovation. He has labored long and hard under Dr. Muck, who seems to have a penchant for his kettle-drums, anyhow, and yesterday, in the concluding measures of the symphony, Mr. Neumann was seen bending and swaying athletically and with unerring speed and accuracy, from one to another of the four kettle-drums with which he was contending. He had endured nerve-racking suspense, waiting for the last six measures of the symphony, nearly breaking, it was said, under the strain preliminary to that last cataclysmic entrance. He executed a difficult and dangerous task with fidelity and despatch.

Indeed, this symphony taxed the physical abilities of most of the members of the orchestra. Mr. Stock has employed all the instruments that even a modern orchestra affords the composers, and employed them witho stint, and with very brilliant effe Not only is it effectively, if heavi scored, but Dr. Muck gave a supe performance. Too much praise cou not be given this remarkable conduct for the sympathetic intuition and th contagious enthusiasm of his readin It was a pity that Mr. Stock, wh also knows something about conduct ing, could not have been present t hear this performance.

Skill Never-Failing

But now that the shouting is over what about Mr. Stock's work? It is admirably made, in accordance with modern German standards. The form is traditional, and the frame is very large, but it is not filled with purposeless writing. Mr. Stock has a firm grip on his ideas and his proportions. Many of his contrapuntal feats are worthy of especial admiration. The very chromatic character of his first subject demands especial skill in its manipulation. This skill is never-failing, and despite the chromaticism characteristic of many pages of the first movement of the symphony it is based on a rock-ribbed foundation of clearly defined and closely related tonalities. Mr. Stock gives conclusive evidence of his mastery of all the practical problems of the composing musician.

Struggle With Destiny

He has also admitted that the work, like almost every sincere compos[illegible] has a "programme." The sym[illegible] treats of the theme which has en[illegible] the attention of poets and arti[illegible] many centuries, as it will enga[illegible] attention of [illegible]

Ma his doubts faith.
But the p
phony is sc conventions are not the Brahms. T
the German strange tha
German co escape them
al conrtapu quences, th
theme of t
first them,
theme poss
ated with t

Pl

There is final apothe with other
There is th
tra, with al
going almo climax afte simply dulle able to resp
ever excitin
there is the
of the com symphony is threat, and often a pro

No

[133]

From Addres
Date_
Estabi

From

Address

Date

Establ

BOSTON HERALD.

IARCH 31, 1916.

Orchestral Behavior.

World Wags:

A v days ago you published a letter of m e in which I asked if you were not ınnoyed as I have been by the yawn ig, talking and inattention which has become rather common with a few members of the Symphony Orchestra. In your editorial comment you replied: "We did not notice any reading, yawning and talking on the stage at this afternoon Symphony concert; perhaps because we were listening to the music." I appreciate perfectly the implied rebuke and I confess to an over-sensitiveness to disturbances such as have been described. I have perhaps no right to endanger the peace of some quiet listener who may now be on the lookout for irregularities in orchestral behavior. Still I feel that a useful purpose may be served by further discussion of the subject. I would like very much to know as a matter of psychological interest how important is the appearance and demeanor of the orchestra to the average listener. To me the orchestra and the music are one. I cannot separate the two. The personality of the men, their facial expression, their manner of dressing, their handling of the instruments, all these factors when they are in keeping, contribute to my enjoyment of the music. This being so, the slightest incongruity of behavior in any individual, mars the performance and jars like a false note.

No one questions the importance of personal conduct in a soloist. The best of the musical critics denounce mannerisms and affectations in the single performer. Why then should we expect less from the component parts of an orchestra? One violin may not without danger play out of tune though there are twenty-nine others to cover the mistake. If we are striving for an artistic whole, is it quite safe for one player to fail in attention or, worse than that, to distract the attention of his neighbor?

It seems to me quite possible that members of the orchestra may themselves be interested in an expression of opinion on this subject. Certainly it may be trying for a musician who is not playing, to sit out the long blank pages. If the man who does this with strict attention and with an air of readiness were to realize that he is contributing to the general musical effect he might meet the situation with greater fortitude. H. J. H.

Marblehead.

Concert Reforms.

We did not for a moment intend to "rebuke" our correspondent. It is not our mission in life to rebuke anyone. On the contrary it is our purpose to incite in the community a "gentlemanlike joy," as Athenaeus put it.

Ten or twelve years ago there were articles and even pamphlets published in Germany advocating reforms in concert life. One writer wished the orchestra conductor, also the soloist—singer, fiddler or pianist—to be hidden from the sight of the hearer. Another thought the hall should be dimly lighted. Still another believed that the audience would be more receptive if the concerts took place in the morning. There was talk about a more aesthetic dress for the players than the conventional suit of solemn black. Thus, like chorus girls, the members of the orchestra might make lightning changes in the course of the program. Playing music by Mozart, Haydn, Gluck, Bach, Handel, the orchestra should wear the dress of the period, with wigs. The conductor should have a sword by his side—useful in case of an inefficient soloist, or a refractory one—as Mr. Josef Hofmann, for example.

And so on, down the periods. When music by Schoenberg and other ultra-radicals is played, the orchestral members might have straw in their hair and rent garments, like the mad lady of the village.

When we heard the Meiningen orchestra led by Buelow, the players all stood, except the 'cellists, and played without notes. The Gewandhaus orchestra stood for years. Perhaps the tradition is still observed in Leipsic.

Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch in his concerts of ancient music dressed the part. Unfortunately he was not an imposing figure. In fact, he was a sight.

BOSTO

Concerts and Com ser

MR. STOCK'S SYMPHONY

THE CONDUCTOR TO BE HEARD AS COMPOSER

The Novel and Long-Prepared Piece for the Symphony Concerts of This Week—The Man and His Work in Chicago—Previous Compositions—The Course and Quality of the Music

LIKE Terence Mulvaney's friend, Jock Learoyd, Frederick A. Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, is "a deceivin' fighter." Before an audience, his manner is almost distrait, and his smile, a bit patient and gentle. On rare occasions, when he must announce the title of an encore number at a "pop" concert, for instance, the audience invariably starts in its chairs. For underneath the precise, brief speech is a deep tone, a virility of timbre typical only of men who have wrought mightily in some line of endeavor. No one ever mistakes that tone, for it is the sign of success. And it is a real, a throbbing pleasure to hear him swear—a good fortune mine only once, but a memorable occasion!

The measure of Frederick A. Stock is given in his service with the Chicago orchestra. From the first viola stand, where he sat for several years, he emerged to conduct accompaniments for soloists, a few times only, until called upon suddenly to take the mantle from the shoulders of the "great pioneer," Theodore Thomas. That he has held it with honor to its traditions for more than a decade, retaining meanwhile the friendship of the men still behind the stands, tells much of the story. Not always have conditions been most pleasant for him; but not one crisis has he failed to meet.

It is easy to see the development by which he has come to prominence both as composer and conductor, now that one begins to gain perspective. When he joined the Chicago orchestra, the vogues of Richard Strauss and of Debussy were just beginning in this country. The son of a German army bandmaster, a Cologne conservatory graduate, a student of composition under Humperdinck, Zoellner and Franz Wullner, he came to this country with the lore of European schools at his tongue's end. Barely had the new music of Germany and France begun to find appreciation when he was called to the conductor's stand.

Previous to that day, he had written voluminously, after the German style. Some of it—mainly chamber music and anonymous instrumentations for occasional soloists—was heard in public. Long afterwards he told of taking to Theodore Thomas the score a "Dramatic Overture," I believe it was called. He laughs now about it, but it was no laughing matter then. "Suppose it should fail," he was asked; "what about your future with the orchestra?" So he put it away, for bread and butter held a certain attraction.

Finally, in 1905, his Symphonic Variations came to performance, under Theodore Thomas's direction, if memory fails not. The work made a deep impression on the audience. Variations, Mr. Stock himself says today, are for the school-room, but those variations established him as a quantity to be reckoned with. For, without much melody though they were, their facility with the modern orchestra and their inventive skill would not be denied.

Almost immediately Mr. Stock assumed the direction of the orchestra, and he was little heard as a composer, excepting for the performance the next season of a long, philosophical tone-poem "Eines Menschenlebens Morgen, Mittag und Abend." An Improvisation, frankly, a study in cantilene; a symphonic sketch, "A Summer Evening"; a symphonic waltz, which ha become popular; a Festival March; the minor symphony, and an overture, "Life' Springtide;" have been his own contribu tions to the repertory since then.

During that time, Mr. Stock's greates achievements as conductor had been hi interpretations of the Brahms symphonie and the tone-poems of Richard Strauss

Frederick A. Stoc

His composition developed along lines. In each successive work discerned a tendency toward themes of greater simplicity and centrated strength, so to speak.
same time, and by the same t skill in instrumentation grew o bounds. In the Variations were cleverness, fecundity of device, a

From

Address

Date

Establ

BOSTON POST,

APRIL 1, 1916

SYMPHONY CREATES A SENSATION

Stock's Immense Work Given Superb Performance

BY OLIN DOWNES

An immense symphony, a work which may fairly be called monumental, the symphony in C minor, op. 18, of Frederick Stock, the present conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, was heard for the first time [illegible] and was the sensation of the 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The audience applauded for nearly half of the intermission after the performance, and probably for the first time in the history of symphony concerts in this country, the kettle-drummer was called to the front of the stage, while the applause continued, and some even whistled.

DESERVES OVATION

In truth, Mr. Neumann, whose name must be preserved to fame, deserved his ovation. He has labored long and hard under Dr. Muck, who seems to have a penchant for his kettle-drums, anyhow, and yesterday, in the concluding measures of the symphony, Mr. Neumann was seen bending and swaying athletically and with unerring speed and accuracy, from one to another of the four kettle-drums with which he was contending. He had endured nerve-racking suspense, waiting for the last six measures of the symphony, nearly breaking, it was said, under the strain preliminary to that last cataclysmic entrance. He executed a difficult and dangerous task with fidelity and despatch.

Indeed, this symphony taxed the physical abilities of most of the members of the orchestra. Mr. Stock has employed all the instruments that even a modern orchestra affords the composers, and employed them witho stint, and with very brilliant effe Not only is it effectively, if heavi scored, but Dr. Muck gave a supe performance. Too much praise coul not be given this remarkable conducto for the sympathetic intuition and th contagious enthusiasm of his reading It was a pity that Mr. Stock, wh also knows something about conduct ing, could not have been present t hear this performance.

Skill Never-Failing

But now that the shouting is over, what about Mr. Stock's work? It is admirably made, in accordance with modern German standards. The form is traditional, and the frame is very large, but it is not filled with purposeless writing. Mr. Stock has a firm grip on his ideas and his proportions. Many of his contrapuntal feats are worthy of especial admiration. The very chromatic character of his first subject demands especial skill in its manipulation. This skill is never-failing, and despite the chromaticism characteristic of many pages of the first movement of the symphony it is based on a rock-ribbed foundation of clearly defined and closely related tonalities. Mr. Stock gives conclusive evidence of his mastery of all the practical problems of the composing musician.

Struggle With Destiny

He has also admitted that the work, like almost every sincere composition, has a "programme." The symphony treats of the theme which has engaged the attention of poets and artists for many centuries, as it will engage the attention of thousands of artists [illegible]

ame: Ma
his doubts
faith.
But the phony is s conventions are not the Brahms. T
the German strange tha
German co escape them
al conrtapu
quences, th
theme of t
first them,
theme poss
ated with t
Pl
There is final apothe
with other
There is th
tra, with al
going almos climax afte simply dull able to resp
ever excitin
there is the
of the com
symphony is threat, and often a pros
No
We believe and in a ir communicat presence of in the ar
the final [illegible] from [illegible] there i

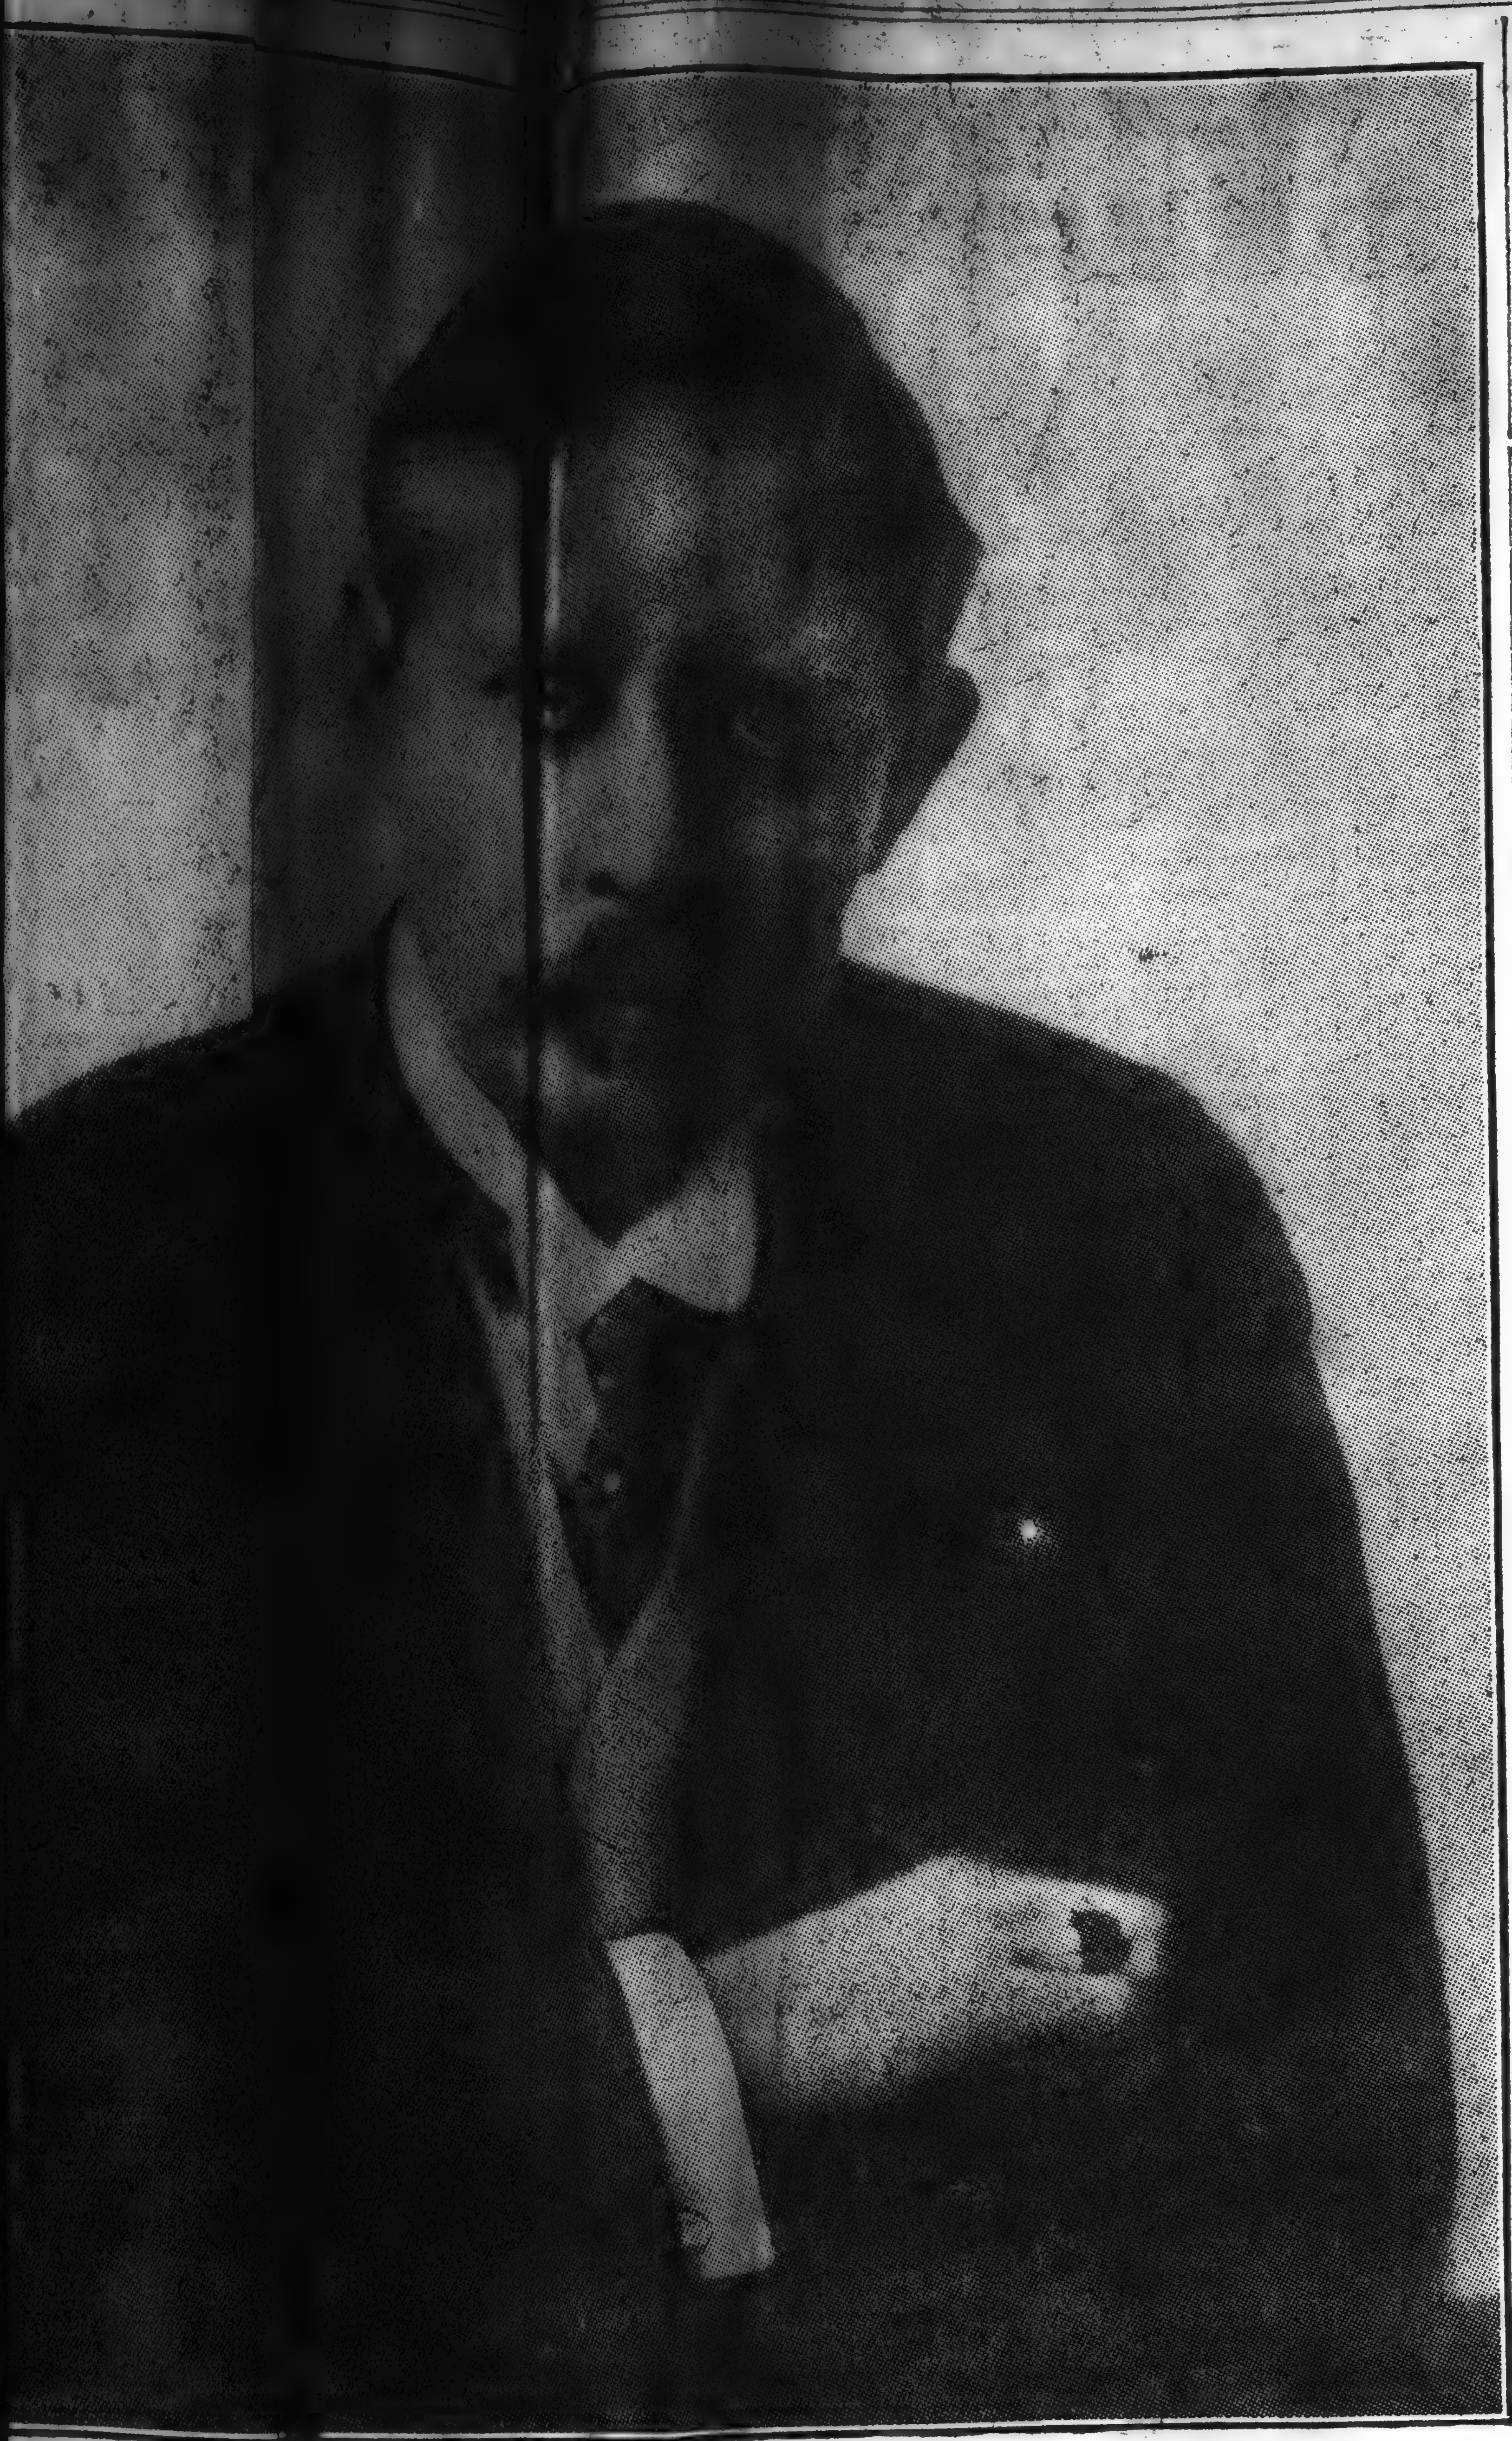
TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, MARCH 30, 1916

and Composers --- The Theatres



Frederick A. Stock

(Photograph by Moffett of Chicago)

ic waltz, which ha
stival March; the (
an overture, "Life'
n his own contribu-
since then.
Ir. Stock's greatest uctor had been his
Brahms symphonies
of Richard Strauss.

His composition developed along the same lines. In each successive work could be discerned a tendency toward evolving themes of greater simplicity and more concentrated strength, so to speak. At the same time, and by the same token, his skill in instrumentation grew out of all bounds. In the Variations were exceeding cleverness, fecundity of device, and a certain rigid virtuosity with the orchestra. But with the later scores, and especially in the case of the Festival March (an occasional work) that virtuosity had added a fluency, a dare-devil joy in seeking out not only the utmost possibilities of the instruments but also their complete use in combinations of all sorts.

Quite by the same influences, Mr. Stock's style, as it has been defined by these eight scores, has become an intensely dramatic style, in which his conductor's sense of dynamic values is no small element. He writes with one ear cocked for the echo from the auditorium, so to speak. And after a trial the ear, trained to a remarkable finesse of judgment, tells him to study such and such pages, as a sculptor will study a carving in all possible angles of lights and shadows.

The symphony in C minor represents the fruit of his long years of writing supervised by his decade of exacting but informing work at the head of an orchestra which has presented classics and novelties from every school in the musical world. It is strange, to those who do not know the man, that fads, like the Debussy or the Tschaikowsky fad, have not left more pronounced traces upon his work. Their principles may appear in the detail of this symphony, but their idiosyncrasies never.

In the C minor symphony, Boston hears the work most comprehensively indicative of Mr. Stock's creative gifts. The melodious polyphony of the Improvisation and "A Summer Evening" are represented; the rich, heavy coloring and the feeling for theatric effect of the "Menschenlebens Morgen, Mittag und Abend" are there; the powerful, flaming climaxes of the Festival March have their counterparts in the finale; and the skill of instrumentation of the Variations now seems like a mere omen.

It will be interesting to note whether Boston's opinion places Frederick A. Stock in the sequence of German composers, or among the Americans, or among the cosmopolites who wander, like the soul of Tomlinson, from concert hall to library, with the unrest of the unclassified:

As for the symphony itself, Mr. Stock began the writing of the music in 1906 and finished it in 1909. Already it has been played in Chicago, Philadelphia, New York, Berlin and lesser cities. It runs in four movements—an introductory Adagio, leading into a long Allegro; a Scherzo; an Andante Cantabile, and an energetic Finale. The required orchestra is large but in no way eccentric. For the programme-book of the Chicago Orchestra, when the symphony was first played on the last day of 1909, Mr. Stock drafted the following preliminary note: "While the symphony bears no programme, and should therefore be regarded as absolute music, the composer agrees with many other modern writers that each and every piece of music is 'programme music' in some formal sense. When music depicts human emotions, or illustrates various phases of man's emotional life in a more or less subjective manner, its inner significance is at once coupled with a programmatic idea, because it pictures human moods and feelings, and must, therefore, be considered as programme-music of the most legitimate, most noble type.

"Speaking of the present symphony, it should be said that the work is also meant to describe, what so often has been described in works of the same character and form: human life, its sorrows as well as joys, the struggle of mortal man against fate, the spiritual trials to which he is subjected, his despair at the apparent futility of worldly existence, mingled with everlasting hope that victory will be his in the end. The first movement represents various phases of this struggle; as it surges to and fro, it depict man's mind in a state of utter restlessness and determined resistance, a state of mind which does not recognize hope of lasting relief or comfort.

"The second part—Scherzo—speaks of life's joys in a more or less humorous fashion, while the third—Andante—depicts reminiscences of life's happiest moments. The fourth—Finale—explains itself when it is made known that it bears the motto which has become the 'motive of life' of the German nation: Vorwärts! (Forward), Aufwärts! (Upward), which motto is, of course, to be taken in its broadest, most ideal and universal sense."

E. D.

---

loyed them witho
very brilliant effec
ffectively, if heavil
Muck gave a super
o much praise coul
remarkable conducto ic intuition and th
iasm of his reading at Mr. Stock, who hing about conduct-
ave been present to ance.

ver-Failing

he shouting is over.
Stock's work? It is in accordance with tandards. The form
the frame is very filled with purpose-

Stock has a firm
and his proportions,
trapuntal feats are al admiration. The aracter of his first especial skill in its
s skill is never-fail-
the chromaticism
many pages of the
the symphony it is ibbed foundation of closely related tock gives conclusive
stery of all the prac-
the composing mu-

Vith Destiny

itted that the work,
sincere composition,
e." The symphony
which has engaged
[illegible]

[illegible] Man's struggles with destiny, his doubts, defeats, his triumphant faith.

But the pity of it is, that this symphony is so utterly conventional. The conventions of Mr. Stock's symphony are not the conventions of Mozart or Brahms. They are the conventions of the German school of today, and it is strange that so few contemporaneous German composers have been able to escape them. They are the conventional contrapuntal cominations and sequences, the continual presence of a theme of three notes, taken from the first them, as a sort of a motto—a theme possibly intended to be associated with the idea of struggle.

Plethora of Sound

There is the regular and inevitable final apotheosis of a triumphant theme with other themes in counterpoint. There is the plethoric German orchestra, with almost all of the instruments going almost all of the time, swollen climax after climax, till the ear is simply dulled to the point of being unable to respond to any more noise, however exciting that noise may be. And there is the all too obvious moralizing of the composer. The semon of this symphony is rammed down the listener's throat, and delivered in what is too often a prosy manner.

No Room for Climax

We believe great art will unconciously [illegible] in a irresistibly beautiful manner communicate its lesson, and so, the [illegible]ence of sign-posts do not necessarily [illegible] the arrival of a great painter. And [illegible] final movement of the symphony [illegible]rs from gratuitous length. At the [illegible] there is no room for climax, and [illegible]nding of Mr. Stock's symphony is [illegible]-climax of the most banal kind. [illegible] "L'Arlesienne" suite of Bizet [illegible]

ADVERTISER,

APRIL 1, 1916

NEW NATIVE WORK AT SYMPHONY

Mr. Stock's Work Holds to True Symphonic Form

DR. MUCK GIVES SCORE A SPLENDID READING

Melodic Simplicity and Beauty in Bizet's Work Follows

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Stock	Symphony No. 1, C minor
Bizet	Suite Arlesienne, No. 1

The brevity of the program, printed above, need not be taken as an indication that there was a short concert. All moderns when composing a symphony go much beyond the length of Beethoven's first eight. But when, as in the present instance, they have something to say, this need not be [illegible]

[illegible] known Mr. Frederick A. Stock in the classical forms, through an excellent string quartette, and we were, therefore, prepared to find a musicianly composition in his symphony, even if the demon of figure development should lead him to excessive length.

It is a pleasure to find a good composer in these days, who holds to the true symphonic form. Mr. Stock's work is not in the free and vague style, which too often replaces the classical form nowadays. The four regular movements are there, and each of these leans toward the Sonata-Allegro form, the strictest of the symphonic shapes. There is figure development, the intellectual side of classical music, in much profusion, so that the work will probably be more appreciated by the trained musician than the layman.

The true ideal of classical music is to combine intellectuality with emotion, and this is done in the Stock symphony, although it leans more toward the former than the latter quality. There is thematic transference also, which gives homogeneity; that is, the chief thoughts of the first movement reappear and are finely developed in the finale.

The symphony is "absolute music"; it does not tell a story, nor give definite pictures; it is subjective, not objective. Yet there are certain definite thoughts worked out, which can be readily recognized and have the composer's sanction. Thus the first movement (which is rather too long) pictures storm and stress, somewhat after the ideal of Tschaikowsky in the first movement of his fourth symphony. Life's lighter phases are daintily portrayed in the second movement, which is the Scherzo, although it is not in the conventional "Scherzo and Trio" shape, and has more development of themes than is often found in this movement. The third is the slow movement and deals with memories and reminiscences, while the finale is triumph, accented by the words "Vorwaerts" and "Aufwaerts"—"Forward" and "Upward."

The worth of the work has been recognized and it has already been performed not only by Mr. Stock's own Chicago orchestra, but by the New York (Damrosch) orchestra and the Philadelphia one. It is scored with all the resources of the largest modern orchestra; indeed it goes a little beyond most of the modern scores in demanding two English horns, a tenor tuba in addition to the bass one, a xylophone, four kettle-drums, a side drum, etc.

The chief theme of the first movement is rather wide and disjunct, but, like Max Reger, Mr. Stock seems to enjoy taking unpromising and unmelodic themes and giving most ingenious and unexpected development of them. This theme, however, lends itself excellently to triumphant effects, and it is thus used in the first movement, while it comes in with ingenious contrapuntal treatment in the finale. The subordinate theme is in good contrast, not quite as lyrical as some subordinate themes, but afterwards also developed, and in fact it ends the symphony, in the coda of the Finale. Throughout the first movement a figure of three notes is developed, a figure that is somewhat like the Wagner "Fate Figure" inverted.

Most ingenious is the development of the first movement, with its stationary tone on the violins with treatment of figures going on below, and then the inversion of this process, with an organ point on the deep instruments. There is a fine Coda here.

In the Scherzo the clarinette plays an important part and a subordinate theme is given on solo violin. This and the next movement are the least complex and likely to be the most appreciated. Yet the Finale is the really great movement of the work. There are two strong motives picturing the "Forward" and "Upward" mottoes and these are skilfully interwoven with the chief theme of the first movement, while in the Coda these two important phrases are again united. There is something of Brahms' ingenuity here, but the complexity does not obscure the triumphant character of the end. The two "motto" themes here are more shapely and melodic than some of the themes of the preceding movements.

Dr. Muck gave this large and difficult score a splendid reading and the men played it in a manner that brought out all its beauties. Mr. Stock evidently does not believe that the regular symphonic form is a lemon that is utterly squeezed dry, for he has here shown that it can be used in most modern fashion.

The symphony is decidedly dramatic in the Mahler vein of strong contrasts. These were fortissimo effects that almost blew in the eardrums of the auditors. The kettledrummer came to the front many times and his batting average was very high; his part was at times almost a solo.

The exciting character of the work and particularly the triumphant end aroused the audience to great enthusiasm and the work, in spite of its complexity, won a success.

After this intellectual work came melodic simplicity and beauty in the shape of Bizet's "Suite Arlesienne" No. 1. That work never loses its charm, in spite of all the ambitious music that has been achieved since it and Co[illegible]sers --- The Theatres

Frederick A. Stock

(Photograph by Moffett of Chicago)

ic waltz, which ha
stival March; the
an overture, "Life'
n his own contribu
since then.
Mr. Stock's greatest uctor had been his Brahms symphonies
of Richard Strauss.

His composition developed along the same lines. In each successive work could be discerned a tendency toward evolving themes of greater simplicity and more concentrated strength, so to speak. At the same time, and by the same token, his skill in instrumentation grew out of all bounds. In the Variations were exceeding cleverness, fecundity of device, and a certain rigid virtuosity with the orchestra. But with the later scores, and especially in the case of the Festival March (an occasional work) that virtuosity had added a fluency, a dare-devil joy in seeking out not only the utmost possibilities of the instruments but also their complete use in combinations of all sorts.

Quite by the same influences, Mr. Stock's style, as it has been defined by these eight scores, has become an intensely dramatic style, in which his conductor's sense of dynamic values is no small element. He writes with one ear cocked for the echo from the auditorium, so to speak. And after a trial the ear, trained to a remarkable finesse of judgment, tells him to study such and such pages, as a sculptor will study a carving in all possible angles of lights and shadows.

The symphony in C minor represents the fruit of his long years of writing supervised by his decade of exacting but informing work at the head of an orchestra which has presented classics and novelties from every school in the musical world. It is strange, to those who do not know the man, that fads, like the Debussy or the Tschaikowsky fad, have not left more pronounced traces upon his work. Their principles may appear in the detail of this symphony, but their idiosyncrasies never.

In the C minor symphony, Boston hears the work most comprehensively indicative of Mr. Stock's creative gifts. The melodious polyphony of the Improvisation and "A Summer Evening" are represented; the rich, heavy coloring and the feeling for theatric effect of the "Menschenlebens Morgen, Mittag und Abend" are there; the powerful, flaming climaxes of the Festival March have their counterparts in the finale; and the skill of instrumentation of the Variations now seems like a mere omen.

It will be interesting to note whether Boston's opinion places Frederick A. Stock in the sequence of German composers, or among the Americans, or among the cosmopolites who wander, like the soul of Tomlinson, from concert hall to library, with the unrest of the unclassified:

As for the symphony itself, Mr. Stock began the writing of the music in 1906 and finished it in 1909. Already it has been played in Chicago, Philadelphia, New York, Berlin and lesser cities. It runs in four movements—an introductory Adagio, leading into a long Allegro; a Scherzo; an Andante Cantabile, and an energetic Finale. The required orchestra is large but in no way eccentric. For the programme-book of the Chicago Orchestra, when the symphony was first played on the last day of 1909, Mr. Stock drafted the following preliminary note: "While the symphony bears no programme, and should therefore be regarded as absolute music, the composer agrees with many other modern writers that each and every piece of music is 'programme music' in some formal sense. When music depicts human emotions, or illustrates various phases of man's emotional life in a more or less subjective manner, its inner significance is at once coupled with a programmatic idea, because it pictures human moods and feelings, and must, therefore, be considered as programme-music of the most legitimate, most noble type.

"Speaking of the present symphony, it should be said that the work is also meant to describe, what so often has been described in works of the same character and form: human life, its sorrows as well as joys, the struggle of mortal man against fate, the spiritual trials to which he is subjected, his despair at the apparent futility of worldly existence, mingled with everlasting hope that victory will be his in the end. The first movement represents various phases of this struggle; as it surges to and fro, it depict man's mind in a state of utter restlessness and determined resistance, a state of mind which does not recognize hope of lasting relief or comfort.

"The second part—Scherzo—speaks of life's joys in a more or less humorous fashion, while the third—Andante—depicts reminiscences of life's happiest moments. The fourth—Finale—explains itself when it is made known that it bears the motto which has become the 'motive of life' of the German nation: Vorwärts! (Forward), Aufwärts! (Upward), which motto is, of course, to be taken in its broadest, most ideal and universal sense."

E. D.

---

loyed them witho
very brilliant effe
ffectively, if heavil
Muck gave a supe
o much praise cou
remarkable conducto
tic intuition and th
iasm of his readin
at Mr. Stock, wh thing about conduct-
ave been present to ance.

ver-Failing

he shouting is over.
Stock's work? It is in accordance with tandards. The form
the frame is very filled with purpose-

Stock has a firm
and his proportions.
trapuntal feats are al admiration. The aracter of his first especial skill in its
s skill is never-fail-
the chromaticism
many pages of the
the symphony it is ibbed foundation of l closely related to-
ck gives conclusive
stery of all the prac-
the composing mu-

Vith Destiny

itted that the work,
sincere composition,
e." The symphony
which has engaged
[illegible]

[illegible] Man's struggles with destiny, his [illegible]oubts, defeats, his triumphant faith.

But the pity of it is, that this symphony is so utterly conventional. The conventions of Mr. Stock's symphony are not the conventions of Mozart or Brahms. They are the conventions of the German school of today, and it is strange that so few contemporaneous German composers have been able to escape them. They are the conventional contrapuntal cominations and sequences, the continual presence of a theme of three notes, taken from the first them, as a sort of a motto—a theme possibly intended to be associated with the idea of struggle.

Plethora of Sound

There is the regular and inevitable final apotheosis of a triumphant theme with other themes in counterpoint. There is the plethoric German orchestra, with almost all of the instruments going almost all of the time, swollen climax after climax, till the ear is simply dulled to the point of being unable to respond to any more noise, however exciting that noise may be. And there is the all too obvious moralizing of the composer. The semon of this symphony is rammed down the listener's throat, and delivered in what is too often a prosy manner.

No Room for Climax

We believe great art will unconciously and in a irresistibly beautiful manner communicate its lesson, and so, the presence of sign-posts do not necessarily infer the arrival of a great painter. And the final movement of the symphony suffers from gratuitous length. At the [illegible] there is no room for climax, and [illegible] ending of Mr. Stock's symphony is [illegible]nti-climax of the most banal kind. [illegible] 1st "L'Arlesienne" suite of Bizet [illegible]

ADVERTISER,

APRIL 1, 1916

NEW NATIVE WORK AT SYMPHONY

Mr. Stock's Work Holds to True Symphonic Form

DR. MUCK GIVES SCORE A SPLENDID READING

Melodic Simplicity and Beauty in Bizet's Work Follows

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Stock................Symphony No. 1, C minor
Bizet....................Suite Arlesienne, No. 1

The brevity of the program, printed above, need not be taken as an indication that there was a short concert. All moderns when composing a symphony go much beyond the length of Beethoven's first eight. But when, as in the present instance, they have something to say, this need not be [illegible] known Mr. Frederick A. Stock, in the classical forms, through an excellent string quartette, and we were, therefore, prepared to find a musicianly composition in his symphony, even if the demon of figure development should lead him to excessive length.

It is a pleasure to find a good composer in these days, who holds to the true symphonic form. Mr. Stock's work is not in the free and vague style, which too often replaces the classical form nowadays. The four regular movements are there, and each of these leans toward the Sonata-Allegro form, the strictest of the symphonic shapes. There is figure development, the intellectual side of classical music, in much profusion, so that the work will probably be more appreciated by the trained musician than the layman.

The true ideal of classical music is to combine intellectuality with emotion, and this is done in the Stock symphony, although it leans more toward the former than the latter quality. There is thematic transference also, which gives homogeneity; that is, the chief thoughts of the first movement reappear and are finely developed in the finale.

The symphony is "absolute music"; it does not tell a story, nor give definite pictures; it is subjective, not objective. Yet there are certain definite thoughts worked out, which can be readily recognized and have the composer's sanction. Thus the first movement (which is rather too long) pictures storm and stress, somewhat after the ideal of Tschaikowsky in the first movement of his fourth symphony. Life's lighter phases are daintily portrayed in the second movement, which is the Scherzo, although it is not in the conventional "Scherzo and Trio" shape, and has more development of themes than is often found in this movement. The third is the slow movement and deals with memories and reminiscences, while the finale is triumph, accented by the words "Vorwaerts" and "Aufwaerts"—"Forward" and "Upward."

The worth of the work has been recognized and it has already been performed not only by Mr. Stock's own Chicago orchestra, but by the New York (Damrosch) orchestra and the Philadelphia one. It is scored with all the resources of the largest modern orchestra; indeed it goes a little beyond most of the modern scores in demanding two English horns, a tenor tuba in addition to the bass one, a xylophone, four kettle-drums, a side drum, etc.

The chief theme of the first movement is rather wide and disjunct, but, like Max Reger, Mr. Stock seems to enjoy taking unpromising and unmelodic themes and giving most ingenious and unexpected development of them. This theme, however, lends itself excellently to triumphant effects, and it is thus used in the first movement, while it comes in with ingenious contrapuntal treatment in the finale. The subordinate theme is in good contrast, not quite as lyrical as some subordinate themes, but afterwards also developed, and in fact it ends the symphony, in the coda of the Finale. Throughout the first movement a figure of three notes is developed, a figure that is somewhat like the Wagner "Fate Figure" inverted.

Most ingenious is the development of the first movement, with its stationary tone on the violins with treatment of figures going on below, and then the inversion of this process, with an organ point on the deep instruments. There is a fine Coda here.

In the Scherzo the clarinette plays an important part and a subordinate theme is given on solo violin. This and the next movement are the least complex and likely to be the most appreciated. Yet the Finale is the really great movement of the work. There are two strong motives picturing the "Forward" and "Upward" mottoes and these are skilfully interwoven with the chief theme of the first movement, while in the Coda these two important phrases are again united. There is something of Brahms' ingenuity here, but the complexity does not obscure the triumphant character of the end. The two "motto" themes here are more shapely and melodic than some of the themes of the preceding movements.

Dr. Muck gave this large and difficult score a splendid reading and the men played it in a manner that brought out all its beauties. Mr. Stock evidently does not believe that the regular symphonic form is a lemon that is utterly squeezed dry, for he has here shown that it can be used in most modern fashion.

The symphony is decidedly dramatic in the Mahler vein of strong contrasts. These were fortissimo effects that almost blew in the eardrums of the auditors. The kettle-drummer came to the front many times and his batting average was very high; his part was at times almost a solo.

The exciting character of the work and particularly the triumphant end aroused the audience to great enthusiasm and the work, in spite of its complexity, won a success.

After this intellectual work came melodic simplicity and beauty in the shape of Bizet's "Suite Arlesienne" No. 1. That work never loses its charm, in spite of all the ambitious music that has been achieved since it was written. It was a good contrast to turn from Stock's presentation of "Life's endless toil and endeavor" to the hearty country life depicted by Bizet. The variations of the first movement, the pathos of the Innocent as portrayed upon the saxophone, the clangor of the bells at the village festival, appealed to every auditor, musician and non-musician alike, and showed that sometimes Music can really become an "Art Universal," a position from which it is rapidly departing in its most modern, complicated phases.

BOSTON GLOBE-

APRIL 1, 1916

NEW SYMPHONY BY FREDERICK STOCK

First Two Movements Outclass the Last

Virtuoso Performance by Dr Muck, Orchestra and Tympanist

Frederick Stock, the admirable conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, may become known to history for developing celerity in the mechanism of the kettle drum. For the present his tympanist must be an acrobat in full training. Mr Stock relieves the tedium of the final movement of his symphony in C minor, op 18, played by Dr Muck yesterday for the first time in Boston, with an amazing fanfare upon the kettle drums. The tympanist is obliged to brandish his drum sticks menacingly in the air as a savage of the Australian bush might have displayed his weapons. The effect is electrical as Mr Neumann accomplished yesterday what was a startling feat of virtuosity, rather than any emotional or rhetorical aid to musical expression.

It is unfortunate that the composer has not considered the adagio and the finale more carefully before allowing public performance of the work. The symphony as a whole is too long, something over an hour is required, and the final memories of it are sadly prejudicial to those which preceded.

The decline of the latter half of the work in inspiration is the more to be remarked because of the vitality and brilliance of what goes before. The adagio is swollen and labored. Until a calm spreads grateful wings over the close, there is little that moves, or appeals by any inherent power. The finale attempts to provide an apotheosis pitched in too high an emotional key. The flight falters and what was a vein of true inspirational character earlier in the work gives way to the commonplace and prolix.

There are passages, such as the twice repeated sequence in the brasses and an over worked trumpet, that are filled with noise rather than epic expression of the motto: "Forward! Upward." The trumpeter should be supremely conscious of the latter injunction. The opening proclamation for full orchestra is not without majesty and its aspiration. Some may cite the hymn for strings as a reminiscence of Brahm's similar device in his symphony in C minor. The fugal subject is somewhat broken in line to be most effective.

It is to be regretted that the first two movements could not have prompted a more fitting conclusion. They are laid out upon a large scale. Is it possible that they exhausted the composer's invention? There are in these, as throughout all, certain mannerisms, as the fondness for quickly developed dramatic outbursts, followed by periods of reflection or reorganization of forces. There is, however, a well balanced division between periods of stress and of repose. There are passages of sustained song, emotional, at times impassioned, rich in harmonic color and contrapuntal texture. There are instances of effective and striking bits of instrumentation.

There is lively characterization as in the lightness and play in the opening idea of the scherzo, a lightness which makes ensuing and contrasting episodes appear boisterous, but which returns winged as before. There are deft touches of humor and true charm in the treatment of fanciful and beguiling ideas. The latter part of the movement here as in the first, delays the end, yet is not in need of variety or resource to add another telling idea. Anticipation is developed to a sweeping and intensive degree in the conclusion of the first, in a striking and dramatic manner. The fair beginning shows the large calibre of Mr Stock's gifts. At some future time it is to be hoped he will add a slow and final movement, less long and less laborious.

The perforamnce was one of supreme and noteworthy virtuosity for Dr Muck and his players. Bizet's first "L'Arlesionne" suite completed the program.

BOSTON JOURNAL-

APRIL 1,

STOCK SYMPHONY SCORES SUCCESS

Dr. Muck Leads a Brilliant Performance of the New Work.

On this week's Symphony program is a new symphony in C minor, by Frederick A. Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, and at yesterday's concert the novelty was most enthusiastically applauded. The first two movements proved especially impressive—rich in thematic material, graphic in their expression of the composer's ideas, brilliant in development. These lower stories of the symphonic edifice, as they may be called, were substantial and, in a broad sense, beautiful. They aroused the profound interest of the public and led to a favorable reception of the two succeeding movements; but the symphony does not develop very much after the second movement.

The third movement, the andante, is a lyric long drawn out and rather reminiscent, while the final is grandiose, sentimental and, at last, sensational. There is a mighty flourish for the tympanist at the close, and Mr. Neumann enjoyed a personal ovation after the orchestra had received one. His drumming was electrical.

At any rate, the Stock symphony enjoyed a success beyond that won by any novelty of the kind introduced in many a season. It achieved the rare distinction of pleasing both the public in general and the musicians who appreciate fine technical points. Its best parts are somewhat in the style of Richard Strauss—the Strauss of "Death and Transfiguration," not of "Elektra;" but there are fine individual points, not only in the character of the themes, but in the superb use that Mr. Stock makes of all the divisions of the orchestra.

The work was performed with the utmost sympathy and brilliance by Dr. Muck and his hundred men. Mr. Stock, unfortunately, was not present. He would have been warmly received, and he would have been the first to appreciate the quite fraternal as well as artistic quality of the performance.

A performance of Bizet's own "L'Arlesienne" suite closed the concert.

There will be another novelty on the program next week, "Lucifer," a symphony poem composed by Henry K. Hadley. Beethoven's first symphony and Sibelius' "King Christian II." suite will also be played.

ADVERTISER, SATURDAY

APRIL 8, 1916

NEW WORK BY HADLEY PRESENTED

POINTS OF GREAT BEAUTY AND MUCH MAJESTY

Symphony Concert Provides Contrast to Opera Being Presented

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Beethoven	First Symphony
Hadley	"Lucifer," Symphonic Poem
Sibelius	Suite, "King Christian II."

Dr. Muck is certainly taking the American Muse under his protection, for at each recent concert he has given us some work by a native composer. It was well to have a purely orchestral concert, for we are getting all the vocal music necessary, a block further up the avenue, and we have had violinists and pianists enough in the recent programs. Many of the Symphony concert auditors attend the opera, and they must have felt how refreshing it was to come back to a more purely intellectual musical feast.

Beethoven's first symphony is more like the Haydn works than any of the later eight. When he wrote it he was directly under the influence and tutelege of Haydn and followed in his master's footsteps, although he displays more virility and power than the latter. The points of resemblances are, first, the clear shape of every movement (three Sonata-allegros and a Minuet), and second, the Haydn-like character of the finale. Haydn always made the finale of a cycle form genial and jolly, like the finale of this symphony.

But one can find the true Beethoven peeping out of this clear-cut symphony none-the-less. Hayden insisted that the third movement of the symphonic form should be a Minuet—dance themes in contrast with each other and with little or no development. Beethoven complied with this but listen to the Minuet that he wrote! It is as free as a Scherzo. It is a fact to be noted that the very first chord of the introduction of this very first of the nine symphonies should show the pioneer. The dominant chord of F to begin a symphony in C major! That set all the critics shaking their heads. Today we think it a very simple matter.

The symphony was read in a good straightforward manner, without any attempt to swell it up into something bigger than it really was. The Minuet was made sufficiently broad and the Finale sufficiently dainty. The charming archness of the slow movement was very attractive, and the audience proved by enthusiastic applause that they had not been educated out of the appreciation of melody by all the modern music they have gone through. But what will the latter-day composers say? Here is a symphony with a small score and lasting about half an hour. They will probably call it a Sinfoniettina!

Many a modern composer, if he had created a symphonic poem on "Lucifer," would have made his music sound like—Lucifer. But Mr. Hadley holds to Beethoven's apothegm—"Music, even in picturing something ugly, must in itself remain beautiful"—and does not assail the auditor with needless cacophony. There are points of great beauty and much majesty in the score; fine guiding themes—Gabriel's trumpet call, Lucifer, The Angels, Peace and Triumph—which are most skilfully interwoven. There is much development. Possibly the contrasts are too sharp and too constant, and brasses, piccolo and kettledrum effects too often repeated (especially the pedal point on the kettledrum), but the tone-coloring of the large score is effective and shows that Mr. Hadley can thoroughly handle the great modern orchestra.

The fanfares of brass and the rolls of the side drum suggested the trenches of Verdun rather than celestial warfare, but were exciting, nevertheless. The march effects were a good point (excepting the pedal point aforesaid) and the work was stronger in its combative than in its celestial effects, but it led up to a final climax that was overwhelmingly grand, and which caused great enthusiasm. The composer was recalled over and over again, and this powerful work by an American composer certainly deserved the tribute. Mr. Hadley conducted his own work, and his decisive beat and elastic reading proved that the West lost a very good conductor when they allowed him to leave San Francisco.

The end of the program was its Finnish. Sibelius' Suite was heard here complete for the first time. It is not the composer's greatest work but it is nevertheless interesting and tuneful. It does not make such a universal appeal as that other Northern Suite—the "Peer Gynt" (No. 1) by Grieg. It is founded on music written for Paul's tragedy. The opening, as well as the closing, movement, deals largely in dance rhythms; in fact, parts of this Noctunre might be an Oriental dance. Its second part is less terpsichorean, but the music is not very distinguished. Perhaps if we knew the text we might appreciate it more highly.

The Elegie, for strings, was a direct and simple affair, in whic hthe violoncellos were prominent, and did good work. The Musette was more striking. The Musette, being a rustic work, one expected the oboes to be prominent, but Sibelius gives the leading part here to the clarinettes. The rustic character is, however, thoroughly maintained, and the pastoral pipings won hearty appreciation. Both clarinettes and bassoons did commendable work in this movement.

The Valse Triste is a weird application of this dance rhythm, which pictures a dying mother hearing spirit strains and rising from her bed to dance to them. Other dancers join in, but when the dance is in full swing Death knocks at the door and ends the terpsichorean proceedings. The waltz suits better to such mournful development than to the symphonic treatment of Tschaikowsky or Berlioz, as witness also Moszkowski's lugubrious Op. 8, No. 2.

The Serenade was melodic, as was almost the entire composition, while in the finale there were again catchy dance tunes interrupted by sinister effects as if a festival were broken up by a tragedy. One must not judge a suite as one would a symphony, but one longed for some clue to the contrasts which Sibelius has used in this work and why the dances led to disaster.

[135]

From COURANT
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date MAY 28 1916
Est 884

SYMPHONY PROGRAM ENDS IN OVATION

Dr. Muck and His Players Receive Enthusiastic Applause.

The present season's series of concerts in Hartford by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came to an end in a blaze of tonal glory at the Parsons Theater last evening. There was an audience present that filled every seat, including some chairs in the pit where the theater orchestra usually holds forth, and all the available standing room, and there was such enthusiastic applause that Dr. Muck not only had to return to the stage several times to acknowledge it, but twice asked his players to rise and acknowledge it with him. Altogether the concert was a huge success and wholly justified the belief of the managers that a Wagner program, played as Dr. Muck and his men so well know how to play it, would prove wonderfully popular.

There were two Boston Symphony concerts this season previous to last evening's, but one of them was given that awful night in December when the snow was much more successful in coming downtown than were the trolley cars and automobiles, so really the great majority of Hartford music-lovers lost one-third of the orchestra's work this year. Which is a very great pity, for we have too few orchestral concerts anyway. At each of the other concerts a soloist appeared with the orchestra but last evening, with some twenty-five or thirty more players than usual appearing, no soloist was heard. And none is necessary when such a program is played in such splendid fashion; the joy of hearing the orchestra is more than sufficient.

It is many, many years since an entire Wagner program has been played here. If memory serves the last conductor to do such a thing here was Anton Seidl, one of the greatest of the disciples of the great composer. It was, therefore, Dr. Muck's privilege to give much new joy to all the lovers of Wagner's splendid music; he has played much of it here before, of course, but never so much, and indeed never some of the numbers he gave last evening. The program was finely constructed; the weird and beautiful "Flying Dutchman" music that was so brilliantly played as an opening number seemed to make a perfect memory background for the lovely measures of the "Siegfried Idyl" that followed; and the selections that were played from "Die Meistersinger" were no less lovely though of a different texture. The latter part of the program was made up of the exquisite prelude to "Lohengrin," the wondrously beautiful Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal" and the tremendous and brilliant "Tannhauser" overture. Surely no ardent Wagnerian could ask for a finer concert program—nor could he ask for a more brilliant and satisfying reading of the varied scores than that given last evening by Dr. Muck.

Even where all the playing is of splendid quality it is no more than natural that some parts of the work done should exceed others in perfection of beauty, and last evening some of the measures in the "Idyl" seemed to have reached the absolute limit of tonal loveliness; yet they were followed by playing in the "Meistersinger" that seemed even more beautiful. The "Lohengrin" prelude brought out the compelling power of the strings with splendid effect and the climax of the brass tone was simply tremendous. And in the "Parsifal" music again and again the wonders of the weaving melodies shone out, proving Wagner's right to a place not only among the masters of great orchestral effects, but as a master melodist as well. "Tannhauser"—old, old friend—simply served to bring the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm at the end of the concert. The overture, played by a great orchestra, is one of the most brilliant final numbers possible to find.

Just a word as to the size of the orchestra that played last evening. We have never had on a Hartford stage so great a number of players in a concert orchestra. Of course the mere fact that there were some ninety men playing did not make the orchestra, necessarily, any better than it has been with fewer players in the past, but the extra men did permit the conductor to get tonal effects that fewer men, no matter how capable, could not produce. Last night showed us what the really big orchestra could do. And when we have the great concert hall that every music-lover in Hartford is longing for and hoping for, the big orchestra may often be heard here. May that hall soon come!

DEPT

GLOBE—SATU

[136]

MONITOR, BOSTON
APRIL 8, 1916

"LUCIFER" TONE POEM CONDUCTED BY COMPOSER

SYMPHONY HALL—Twentieth program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, presented on the afternoon of April 7. The program: Beethoven, symphony No. 1, in C major, op. 21; Henry K. Hadley, "Lucifer" tone poem for orchestra after Vondel, op. 66 (conducted by the composer, first performance in Boston); Sibelius suite from music to Adolf Paul's tragedy, "King Christian II.," op. 27.

The program had a generally low level of interest. It contained in the first place a formal work by Beethoven, written before the master had found himself as a symphonist; in the second place a descriptive piece by an American composer, done in general imitation of all the recent grand and flamboyant styles of Europe; and in the third place a set of rhapsodies by a brilliant Finn who, though as a rule individual in his writing, can on occasion be perfunctory. The opening and closing numbers, being interpreted by the regular conductor, were neatly and vigorously executed and therefore had agreeable sonority and appealing rhythm. But the middle number, being directed by a visitor, had an uncontrolled and disjointed effect that was quite out of keeping with Symphony concert tradition.

When an American composer is invited to take the baton in the presentation of his music at these concerts, the question always arises whether the head of the orchestra cares nothing about the piece and wants to escape responsibility for its performance, or whether he wishes to pay native ability a compliment. Whatever the motives of the situation, the truth is that American music sounds better and makes a more favorable impression when handled in the ordinary way. Broadly speaking, it fares well only when it competes on its own merits for a place in the repertory. It has a more satisfactory hearing under the conductor of the orchestra himself.

Like the symphony in C minor by Frederick Stock, which was performed last week, the "Lucifer" tone poem represents the United States in the practice period of its orchestral expression. Like the work by the Chicago conductor, too, the one by the former San Francisco conductor is a transcript of recent German, Austrian and British symphonic formulas. It is written after the manner of Strauss, Mahler, Reznicek, Elgar, Delius and Bantock and it restates the impressions the composer got while studying the scores of these men. Stock rather likes to convey his ideas through melodic line, whereas Hadley prefers to set his forth in terms of color. But both have a fondness for full instrumentation and for big climax.

Five representatives of the musical life of the United States, Messrs. Converse, Clapp, Hill, Stock and Hadley, have proved themselves masters of the modern art of orchestration by works which they have produced under the auspices of the Boston orchestra in recent seasons. Two others, Chadwick and Gilbert, have not attempted the grand style but have written short pieces and have scored them with restraint. The group that has used a large symphonic plan and a heavy scheme of instrumentation can scarcely be said to have added much to what has already been well said in Europe. But the two who have used a small structural plan and have been sparing in their use of tone, have without doubt proved the better masters of self-expression. They have managed to get some national sentiment on record when their louder-speaking contemporaries have but repeated sounds from across the seas.

JOURNAL
APRIL 8-

HADLEY CONDUCTS NOVEL TONE POEM

Somerville's most distinguished musical son, Henry Hadley, conducted his tone poem, "Lucifer," at the Symphony concert yesterday. This was the first performance of the composition in Boston. It made a pleasing impression upon the audience, although, from an imaginative point of view, it is not an extraordinary work.

The composition is based on Vondel's "Lucifer," a tragedy in five acts, which was performed in Amsterdam in 1654. Some argue that Milton was much indebted to Vondel. Mr. Hadley's work has the following argument:

"The tone poem 'Lucifer' contains five principal subjects: First, the stately [illegible] proclaiming love and goodness to all his subjects); second, the Lucifer theme, sinister, foreboding; third, the choral-like theme suggesting angelic voices; fourth, the calm theme personifying peace and happiness; fifth, the theme of joy and victory during the battle. These contrast freely until the war trumpets announce Lucifer, who has gathered his legions 'round him to fight God's angels in the heavens. War ensues until Lucifer, defeated, is cast down into utter darkness. Then follows the peaceful theme, the work proceeding with the choral, and Gabriel's trumpet theme enlarged and harmonized for the entire orchestra, which brings the work to a brilliant close with a fanfare of four trumpets."

The finale stirred up much applause and the composer was called back to the stage several times.

Previous to this, Dr. Muck and the orchestra were treated to an ovation after their performance of the Beethoven symphony in C. There was also considerable enthusiasm during the performance of the final number on the program, the "King Christian II." suite of Sibelius. The second movement comprising the elegy and musette, was played six years ago under Mr. Fiedler. This time all four movements are offered—the first, a nocturne; the third, a serenade, and the fourth, a ballade. The suite is one of Sibelius' most agreeable writings.

Next week the program will include "The Forced Marriage" overture of Humperdinck, Haydn's second symphony, and Dvorak's violin concerto, with Mr. Noack as soloist.

The following week the program will fit the Shakespeare celebration. The works chosen are Smetana's "Richard III." overture, three movements from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky's tone poem, "Hamlet"; part of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, and Dvorak's "Othello" overture.

BOSTON GLOBE-
. APRIL 8, 1916

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Gracious Suite of Sibelius Gives Pleasure

Henry Hadley Conducts New Tone Poem, "Lucifer"

Sibelius' suite from his incidental music to Adolf Paul's tragedy "King Christian II,' played yesterday, Dr Muck and the orchestra, to the great pleasure of the audience, provokes interest in the other works of the Finn of this period. The suite was published in 1899 when the composer was 34. Its period is that of the first symphony, "The Maid in the Tower" (the first Finnish opera produced in 1896 at Helsingfors), a piece for solo, voice and orchestra. "The Ferryman's Bride," three cantatas and two other orchestral suites.

The style is more pastoral, more that of folk character, less epic and austere than is to be found in the Sibelius of the later symphonies and tone poems. Mr Fiedler had played the second movement, "Elegie et Musette." The others had not been performed in Boston. There is poetic expression of simplicity and directness. There is no laborious or pretentious dramatic scheme; the melodic invention is obvious, colloquial, but not commonplace, the simplicity which refreshes. The harmonic color is spontaneous, rich, but not contrived or incongruous. The musette reawakens the spirt of the pastoral dance of Louis XIV and XV, the ladies of whose courts played upon musettes of costly manufacture, airs which Weckerlin since compiled with drone bass figures in the accompaniments for piano.

The Elegie is a plaint of shepherds rather than of National grief. In all the suite the sterner face of the later Sibelius is not yet seen. The nocturne is gracious, and the serenade suggests the dance of Old World charm. There is piquancy of rhythm, suarity of line and delicacy of sentiment, with through all a fiber of the northland. The music was played with the art expected of the orchestra and of its virtuosi of woodwind instruments.

Hadley's "Lucifer"

Henry Hadley, whose rising career has been followed with interest in this city of his early home, conducted for its first performance in Boston his "Lucifer," a tone poem for grand orchestra after a poem by Vondel, op. 66. Vondel was a Dutch poet and dramatist of the 16th and 17th centuries, whom some suppose was an inspiration through his drama "Lucifer" of Milton's "Paradise Lost."

The downfall of Satan and the infernal haste from the gates of Heaven has tempted many an intrepid composer. A less cyclopean subject, such as a shepherd piping gentle airs to his mistress, would, generally speaking, be more grateful, and perhaps no less edifying.

Enrico Bossi made a setting of the "Paradise Lost" for chorus which was sung here by the Handel and Haydn Society. Being a cathedral organist he composed heavenly music of a very fair and inviting quality, but showed very little acquaintance with the nether regions. Mr Converse, a man of kind heart and good works, albeit of learning, nevertheless wrote more persuasively of the powers of light in his "Ormazd." So also Cesar Franck.

Much Work for the Brass

What then is a composer to do? Mr Hadley chose a formula on which most books upon how to write symphonic poems probably would agree—trumpet calls ringing through the heavens, other depiction of heaven in high strings in modal harmonies, suggestion of the devil in short, disgruntled and ejaculatory phrases plied with [illegible] simulating with turbu-

Mr Hadley has called loudly upon the modern orchestra today in a rhetorical matter material which cannot be called impressive in thought. At times color of sounds conceals paucity of invention. There is some facility in a conventional ecclesiastical suggestion. As to any presentation of the great world struggle which may in any epoch or time destroy a Nation or a soul, Mr Hadley himself would have to listen with highly imaginative ears to hear it.

The brass section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has labored valiantly for two weeks. If next Friday Humperdinck kindly spares these gentlemen in his "Forced Marriage" overtures, which is not particularly reassuring in title, there is hope for relief in Dvorak's violin concerto and Haydn's symphony. Beethoven's symphony began the program yesterday.

HERALD
APRIL 8, 1916

COMPOSER OF 'LUCIFER' LEADS AT SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives Boston Its Initial Performance of Hadley's Tone-Poem—Absence of Continuity Noted—Has Some Pretty Orchestral Effects, However.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 1; Hadley, "Lucifer," Tone-Poem; Sibelius, Suite from the music to Paul's tragedy, "King Christian II." The concert will be repeated tonight.

Mr. Hadley's "Lucifer" was played here for the first time. He conducted the performance. He was inspired to write his music by the drama of Joost van den Vondel, whose tragedy "Lucifer" is now remembered, because some think that Milton was greatly indebted to it for his "Paradise Lost." Mr. Hadley's tone-poem was first performed at a festival of the Litchfield County Choral Union, Norfolk, Ct., in June, 1914. In November of the same year it was performed by the Philharmonic Society of New York.

There are five principal themes: Gabriel blows his trumpet, "announcing God's message proclaiming love and goodness to all his subjects"; the Lucifer theme, described as sinister in the composer's preface; a choral-like theme "suggesting angelic voices"; a "calm theme personifying peace and happiness"; the theme of joy and victory during the battle.

Two of Mr. Hadley's symphonies have been played at these concerts, and his tone poem, "Salome," and his rhapsody, "The Culprit Fay," have also been performed. "Lucifer" is inferior to them. As in the works already named, there is the same facility, the same knowing routine, but the musical contents are of slight importance.

The subject—the revolt of Lucifer and his host, the battle with the celestial army, the portraiture of heavenly peace —this would tax the invention and the imagination of a great genius. Cesar Franck failed dismally in his "Beatitudes" when he wrote music in Meyerbeerian vein for Satan. Liszt's music for Mephistopheles is successful only in parodying the themes that picture Faust. Boito presents Mephistopheles as a startling figure in the prologue to his opera, but in the Walpurgis Night he is a devilish bore. The few chords typical of Samiel in "Der Freischuetz" are more demoniacal than all the music invented by Gounod and even Berlioz, for the latter's wonderful "Ride to Hell" does not depend for its effect on the ejaculations of the fiend.

Mr. Hadley's themes are not significant. Gabriel's trumpet call is as any earthly fanfare. The Lucifer theme is only mildly melodramatic; the themes expressive of heavenly voices and peace and happiness have a gentle, soothing character suggestive of psalmody for female voices. The five themes are exposed in due order as though ticketed for a museum, but there is little true development. The tone-poem suffers from an absence of continuity, a lack of close relationship. There are some pretty orchestral effects in the suaver episodes; there is a brave attempt at grandeur with a pedal point as the foundation; but when it comes to the dramatic pages, the painting of Lucifer in tones, the battle in the sky, the rejoicing of the angelic hosts, this music is conventional and ineffective. The subject would daunt a Richard Strauss. Few composers among the greatest have been Miltonic.

The Suite of Sibelius is derived from incidental music to a tragedy by Adolf Paul. Mr. Fiedler brought out the Elegy and Musette six years ago, and this movement of the suite is more interesting than the other movements played here yesterday for the first time, the Nocturne, Serenade, Ballade. The Suite is not among the important works of Sibelius. The music, no doubt, has more significance when it is heard in connection with the tragedy. Those who object to incidental music say that if it is good it calls attention from the play and players. If it is poor, it is the more impertinent. In this suite there is constant evidence of the practised composer, but with the exception of the Elegy and

From COURANT

Address Hartford, Conn.

Date [illegible] 1916

Est 884

SYMPHONY PROGRAM ENDS IN OVATION

Dr. Muck and His Players Receive Enthusiastic Applause.

The present season's series of concerts in Hartford by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came to an end in a blaze of tonal glory at the Parsons Theater last evening. There was an audience present that filled every seat, including some chairs in the pit where the theater orchestra usually holds forth, and all the available standing room, and there was such enthusiastic applause that Dr. Muck not only had to return to the stage several times to acknowledge it, but twice asked his players to rise and acknowledge it with him. Altogether the concert was a huge success and wholly justified the belief of the managers that a Wagner program, played as Dr. Muck and his men so well know how to play it, would prove wonderfully popular.

There were two Boston Symphony concerts this season previous to last evening's, but one of them was given that awful night in December when the snow was much more successful in coming downtown than were the trolley cars and automobiles, so really the great majority of Hartford music-lovers lost one-third of the orchestra's work this year. Which is a very great pity, for we have too few orchestral concerts anyway. At each of the other concerts a soloist appeared with the orchestra but last evening, with some twenty-five or thirty more players than usual appearing, no soloist was heard. And none is necessary when such a program is played in such splendid fashion; the joy of hearing the orchestra is more than sufficient.

It is many, many years since an entire Wagner program has been played here. If memory serves the last conductor to do such a thing here was Anton Seidl, one of the greatest of the disciples of the great composer. It was, therefore, Dr. Muck's privilege to give much new joy to all the lovers of Wagner's splendid music; he has played much of it here before, of course, but never so much, and indeed never some of the numbers he gave last evening. The program was finely constructed; the weird and beautiful "Flying Dutchman" music that was so brilliantly played as an opening number seemed to make a perfect memory background for the lovely measures of the "Siegfried Idyl" that followed; and the selections that were played from "Die Meistersinger" were no less lovely though of a different texture. The latter part of the program was made up of the exquisite prelude to "Lohengrin," the wondrously beautiful Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal" and the tremendous and brilliant "Tannhauser" overture. Surely no ardent Wagnerian could ask for a finer concert program—nor could he ask for a more brilliant and satisfying reading of the varied scores than that given last evening by Dr. Muck.

Even where all the playing is of splendid quality it is no more than natural that some parts of the work done should exceed others in perfection of beauty, and last evening some of the measures in the "Idyl" seemed to have reached the absolute limit of tonal loveliness; yet they were followed by playing in the "Meistersinger" that seemed even more beautiful. The "Lohengrin" prelude brought out the compelling power of the strings with splendid effect and the climax of the brass tone was simply tremendous. And in the "Parsifal" music again and again the wonders of the weaving melodies shone out, proving Wagner's right to a place not only among the masters of great orchestral effects, but as a master melodist as well. "Tannhauser"—old, old friend—simply served to bring the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm at the end of the concert. The overture, played by a great orchestra, is one of the most brilliant final numbers possible to find.

Just a word as to the size of the orchestra that played last evening. We have never had on a Hartford stage so great a number of players in a concert orchestra. Of course the mere fact that there were some ninety men playing did not make the orchestra, necessarily, any better than it has been with fewer players in the past, but the extra men did permit the conductor to get tonal effects that fewer men, no matter how capable, could not produce. Last night showed us what the really big orchestra could do. And when we have the great concert hall that every music-lover in Hartford is longing for and hoping for, the big orchestra may often be heard here. May that hall soon come!

LOBE—SATU

MONITOR, BOSTON

APRIL 8, 1916

"LUCIFER" TONE POEM CONDUCTED BY COMPOSER

SYMPHONY HALL—Twentieth program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, presented on the afternoon of April 7. The program: Beethoven, symphony No. 1, in C major, op. 21; Henry K. Hadley, "Lucifer" tone poem for orchestra after Vondel, op. 66 (conducted by the composer, first performance in Boston); Sibelius suite from music to Adolf Paul's tragedy, "King Christian II.," op. 27.

The program had a generally low level of interest. It contained in the first place a formal work by Beethoven, written before the master had found himself as a symphonist; in the second place a descriptive piece by an American composer, done in general imitation of all the recent grand and flamboyant styles of Europe; and in the third place a set of rhapsodies by a brilliant Finn who, though as a rule individual in his writing, can on occasion be perfunctory. The opening and closing numbers, being interpreted by the regular conductor, were neatly and vigorously executed and therefore had agreeable sonority and appealing rhythm. But the middle number, being directed by a visitor, had an uncontrolled and disjointed effect that was quite out of keeping with Symphony concert tradition.

When an American composer is invited to take the baton in the presentation of his music at these concerts, the question always arises whether the head of the orchestra cares nothing about the piece and wants to escape responsibility for its performance, or whether he wishes to pay native ability a compliment. Whatever the motives of the situation, the truth is that American music sounds better and makes a more favorable impression when handled in the ordinary way. Broadly speaking, it fares well only when it competes on its own merits for a place in the repertory. It has a more satisfactory hearing under the conductor of the orchestra himself.

Like the symphony in C minor by Frederick Stock, which was performed last week, the "Lucifer" tone poem represents the United States in the practice period of its orchestral expression. Like the work by the Chicago conductor, too, the one by the former San Francisco conductor is a transcript of recent German, Austrian and British symphonic formulas. It is written after the manner of Strauss, Mahler, Reznicek, Elgar, Delius and Bantock and it restates the impressions the composer got while studying the scores of these men. Stock rather likes to convey his ideas through melodic line, whereas Hadley prefers to set his forth in terms of color. But both have a fondness for full instrumentation and for big climax.

Five representatives of the musical life of the United States, Messrs. Converse, Clapp, Hill, Stock and Hadley, have proved themselves masters of the modern art of orchestration by works which they have produced under the auspices of the Boston orchestra in recent seasons. Two others, Chadwick and Gilbert, have not attempted the grand style but have written short pieces and have scored them with restraint. The group that has used a large symphonic plan and a heavy scheme of instrumentation can scarcely be said to have added much to what has already been well said in Europe. But the two who have used a small structural plan and have been sparing in their use of tone, have without doubt proved the better masters of self-expression. They have managed to get some national sentiment on record when their louder-speaking contemporaries have but repeated sounds from across the seas.

JOURNAL
APRIL 8—

HADLEY CONDUCTS NOVEL TONE POEM

Somerville's most distinguished musical son, Henry Hadley, conducted his tone poem, "Lucifer," at the Symphony concert yesterday. This was the first performance of the composition in Boston. It made a pleasing impression upon the audience, although, from an imaginative point of view, it is not an extraordinary work.

The composition is based on Vondel's "Lucifer," a tragedy in five acts, which was performed in Amsterdam in 1654. Some argue that Milton was much indebted to Vondel. Mr. Hadley's work has the following argument:

"The tone poem 'Lucifer' contains five principal subjects: First, the stately [illegible] announcing God's [illegible] proclaiming love and goodness to all his subjects); second, the Lucifer theme, sinister, foreboding; third, the choral-like theme suggesting angelic voices; fourth, the calm theme personifying peace and happiness; fifth, the theme of joy and victory during the battle. These contrast freely until the war trumpets announce Lucifer, who has gathered his legions 'round him to fight God's angels in the heavens. War ensues until Lucifer, defeated, is cast down into utter darkness. Then follows the peaceful theme, the work proceeding with the choral, and Gabriel's trumpet theme enlarged and harmonized for the entire orchestra, which brings the work to a brilliant close with a fanfare of four trumpets."

The finale stirred up much applause and the composer was called back to the stage several times.

Previous to this, Dr. Muck and the orchestra were treated to an ovation after their performance of the Beethoven symphony in C. There was also considerable enthusiasm during the performance of the final number on the program, the "King Christian II." suite of Sibelius. The second movement comprising the elegy and musette, was played six years ago under Mr. Fiedler. This time all four movements are offered—the first, a nocturne; the third, a serenade, and the fourth, a ballade. The suite is one of Sibelius' most agreeable writings.

Next week the program will include "The Forced Marriage" overture of Humperdinck, Haydn's second symphony, and Dvorak's violin concerto, with Mr. Noack as soloist.

The following week the program will fit the Shakespeare celebration. The works chosen are Smetana's "Richard III." overture, three movements from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky's tone poem, "Hamlet"; part of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, and Dvorak's "Othello" overture.

BOSTON GLOBE—

. APRIL 8, 1916

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Gracious Suite of Sibelius Gives Pleasure

Henry Hadley Conducts New Tone Poem, "Lucifer"

Sibelius' suite from his incidental music to Adolf Paul's tragedy "King Christian II,' 'played yesterday, Dr Muck and the orchestra, to the great pleasure of the audience, provokes interest in the other works of the Finn of this period. The suite was published in 1899 when the composer was 34. Its period is that of the first symphony, "The Maid in the Tower" (the first Finnish opera produced in 1896 at Helsingfors), a piece for solo, voice and orchestra. "The Ferryman's Bride," three cantatas and two other orchestral suites.

The style is more pastoral, more that of folk character, less epic and austere than is to be found in the Sibelius of the later symphonies and tone poems. Mr Fiedler had played the second movement, "Elegie et Musette." The others had not been performed in Boston. There is poetic expression of simplicity and directness. There is no laborious or pretentious dramatic scheme; the melodic invention is obvious, colloquial, but not commonplace, the simplicity which refreshes. The harmonic color is spontaneous, rich, but not contrived or incongruous. The musette reawakens the spirt of the pastoral dance of Louis XIV and XV, the ladies of whose courts played upon musettes of costly manufacture, airs which Weckerlin since compiled with drone bass figures in the accompaniments for piano.

The Elegie is a plaint of shepherds rather than of National grief. In all the suite the sterner face of the later Sibelius is not yet seen. The nocturne is gracious, and the serenade suggests the dance of Old World charm. There is piquancy of rhythm, suarity of line and delicacy of sentiment, with through all a fiber of the northland. The music was played with the art expected of the orchestra and of its virtuosi of woodwind instruments.

Hadley's "Lucifer"

Henry Hadley, whose rising career has been followed with interest in this city of his early home, conducted for its first performance in Boston his "Lucifer," a tone poem for grand orchestra after a poem by Vondel, op. 66. Vondel was a Dutch poet and dramatist of the 16th and 17th centuries, whom some suppose was an inspiration through his drama "Lucifer" of Milton's "Paradise Lost."

The downfall of Satan and the infernal haste from the gates of Heaven has tempted many an intrepid composer. A less cyclopean subject, such as a shepherd piping gentle airs to his mistress, would, generally speaking, be more grateful, and perhaps no less edifying.

Enrico Bossi made a setting of the "Paradise Lost" for chorus which was sung here by the Handel and Haydn Society. Being a cathedral organist he composed heavenly music of a very fair and inviting quality, but showed very little acquaintance with the nether regions. Mr Converse, a man of kind heart and good works, albeit of learning, nevertheless wrote more persuasively of the powers of light in his "Ormazd." So also Cesar Franck.

Much Work for the Brass

What then is a composer to do? Mr Hadley chose a formula on which most books upon how to write symphonic poems probably would agree—trumpet calls ringing through the heavens, other depiction of heaven in high strings in modal harmonies, suggestion of the devil in short, disgruntled and ejaculatory phrases plied with much energy, cumulating with turbu-

Mr Hadley has called loudly upon the modern orchestra today in a rhetorical matter material which cannot be called impressive in thought. At times color of sounds conceals paucity of invention. There is some facility in a conventional ecclesiastical suggestion. As to any presentation of the great world struggle which may in any epoch or time destroy a Nation or a soul, Mr Hadley himself would have to listen with highly imaginative ears to hear it.

The brass section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has labored valiantly for two weeks. If next Friday Humperdinck kindly spares these gentlemen in his "Forced Marriage" overtures, which is not particularly reassuring in title, there is hope for relief in Dvorak's violin concerto and Haydn's symphony. Beethoven's symphony began the program yesterday.

HERALD
APRIL 8, 1916

COMPOSER OF 'LUCIFER' LEADS AT SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives Boston Its Initial Performance of Hadley's Tone-Poem—Absence of Continuity Noted—Has Some Pretty Orchestral Effects, However.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 1; Hadley, "Lucifer," Tone-Poem; Sibelius, Suite from the music to Paul's tragedy, "King Christian II." The concert will be repeated tonight.

Mr. Hadley's "Lucifer" was played here for the first time. He conducted the performance. He was inspired to write his music by the drama of Joost van den Vondel, whose tragedy "Lucifer" is now remembered, because some think that Milton was greatly indebted to it for his "Paradise Lost." Mr. Hadley's tone-poem was first performed at a festival of the Litchfield County Choral Union, Norfolk, Ct., in June, 1914. In November of the same year it was performed by the Philharmonic Society of New York.

There are five principal themes: Gabriel blows his trumpet, "announcing God's message proclaiming love and goodness to all his subjects"; the Lucifer theme, described as sinister in the composer's preface; a choral-like theme "suggesting angelic voices"; a "calm theme personifying peace and happiness"; the theme of joy and victory during the battle.

Two of Mr. Hadley's symphonies have been played at these concerts, and his tone poem, "Salome," and his rhapsody, "The Culprit Fay," have also been performed. "Lucifer" is inferior to them. As in the works already named, there is the same facility, the same knowing routine, but the musical contents are of slight importance.

The subject—the revolt of Lucifer and his host, the battle with the celestial army, the portraiture of heavenly peace—this would tax the invention and the imagination of a great genius. Cesar Franck failed dismally in his "Beatitudes" when he wrote music in Meyerbeerian vein for Satan. Liszt's music for Mephistopheles is successful only in parodying the themes that picture Faust. Boito presents Mephistopheles as a startling figure in the prologue to his opera, but in the Walpurgis Night he is a devilish bore. The few chords typical of Samiel in "Der Freischuetz" are more demoniacal than all the music invented by Gounod and even Berlioz, for the latter's wonderful "Ride to Hell" does not depend for its effect on the ejaculations of the fiend.

Mr. Hadley's themes are not significant. Gabriel's trumpet call is as any earthly fanfare. The Lucifer theme is only mildly melodramatic; the themes expressive of heavenly voices and peace and happiness have a gentle, soothing character suggestive of psalmody for female voices. The five themes are exposed in due order as though ticketed for a museum, but there is little true development. The tone-poem suffers from an absence of continuity, a lack of close relationship. There are some pretty orchestral effects in the suaver episodes; there is a brave attempt at grandeur with a pedal point as the foundation; but when it comes to the dramatic pages, the painting of Lucifer in tones, the battle in the sky, the rejoicing of the angelic hosts, this music is conventional and ineffective. The subject would daunt a Richard Strauss. Few composers among the greatest have been Miltonic.

The Suite of Sibelius is derived from incidental music to a tragedy by Adolf Paul. Mr. Fiedler brought out the Elegy and Musette six years ago, and this movement of the suite is more interesting than the other movements played here yesterday for the first time, the Nocturne, Serenade, Ballade. The Suite is not among the important works of Sibelius. The music, no doubt, has more significance when it is heard in connection with the tragedy. Those who object to incidental music say that if it is good it calls attention from the play and players. If it is poor, it is the more impertinent. In this suite there is constant evidence of the practised composer, but with the exception of the Elegy and

It is interesting to note that when Beethoven's symphony in C-major was first performed at Leipsic, it was described by a local critic—no doubt a man who had his admiring readers—as "the confused explosions of the outrageous effrontery of a young man." There were stand-patters in the Leipsic of 1801; lineal descendants are found there today.

The program of the concerts next week are as follows: Humperdinck, overture to "The Forced Marriage"; Dvorak, Concerto for violin (Mr. Noack, violinist); Haydn, Symphony, D-major (B. & H. No. 2).

From

Address Hartford, Conn.

Date [illegible] 1916

MUSICAL REVIEW

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Remarkable Wagner Program Before Capacity Audience at Parsons

The third and last concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Parsons Theatre last evening before the largest audience of the season. Dr. Muck presided, and a Wagner program was the order of the occasion. The following selections were played:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."
"A Siegfried Idyl."
Selections from Act III, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
Prelude to "Lohengrin."
The Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal."
Overture to "Tannhauser."

What better musical treat could possibly be arranged than a Wagner program under the magical baton of Dr. Muck, himself, like Wagner, a German, and since his earliest youth trained in the Wagnerian school? The orchestra was larger in numbers than ever before heard here, and the results attained were, like everything else that Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra attempt, eminently satisfactory. The absence of the customary soloist was not felt. The undivided interest of the audience was centered in the orchestra, and anything else would have been an intrusion.

As one member of the orchestra expressed himself during the intermission: "We could play all this music with our eyes shut. We know every note, and every bit of expression without referring to the score." That statement was borne out in the many etherial and lovely effects which Dr. Muck attained. Of course, the Boston Symphony players are letter perfect in everything they play, but in Wagnerian music they attain results in expression and interpretation which seem almost beyond human belief.

As never before Hartford music lovers realized what a privilege it is to be able to hear three concerts every year by what is undoubtedly the greatest orchestra in the world. No mere human being could criticize the work of the Boston Orchestra. Critics, all reports to the contrary notwithstanding, are human, and anyone, no matter how soured on this world of ours, who heard last evening's concert could bestow anything but praise. The wonderful wood wind and soft reed instruments of the orchestra were given much more opportunity to display their ability than in an ordinary concert, and the players surely availed themselves of the opportunity to display their rare talents.

Those who listened carefully had ample opportunity to note the admirable quality of the clarinet, the beautiful notes of the flute, and the remarkable playing of the solo cornetist. But the individual work was soon swallowed up in the symmetry of the whole, and nothing was left to notice and admire but the ensemble work of the entire organization.

To single out any one number of the exquisite program for special praise would be treason. Some might have preferred the "Tannhauser" overture, while those of a more religious turn of mind might have been attracted to the "Parsifal" selections. The poetical and dreamy individual would have been drawn to the "Lohengrin" prelude, which was taken at a tempo even slower than the extreme largo adopted by other conductors. There was poetry in the "Siegfried Idyl," poetry of the kind which endures, and leaves its impression for generations of those yet unborn, and poetry which will enlighten the human race for hundreds of years after we are all passed and gone. The "Idyl" is a rare gem of musical art. Dr. Muck, instead of a stolid German, became an emotional leader of a band of supernaturally endowed musicians, and the almost celestial harmonies which he drew from the willing souls of his co-workers, seemed to lift every one into a world where imagination and romance reign supreme.

Rythm, melody, and pomp are all written in the prelude to Act III of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." This prelude shows the dance of the apprentices, procession of the master singers, and song of greeting to Hans Sach. It was in this that Dr. Muck attained probably his greatest artistic and musical triumph of the evening. Mere words cannot describe the interpretation. Dr. Muck went far beyond the mere effects usually heard in grand opera. He conducted with the years of experience gained in the Wagnerian surroundings of the Fatherland.

At the conclusion of the program the conductor was tendered an ovation, which he generously shared with members of his orchestra.

R. M. L.

BOSTON POST
APRIL 5, 1916

HADLEY POEM AT SYMPHONY

"Lucifer" Played for First Time in Boston

BY OLIN DOWNES

Henry Hadley's symphonic poem, "Lucifer," after the work of the Dutch poet, Vondel, was performed for the first time in Boston yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor. This poem treats of the conflict between Satan and Gabriel, the preparation for the battle, the battle itself, the ultimate joy of the righteous conquerors.

We do not like this music. We think it the epitome of all that is theatrical and commonplace. We know of little music by Mr. Hadley which stands by its side when worthlessness is concerned. There are conventional German tricks of composition and instrumentation. There is a flourish of the brass suggestive of France. There is nothing which appears as the inevitable, spontaneous idea of the composer. An immense orchestra which includes the organ and many pulsatile instruments is used. But the best description of this tone poem is contained in one sentence by the distinguished editor of the Symphony programmes: "A heaven with complicated apparatus was elected at a large expense."

The Beethoven symphony gave pleasure to the audience. Five small pieces of Sibelius, from his "King Christian" music—music written for a drama representing, presumably "King Christian," were played, three for the first time here. These pieces are frankly theatre music. Each piece has a melodic idea, charmingly worked out, and eloquent in a manner not so sophisticated that no one can discover the meaning of the speaker. The mastery of form shown in these little pieces for the stage is a thing which also testifies to the talent of Sibelius, one of the greatest figures in modern music.

A ERI N
[illegible] 2, 1916

STOCK'S FIRST SYMPHONY IS 'HUMAN LIFE'

Composer Sees Joys and Sorrows of Race in His Work; Is Well Received.

By FRED J. M'ISAAC.

Most of the concert at Symphony Hall Friday afternoon was devoted to Frederick A. Stock's First Symphony, which was played for the first time in Boston. The performance lasted an hour and ten minutes. Mr. Stock is conductor of the Chicago orchestra. He was born in Germany, studied at Cologne, and came to this country to play the viola in Theodore Thomas' Orchestra in 1895.

Mr. Stock himself describes this symphony as "human life, its sorrows as well as its joys, the struggle of mortal man against fate, the spiritual trials, despair at the apparent futility of worldly existence mingled with the hope that victory will be his in the end."

Stock, of course, is a fine musician, intimately acquainted with the uses of all musical instruments, and fully informed by the simple process of studying and performing the world's music what curious sounds tions of instruments and tones.

NOVEL TONAL EFFECTS.

Imagine Stock sitting down, with his head full of all the works of Strauss, Debussy, Reger, Sibelius, Liszt and Wagner, to compose a symphony. See him rejecting one theme after another because he isn't sure whether it is original or a vagrant tune from one of the world's masters. Is it any wonder that he has avoided out and out melody in this symphony, and has resorted to a combination of the orchestral trickery of all the modernists put together?

The first movement, adagio, an allegro ma non troppo, is one of the noisiest, most strident, most bombastic, least agreeable and least sensible affairs I ever listened to. Certainly there are novel and curious tonal effects, colorings and theme treatments, but from the point of an auditor it was formless and purposeless uproar, nothing more.

It might have represented the futility of human ambition, or the simultaneous slaughter of ten thousand animals in the Chicago stock yards. The second movement, or scherzo, Mr. Stock fatly observes, might be considered humorous. It was ponderous orchestral trickery upon stupid or commonplace themes.

LYRIC PASSAGES.

The third movement, reminiscences of life's happiest movements, reveals some lyric passages of interest, and less offensive mannerisms, while the finale rises to considerable heights of richness, sonority and majesty, despite furious orchestration. The last few bars are a test of agility for the kettle drummer, who did nobly.

Doctor Muck conducted this monstrous affair with the utmost enthusiasm, and the orchestra never played better. Stock had provided traps and pitfalls for every instrument in the band, and as far as could be judged they all emerged safely, if a little winded, upon the other side.

The charming airy melodies of Bizet's L'Arlessienne Suite brought the concert to a pleasant close.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
SATURDAY, APRIL 1,

FIRST SYMPHONY OF STOCK GIVEN BY KARL MUCK

SYMPHONY HALL—Nineteenth program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of March 31: Frederick A. Stock, symphony in C minor, op. 18 (first time in Boston); Bizet, "L'Arlesienne," suite No. 1.

Once there were architects. They designed government offices, art museums, academic halls and other buildings for the decoration and dignifying of public life. There are still architects of a minor sort, who confine themselves chiefly to drawing plans and elevations of dwelling houses; or, if they ever get a chance at anything big, it is only to sketch the façade which masks and disguises the real work. They put in the Corinthian columns and the Gothic windows which give a building its apparent style and lend it a show of historical classification. They have nothing to do, however, with the inner organization of the structure. No; the men who build today are engineers.

Now the striking difference between the two types is that the worker in stone and mortar was engaged with a problem of adapting his material to his form, while the worker in steel and cement thinks in terms of pure form and bothers himself not at all about the medium in which he builds. The first weighed and balanced everything and erected a self-sustaining, economically proportioned edifice. The second, forsooth, conceives his outlines as large as he happens to want to and proceeds to fill them, confident that whatever he puts up will stand as long as the foundations of the earth remain steady.

Once there were architects in tone. But they, too, have been for the most part supplanted. The orchestral composer of today keeps his old character of architect only in the small forms, like the overture and the variation. In the symphonic form he is, with an exception here and there, an exalted mechanician. In the architectural days, the composer of a symphony, after plotting his four movements and parceling out his themes, was conscious at once of definite limits for his ground space and his height. In these engineering days, on the contrary, the symphony composer takes all the area he wishes and goes into the air as far as he likes.

Now the modern engineer may be just as much of an artist as the former-time architect. He is, without dispute, far the franker person. And to be frank, even egotistic, is undoubtedly to be expressive. The future must decide the question, though the present must ponder it. Gustav Mahler, the most ingenious, no doubt, in workmanship and the most magnificent in idea of all tone engineers, seems likely to be accepted within a short time as one who composed from as great a necessity to say something to the world as Beethoven or Brahms. So, likewise, Mr. Stock, the very leader of the tone engineers of the United States, according to the evidence of his symphony in C minor, may win ready recognition.

In approving the Mahler-Stock kind of composition, the twentieth century listener will be obliged to shift musical emphasis to a far different place from where the nineteenth century listener had it. He will have to be persuaded into putting symphonic expression on a wholly intellectual basis. For the tone engineers are relentlessly serious in all they say. They proclaim the complete supremacy of thought over feeling. They will have nothing to do with humor, except in the most calculating and ironical way. And they will not tolerate any manifestation of that which the world used to know as sentiment. They let the head rule and they give notice that the heart must keep out.

To a conservative listener, the saving quality of a work like the Mahler symphony in C sharp minor, which was on the Boston programs two years ago, and the Stock symphony in C minor is a kind of good-nature which pervades them. Plainly the writers rejoiced in their ability to turn out works of larger sonority and of greater amplitude of form than their predecessors could execute. And men enjoying their work are always a refreshment. But many will find it hard to understand how anybody could take pleasure in such heavy scoring as that which the conductor of the Chicago orchestra put into the pages of his composition. Perhaps the French critic was right who said that a man who conducts all the time does not write with genuine inspiration, but only gives out what he has heard. In this work the composer seems determined to give out all he has ever heard. For the amount of sound which he develops is simply unprecedented. No symphonist before, not even Bruckner, has piled up so much tone and kept it harmonically plausible.

The piece might be described as all climax, so little cessation is there to the full orchestral volume. But this would be somewhat of an exaggeration since the scherzo and the slow move-

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Boston Heral
April 2, 1916

SYMPHONY PLAYERS GIVE 19TH CONCERT

Audience Warmly Receives Performance of Stock's Symphony in C Minor, Which Occupied Nearly an Hour—Program Is to Be Repeated This Evening.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Stock, Symphony in C-Minor; Bizet, Suite No. 1 from the music for Daudet's "L'Arlesienne."

Mr. Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony orchestra, visited this city with his band in December, 1911, and with the Mendelssohn choir of Toronto in February of the next year. At the second concert his Symphonic Waltz was played by the orchestra. His string quartet was heard in 1911 at a Kneisel concert. The Kneisels had played a movement of this quartet late in 1905. The composer of the Symphony in C-Minor, played here yesterday for the first time, was therefore not a stranger in Boston.

This symphony is long. It lasted yesterday, with the pauses between the movements, about an hour. The length is prejudicial to the value of the work, for there is much said that is not worth saying. More than once a fine effect is frittered away or at once destroyed by Mr. Stock's inability to stop, by his insatiate desire to add something from fear lest he has not already made his point. There is overdevelopment. Anxiety lest little figures, fragments of phrases, should pass unnoticed leads him to give them undue importance by endless repetition. This anxiety is also observed at the end of the scherzo. The natural ending is here and in another instance effective. But there must needs be a postscript, and this postscript, unlike the traditional one of a woman's letter, does not contain the vital statement.

Mr. Stock has said that his symphony is meant to describe "human life, its sorrows as well as joys," the struggle of mortal man against fate, the spiritual trials to which he is subjected. The first movement represents various phases of this struggle; the Scherzo speaks of life's joys in a more or less humorous fashion; the third depicts reminiscences of happy moments; while the finale "explains itself when it is made known that it bears the motto which has become the 'motive of life' of the German nation: Forward! Upward!" This was written in 1910. Reprinted, it is ironical today. Yet some, finding the finale brutally noisy, might admit that the choice of these mottoes is appropriate.

We have said that the symphony is too long; that there is over-elaboration, too much detail. It may also be said that the music is too often deafening. A common theme—for Mr. Stock's thematic material is at times common—is swollen preposterously that it may seem heroic. Let it not be said that the din was in any way the fault of the conductor. Dr. Muck, who had taken great pains in preparation and held many rehearsals gave a brilliant reading of the work. The noise—for sound often became noise—is in the music itself, as any one can see by examining the score. The composer employs a very large orchestra, and he goads it to fury. His instrumentation, as a rule, is thick and heavy. When it is in lighter mood it is experimentally fanciful.

There is the influence of Strauss throughout the work, and it is seldom that of the better Strauss. There is very little that has individual flavor. The scheme of his work as he has stated it, the program side of it, has been adopted by many before him. This is a matter of trifling importance; but in the music we find little originality. There is a following of old devices Straussized. There is indisputable technical skill; there is infinite labor.

The symphony was warmly received. This is not surprising. Any work, new or old, that has a sonorous, heaven de- [illegible] parts of the composition are [illegible] together. Long as it is, there [illegible] irrelevant passages. The first movement is the most interesting, because its mood is appropriate to an opening allegro, and because its thematic unity is absolutely unbroken. A motive of three notes runs through it all and never exhausts its expressiveness and appeal. The scherzo has some admirable touches of color at the beginning and the end, but its humor is not well sustained. The andante, as has been indicated, wants sentiment. The finale is overcharged, almost absurdly, with loud-voiced moments.

The reading of the score by Dr. Muck was in every respect masterly and the playing by the men was enthusiastic and brilliant.

[illegible] to vie in noise. Furthermore the agility of the kettledrum player at the end of the Finale no doubt had something to do with the degree of applause. The orchestral performance, however, deserved tribute.

It is to be regretted that the saxophone was not used in Bizet's Prelude and Minuetto. In the former it is peculiarly characteristic of the "Innocent." The cold, unearthly tones do not belong to the replacing instrument. It is said that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has no saxophone. Yet we remember Mr. Strasser playing one in Bizet's suite, and on one occasion Mrs. Hall with the instrument was added to the players.

This concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 1; Hadley, Lucifer," a symphonic poem (first time here); Sibelius, suite, "King Christian II."

TIMES

From

Address Hartford, Conn.

Date

PROGRAM GIVEN OVER TO WAGNER

And the Result Is an Evening of True Musical Ravishment.

The third and last Boston Symphony concert for the season was given in Parsons's theater last evening, Dr. Karl Muck conducting. The program was entirely made up of excerpts from the works of Wagner And this program was enthusiastically received by a very large and notably representative audience From which it would appear tha Hartford town finds little of substance or interest in the speculativ theory that Wagner's influence o the development of the presen German national point of view ha been more potent if more subtl than the influence of Frederick th Great, Nietzsche, Treitschke, Bernhardi, et al.

Dr. Muck's pre-eminence as Wagnerian conductor is everywher acknowledged. The Boston orchestra as a symphonic instrument ha no superior. The music heard las evening was noble music—music familiar and much beloved. Th great company of listeners receptiv and responsive. All the element involved in a great and memorabl performance were present. An such a performance this concer was.

Transcript
April 1st

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

REMARKABLE MUSIC ELOQUENTLY PLAYED

The Notable Qualities of Mr. Stock's Symphony—Technical Distinction, Mental Force and Spiritual Passion—The Masculine Note in the Whole—A Performance That Taxed Orchestra and Conductor to the Utmost

No novel symphony by a composer of our immediate time has been more eloquently played or more warmly applauded than was Mr. Stock's at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. It is easy to say that this applause was quickened by the nervous excitements of mounting pace, uppiled sonorities and all the intensifying devices that fill the Finale. The superlative feats of virtuosity that Mr. Neumann did then and there in a fanfare upon four kettledrums may also have contributed to the clapping that was not content till it had recalled the conductor, set the orchestra on its feet, singled out the drummer and waited expectantly for a Stock who happened to be busy at the very hour with his own concert in Chicago. All this may pass, if the bystander chooses, as the shallow impulse of a self-stimulating company; but the fact remains that the applause was proportionally as hearty, general and spontaneous at the close of the first and the second movements of the symphony, while it was only a little less after the slow song. Moreover, even the usual entertainment of the programme-book did not lure the audience from rapt attention to the music.

Much as the public of the Symphony Concerts takes conductor and orchestra for granted, the performance may well have stirred it hardly less than did the piece. Since the distant days of Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," Dr. Muck and his forces have not undertaken a more taxing music. Mr. Stock not only exacts frequent feats of virtuosity, like that already specified with the tympani, from the principal instruments and from whole groups and choirs, but he has so written his music that it requires unrelaxing concentration of mind, unwearying quickness of spirit and unsparing technical skill from nearly all the players through a symphony nearly sixty minutes long. The strain told even upon the Symphony Orchestra, after ten days of rehearsal and unusual private study of parts that even the "old hands" of the band did not disdain. Not once from the first measures [illegible] the orchestra audibly flag; but the perceptible difference from the usual was the clear reliance of the men upon Dr. Muck to carry them through. Usually they do but work his fore-ordained will, as for the hour he may enforce and shade it, upon music in which he and they are equally secure. Yesterday, they not merely hung upon his beat and all his promptings, but they seemed to draw from him the impulse that kept them at their utmost, the confidence that sustained their eloquence.

The conductor gave himself equally to music and men. Since he began, last autumn, his study of the symphony, he has made no secret of his waxing admiration for it. He lavished upon it his usual powers of exposition and characterization; marshalled it with all his faculty for musical design, progress and cumulation; heated and exalted it with the passion of mind and spirit that the music in its turn curiously blends; and added his own propulsive force to that with which Mr. Stock had winged it. The voice was the voice of Stock, but the transmitting power that held the audience fast from the first measures onward, was the power of Muck. He leads in all his music with high and controlled intensity of feeling; he led in Mr. Stock's symphony with a personal passion of communication that he rarely shows—as though the music meant much to him and took much from him.

The music in itself deserved and rewarded such performance. It is not for a moment to be waved aside as one of the exercises in virtuosity and rhetoric, with which conductors sometimes amuse—and deceive—themselves out of daily experience with the inventions and the procedures, harmonic, instrumental and melodic, of other men. In such experience Mr. Stock has studied the capabilities of each component voice in his band; he does not lack imagination and resources of his own with them; but almost always he uses both in the service of his musical thought and his spiritual passion. No more than many a composer who has never in all his life led an orchestra—less indeed than several such—does he devise little instrumental and harmonic strokes, rarefied and esoteric, existing chiefly for their own momentary sake, like those readily recognizable at the end of the Scherzo. Nearly as seldom is the music all sounding pomp without and mental and spiritual emptiness within. Of course Mr. Stock knows the sonorous might and the pulsing magnificence of the modern orchestra in impassioned declamation or deeply glowing song. He knows also its power to intensify and cumulate a musical thought, a mood, a progress, until the hearer is bathed in the flood of tone, feeling and also rhetoric. No doubt the Satan of sonority tempts him, as he does many a composer of our day, to over-use of all this puissance. Oftener than most Mr. Stock withstands him, and keeps his might for the moments when the magnitude of his design and the force of his passion inevitably summon it.

With as little reason is the symphony to be dismissed as merely Straussian. Mr. Stock speaks in the tonal speech of much contemporary music in Germany and elsewhere, even if it be not the new idiom that Ravel and Mr. Carpenter for ready instances, have exemplified in our ears of late. Strauss contributed not a little to this speech, but those contributions are now the common property of composers to utilize each according to his own idiosyncrasy. Very rarely—perhaps only in a few measures of the Scherzo—does Mr. Stock seem, like Korngold, consciously or spontaneously imitative of Strauss. Elsewhere in his own way he uses Straussian expedients, while his own invention of melodic thoughts and of less expansive motives sometimes excels considerably that of "the master" whom he is presumed to follow. The truth is that the grave and reflective mood that fills the symphony and the mental power and ordinance that accomplish much of the purely musical development hark back to Brahms more than Strauss. It is also possible in these days to be chromatic without a master.

Perhaps by this very token, Mr. Stock is orthodox in the musical design of his symphony and conventional in the emotional and spiritual scheme. There are the usual four movements in a normal order; the usual formal procedure in themes and "subsidiaries," contrasts and recapitulations, but all this orthodoxy in the trail of the sonata does not lessen the elasticity of the music, the composer's free handling of it or the unity that he gives it by the return of motives in movements subsequent to those in which they first appeared. As the parsons interpret old theologies in the light of new freedoms so Mr. Stock applies his formal procedure. As he himself sets down in a programme note for the symphony, the first movement has to do with man's spiritual striving with himself and with the world; the scherzo with glad relaxations of this struggle and scrutiny; the Andante with the soothings of content and happiness; the Finale with the joy of conflict and the inexhaustible impulse that drives him forward to fight the good fight for life in his own way according to his own ideals. Admittedly a conventional design, but so the more one that the composer must revivify by the intensity of his individual thought and the force of his individual passion. Sometimes it takes more courage so to individualize the conventional than merely to thrust it away.

So conceiving his symphony and so proceeding with it, Mr. Stock has evolved it from musical ideas of full voice and long span, that are born of thought when emotion warms and passions it, that have character in themselves sufficient to stir and hold the hearer. From them, to do their office in the evolution of the symphony, he has germinated lesser musical ideas, bearing witness to the fecundity of his invention and the variety of his impulses. They are seldom scraps tossed about by the composer for the sake of mere "working" and modulation. They have place in the two schemes of the symphony and they are not uninteresting to follow. The progress of these themes and motives through the music abounds in imagination and vitality, in sense of design and detail, coördination and cumulation—in all the intellectual faculties of music-making. It teems no less with harmonic and instrumental color that engages and stimulates [illegible] is there mere workmanship for the sake of workmanship, [illegible] calculation instead of warm impulse. Or seldom does excess of zeal unduly lengthen or unduly thicken the music, according to the standards of its kind, if not to those of the thinner and opener tonal speech that is succeeding it. Mr. Stock may have reflected long over his symphony; there is no mistaking the force of mind that went Brahmswise into it; there is no hiding the occasional moments when he says too much; but always a clear passion of creation animates and impels it.

As Mr. Stock adds mental to technical fecundity and command in his music, so he vitalizes both—the more because they exist so clearly in the music—with spiritual passion. For the symphony is a human symphony that misses neither beauty nor power; no work of the study for scholars but of large and kindling voice and of wide and answering appeal. All the pattern-weaving, all the procedure and vesture of the first movement are but the means to the puissant expression of the spiritual conflict that it bears and intensifies. Large emotion and large power fill it, incarnate and inseparable in the tones that give them voice and so achieving the spiritual and the musical unity which is the crown of a symphony, if it is to be more than a fresco in sound with no passion outside that of creation in the cnosen medium.

The gladsome mood of the Scherzo, yet still with a measure of underlying gravity, flowers in the fancies of music like opening blooms upon a sappy stem. The mood, the voice, the imaginings that summon them have beauty. A happy felicity seems born of spontaneous joy. The song of the slow movement, though it falls below the other three, has beauty too, the deeply glowing beauty from within outward, the grave intensities of feeling that are more of the meditative Brahms than of the more outspoken and opulent Strauss. The Finale, in turn, sings high with the zest of renewed striving and faith, conflict and conquest. "Quit you like men," Mr. Stock might as readily have set over it as his German motto. Once more he is writing a music in which passion of mood and passion of means unite to power. Perhaps, it would be truest to call the symphony, from end to end a man's music for men in whom life is neither over-subtilized or spent or calloused. For that reason, perhaps, an audience, three-quarters feminine at least were so stirred by it. H. T. P.

Boston Traveler
April 1st

SYMPHONY BY FREDERICK STOCK CONCERT FEATURE

Boston Symphony orchestra patrons heard for the first time yesterday afternoon the symphony in C minor, op. 18, of Frederick A. Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony orchestra. It was the feature number of the Symphony concert. Seldom has the first hearing of a work of this magnitude been received with such enthusiasm. Each movement was applauded and at its close Dr. Muck was four times recalled, the third time calling upon the players to rise and share in the tribute. Not satisfied with that, the audience insisted upon the kettledrum player coming forth and receiving a personal tribute.

The work is interesting throughout, shows, as was to have been expected of an orchestral leader, keen knowledge of the possibilities of the modern orchestra, employs every instrument in the orchestra and a few not usually heard. It's an interesting study in which the interest grows with each movement until it culminates in an exceptionally fine final movement. The first movement portrays the struggles of life, the second its brighter spots, the third reminiscences and the final hope that will not die. It's to be hoped Boston gets another hearing of the work the coming season. It will bear repetition.

There was but one other number on the program, Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" suite, a particularly happy selection to follow the Stock number.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

[illegible] have moments of comparative [illegible]. All parts of the composition are [illegible] firmly together. Long as it is, there are no irrelevant passages. The first movement is the most interesting, because its mood is appropriate to an opening allegro, and because its thematic unity is absolutely unbroken. A motive of three notes runs through it all and never exhausts its expressiveness and appeal. The scherzo has some admirable touches of color at the beginning and the end, but its humor is not well sustained. The andante, as has been indicated, wants sentiment. The finale is overcharged, almost absurdly, with loud-voiced moments.

The reading of the score by Dr. Muck was in every respect masterly and the playing by the men was enthusiastic and brilliant.

[illegible] on Her[illegible]
[illegible]il 2, 1916

SYMPHONY PLAYERS GIVE 19TH CONCERT

Audience Warmly Receives Performance of Stock's Symphony in C Minor, Which Occupied Nearly an Hour—Program Is to Be Repeated This Evening.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Stock, Symphony in C-Minor; Bizet, Suite No. 1 from the music for Daudet's "L'Arlesienne."

Mr. Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony orchestra, visited this city with his band in December, 1911, and with the Mendelssohn choir of Toronto in February of the next year. At the second concert his Symphonic Waltz was played by the orchestra. His string quartet was heard in 1911 at a Kneisel concert. The Kneisels had played a movement of this quartet late in 1905. The composer of the Symphony in C-Minor, played here yesterday for the first time, was therefore not a stranger in Boston.

This symphony is long. It lasted yesterday, with the pauses between the movements, about an hour. The length is prejudicial to the value of the work, for there is much said that is not worth saying. More than once a fine effect is frittered away or at once destroyed by Mr. Stock's inability to stop, by his insatiate desire to add something from fear lest he has not already made his point. There is overdevelopment. Anxiety lest little figures, fragments of phrases, should pass unnoticed leads him to give them undue importance by endless repetition. This anxiety is also observed at the end of the scherzo. The natural ending is here and in another instance effective. But there must needs be a postscript, and this postscript, unlike the traditional one of a woman's letter, does not contain the vital statement.

Mr. Stock has said that his symphony is meant to describe "human life, its sorrows as well as joys," the struggle of mortal man against fate, the spiritual trials to which he is subjected. The first movement represents various phases of this struggle; the Scherzo speaks of life's joys in a more or less humorous fashion; the third depicts reminiscences of happy moments; while the finale "explains itself when it is made known that it bears the motto which has become the 'motive of life' of the German nation: Forward! Upward!" This was written in 1910. Reprinted, it is ironical today. Yet some, finding the finale brutally noisy, might admit that the choice of these mottoes is appropriate.

We have said that the symphony is too long; that there is over-elaboration, too much detail. It may also be said that the music is too often deafening. A common theme—for Mr. Stock's thematic material is at times common—is swollen preposterously that it may seem heroic. Let it not be said that the din was in any way the fault of the conductor. Dr. Muck, who had taken great pains in preparation and held many rehearsals gave a brilliant reading of the work. The noise—for sound often became noise—is in the music itself, as any one can see by examining the score. The composer employs a very large orchestra, and he goads it to fury. His instrumentation, as a rule, is thick and heavy. When it is in lighter mood it is experimentally fanciful.

There is the influence of Strauss throughout the work, and it is seldom that of the better Strauss. There is very little that has individual flavor. The scheme of his work as he has stated it, the program side of it, has been adopted by many before him. This is a matter of trifling importance; but in the music we find little originality. There is a following of old devices Straussized. There is indisputable technical skill; there is infinite labor.

The symphony was warmly received. This is not surprising. Any work, new or old, that has a sonorous, heaven-de-[illegible] apotheosis," [illegible] the audience to vie in noise. Furthermore the agility of the kettledrum player at the end of the Finale no doubt had something to do with the degree of applause. The orchestral performance, however, deserved tribute.

It is to be regretted that the saxophone was not used in Bizet's Prelude and Minuetto. In the former it is peculiarly characteristic of the "Innocent." The cold, unearthly tones do not belong to the replacing instrument. It is said that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has no saxophone. Yet we remember Mr. Strasser playing one in Bizet's suite, and on one occasion Mrs. Hall with the instrument was added to the players.

This concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 1; Hadley, Lucifer," a symphonic poem (first time here); Sibelius, suite, "King Christian II."

TIMES

From ....

Address .... Hartford, Conn

Date ....

PROGRAM GIVEN OVER TO WAGNER

And the Result Is an Evening of True Musical Ravishment.

The third and last Boston Symphony concert for the season was given in Parsons's theater last evening, Dr. Karl Muck conducting. The program was entirely made up of excerpts from the works of Wagner. And this program was enthusiastically received by a very large and notably representative audience. From which it would appear that Hartford town finds little of substance or interest in the speculative theory that Wagner's influence on the development of the present German national point of view has been more potent if more subtle than the influence of Frederick the Great, Nietzsche, Treitschke, Bernhardi, et al.

Dr. Muck's pre-eminence as a Wagnerian conductor is everywhere acknowledged. The Boston orchestra as a symphonic instrument has no superior. The music heard last evening was noble music—music familiar and much beloved. The great company of listeners receptive and responsive. All the elements involved in a great and memorable performance were present. And such a performance this concert was.

Transcript
April 2

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

REMARKABLE MUSIC ELOQUENTLY PLAYED

The Notable Qualities of Mr. Stock's Symphony—Technical Distinction, Mental Force and Spiritual Passion—The Masculine Note in the Whole—A Performance That Taxed Orchestra and Conductor to the Utmost

NO novel symphony by a composer of our immediate time has been more eloquently played or more warmly applauded than was Mr. Stock's at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. It is easy to say that this applause was quickened by the nervous excitements of mounting pace, upqiled sonorities and all the intensifying devices that fill the Finale. The superlative feats of virtuosity that Mr. Neumann did then and there in a fanfare upon four kettledrums may also have contributed to the clapping that was not content till it had recalled the conductor, set the orchestra on its feet, singled out the drummer and waited expectantly for a Stock who happened to be busy at the very hour with his own concert in Chicago. All this may pass, if the bystander chooses, as the shallow impulse of a self-stimulating company; but the fact remains that the applause was proportionally as hearty, general and spontaneous at the close of the first and the second movements of the symphony, while it was only a little less after the slow song. Moreover, even the usual entertainment of the programme-book did not lure the audience from rapt attention to the music.

Much as the public of the Symphony Concerts takes conductor and orchestra for granted, the performance may well have stirred it hardly less than did the piece. Since the distant days of Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," Dr. Muck and his forces have not undertaken a more taxing music. Mr. Stock not only exacts frequent feats of virtuosity, like that already specified with the tympani, from the principal instruments and from whole groups and choirs, but he has so written his music that it requires unrelaxing concentration of mind, unwearying quickness of spirit and unsparing technical skill from nearly all the players through a symphony nearly sixty minutes long. The strain told even upon the Symphony Orchestra, after ten days of rehearsal and unusual private study of parts that even the "old hands" of the band did not disdain. Not once from the first measure to the last did the orchestra audibly flag; but the perceptible difference from the usual was the clear reliance of the men upon Dr. Muck to carry them through. Usually they do but work his fore-ordained will, as for the hour he may enforce and shade it, upon music in which he and they are equally secure. Yesterday, they not merely hung upon his beat and all his promptings, but they seemed to draw from him the impulse that kept them at their utmost, the confidence that sustained their eloquence.

The conductor gave himself equally to music and men. Since he began, last autumn, his study of the symphony, he has made no secret of his waxing admiration for it. He lavished upon it his usual powers of exposition and characterization; marshalled it with all his faculty for musical design, progress and cumulation; heated and exalted it with the passion of mind and spirit that the music in its turn curiously blends; and added his own propulsive force to that with which Mr. Stock had winged it. The voice was the voice of Stock, but the transmitting power that held the audience fast from the first measures onward, was the power of Muck. He leads in all his music with high and controlled intensity of feeling; he led in Mr. Stock's symphony with a personal passion of communication that he rarely shows—as though the music meant much to him and took much from him.

The music in itself deserved and rewarded such performance. It is not for a moment to be waved aside as one of the exercises in virtuosity and rhetoric, with which conductors sometimes amuse—and deceive—themselves out of daily experience with the inventions and the procedures, harmonic, instrumental and melodic, of other men. In such experience Mr. Stock has studied the capabilities of each component voice in his band; he does not lack imagination and resources of his own with them; but almost always he uses both in the service of his musical thought and his spiritual passion. No more than many a composer who has never in all his life led an orchestra—less indeed than several such—does he devise little instrumental and harmonic strokes, rarefied and esoteric, existing chiefly for their own momentary sake, like those readily recognizable at the end of the Scherzo. Nearly as seldom is the music all sounding pomp without and mental and spiritual emptiness within. Of course Mr. Stock knows the sonorous might and the pulsing magnificence of the modern orchestra in impassioned declamation or deeply glowing song. He knows also its power to intensify and cumulate a musical thought, a mood, a progress, until the hearer is bathed in the flood of tone, feeling and also rhetoric. No doubt the Satan of sonority tempts him, as he does many a composer of our day, to over-use of all this puissance. Oftener than most Mr. Stock withstands him, and keeps his might for the moments when the magnitude of his design and the force of his passion inevitably summon it.

With as little reason is the symphony to be dismissed as merely Straussian. Mr. Stock speaks in the tonal speech of much contemporary music in Germany and elsewhere, even if it be not the new idiom that Ravel and Mr. Carpenter for ready instances, have exemplified in our ears of late. Strauss contributed not a little to this speech, but those contributions are now the common property of composers to utilize each according to his own idiosyncrasy. Very rarely—perhaps only in a few measures of the Scherzo—does Mr. Stock seem, like Korngold, consciously or spontaneously imitative of Strauss. Elsewhere in his own way he uses Straussian expedients, while his own invention of melodic thoughts and of less expansive motives sometimes excels considerably that of "the master" whom he is presumed to follow. The truth is that the grave and reflective mood that fills the symphony and the mental power and ordinance that accomplish much of the purely musical development hark back to Brahms more than Strauss. It is also possible in these days to be chromatic without a master.

Perhaps by this very token, Mr. Stock is orthodox in the musical design of his symphony and conventional in the emotional and spiritual scheme. There are the usual four movements in a normal order; the usual formal procedure in themes and "subsidiaries," contrasts and recapitulations, but all this orthodoxy in the trail of the sonata does not lessen the elasticity of the music, the composer's free handling of it or the unity that he gives it by the return of motives in movements subsequent to those in which they first appeared. As the parsons interpret old theologies in the light of new freedoms so Mr. Stock applies his formal procedure. As he himself sets down in a programme note for the symphony, the first movement has to do with man's spiritual striving with himself and with the world; the scherzo with glad relaxations of this struggle and scrutiny; the Andante with the soothings of content and happiness; the Finale with the joy of conflict and the inexhaustible impulse that drives him forward to fight the good fight for life in his own way according to his own ideals. Admittedly a conventional design, but so the more one that the composer must revivify by the intensity of his individual thought and the force of his individual passion. Sometimes it takes more courage so to individualize the conventional than merely to thrust it away.

So conceiving his symphony and so proceeding with it, Mr. Stock has evolved it from musical ideas of full voice and long span, that are born of thought when emotion warms and passions it, that have character in themselves sufficient to stir and hold the hearer. From them, to do their office in the evolution of the symphony, he has germinated lesser musical ideas, bearing witness to the fecundity of his invention and the variety of his impulses. They are seldom scraps tossed about by the composer for the sake of mere "working" and modulation. They have place in the two schemes of the symphony and they are not uninteresting to follow. The progress of these themes and motives through the music abounds in imagination and vitality, in sense of design and detail, coordination and cumulation—in all the intellectual faculties of music-making. It teems no less with harmonic and instrumental color that engages and stimulates [illegible] is there mere workmanship for the sake of workmanship; mere calculation instead of warm impulse. Or seldom does excess of zeal unduly lengthen or unduly thicken the music, according to the standards of its kind, if not to those of the thinner and opener tonal speech that is succeeding it. Mr. Stock may have reflected long over his symphony; there is no mistaking the force of mind that went, Brahmswise into it; there is no hiding the occasional moments when he says too much; but always a clear passion of creation animates and impels it.

As Mr. Stock adds mental to technical fecundity and command in his music, so he vitalizes both—the more because they exist so clearly in the music—with spiritual passion. For the symphony is a human symphony that misses neither beauty nor power; no work of the study for scholars but of large and kindling voice and of wide and answering appeal. All the pattern-weaving, all the procedure and vesture of the first movement are but the means to the puissant expression of the spiritual conflict that it bears and intensifies. Large emotion and large power fill it, incarnate and inseparable in the tones that give them voice and so achieving the spiritual and the musical unity which is the crown of a symphony, if it is to be more than a fresco in sound with no passion outside that of creation in the chosen medium.

The gladsome mood of the Scherzo, yet still with a measure of underlying gravity, flowers in the fancies of music like opening blooms upon a sappy stem. The mood, the voice, the imaginings that summon them have beauty. A happy felicity seems born of spontaneous joy. The song of the slow movement, though it falls below the other three, has beauty too, the deeply glowing beauty from within outward, the grave intensities of feeling that are more of the meditative Brahms than of the more outspoken and opulent Strauss. The Finale, in turn, sings high with the zest of renewed striving and faith, conflict and conquest. "Quit you like men," Mr. Stock might as readily have set over it as his German motto. Once more he is writing a music in which passion of mood and passion of means unite to power. Perhaps, it would be truest to call the symphony, from end to end a man's music for men in whom life is neither over-subtilized or spent or calloused. For that reason, perhaps, an audience, three-quarters feminine at least were so stirred by it. H. T. P.

Boston Traveler
April 2 '16

SYMPHONY BY FREDERICK STOCK CONCERT FEATURE

Boston Symphony orchestra patrons heard for the first time yesterday afternoon the symphony in C minor, op. 18, of Frederick A. Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony orchestra. It was the feature number of the Symphony concert. Seldom has the first hearing of a work of this magnitude been received with such enthusiasm. Each movement was applauded and at its close Dr. Muck was four times recalled, the third time calling upon the players to rise and share in the tribute. Not satisfied with that, the audience insisted upon the kettledrum player coming forth and receiving a personal tribute.

The work is interesting throughout, shows, as was to have been expected of an orchestral leader, keen knowledge of the possibilities of the modern orchestra, employs every instrument in the orchestra and a few not usually heard. It's an interesting study in which the interest grows with each movement until it culminates in an exceptionally fine final movement. The first movement portrays the struggles of life, the second its brighter spots, the third reminiscences and the final hope that will not die. It's to be hoped Boston gets another hearing of the work the coming season. It will bear repetition.

There was but one other number on the program, Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" suite, a particularly happy selection to follow the Stock number.

From
Address
Date

Boston Post
April 15, 1916

RAINY DAY MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Dull Programme Is Performed Perfunctorily

BY OLIN DOWNES

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Sylvain Noack, second concertmaster, was soloist. He played the Dvorak violin concerto in A minor.

This performance was prefaced by Humperdinck's overture to "The Forced Marriage," and followed by Haydn's symphony in D major, B and H.

DULLEST OF PROGRAMMES

The marriage was not more forced than the overture, which is poor stuff, heavy footed, lumbering, scholastic. A theme at the beginning given to the horns, a theme which is an inferior edition of Hansel and Gretel; a passage for the wood wind accompanied by the strings of a sprightly and rhythmical character, afford flashes of light in the gloom. But it would be harder to imagine a composition, as a whole, much poorer, much more labored than this overture.

The programme, in fact, was one of the dullest that Dr. Muck has given here. For such a programme it is hard to find an excuse, with an orchestra capable of playing any music composed, and a library so rich as the library of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Concerto Admirably Played

Dvorak's concerto may be admitted on the grounds of the small number of available concertos for the violin, and the needs of a soloist. Yet, again, it is a pity that Mr. Noack, an admirable musician, an excellent violinist, should have wasted his powers on this composition. His performance was distinguished by wholly adequate virtuosity, musicianly balance and finish of detail, beauty of tone—by all of the qualities of first-class violin playing, and the audience recalled Mr. Noack with enthusiasm. Let us hope that it will be a long time to come before any soloist recalls this concerto, a work weak in thematic material, flimsily constructed, and among the most uninteresting of Dvorak's compositions.

A Boston Eymphony audience has a right to better music and a better succession of compositions than that offered yesterday afternoon.

The finale of Haydn's symphony, a rollicking finale, was played with that overflowing wit and exuberance that are its properties, which are seldom done complete justice by other conductors than Dr. Muck. For the rest the performance had much of the character of routine. The orchestra played a symphony with which it was thrice familiar with all propriety and despatch. There was a lack of delicate values in the exquisite slow movement. Only in the minuet and the finale did the performance equal the best traditions of these concerts.

At the concerts of next week a programme of music inspired by the works of William Shakspere will be played, including Volkmann's "Richard Third" overture; movements from Berlioz "Romeo and Juliet" symphony; Tschaikowsky "Hamlet" overture; music from Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Dvorak's overture, "Otello."

Boston Journal
April 15, 1916

NOACK'S PLAYING WELL APPLAUDED

Sylvain Noack's appearance as Symphony soloist was enthusiastically applauded yesterday. The popularity and the virtuosity of the second concert master of Boston's premier orchestra received due acknowledgment from one of the most sympathetic audiences of the season. It seemed that most of those in attendance braved the storm principally to enjoy his performance of the seldom played Dvorak concerto in A minor. The concerto is intrinsically much more entertaining than the average work written for stellar display. Much good music is given to the orchestra as well as to the solo instrument.

After a rather ragged start Mr. Noack warmed to his task and gave what might fairly be termed a brilliant performance. His playing is spirited, musicianly from beginning to end, and without affectation. His tone has deepened since he appeared as soloist a year ago. The poetic quality of his playing has always been a source of enjoyment to the Boston public.

Few visiting stars have been awarded more applause than this unassuming, accomplished violinist received yesterday.

The conservatives in the audience also enjoyed the performance of the overture to one of the Humperdinck operas, "The Forced Marriage," the main theme of which could fit nicely into "Haensel and Gretel," and of the Haydn symphony in D major.

The Shakespeare anniversary will be celebrated at next week's concerts. Dr. Muck has made up the following program: Overture, "Richard III," Smetana; three movements from "Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz; symphonic poem, "Hamlet," Tschaikowsky; the overture, nocturne and scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music; overture, "Othello," Dvorak.

SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAM TEPID

HUMPERDINCK, DVORAK AND HAYDN REPRESENTED

Symphony in D Major One of Most Interesting in Haydn Set

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Humperdinck—Overture. "The Forced Marriage."
Dvorak—Violin Concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Sylvain Noack.
Haydn—Symphony in D major.

"There was a Conservatory pupil who, on being asked in examination "How many symphonies did Beethoven write?" responded — "Three. The Heroic, the fifth and the ninth." In like manner we would respond to a question as to how many overtures Humperdinck wrote, by answering—One. The Prelude to "Hansel and Gretel." For Humperdinck was something of a 'single-speech Hamilton"; his one great success dwarfs all his other work. The "Spielmann's Lied" in "Koningskinder" is the only memorable thing that he achieved outside of his one famous opera.

This overture has very little to say for itself. It is conventional and artificial. It is "Kapellmeistermusik" such as trained composers reel off by the yard, stopping when they have filled a sufficient number of pages. The subordinate theme of this work has a melody not unlike "Yankee Doodle." But this American tune (which is of English origin) resembles many melodies of other lands, as simple tunes often bear a kinship to each other. There is a Hungarian melody, and a Dutch nursery song, and the chief theme of Beethoven's ninth symphony, which are all first cousins to "Yankee Doodle."

Possibly this theme aroused the audience to the applause which was won by the work. There was nothing in the overture to grow excited over, except the perfect performance. Even Dr. Muck's strong contrasts and breadth of style could not make this overture eloquent.

Dvorak's violin concerto was more powerful, although it is a question whether the tooth of Time is not gnawing at some of his compositions. He was an excellent master of scoring, in his time, but in this field the growth has been enormous in a single generation, and his orchestration seems simple enough nowadays. The musical ideas of the first movement did not seem very remarkable. There was considerable antiphonal work, the orchestra and the violin indulging in quite long stretches of dialogue, but the conversation did not rise much above the sewing-circle standard. Some of the short phrases were vehement enough, but none of them were impressive.

But now matters began to mend, and the slow movement had that Czech melancholy which is always impressive. The slow movement is here attached to the opening Allegro, a rather unusual proceeding. Mr. Sylvain Noack was the soloist, and in this second movement his nobility of tone carried the work to great popular success. He was broad in his bowing, sympathetic in tone quality, sure in intonation. It means a great deal for a symphony orchestra to have such artists as Noack, Witek, Malkin, Warnke, Ferir, Barth, among its string players, and fully as eminent talent among its wood-wind players.

The final Rondo of the concerto was played by Mr. Noack with consummate ease yet with great brilliancy, too. The playing was better than the music itself, which we found rather short-breathed and spasmodic. The tone-coloring of the finale was quite effective, although there was some bassoon work (excellently played) which proved that Dvorak was familiar with Beethoven's eighth symphony. At the close Mr. Noack was recalled with much fervor, again and again, and his artistic playing certainly deserved such homage, yet we cannot rank Dvorak's violin concerto with the masterpieces of this form.

Dr. Muck is quite right to put Haydn and Mozart frequently upon his programs. There are many new auditors each year at these concerts and they should have a chance to hear what to the old attendants is an oft-told tale. Nor was there injustice in the remark once made to the present writer by Dr. Hiller—"We in Germany have grown into the modern school through Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven. You in America begin with the most highly spiced modern music. That is dangerous."

The symphony in D major is one of the most interesting of the Haydn set and one ought not to tire of its melodious symmetry. But, for all that, in this concert, we began to long for some of the modern intensity and force. The music of the program had been too continuously tepid, in spite of the charming rusticity of the Haydn Symphony.

Globe
April 15

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Curiously Dull Program—Mr Noack Soloist

Orchestral Performance of Symphony by Haydn the Feature

Humperdinck's overture to his opera, "The Forced Marriage," Dvorak's A minor concerto for violin, Haydn's Symphony in D major (B. and H. No. 2)—not a promising list for the Symphony Concert yesterday. Dr Muck hardly has hit upon so dull and uninteresting a program all Winter. Humperdinck's is an orthodox, conventional German overture in the accepted manner, written at a time when the composer was considerably past his prime, considerably beyond "Haensel and Gretel" in point of years, but not in recurring and reminiscent ideas from it.

The subject matter is clearly enough arranged, well laid out and effectively orchestrated, not forgetful of Wagner, and doubtless when listened to by a respectable German audience, about to view Humperdinck's opera, now 10 years old, it provokes a receptive mood. The orchestra played it spiritedly and there was warm applause.

That any violinist could have the fortitude, even having settled upon such a work as Dvorak's concerto, to rehearse it sufficiently for a performance, is not easily credible. What is there in this stupid doggerel to engage a serious musician of Mr Noack's proficiency and taste? Childish prattle, repeated and reiterated to insufferable boredom. Was any man ever a more supine slave to sequence? Having said a commonplace, Dvorak must drill it into the benumbed brain of a hearer by saying it again with a faith serene and sublime. Some may fancy the music is naive, childlike. It is childish, prattling, full of nameless inconsequentialities and repetitions, for that which is naive is not rapid. In the last movement there is a slight rhythmic awakening and there is a counterpoint in the horn which gives short-lived hope. Mr Noack played as though trying to make something out of it.

The feature of the concert was the orchestral performance of the Symphony. What had preceded would have given a stranger within the gates but little idea of the virtuosity or euphony of the orchestra, nor did this, but the transparent beauty, the warmth and precision of the strings was revealed. The opening adagio was played with due elegance and with the sentiment which was not wholly of the surface.

The program next week promises to be one of unusual interest. Chosen to commemorate the 300th anniversary of the death of William Shakspere, it is as follows: Smetana, overture, "Richard III"; Berlioz, three movements (Queen Mab, Garden Scene and the Ball at Capulets), from "Romeo and Juliet"; Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "Hamlet"; Mendelssohn, overture, nocturne and scherzo from the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Dvorak, overture, "Othello."

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MORE COMPLAINT OVER DR. MUCK'S PROGRAMMES

The Dull or Routine Pieces That for Two Weeks Have Filled Them, While Many Another of More Interest Lies Neglected on the Library Shelves—For the Most Part, Also, No More Than the Average of Performance

It is no more necessary to dwell upon the Symphony Concert of yesterday than it was upon that of the preceding Friday. Those that keep on their shelves the long rank of the bound programme-books may search in vain through the thrity-odd years of them for two less interesting programmes than Dr. Muck has for a fortnight imposed upon audiences on both occasions preceptibly smaller than the conductor, the orchestra and their music usually attract even when opera from New York takes possession of the town or the weather is forbidding. A week ago the conductor bestowed upon his public the first symphony of Beethoven in the biennial preformance that has become a rite in virtue of the later symphonies and of the exalted place of the composer, but which in itself no more deserves such frequent repetition than a dozen other symphonies written in the Mozartean or the Haydnesque manner, in the Vienna of a century ago. It is a pretty enough little piece in its imitative way, and it was played with due elegance by the conductor and his men. It served in a perfunctory programmme—while twenty, thirty, forty pieces from ancient or modern, classic or experimenting, hands lie neglected in the ample library of the orchestra for no reason that the many who long for them can fathom.

To this symphony succeeded a tone-poem, "Lucifer" by Mr. Henry Hadley—music that set the thematic material in order as though it was a five-fold collection on view in a museum; that proceeded in routine workmanship, little relieved by any sort of imagination in tones; that followed a poetic scheme (as the phrase is) about the fallen Archangel and his warfare upon the Almight that belonged to what one listener aptly called "Hall-Caine Christianity"; and that was controlled by so scanty a critical sense that the angelic hosts actually marched forth to the beat of a snare drum! It is indeed the obligation of a conductor of symphony concerts like ours, to foster American composers, by the performance of their music when it is deserving, exactly as he would encourage the younger writers of music in other lands. The only excuse for the performance of such trite and sterile tonal prose as "Lucifer" is the fact that it was neither better nor worse than other pieces not a whit more deserving that have strangely appeared from time to time on the programmes of the Symphony Orchestra. Meanwhile, the overlooked classics, semi-classics and novelties may gather dust in the library—and there is no explanation. The final piece was a suite that Sibelius put together from his incidental music to a Danish play about "King Christian II." In the vernacular of commerce it was no more than "high-grade" theatre-music written by a composer of individuality, imagination and characteristic idiom, who occasionally deigned to apply all three to the job in hand. But Sibelius's new tone-poem of "The Daughters of Ocean"—a much more interesting piece—has been thrust into the pile of abandoned novelties.

Even less interesting—in fact downright dull—were two of the members on the programme of yesterday. We may not bear Debussy's "Iberia" or d'Indy's second symphony or Ravel's suites from "Daphnis and Chloe"; or a symphony by Mahler, or Schumann's Rhenish symphony; or Reger's Romantic Suite; or Mottl's orchestral version of Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque"; or this or that overture of Beethoven unrevived for years; we may not have more Bach or more Händel; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," Balakirev's "Thamar," Moussorgsky's "Night on the Bald Mountain"; the suites from Stravinsky's ballets—and so on through random citation, which is plentiful enough; but we must listen to Humperdinck's dead and buried overture to his operatic comedy, "Die Heirat wider Willen"—mere ingenious counterpoint, dry and labored melody and a calculated "theatre-stroke" at the end.

More: though here the choice may have been rather of the violinist than of the conductor, the audience must sit under the tedious lengths of Dvoràk's concerto for violin, wherein he is "scholarly," mechanical, "violinistic," what you will—anything but interesting save only in the few passages where in spite of himself he writes with his native zest of rhythm, brightness of color or melancholy mood, as the Czeck that he was who also made music. Contemporary concertos for the violin may be nothing remarkable—we hear too few of them to judge; but they could hardly be more dull than Joachim "in the Hungarian manner" and Dvoràk academic that Mr. Witek and Mr. Noack have respectively imposed upon their audiences this season. Then, for ending, ensued a pleasurable symphony of Haydn. It would be in place or any programme with which it accorded, for the enjoyment it affords the audience and for the light, sure running and polished skill with which orchestra and conductor take it. One or two of Haydn's symphonies may reasonably be played at the Symphony Concerts in a musical year, but hardly at the end of so tedious and sterile a programme as that of yesterday.

[139]

Better days are indeed dawning in the programmes that Dr. Muck proposes for the remaining pairs of Symphony Concerts before the season ends in May. From the time in which he first came to lead the orchestra his programmes have often been unfavorably criticised, but less for the musical matter that they contained than for the manner in which he assembled and disposed it. Until this present season, very seldom has it been fair to call his programmes uninteresting. Once and again, since last October they have seemed to be needlessly so, in view of the wealth of music at his command in the library of the orchestra, on American publishers' shelves and even still obtainable from Amsterdam, Paris and London. None, however, has descended to the scantily relieved and the generally felt dullness of those of yesterday and the Friday preceding. They were of a conductor, an orchestra, and series of concerts stuck for the moment in the worst of all ruts—the rut of complaisant routine. They were even "institutional." Not a few of the audience, who are usually a well-pleased folk, repined under them. The more eager and exacting, especially among the younger generation, upon whom the future of the concerts depends, clamored openly and scornfully against them.

Of course the ready retort was that the appropriate eloquence of the performance for beauty or charm or power or skill made sufficient compensation. It was indeed a delight to hear in Beethoven's symphony; able with Sibelius's music; but no more than routine, except in little adroit or vivid spots, in Haydn's symphony. Moreover, the best of performances can make Humperdinck's overture, Dvorak's concerto or Hadley's tone-poem only a little less tedious and sterile than as music, each and all of them intrinsically is. As with Mr. Witek before him, the admirable abilities of Mr. Noack as a virtuoso and a musician of the violin were nearly buried in an ill-chosen concerto. The first desk of the violins has shone most this winter in the work of the day.

H. T. P.

Ap'l 22
[illegible]

POP CONCERTS OPEN TO PUBLIC ON MAY 9

While the Pop concerts this year open Monday evening, May 8, this first evening will not be for the general public, since the Women's City Club has taken that evening for their own entertainment. Therefore, the season will really be formally opened Tuesday evening, May 9. It will run for nine weeks.

In many ways the season should be, musically speaking, the best that Boston has ever had. The principal factor in this will be the size of the orchestra. This year the Pops will have an orchestra of real symphonic size, each program employing from 75 to 80 musicians. This orchestra is larger than most of the symphony orchestras of this country, and even of Europe.

Ernst Schmidt, assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, will conduct during the opening week. Andre Maquarre will be the conductor the second week and Mr. Schmidt again the third week. Mr. Maquarre will be conductor the fourth and fifth weeks and Mr. Schmidt the sixth and seventh weeks. Mr. Lenom will have charge of the orchestra the eighth week and Mr. Schmidt will close the season with the ninth week.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

APRIL 15, 1916

SYLVAIN NOACK IS THE SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

SYMPHONY HALL — Twenty-first program of Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck conductor, afternoon of Friday, April 14, Sylvain Noack, violinist, soloist. The program: Humperdinck, overture to opera, "The Forced Marriage"; Dvorak, concerto in A minor, for violin, op. 53; Haydn, symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 2).

Dr. Muck lifted this symphony in D out of the rank of routine performances and glorified and transformed it into a glittering gem to scintillate in the memory of a whole season. It was a glorified performance in which the conductor achieved that note of joy he so seldom reaches in his work. True, it would be a wooden conductor indeed who could not be touched by the happiness that shines through Haydn's music, but what made this performance notable especially was the fact that Dr. Muck compassed not only the joy and brightness of the score but dug deeper and discovered dramatic possibilities only suspected as lurking there. He clothed the climaxes with a majesty not usually attributed to Haydn. He invested the delicacy of andante and minuet with a lightness and charm to enhance even the composer's dream. He even turned Haydn's love of a prank to account and drove the violins at a furious scamper Careful, earnest preparation was evident in this symphony. Not an expression mark was overlooked; not a chance to emphasize a point in interpretation was allowed to pass. Even the first violins almost bowed together. Such a reading as Dr. Muck gave postulated an undercurrent thought of Brahms lying close to the surface. Certain qualities we are accustomed to associate with the later giant appeared in this symphony of the earlier. Brahms, we are coming to understand, had also a note of joy running through his work, not the simple gladness of Haydn, but an all-consuming, glorified and complex emotion. This is more what Dr. Muck grasped and read into the Haydn score.

Mr. Noack, leaving his seat at the first desk of the violins to play the Dvorak concerto, acquitted himself well. It has come to be customary that the members of the orchestra when they appear as soloists do not make of it the event that they once did. They come from their places, play their solos and return to the work of the day. Which may be taken as a commentary on the abilities of the orchestra. So Mr. Noack, stepping out from beside the concertmaster, gave an excellent technical performance of a seldom heard work, which puts in order the question why this concerto is not more often played.

It was written long before Dvorak visited America, even before he went to England, and is of the period when he composed much but had comparatively small chance for revision because his works were sometimes long in gaining a hearing. It is quite possible that he would have wished to alter some passages in this concerto, for all his ingenuity in development did not prevent parts of it from being almost banal. However, it is a pleasing composition to hear, and offers sufficient technical difficulties to make it worth any violinist's pains in learning.

Mr. Noack's abilities have become known and admired since his residence in Boston. His tone is not large, but is sweet and flexible, and his intonation sure. He has yet to acquire the faculty of putting himself into the music he is playing, of making it a part of himself as he gives it out.

BOSTON GLOBE—

APRIL 22,

SYMPHONY HONORS SHAKSPERE'S MEMORY

300th Anniversary of Poet's Death Observed

Dr Muck arranged a program for the 22d Friday afternoon Symphony concert to observe the passing commemoration of the third centennial of Shakspere's death. The program, drawn from two Bohemians, a Frenchman, a Russian and a German, was as follows: Smetana, symphonic poem, "Richard III"; Berlior, three movements—Queen Mab, Garden Scene and the Ball at Capulet's—from the "Romeo and Juliet" dramatic symphony; Tschaikowsky, "Hamlet," overture fantasia; Mendelssohn, overture, nocturne and scherzo from the music to "Midsummer Night's Dream"; Dvorak, overture, "Othello."

Shakspere, the supreme expressionist of life through the written and spoken word, has inspired a singularly small amount of music embodying truth as he saw it. In comparison the symphonic literature suffers with that of the opera house — and this chiefly through the two monumental last works of Verdi, "Otello" and "Falstaff," operas which have not been popular, and probably will not be, for the reason that people go chiefly to the opera house to hear some individual singer who captures their fancy. The world wants for an opera upon "As You Like It" such music as the Verdi of "Falstaff" could have written, with his lightness, his wit, his unfading youth.

Out of Italy Verdi seems to stand alone as a recreator of Shakspere. Sgambati and Martucci, respected symphonists of a people who write easier for the stage than the concert hall, have left nothing of large form based upon the great dramatist's plays. Of the two compositions played yesterday from Bohemians, the overture of Dvorak is heard more frequently than Smetana's symphonic poem. From Germany there is Mendelssohn's charming music of yesterday, the youthful symphonic poem of Strauss on "Macbeth," the symphonic poem by Weingartner on "Lear" and others. Litolff, born in London, the son of a French Alsatian soldier, has an overture on the latter subject; so has Berlioz, the three works having comprised a program by Sir Henry Wood at a promenade concert in London at the Shakspere anniversary of four years ago in June.

Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," with its quien mab scherzo of exquisite imagination and fine fancy comes heavily to earth in the overdeveloped scene in the garden and the commonplace music at the ball. Tschaikowsky's overture suggested by Balakirew reflects better the youthful passion and tenderness of the tragedy, while his "Hamlet," written for an occasion, is not indicative of his style, as the overture or the orchestral fantasia on "The Tempest" shows it. The program was played by Dr Muck and the orchestra with the evidences of care which made the Berlioz scherzo in particular a thing of amazing lightness and beauty.

The program next week will be as follows: Rimsky-Korsakoff overture, "The Bethrothed of the Tsar"; Chadwick, "Tam o' Shanter" ballade for orchestra (first time in Boston); Strauss, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

BOSTON POST,

APRIL 22,

SYMPHONY'S TRIBUTE TO SHAKSPERE

Programme of Music Inspired by Great Dramatist

The programme of the 22nd concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was given in observance of the Shaksperean tercentenary, and was devoted entirely to music inspired by the English dramatist. Overture, Richard III., Volkmann; three movements, "Queen Mab," the garden scene and the ball, from Berlioz' dramatic symphony, "Romeo and Juliette"; symphonic poem, "Hamlet," Tschaikowsky; overture, Nocturne, and Scherzo, from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and Dvorak's overture, "Otello."

INSTRUCTIVE MUSIC

The programme was instructive, as well as entertaining, for it brought before the audience many musical personalities, and a wide divergency of styles. The two compositions which showed out above the others, of course, were the movements from Berlioz's great symphony, which is practically a series of musical tableaux, illustrative of the most significant moments of the drama, and Mendelssohn's music, which does not age, which is perennially youthful and poetic in the highest degree.

Volkmann's overture makes its mark as an effective concert piece, but is, after all, becoming rapidly outmoded, in spite of the modernity of its form, which is not matched by true modernity of spirit. Dvorak's music is not so poignant or so heroic that it need tain the hearer for any gr of time, but Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet," in spite of its mannerisms and its bombast, its furious brilliancy, or melting melody, its dark and sepulchral effects, in certain places, has much that strikes home. This may be a Russian Hamlet, influenced by vodka, as well as congenital indecision. It is nevertheless an aspect of the Hamlet character, in so much as Tschaikowsky, an irredeemably subjective composer, touched hands at certain points with the temperament of the Prince of Denmark.

The performances were brilliant and characteristic of the composers presented. There was much applause.

BOSTON HERALD.

APRIL 22

SHAKESPEARE PROGRAM BY SYMPHONY

Orchestra's 22d Concert Program Selected in Commemoration of 300th Anniversary of Death of Dramatist—Brilliant Performance Throughout—Dr. Muck Conducts.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program, selected in commemoration of the 300th anniversary of the death of Shakespeare, was as follows:

Symphonic Poem "Richard III.".......Smetana
Queen Mab, Garden Scene and Ball at Capulet's from "Romeo and Juliet"...Berlioz
"Hamlet," overture Fantasia....Tschaikowsky
Overture, Nocturne and Scherzo from music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssohn
Overture "Othello"......................Dvorak

For the commemoration there was a mass of music at hand. Take "Richard III.," for example. There was Volkmann's overture with the anachronistic introduction of "The Campbells Are Coming," performed here nine years ago, not to mention the overtures by Rosenfeld and Titl.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet," familiar here, is among his most imaginative compositions, but there are overtures by Freudenberg, Schlottman, Pierson, Raff, Svendsen, not to mention introductions to operas founded on the tragic story.

And "Hamlet." There is Liszt's symphonic poem, which, we believe, has not been performed in Boston. There are overtures by Joachim, Gade, Emanuel Bach (not the son of Johann Sebastian, it is needless to say), Henschel; Mathias; there is the wonderful funeral march for Hamlet by Berlioz, which has been performed here, led by Mr. Longy; there is the symphonic poem of Lekeu; there is MacDowell's "Hamlet and Ophelia."

Fibick wrote a symphonic poem "Othello."; Krug is the composer of a symphonic prologue to the tragedy; there is an overture by Raff.

Other tragedies and comedies of Shakespeare have incited many composers to gird up their loins for the task. The late John K. Paine wrote a symphonic poem "The Tempest"; he also composed an overture to "As You Like It." Nicolai's overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" might well have tempted Dr. Muck. We should have preferred it to Dvorak's "Othello." We were spared Richard Strauss's "Macbeth," also Rheinberger's overture to "The Taming of the Shrew," also Rubinstein's overture to "Antony and Cleopatra."

The list of purely orchestral works inspired by Shakespeare is a formidable one. What has become of Ebermein's overture to "Macbeth," once very popular; or Bruell's overture to the same tragedy—it has been played here. Does any one remember the overtures to "Julius Caesar" by Schumann and Hans von Buelow? The "King Lear" overture of Berlioz still has vitality, but where is Radecke's overture to "King John," once applauded in Berlin and in the Gewandhaus of Leipsic? Louis Ehlert was not contented with being a critic: he wrote an overture to "Cymbeline." Balakireff's overture to "King Lear" might be worth hearing. We doubt if this could be said of Albert Schaefer's overture to "The Winter's Tale."

Building his program on the music of Berlioz, Dr. Muck, passing over Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet," was obliged to choose between his "Hamlet" and "The Tempest" if the Russian was to be represented. Neither of these works shows Tschaikowsky at his best. There are only a few impressive moments in "Hamlet," which had not been heard here since 1900. The appearance of the Ghost at midnight is well conceived; the themes associated with Ophelia have a decided profile, and the march measures—do they refer to Fortinbras?—are out of the common. The introduction is labored; the thematic development is for the most part uninteresting; the instrumentation seldom attracts attention by originality or color.

Smetana's "Richard III" had not been played here for many years. It was composed when he was in Sweden (in 1858), and evidently impressed by Liszt's symphonic poems. In a letter to Liszt, enclosing the beginning of "Richard III," he said that the emphasis of his music fitted the action of the tragedy; the attainment of the goal, the overthrowing of all obstacles, the triumph, and then the monarch's fall. The earnestness and directness of this music, its energetic quality, the abstinence from everything extraneous even in the way of ornamentation that might be legitimate, command respect; more than this, there are strokes of vivid imagination. Some passages might be considered naive, if not awkwardly expressed, but the virility of the musical spirit carries the composer safely to the end, which is peculiarly effective.

It is a pity that we cannot hear the whole of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet," or at least all the nobler pages. It would be impertinent at this late day to expatiate on the exquisite Sherzo, the wondrously beautiful love music, or Romeo's pathetic theme so finely played yesterday by Mr. Longy. Only the ball music reminds us of 1839. It suggests the engagement of the Verona brass band by Capulet for the coming-out of his daughter. No composer, to our knowledge, has written music suitable to this festival. That of Berlioz, as that of Gounod, might be compared to the supper of the evening as characterized by Capulet: "We have a trifling foolish banquet towards."

The performance of the orchestra throughout was brilliant.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Rimsky-Korsakoff, overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar"; Chadwick, "Tam O' Shanter" (first time here); Strauss, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

[140]

Advertiser
Apr. 22nd

SYMPHONIC TRIBUTE TO SHAKESPEARE

Best Technical Musician Among Great Poets Honored on Tercentenary

TSCHAIKOWSKY'S "HAMLET" IMPRESSIVE WORK

Berlioz and Mendelssohn Seem Truest Translators of Great Poet Into Music

BY LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM.

Smetana—"Richard III" Overture.
Berlioz—"Romeo and Juliet" Symphony. Three movements.
Tschaikowsky—"Hamlet" Symphonic Poem.
Mendelssohn—"Midsummernight's Dream." Three Pieces.
Dvorak—"Othello" Overture.

It was very proper that our Symphony Orchestra should take cognizance of the tercentenary of Shakespeare's death, as they did yesterday afternoon, in a program of somewhat greater length than usual, for that poet has done more for our art than any other writer outside of the musical profession. Every one of his plays has been used as a libretto for opera; his short poems have inspired songs innumerable, and overtures, symphonies, symphonic poems, etc., have grown out of his works. As all the world loves a lover, "Romeo and Juliet" naturally has inspired the most music, but "Hamlet," "Othello," "The Merry Wives of Windsor," "Macbeth," and all the rest, have music to their credit.

More than this, Shakespeare was the best technical musician among the poets. Shakespeare, Milton and Browning, are the three who stand apart in this from the rank and file of even great poets, who have generally made a mess of it when they dabbled much in musical metaphor. Tennyson, Coleridge, and a number of others might be cited as warning examples. The reader who wishes to study Shakespeare's musical trend at its best should carefully analyze "Twelfth Night," as the play where musical allusions, poetic, playful, laudatory and ironical are thickest.

It was a pity this concert should have taken place on the same afternoon that Wagner's great opera was given a couple of blocks further up the avenue. Many a musical auditor must have wailed:—

> "How happy could I be with either
> Were t'other dear charmer away."

But the reviewer determined to foster home industries, and, after all, a Shakespearian tercentenary does not happen very frequently.

Some of the music was not as inspiring as its topic. We would much rather have heard Nicolai's charming overture (in classical form, too) to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," than the Smetana work, and even Volkmann has done a better overture to "Richard III.," if we can excuse his bringing in a Scotch tune ("The Campbells Are Comin'") at the battle of Bosworth field, a tune which was composed more than a century after that fight.

Smetana causes Richard to march around in a very bombastic and bloodthirsty manner, accompanied by a full brass band, and with a great deal of pomp and circumstances, while at the end there comes a cataclysm that might well have "struck terror to the soul of Richard" and to the auditors as well. We cannot believe that they used Krupp bombs on Bosworth field, but this Coda suggests it.

Of the three movements from the Berlioz "Romeo and Juliet" symphnoy, the Balcony scene was the most beautiful, and here, at least, was a true Shakespeare Picture. Berlioz fell in love with his first wife (Harriet Smithson) when he saw her in this scene, and it is very possible that we get the echoes of that event in this tone-picture. Certain it is that a passionate violoncello makes love to a tender violin (with added flute), but the spasmodic interruptions cause one to exclaim—"Ah, Romeo, Romeo, wherefore art thou Berlioz!"

Still, it is much better than Gounod's Romeo in syrup. But the piquant "Queen Mab" is so daintily pictured that Mercutio's little sketch becomes the chief point of the whole symphony, with many auditors. The violins and the English horn deserve much praise for their work in this. We wish that we could have had Berlioz's "King Lear" overture as a tragic contrast to this, since the "Ball at the Capulets" was also spicy music.

Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" symphonic poem is not as striking a composition as his "Romeo and Juliet" overture, but it is an impressive work nevertheless. The fault to be found with it is that it does not portray the character of the prince to the Shakesperian student any more than Ambroise Thomas does. If we do not seek for Shakespearian characters in the work we can be satisfied with its beautiful music, but it is difficult to discover "the melancholy Dane" in its measures. There is much more of Laertes and the camp. The strong themes and fine orchestration exhibit the wild power of Tschaikowsky, but one might have named the work "Macbeth" and the music would have fitted quite as well, or possibly a little better. The composition was most excellently played.

Mendelssohn's three pieces from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music were exquisitely played. The overture was musically the best piece of the whole program, and it is real Shakespearian translation into tones. The chief theme of this classical form, perfectly played by the violins, represents the fairies; the second theme, more longing and passionate, is the lovers; the closing theme, with its lumbering steps and odd skipping, portrays the Athenian players, and does it exceedingly well. Add to this the bassoon brayings of Bottom, the weaver, when turned into an ass, and the snoring of the same character, when in a drunken sleep among the fairies (oh, for an ophicleide here!) and we have a composition that every Shakespearian can revel in. And the composer was only 18 years old when he created it!

The Nocturne, following, gave some beautiful horn music (not very evenly played), and the Scherzo showed Mendelssohn, as usual, the best composer of his time in this form. But why did we not have the Wedding March? That blaring piece of war music has led more people into battle than any other march that was ever written!

The last number of the program pleased us less. We must remember that the title of the work is not "Othello, the Moor of Bohemia," and yet this overture gave the impression that Othello had taken out his naturalization papers in Prague. But we suppose that if Shakespeare put a sea-coast in Bohemia, Dvorak has the right to put a Moor there also. The overture seemed full of touches of Bohemian folk-music. There was, however, a military chief theme, which seemed to speak of > "The plumed troop and the big wars," and there were cymbal strokes and blasts of muted horns, which came as a premonition of impending evil. Afterwards there came a gentle theme, chiefly harp and wood-wind, in which we had no difficulty in recognizing Desdemona. Then more cymbal clashes, a wild rush of the whole orchestra, and she was smothered, suddenly and brusquely.

In this Shakespearian program Berlioz and Mendelssohn seemed the truest translators of Shakespeare into music. The others simply used the poet as a peg on which to hang their compositions. The first and last numbers could have been replaced by more representative compositions, and we longed for a few other Shakespearian works, but, after all, if Dr. Muck were to attempt to give all the good orchestral music that Shakespeare has inspired he might use up the entire series of symphony concerts in the attempt.

From Bulletin
Address Providence, R. I.
Date APR 12 1916

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES CLOSING CONCERT

For the sixth and last concert in its 35th season, last evening in Infantry Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented by request a programme that was something of a novelty from that source. Other organizations have given all-Wagner programmes here occasionally, but although Dr. Muck is considered one of the greatest living authorities on the interpretation of Richard Wagner's music, he has never exploited it unduly on his symphony programmes, and in the four years of his present incumbency has given only about a half-dozen orchestral Wagnerean selections at these concerts here.

In fact, aside from the pension fund concerts of the orchestra in Boston and two in San Francisco at the exposition a year ago, this city is the second to be favored with such a programme. It called out an audience of about the usual size, which accepted philosophically the substitution of the well-known Prelude to "Lohengrin" for the selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdamerung" which had been previously announced. The present season has become noted for eleventh-hour changes in programmes, but it did seem a bit amazing, that constant association for several seasons with the stage accommodations, and a knowledge of the requirements of these selections, should not have precluded their choice, instead of requiring a revision of the programme, of which the order given was as follows:

Overture to "Rienzi"........................
"A Siegfried Idyl"........................
Selections from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" (Introduction to Act III.; Dance of the Apprentices; Entrance of the Mastersingers; Homage to Hans Sachs)........
Prelude to "Lohengrin"........................
Good Friday Magic from "Parsifal"........
Overture to "Tannhauser"........................
............................Richard Wagner

Of these the greatest novelties were the overture to "Rienzi" and the "Good Friday Magic" from "Parsifal." Separated by some 40 years in their composition, they were as widely removed in theme and style, but both excellently well played. In the former, the brasses and the tympani, so often relegated to the background, came into their own and held it against the strings, with a forceful rhythmic effect that stirred the pulses. The "Good Friday Magic" was equally full of orchestral color, but in its more delicate passages revealed the subtler art of the composer's old age.

The "Siegfried Idyl," the selections from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" and the prelude to "Lohengrin" were old acquaintances, presented in excellent form. As was to be expected, such a programme to lovers of Wagner's music was a joy from beginning to end, while to the Philistines in the audience it savored of monotony.

With the last number on the programme, however, even these were satisfied, and musician and layman alike listened, absorbed, to the magnificent rendition of the overture to "Tannhauser." Probably the best known of any number on the programme, and played here twice in as many years, it revealed new beauties in the conductor's reading, and may well be considered one of the finest performances ever given here by the orchestra.

The grandeur of the recurring "Pilgrim's Chorus" and the wonderfully subtle treatment of the Bacchanal music compelled the admiration of every listener, which expressed itself in applause sufficiently enthusiastic to recall Dr. Muck to the stage after he had left it.

Six concerts are announced for next season, to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings, Oct. 17, Nov. 21, Dec. 26, Feb. 6, March 6 and April 10, when distinguished soloists are promised and programmes as enjoyable as those of past years will doubtless be given.

A. W. C.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

WAGNER CONCERT CLOSED SERIES

Boston Symphony Orchestra Delighted a Large Audience.

The last of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew a large audience to Infantry Hall last night. It was a notable occasion by reason of the fact that for the first time here an exclusively Wagnerian programme was rendered. Dr. Muck, the able director of the orchestra, is always rather reluctant to arrange such a programme, although acknowledged to be one of the best conductors of Wagnerian music, but by special request he prepared the programme which was rendered last night. That it was satisfying no one could doubt after hearing the music and noting the enthusiastic reception that was given to the conductor and the musicians.

Dr. Muck once more revealed his special ability in the preparation of pleasing programmes. The one last night was particularly well balanced and at the same time showed the wide range of works by the great composer while displaying the growth and development of the artist in his musical life. From the earliest of his compositions to the fullest and richest results of his training and his ability as a composer, selections were made which brought this increase of power and constantly cumulative attainment in review and showed the greatness of the artist mounting ever higher as the beauty and forcefulness of his art gained in strength and intensity.

The programme opened with the overture to "Rienzi," the first successful opera he produced. Naturally it shows little of the mastery of his art which was revealed later, but smacks of the style of his master, Meyerbeer, and the others of that romantic period who formed the school from which he gained his initial impressions. The hero of the opera is Bulwer Lytton's "The Last of the Tribunes," and it is filled with the spirited youthful hero worship, though expressed in a manner that seems simple and crude in comparison with his later triumphs of more pretentious character.

The second number was the "Siegfried Idyl," written for his wife after the birth of their son, Siegfried. This is an exquisite bit which is familiar to music lovers and seems to be a special favorite with Dr. Muck as he has placed it upon his concert programme here several times.

The first half of the programme closed with a series of selections from the last act of the single comic opera written by Wagner, "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg." These included the introduction to the third act constructed on Hans Sachs's monologue, the dance of the apprentices, the entrance of the Mastersingers and the chorale from the festal scene. These have seldom been heard here and they were enjoyed to the full.

In the second part the prelude to "Lohengrin" was substituted for the announced selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung." There was some disappointment at this change but the interpolated numbers was played as usual with appreciation and sympathy. Then came the beautiful passage from the last scene of "Parsifal," commonly known as "Good Friday Magic," telling how the fields and meadows burst into bloom on Good Friday watered by the tears of repentant sinners. Fittingly as the close of the programme was rendered the familiar and ever enjoyable overture to "Tannhauser."

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date APR 11 1916

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall this evening at 8:15. The programme will be as follows: Overture to "Rienzi;" "A Siegfried Idyl;" selections from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg,", (introduction to act III, dance of the Apprentices; Entrance of the Mastersingers; Homage to Hans Sachs), Richard Wagner; The Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal;" selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," (arranged by Hans Richter), Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock; Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine Journey; overture to "Tannshauser."

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT

Orchestra Gives Novel Programme at Infantry Hall.

WAGNER PIECES FEATURED

Impressive Rendition of Noted Composer's Selections Given Under Leadership of Dr. Muck.—Overture to "Rienzi" One of Most Interesting Numbers on Card.

For the sixth and last concert in its 35th season, last evening in Infantry Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented by request a programme that was something of a novelty from that source. Other organizations have given all-Wagner programmes here occasionally, but although Dr. Muck is considered one of the greatest living authorities on the interpretation of Richard Wagner's music, he has never exploited it unduly on his symphony programmes, and in the four years of his present incumbency has given only about a half-dozen orchestral Wagnerean selections at these concerts here.

In fact, aside from the pension fund concerts of the orchestra in Boston and two in San Francisco at the exposition a year ago, this city is the second to be favored with such a programme. It called out an audience of about the usual size, which accepted philosophically the substitution of the well-known Prelude to "Lohengrin" for the selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdamerung" which had been previously announced. The present season has become noted for eleventh-hour changes in programmes, but it did seem a bit amazing, that constant association for several seasons with the stage accommodations, and a knowledge of the requirements of these selections, should not have precluded their choice, instead of requiring a revision of the programme, of which the order given was as follows:

Overture to "Rienzi"........................
"A Siegfried Idyl"........................
Selections from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" (Introduction to Act III.; Dance of the Apprentices; Entrance of the Mastersingers; Homage to Hans Sachs)........
Prelude to "Lohengrin"........................
Good Friday Magic from "Parsifal"........
Overture to "Tannhauser"........................
............................Richard Wagner

Of these the greatest novelties were the overture to "Rienzi" and the "Good Friday Magic" from "Parsifal." Separated by some 40 years in their composition, they were as widely removed in theme and style, but both excellently well played. In the former, the brasses and the tympani, so often relegated to the background, came into their own and held it against the strings, with a forceful rhythmic effect that stirred the pulses. The "Good Friday Magic" was equally full of orchestral color, but in its more delicate passages revealed the subtler art of the composer's old age.

The "Siegfried Idyl," the selections from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" and the prelude to "Lohengrin" were old acquaintances, presented in excellent form. As was to be expected, such a programme to lovers of Wagner's music was a joy from beginning to end, while to the Philistines in the audience it savored of monotony.

With the last number on the programme, however, even these were satisfied, and musician and layman alike listened, absorbed, to the magnificent rendition of the overture to "Tannhauser." Probably the best known of any number on the programme, and played here twice in as many years, it revealed new beauties in the conductor's reading, and may well be considered one of the finest performances ever given here by the orchestra.

The grandeur of the recurring "Pilgrim's Chorus" and the wonderfully subtle treatment of the Bacchanal music compelled the admiration of every listener, which expressed itself in applause sufficiently enthusiastic to recall Dr. Muck to the stage after he had left it.

Six concerts are announced for next season, to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings, Oct. 17, Nov. 21, Dec. 26, Feb. 6, March 6 and April 10, when distinguished soloists are promised and programmes as enjoyable as those of past years will doubtless be given.

A. W. C.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date AP
Establ

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall this evening at 8:15 o'clock, when the programme will consist of selections from operas by Wagner, as follows: Overture to "Rienzi;" "A Siegfried Idyl;" selections from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" (Introduction to act III.; Dance of the Apprentices; Entrance of the Mastersingers; Homage to Hans Sachs); the Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal;" selections from "Siegfried" and 'Gotterdammerung" (Arranged by Hans Richter); Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock; Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine Journey; Overture to "Tannhauser."

American
April 23

Pop Concerts Season Will Open Soon

WITH the close of the Symphony season Saturday evening, May 6, Symphony Hall will be transformed for the annual season of Pop concerts which play as important a part in the domestic economy of Boston during the Spring as the Symphony concerts do during the Fall and Winter. While the Pop concerts this year open Monday evening, May 8, this first evening will not be for the general public, since the Women's City Club has taken that evening for their own entertainment. Therefore, the season will really be formally opened Tuesday evening, May 9. It will run for nine weeks, closing Saturday evening, July 8. The concerts will be given on every week night of that time running from 8 o'clock until 11.

In many ways the season should be, musically speaking, the best and most interesting that Boston has ever had. The principal factor in this will be the size of the orchestra. Under the general and gradual change of conditions which have been taking place in the administration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from year to year recently the size of the orchestra employed for the Pop concerts has been increased. This year the Pops will have an orchestra of real symphonic size, each program employing from 75 to 80 musicians. This orchestra is larger than most of the symphony orchestras of this country and even of Europe.

The conductors employed during the season will be three, the same gentlemen as acted in this capacity last year; but, in order to provide greater variety of programs, their terms of service will be somewhat different than it has been in the past. Ernst Schmidt, the assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, will have the opening week. Mr. Andre Maquarre will be the conductor the second week, and Mr. Schmidt again the third week. Mr. Maquarre will be conductor the fourth and fifth weeks, and Mr. Schmidt the sixth and seventh weeks. Mr. Lenom will have charge of the orchestra the eighth week, and Mr. Schmidt will close the season with the ninth week.

* * *

Globe
April 23rd

"Pop" Concerts to Begin in Symphony Hall Monday, May 8

With the close of the Symphony season Saturday evening, May 6, Symphony Hall will be transformed for the annual season of "Pop" concerts, which will open Monday evening, May 8. This first evening will not be for the general public, since the Women's City Club has taken that evening for their own entertainment. Therefore, the season will really be formally opened Tuesday evening, May 9. It will run for nine weeks, closing Saturday evening, July 8.

Under the general and gradual change of conditions which have been taking place in the administration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from year to year, recently the size of the orchestra employed for the "Pop" concerts has been increased. This year the "Pops" will have an orchestra of real symphonic size, each program employing from 75 to 80 musicians.

The conductors employed during the season will be three, the same gentlemen who acted in that capacity last year, but in order to provide greater variety of programs their terms of service will be somewhat different than it has been in the past.

Ernst Schmidt, the assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, will have the opening week. Andre Maquarre will be the conductor the second week, and Mr Schmidt again the third week. Mr Maquarre will be conductor the fourth and fifth weeks, and Mr Schmidt the sixth and seventh weeks. Mr Lenom will have charge of the orchestra the eighth week, and Mr Schmidt will close the season with the ninth week.

Post
April 23rd

Symphony's Last Programme

Liszt's "Dante" symphony is the leading number on the 24th and last programme of the Symphony Orchestra, which will be played on Friday afternoon, May 5, and Saturday evening, May 6. In the last movement the "Magnificat" will be sung by a woman's chorus from the Musical Art Club, which is being trained by Stephen Townsend. The second part of the programme will be comprised of the prelude to "Tristan und Isolde"; the funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods," and the prelude to "Parsifal."

Last Cambridge Symphony

The series of eight Symphony concerts in Sanders Theatre, Harvard College, will close next Thursday evening, April 27. The outstanding number on the programme will be Mendelssohn's Italian symphony. The other works are Cornelius' overture, "The Barber of Bagdad," Mozart's concertante symphonie of violin and viola and the "Tannhauser" overture of Wagner. Messrs. Witek and Ferir will play the solo parts in the Mozart number.

POP CONCERTS

With the close of the Symphony season Saturday evening May 6, Symphony Hall will be transformed for the annual season of Pop concerts which play as important a part in the domestic economy of Boston during the spring as the Symphony concerts do during the fall and winter. While the Pop concerts this year open Monday evening, May 8, this first evening will not be for the general public, since the Women's City Club has taken that evening for their own entertainment. Therefore the season will really be formally opened Tuesday evening, May 9. It will run for nine weeks, closing Saturday evening, July 8. The concerts will be given on every week night of that time running from 8 o'clock until 11.

In many ways this Pop season should be, musically speaking, the best and most interesting that Boston has ever had. The principal factor in this will be the size of the orchestra. Under the general and gradual change of conditions which have been taking place in the administration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from year to year recently the size of the orchestra employed for the Pop concerts has been increased. This year, the Pops will have an orchestra of symphonic proportions, each programme employing from 75 to 80 musicians. This orchestra is larger than many of the symphony orchestras of this country and even of Europe.

The conductors employed during the season will be three, the same gentlemen as acted in this capacity last year; but, in order to provide greater variety of programmes, their terms of service will be somewhat different than it has been in the past. Ernst Schmidt, the assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, will have the opening week. Mr. Andre Maquarre will be the conductor the second week, and Mr. Schmidt again the third week. Mr. Maquarre will be conductor the fourth and fifth weeks, and Mr. Schmidt the sixth and seventh weeks. Mr. Lenom will have charge of the orchestra the eighth week, and Mr. Schmidt will close the season with the ninth week. It is believed by the management that this arrangement will be most pleasing to the patrons of the Pops.

Transcript
April 22nd

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MUSIC FOR COMMEMORATION OF SHAKSPEARE

Dr. Muck's Wide and Interesting Choice—Smetana's "Richard III.," Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" and Tschaikovsky's "Hamlet" for the First Times in Years—The Other Pieces—Contrasts and Comparisons—Orchestra and Conductor on Their Mettle Again

FOR the first time, if memory does not falter, the Symphony Concerts have commemorated—as the programme of yesterday ran—an anniversary other than that of the birth or the death of a composer and honored the name and fame of one who wrote no music, except that of words, but suggested much music-making to others. The three hundredth anniversary of the death of Shakspeare befalls on Sunday; the actual day or an approximation of it would have passed uncelebrated in Boston, except by the wrangling municipal mummery at the Opera House, had not Dr. Muck chosen to fill the Symphony Concerts of yesterday and today with music that sundry composers wrote when Shakspeare's fires set sparks to theirs. The playwright used an English speech to English-speaking folk; but the conductor could find no music from English or American hands that harked back to Shakspeare's plays; that was worthy of them and that in itself deserved inclusion in a commemorative programme. Of course, there are English settings of songs from the comedies and the tragedies that might becomingly serve such a purpose: but they were out of the question in a concert that must, perforce, be wholly orchestral. Shakspeare, after all, is universal and Continental Europe has been much more prolific of music born of his drama than has his own England or the kindred America.

To the Continental composers accordingly Dr. Muck turned. From a very wide field of choice Smetana yielded him the tone-poem, "Richard III."; Berlioz the purely orchestral parts of the symphony inspired by "Romeo and Juliet"; Tschaikowsky a fantasia upon "Hamlet"; Mendelssohn, the overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and two fragments of music of the scene; Dvoràk, the overture, "Othello." In all, music suggested by a comedy, three diverse tragedies and a chronicle-play of Shakspeare; music written by composers of four distinct nationalities, Czech, French, Russian and Prussian; in itself music that deserved to be heard and that, with the exception of Mendelssohn's pieces, has been seldom heard of late at the Symphony Concerts. The assembled numbers made as long a programme as any conductor has ever set for Symphony Hall; but it had novel and diversified interest; neither conductor nor orchestra flagged with it; while as much of the audience as dares to be independent of "suburban schedules" held intent and applausive to the end. An exacting programme to prepare, since each piece, except again Mendelssohn's, must be restudied and repractised thoroughly; but one that after those strange two weeks of perfunctory routine, restored the orchestra to its wonted mettle and renewed the wonted interest and exhilaration of the concerts.

So various a concert set in wide scope and vivid contrast the powers of orchestra and conductor. At their hands Berlioz's scherzo of "Queen Mab" was a filigree web of swiftly running and highly rhythmed tones, touched in adroit proportion with as light contrasting strokes in the trios of the echoing wind-choir and the fanfares of fantasy—a gossamer and shimmering poetry of music as the composer wrote it, as the band played it and with the mystery of night-vision permeating almost every bar. Then to the gradual efflorescence in more and more ardent tones and larger and larger utterance of the music of the lovers in the garden—music charged with the sensuous thrill of the soft and glowing Italian night that Berlioz had known at Rome quite as much as with the passion of the fired yet fearing pair. Indeed, so far as it is speech of their passion, it becomes toward the end a rather self-conscious speech of the composer who in true romantic fashion has lingered overlong with his imaginings—especially when a conductor takes them at so slow a pace as Dr. Muck used yesterday. Yet it still keeps the strangeness, the beauty, the young rapture which are everlasting romance.

True compliment in itself and as the orchestra played it is the succeeding music of Romeo's troubled, amorous musing with its high, thin intensity, the voice to this day of Parisian composers for such mood and of the expert oboist who usually speaks for them. Next the music of the dance within the Capulets' house—a brilliant music, a music of romantic pomp as the generation of Berlioz and Liszt imagined, wrote and judged it. The changes of time and taste have made it seem nowadays rather empty and common unless we can hear it with the readjusted ear that in similar fashion "Ce qu' on Entend sur la Montagne" this very season demanded. Yet the gradual shadowing and the final smothering of the music of fete and of longing by the music of the feud remains even now a well-imagined and well-accomplished stroke. Given the conductor, the orchestra, the willing ear and imagination, Berlioz's romantic music still holds its own—quite as surely as does Liszt's. Maybe romance in tones, like romance in every other medium, is an enduring thing.

For Berlioz and this music of "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikovsky's "Hamlet" and Dvoràk's "Othello" made exalting contrast. The romantic glory of Berlioz's symphony reflects the glory of Shakspeare's romantic tragedy. Tschaikovsky's fantasia and Dvoràk's overture take cue from his plays but the voice that speaks out of them is far from his. Tschaikovsky's Hamlet is Tschaikovsky himself in many an idiosyncrasy of his own peculiar and limited idiom. Even the songful motive that is presumed to suggest Ophelia has the lushness, only a little tempered, of the Russian's melody that nowadays seems somehow to vulgarize it. White and dreaming Ophelia, after all, did not stray out of Bellini's transparent southern operas; she was of Shakspeare's more mysterious north. The black and feverish agitation that fills so much of the music developed from the motives of Hamlet himself is only Tschaikovsky neurotic and self-tortured as he had been many times in tones before and was to be many times thereafter. Even when the tragedy and fantasia end, the lament for the dead and fated Hamlet is an intrinsically Russian lament—a wild fury of mourning fitter for Tsarewitch or boyar than for Shakspeare's subtly tempered prince. Almost certainly Tschaikovsky read himself into "Hamlet"; perhaps he felt the tragedy as a dramatic narrative that, depoetized and de-intellectualized, is no more than a melodrama of suspicion and revenge. So reacting to it, may be, he wrote the sharp music of his introduction as though he visioned the suspense and the awe of the scenes on the battlement, the uncanny promptings of nocturnal sound, the sharp cut of inner sensation; midnight, the ghost and the turbid flood of emotion in Hamlet and the other watchers. There and only there, he writes music that becomes its Shakspearean origin.

Nowhere, as it happens, does Dvoràk do as much in his overture to "Othello," which might better, perhaps, be prelude to the final scenes it would epitomize. For the prayerful, remembering and foreboding Desdemona he can find no more than a gently suave and intrinsically commonplace melody. Music-making rather than the tragic voice of tones brings the Moor. The ominous dialogue is merely sharp-cut by a ready hand. The heavy climax of the sacrifice and the suicide, the lyric and elegiac close, half-lament and half-apotheosis are no more than Dvoràk's simple-hearted and rather pedestrian imaginings over that which kindled Verdi in his opera to a music of genius. The mere memory of it yesterday smothered Dvoràk, Desdemona-like, into silence and oblivion.

Smetana was in better case. He, too, has written a relatively simple-minded and simply conducted music as Gloster and the course of "Richard III."' prompted him to imagination and expression in tones. Like all Smetana's symphonic poems, the evolution of the music, the mating of it with what the books call the "poetic content," is transparently clear. The composer's reactions to play and personage are as obvious. None the less, he has written a finely stark and rugged music, now grim and grave, now turbulent and martial, again of suspensive march and once at least of gaunt suggestion of the swarming phantoms of Gloster's tent. There are piercing phrases, heavy tutti, bleak progressions, clashing dissonances, ghostly modulations, broken trumpets and trumpets sounding in long fanfare down the wind and down the world over a stricken field. Not so much a music of Gloster and of "Richard III." as a music of all the line of Shakspeare's historical plays that stretches from "Richard II." through "Henry V.," of the warlike and desolate time that sets them, of the Hotspurs, the Bolingbrokes, the young king of Agincourt, the Welsh rebels, the loyal lords that go to and fro, big of stride and voice, within them. Bohemian though he was, Smetana has written as true and worthy a Shakspearean music as the Berlioz of "Romeo and Juliet," as the Mendelssohn of the overture and the incidental pieces to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Once more out of that thrice-familiar but still unhackneyed prelude from the suffusing loveliness of the chords of the entering and the vanishing fairies, through the lovers' sighs and the stampings of Bottom and his crew, through Nocturne and Scherzo spoke, albeit in another voice and medium, the Shakspeare of youthful fantasy, humors and poetry, not the most illustrious but the most seductive and—to some of us—the most cherished Shakspeare of them all.

H. T. P.

[142]

From
Address
Date
Estab

Monitor
Sat.
April 22nd

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES UP PROGRAM TO SHAKESPEARE

SYMPHONY HALL—Twenty-second program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck conducting, in commemoration of Shakespeare, afternoon of April 21. The program: Smetana, "Richard III.," symphonic poem, op. 11; Berlioz, "Romeo and Juliet," dramatic symphony with chorus, solo voices, and prologue in choral recitative after Shakespeare's tragedy, op. 17, (a) Queen Mab: scherzo; (b) garden scene; (c) ball at Capulet's; Tschaikowsky, "Hamlet," overture fantasia, op. 67 A; Mendelssohn, music to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," for orchestra, soprano solos and female chorus, op. 61, (a) overture, (b) nocturne, (c) scherzo; Dvorak, overture, "Othello," op. 93.

Musical pageantry this program was, and it all testified to the wedding of the intellectual and the emotional in Shakespeare and the zest he communicated through his characters to their interpreters. These interpreters Friday happened to be using the medium of instrumental tone in combination, but nevertheless though they might characterize merely, or establish a mood and to only a slight degree carry forward action, still the program taken as a whole left the impression that "Hamlet" always leaves of completeness. All the elements of drama are present in "Hamlet." And in the Boston Symphony orchestra's commemoration program the five composers contributed each an element that Shakespeare had, fused and indissoluble, in his work.

Good composers, being honest, take from Shakespeare what they can grasp, and if each one sees a different thing the audience may combine them and have the complete Shakespeare again. It would be guessed that Tschaikowsky's Hamlet would be the Hamlet of the morose mood. And that Mendelssohn would be inspired to the best music perhaps that he wrote by the sparkling fantasy of the "Midsummer Night's Dream." Each of these and Smetana in his "Richard III." drew from the dramatist as much as they contributed themselves, and the result was Shakespeare.

In only one of the pieces was a personage characterized—in "Richard III." Smetana has in this done some of his best work. It is bright with brass. Smetana interprets even somber themes and passages with his trumpets, as if to say "this is somber and I shall make it so, but I shall not be robbed of my joy in doing it." His Richard is the hideous figure, the traditional one, and the composer revealed him by the use of apparently formless dissonances. There is some little attempt at narration here, also.

Berlioz goes to "Romeo and Juliet" for his program and his inspiration. Out of this "dramatic" symphony with its twenty-odd sections, Dr. Muck took only three. The "Queen Mab" is a fantasia on Mercutio's speech: "O, then, I see Queen Mab hath been with you." The second is the garden scene with the lovers. Berlioz is successful here in places and not in others. At all times he is giving the symbols that people expect rather than a true transcript. The third is the scene at the ball. This contains a passage for oboe that, played by Mr. Longy, will be remembered, along with a passage for oboe in the Tschaikowsky that came next. It is playing of the kind that explains why this orchestra sometimes plays up to its reputation, for there are others in it besides Mr. Longy who can from the orchestra depths phrase a passage to make one forget many perhaps weary hours of listening to recognized solo instruments, or even to the wooden performances this same great orchestra sometimes nods long enough to give. The performance Friday owes much to Mr. Longy.

If Mendelssohn caught joy from Shakespeare, Tschaikowsky, from the biographies, would go straight to Hamlet, as being an allied personality in some measure. There is a bond between the composer and the Danish prince. Tschaikowsky wrote perhaps most sincerely of the composers represented. He presented most graphically, at any rate, the drama of emotion. His medium prevented him from touching very closely the drama of intellect, even if he were inclined to do so. Hamlet, without articulation of the intellect is hardly half of Hamlet, but it is as well that composers are barred from comments on this phase of their subjects, if biographies are ever correct, which may be doubted. When Shakespeare touched a subject he had a way of saying very nearly all that could be said on it. By intellectual grace he transmuted the themes of pure melodrama. Shakespeare appeals to the heart, but not direct. It is Hamlet's story that appeals as well as his speeches, but—because of his speeches.

In these detached episodes, and the Dvorak "Othello" Shakespeare again contributes to human happiness through the composers, for it is Shakespeare more than the composers or the orchestra that conjured up the finely played program.

Herald
April 30th

THE POPS

The opening of the annual season of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall will find a warm welcome in the great public which has come to look on these concerts as one of the chief means of entertainment during the spring season. A year ago, when the orchestra was away in San Francisco for three weeks and there were no such concerts during that time, their absence was sorely felt. This year, as in all seasons for many past, except last, the Pop concerts follow directly on the heels of the Symphony concerts. The last Symphony concert is Saturday evening, May 6, and the first Pop concert is Monday evening, May 8. In a sense, however, the season of Pops formally opens Tuesday evening, May 9, for the Women's City Club of Boston has taken the hall for Monday evening, and such tickets as they have to sell are to be had at their clubhouse, 40 Beacon street.

Already several special nights have been arranged for. The alumni of Amherst College will have their annual night at the Pops Wednesday evening, May 17. This has come to be one of the most popular events of the season, for the crowd of Amherst men is always large, and they are famous as singers.

The Roxbury Latin school a year ago took a night at the Pops with such success that Head Master Gleason expects it to become an annual event. This year it is set for Friday evening, May 26. It is expected that the Harvard Club chorus will help in the evening's entertainment.

Boston University has its annual night Wednesday, June 7, and "Tech" will take an evening off from the celebrations with which they open their new buildings long enough to be in Symphony Hall the evening of Wednesday, June 14. Other special nights are being arranged for and will be announced in due course of time.

Particular emphasis should be laid this year upon the size of the orchestra employed at these concerts. At each concert there will be a minimum of 75 musicians; but, on any special occasions when more men are required, as, for example, on Wagner nights, a greater number can be used, for all the members of the orchestra, except the principals, are available for these concerts.

All three conductors have strong followings in Boston. Mr. Schmidt, the assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, who opens the season, made many friends last year and his "Blue-White" march was the hit of the season. Mr. Maquarre is an old hand at the Pops and may be relied upon to provide his usual entertaining programs, while Mr. Lenom comes toward the end of the season. The programs of the first week will be out in a few days.

Globe
~~[illegible]~~
April 30

"Pop" Concert Season Soon to Open in Symphony Hall

The opening of the annual season of "Pops" in Symphony Hall will find a warm welcome in the great public which has come to look on these concerts as one of the chief means of entertainment during the Spring season. A year ago, when the orchestra was away in San Francisco for three weeks and there were no such concerts during that time, their absence was sorely felt.

The last Symphony concert is Saturday evening, May 6, and the first "Pop" is Monday evening, May 8. In a sense, however, the season of "Pops" formally opens Tuesday evening, May 9, for the Women's City Club of Boston has taken the hall for Monday evening, and such tickets as they have to sell are to be had at their clubhouse, 40 Beacon st.

Already several special nights have been arranged for. The alumni of Amherst College will have their annual night, Wednesday, May 17. This has come to be one of the most popular events of the season, for the crowd of Amherst men is always large and they are famous as singers.

The Roxbury Latin School a year ago took a night at the "Pops" with such success that Headmaster Gleason expects it to become an annual event. This year it is set for Friday evening, May 26. It is expected that the Harvard Club chorus will help in the evening's entertainment.

Boston University has its annual night Wednesday, June 7, and Tech will take an evening off from the celebrations with which they open their new buildings long enough to be in Symphony Hall the evening of Wednesday, June 14.

This year at each concert there will be a minimum of 75 musicians; but, on any special occasions when more men are required, as, for example, on Wagner nights, a greater number can be used, for all the members of the orchestra, except the principals, are available for these concerts.

Mr Schmidt, the assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, who opens the season, made many friends last year and his "Blue-White" march was one of the hits of the season. Mr Maquarre is an old hand at the "Pops" and may be relied upon to provide his usual entertaining programs, while Mr Lenom comes toward the end of the season.

Boston Post
April 30th

THE POPS

The opening of the annual season of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall will find a warm welcome in the great public which has come to look on these concerts as one of the chief means of entertainment during the spring season. A year ago, when the orchestra was away in San Francisco for three weeks and there were no such concerts during that time, their absence was felt. This year the Pop concerts will follow directly on the heels of the Symphony concerts. The last Symphony concert is Saturday evening, May 6, and the first Pop concert is Monday evening, May 8. In a sense, however, the season of Pops formally opens Tuesday evening, May 9, for the Women's City Club of Boston has taken the hall for Monday evening, and such tickets as they have to sell are to be had at their club house, 40 Beacon street.

Already several special nights have been arranged for. The alumni of Amherst College will have their annual night at the Pops Wednesday evening, May 17. This has come to be one of the most popular events of the season, for the crowd of Amherst men is always large and they are famous as singers.

The Roxbury Latin School, a year ago, took a night at the Pops with such success that Head Master Gleason expects it to become an annual event This year it is set for Friday evening, May 26. It is expected that the Harvard Club chorus will help in the evening's entertainment.

Boston University has its annual night Wednesday, June 7, and "Tech" will take an evening off from the celebrations with which they open their new buildings long enough to be in Symphony Hall the evening of Wednesday, June 14. Other special nights are being arranged for, and will be announced in due course of time.

At each concert there will be a minimum of 75 musicians; but, on any special occasions when more men are required, as, for example, on Wagner nights, a greater number can be used, since, on account of the war, all the members of the orchestra, except the principals, are available for these concerts.

The three conductors have strong following in Boston. Mr. Schmidt, the assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, who opens the season, made many friends last year, and his "Blue-White" march was the hit of the season. Mr. Maquarre is an old hand at the Pops and may be relied upon to provide his usual entertaining programmes; while Mr. Lenom, who has been equally successful, comes toward the end of the season. The programmes of the first week will soon be published.

MONITOR
—APRIL 29—

"TAM O' SHANTER" PIECE CONDUCTED BY THE COMPOSER

SYMPHONY HALL—Twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of April 28. The program: Rimsky-Korsakoff, overture, "The Betrothed of the Tsar"; George W. Chadwick, "Tam o'Shanter," ballade for orchestra (conducted by the composer, first performance in Boston); Strauss, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," tone poem.

The annual music festival of Norfolk, Conn., is doing much for composers. It is giving them practice, helping them to master their technique, enabling them to keep alert in their instrumentation. It is encouraging minor orchestral poets to persevere and write. Under its rule of presenting something original each season, it is opening a clear way for symphonic artists to the public, letting them approach by a door where no ungracious concert manager stands guard.

All this the institution in the southern New England hills is accomplishing. The same thing other organizations in a feeling of civic zeal have done; for example, the Metropolitan opera, by performing new pieces on its stage; and the National Federation of Musical Clubs by holding prize contests. Great seems the pity that in spite of what they do to encourage composers, they do so little to advance the art of composition; that with their high purpose to get music made, they succeed so poorly in achieving any solid community expression.

A work performed a little while ago at a Symphony concert, the "Lucifer" tone poem of Hadley, and one of the works on the twenty-third program, the "Tam o'Shanter" ballade of Chadwick, illustrate the results of Norfolk encouragement and of musical patronage in the United States generally in the last 10 years. The pieces are admirable in their scoring, impressive in their descriptive and dramatic effects, well-proportioned and strongly built. And yet they leave expression just where they found it. They add a good deal to the sum of notes already written but nothing to the sum of thought already clearly uttered.

Listeners must generally [illegible] these two works want originality of content. They can hardly help finding that Hadley's "Lucifer," on the one hand, repeats what European composers said with finality long ago, showing, perhaps, a new arrangement of tone-picture formulas, but causing no essential surprise. They can hardly help finding that Chadwick's "Tam o'Shanter," on the other hand, repeats what the composer himself has long since said conclusively, exploiting fresh literary matter, admittedly, but bringing forward scarcely an idea but can be matched in the "Lochinvar" ballade for baritone and orchestra, the symphonic sketches or the sinfonietta in F major.

Narrowly appraised, the two works may be made to look like real contributions to the musical total of things. They can be shown, undoubtedly, to have enriched the festival programs on which they first appeared. They can be proved, likely enough, to have done more for the glamour of the Norfolk annual scheme of entertainment than any repertory works could. But the issue is now as to their permanent value; it touches their success in expressing the sentiment not of a special group on a single holiday occasion, but of the community at large in its ordinary concert mood.

The players at the matinee gave Mr. Chadwick the best efforts they could command, considering what they had to give their own conductor in the Rimsky-Korsakoff piece before "Tam O'Shanter" and in the Strauss piece after it. They were inclined to expend their tone lavishly on the visitor and were not altogether submissive when he bade them soften down. They may be supposed to have had difficulty in summoning the light touch to stringed instruments and the controlled breath to wind instruments that the new piece in some of its humorous passages required. They were drilled to "Zarathustra" as the principal number of the day and they had to treat everything that came to hand as if the composer of "Zarathustra" wrote it.

In their presentation of the Strauss episodes based on Nietsche's philosophic romance, the men displayed a magnificence of tone and a breadth of phrasing that meant they were having one of their best days. They put a largeness into their phrasing and a vividness into their contrasts of volume of sound that they achieve only when they know their music well and like it.

- POST -
APRIL 29

CHADWICK CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

"Tam O'Shanter" Played—Dr. Muck's Genius in Strauss

BY OLIN DOWNES

The 23d programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, presented yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was one of the most interesting and well balanced that have been presented this season. The compositions were Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture to his opera, "The Betrothed of the Czar"; George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Tam o' Shanter," heard for the first time here, and conducted by the composer, and Richard Strauss' symphonic poem after Nietzsche, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

HUMOR OF CHADWICK

Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture is a delightful piece of music, based on themes of Russian origin or character, orchestrated simply, but with a peculiar and exhilarating brilliancy.

The poem of Burns, the suggestion of the moaning of night wind, of Tam reeling drunk on his mare, of the hellish orgy that he witnessed, and the escape with the loss of nothing worse than the mare's gray tail—these episodes are especially suitable for treatment by Mr. Chadwick. One of his most excellent characteristics as a composer is his humor, and in this symphonic poem there are pages of wholesome, extravagant, fantastical farce. There is the music suggestive of the howling winds, and the drunken Scotch tune given principally to rollicking horns. The confusion of keys, the conflicting of rhythms and of orchestral colors is a shrewd stroke.

The defects of the piece are that it remains too long, that certain instrumental effects are overworked, that the epilogue escapes the reproach

From Addr
Date
Estr

[143]

[illegible] and of rather conventional cadences. But as a whole this is one of the most characteristic and forceful of Mr. Chadwick's later compositions. He seemed to work his will with the orchestra, which played superbly. After the performance the composer was called back repeatedly to the stage.

Impressed by "Zarathustra"

The audience was deeply impressed by Strauss' tone poem, and, indeed, at a time when a new chord a minute is the rule, and Strauss himself has more than once paralleled the technical achievement of his tone-poem after Nietzsche, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," remains one of the seven wonders of orchestral literature. The trumpet that mounts like a gleaming sword with the world motive, the response of the orchestra to its call, and the blinding radiance of the great C major harmony which brings the introduction to a close is surely as near the unspeakable as an artist can attain. Because of its spiritual daring, its unconquerable fantasy, Zarathustra is for many of us a step farther than anything else that Strauss wrote, or for that matter, than any man since Richard Wagner has written.

Two years ago Dr. Muck performed "Zarathustra" for the first time here, and performed it as though he were mentally disputing every assertion of Nietzsche, or Strauss, or both. Yesterday the performance was far more eloquent. It seemed that the conductor, too, had been caught up in the composer's chariot of fire, and the exposition of many details of the score, which ordinarily pass unobserved, was little less than marvelous. Moreover, if anyone wants to see a conductor whose mental and physical self-control are nothing short of miraculous, he has only to watch Dr. Mephistopheles Muck beat two or three different rythms at one time, with only two arms, as he does in conducting the great fugue. Such a dissection of that fugue, and yet such a dramatic interpretation of the passage, had not been witnessed before in this city—first the entrances of the subject and the incredible complications of the free exposition, then the sudden, impatient and joyous entrance of the theme of the ideal, and then the mighty gathering of the fugue to its climax, the trombones marching upward, with the tread of millions, and the shouting trumpet descending—a picture, indeed, which words will never paint.

Was Intended Seriously

On the other hand, there are still places in Dr. Muck's reading which have for us a rather episodic character, and which lack what might be called a characteristic rhetorical flourish.

One feels that it is not always easy for Dr. Muck to take Strauss' colossal extravagance seriously. But Zarathustra was composed in six months, and only because the composer succeeded in taking himself with infinite seriousness, and in a like attitude must the music be interpreted. In this work over-attention to detail is dangerous.

Yet the performance, in its entirety, was engrossing and dramatic and a deeply-stirred audience departed homewards.

GLOBE

APRIL 29

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Chadwick's 'Tamo'Shanter' Played First Time

Dr Muck and Orchestra in Masterly Performance of 'Zarathustra'

The performance of Strauss' stupendous tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," by Dr Muck and the Symphony Orchestra at the concert yesterday afternoon was one appropriately big in conception and brilliant in virtuosity. The new 32-foot reed pipe, especially installed for the deep organ point of the opening measures and their climax, shook the air with its vibration and was as the voice of the great deep.

The attempt to solve Nietzsche's world riddle by carefully programed music of the successive experiences of Zarathustra, the "beyond man," may seem within the bounds of orchestral expression. Spontaneity at times seems stifled, whatever the skill of construction. The recurring world motive of roat, fifth and octave becomes an intrusion in its persistent return. One may wish the composer had been less slavish in his adherence to it, but none will deny the crowing majesty of the introduction, or the beauty now poignant, now sensuous in "of the Great Yearning," "of Joys and Passions," in the "Grave Song." The fugued passage to science is a masterpiece in characterization of academic learning.

The belief that "no diabolical power can pursue God beyond the middle of a running stream" is called the basis of Burns' tale in verse "Tam O' Shanter." And so, Tam O' Shanter riding madly from Alloway Kirk, where he had seen the "hellish legion dancing" headed for the river Doon, and was half way across before "cutty sark" could seize his horse's tail.

Mr Chadwick has been attracted by the character of this care-free roisterer, with little to trouble him other than his Scotch superstitions. In the ballade bearing the hero's name, played yesterday for the first time in Boston and conducted by the composer, he has laid literal stress on the humorous Terrors of Tam's wild ride and upon the pursuit of the shrieking witches.

The carousing passed, there is a closing passage of melodic beauty over characteristic harmony, which is among the best pages from the composer's later works. Mr Chadwick was warmly welcomed when he took the stand, and recalled several times after the performance.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture to his opera "[illegible] Betrothed of the Tsar," in [illegible] filled with color and rhythmic vitality, was played brilliantly.

---

JOURNAL

APRIL 29

CHADWICK PIECE WARMLY GREETED

Boston Composer's Ballade Played at Symphony Concert.

George W. Chadwick's ballade for orchestra, "Tam o' Shanter," which is based on Burns' familiar verses, was performed in Boston for the first time at yesterday's Symphony concert, with the composer conducting. It proved to be one of the most interesting novelties of the season, and Mr. Chadwick was recalled by the applause again and again at the end of it.

In the program book reference is made to Carlyle's view that in the poem, "the strange chasm which yawns in our incredulous imaginations between the Ayr public-house and the gate of Tophet is nowhere bridged over . . . and thus the tragedy of the adventure become a mere drunken phantasmagoria or many-colored spectrum painted on ale-vapors." Mr. Chadwick has succeeded in a measure in bridging the chasm, being a master of the orchestral medium, although the climacteric scene at the bridge passes without any particular impressiveness after the vivid painting of the frenetic ride.

Otherwise, the tone picture is impressively done. The environment is clear and purely Scottish; the rapidly succeeding episodes are depicted with skill and imagination, especially effective being the introduction of snatches of the old Scottish tune of "Martyrs" in the Kirk Alloway scene; and while the composer has dealt with his theme realistically for the most part, he has provided a groundwork of melody that matches the lyric grace of the verses and that would commend the ballade to music lovers who have not lost their taste for good tunes.

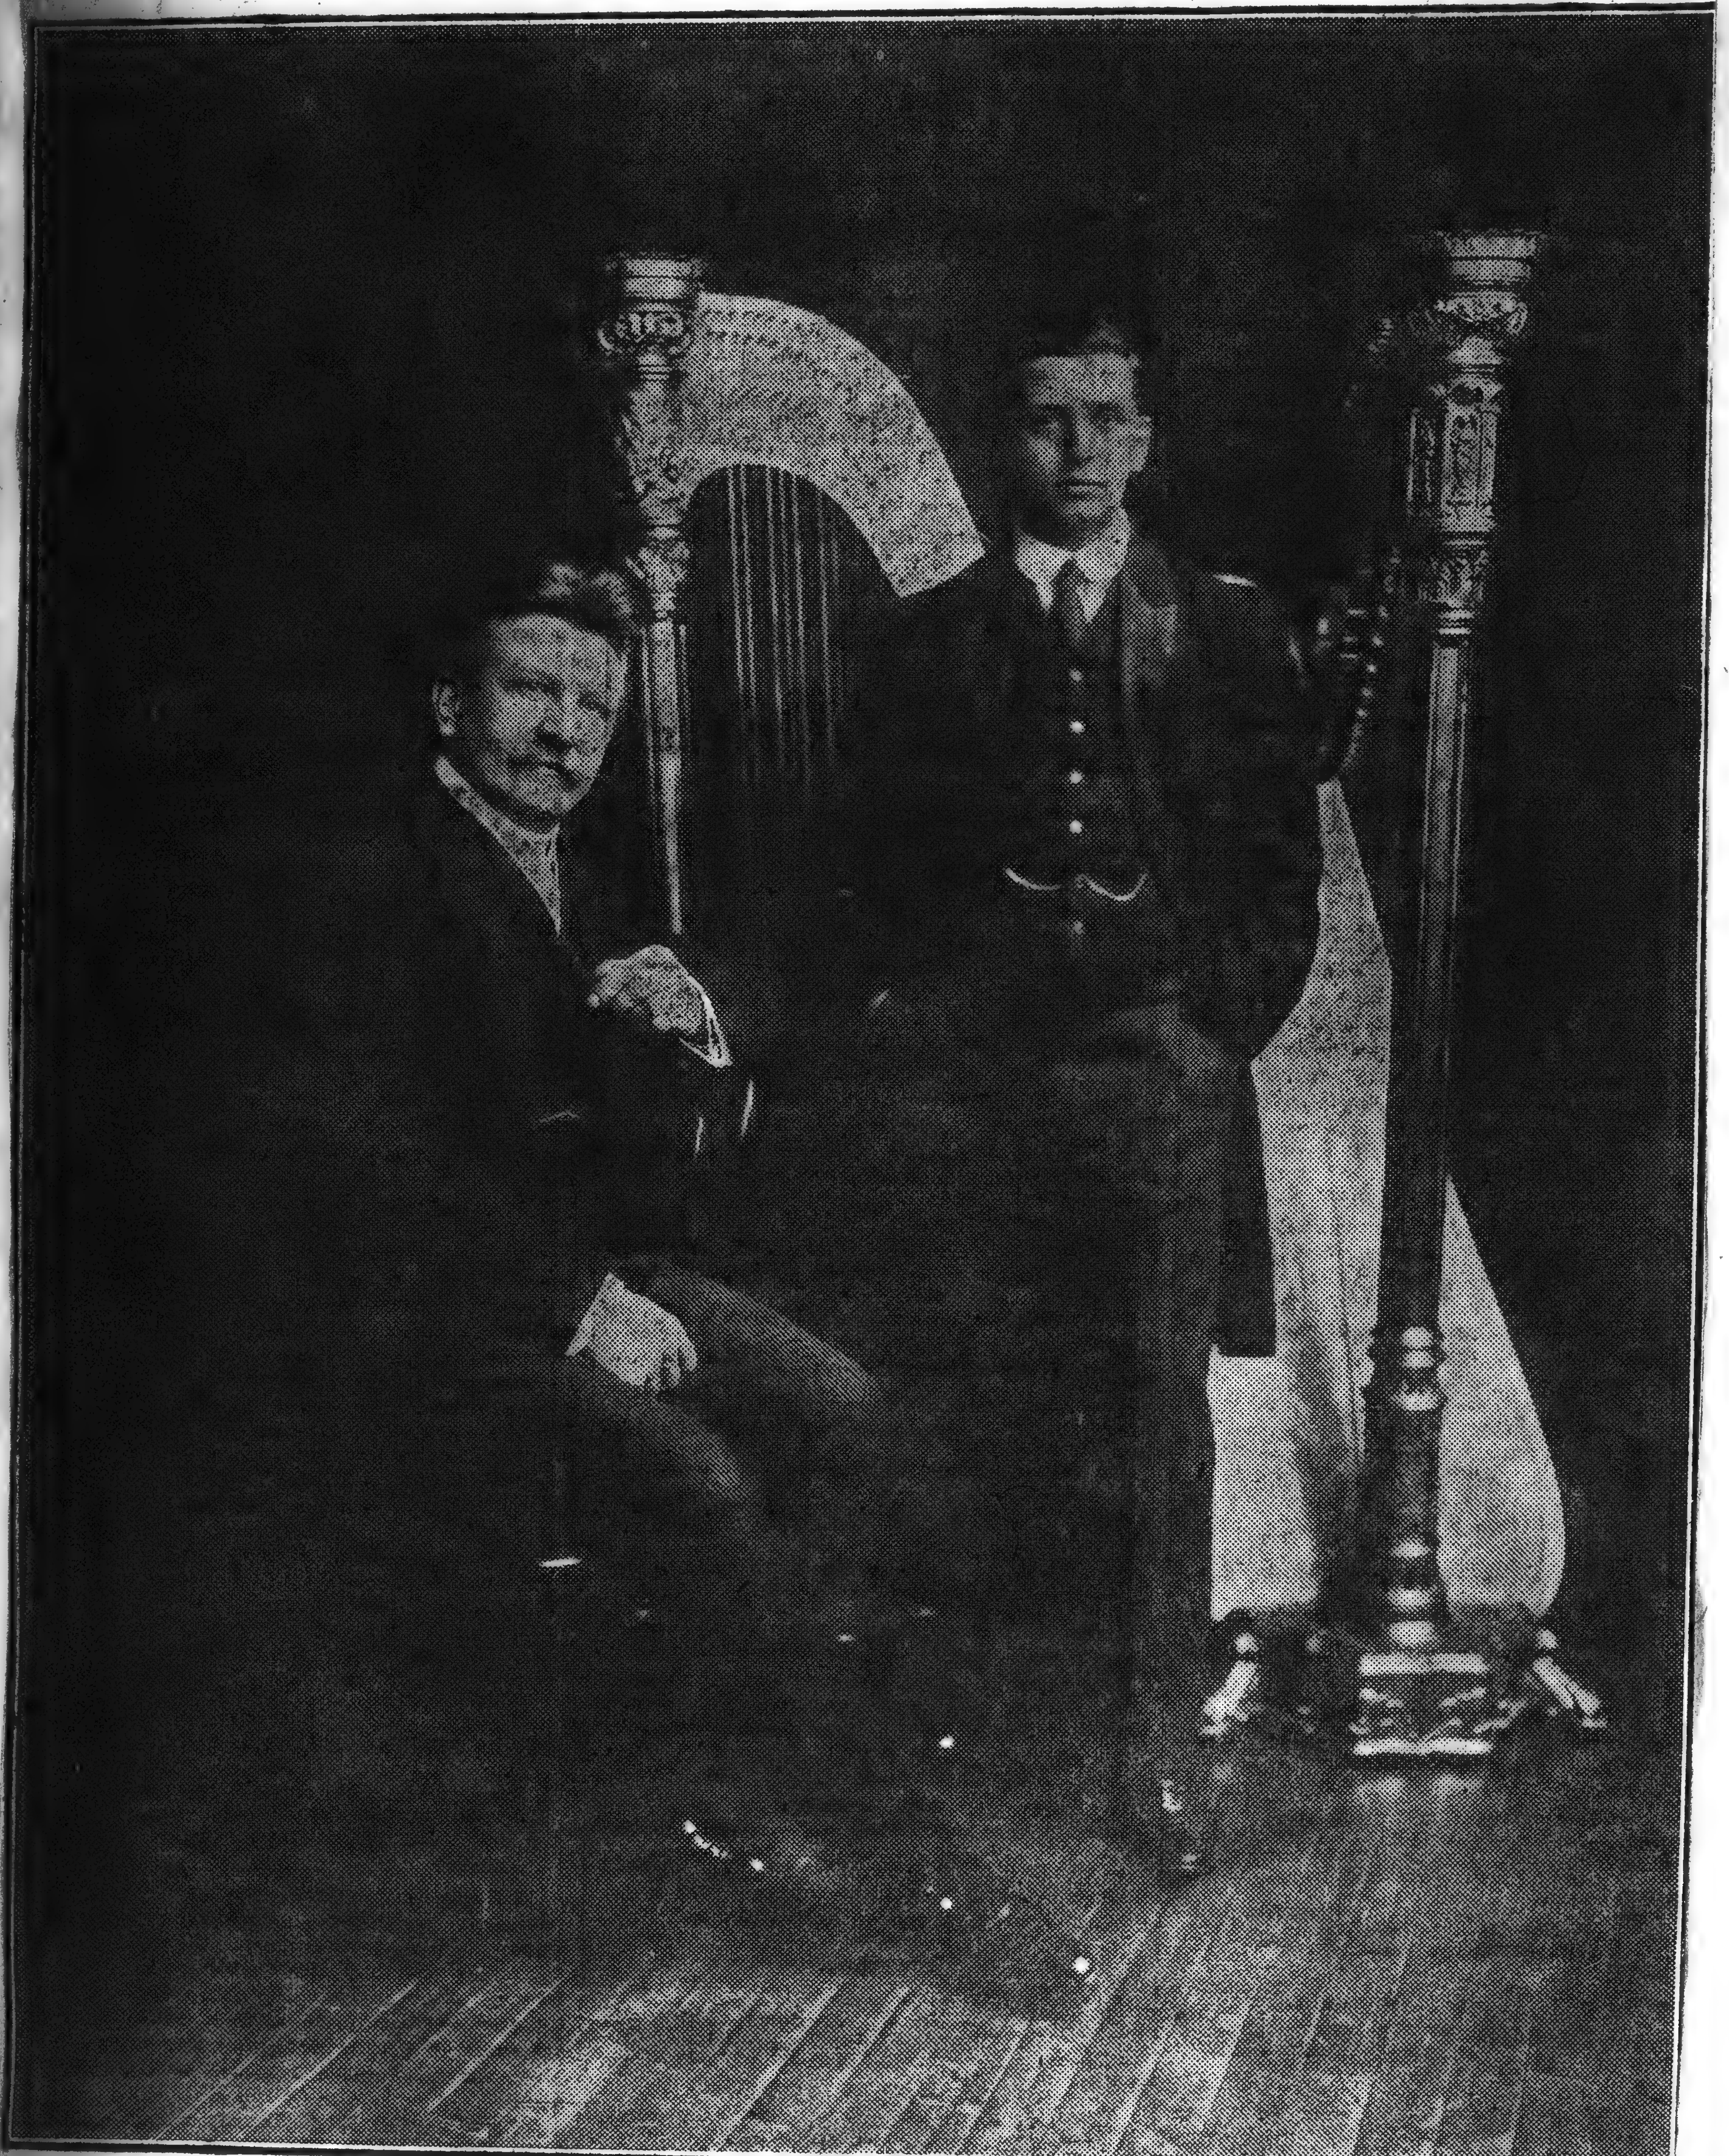
The hand of Boston's most distinguished composer still retains its cunning. "Tam o' Shanter" is generally a brilliant effort—a work that need not be applauded perfunctorily and merely out of local pride.

The orchestra was in fine form all through the concert, which, by the way, is one of the shortest of the season. Dr. Muck conducted the performance of the long absent overture to one of the Romsky-Korsakoff operas, "The Betrothed of the Tsar," and one of the monumental Strauss tone poems, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." This week's concerts are certain to be voted excellent.

The season will close next week with a striking program. Liszt's "Dante" symphony will be the first number, and in the "Purgatory" movement the "Magnificat" will be sung by a woman's chorus from the Musical Art Club, which Stephen Townsend has trained. The other numbers will be excerpts from Wagner music-dramas—the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," the funeral music from "The Dusk of the Gods" and the prelude to "Parsifal."

TRANSCRIPT
APRIL-27

Familiar Figures of the Symphony Concerts



Alfred Holy, First Harp; Thedore Cella, Second Harp

ADVERTISER
APRIL-29

BRILLIANT NEW WORK BY CHADWICK

Feature of Entirely Orchestral Program at Symphony Concert

MOST IMPORTANT SCORE IN AMERICAN REPERTOIRE

Picturesque and Dramatic Work Can Hold Its Own With Europe's Best

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Rimski-Korsakoff. "La Fiancee du Tsar." Overture.
Chadwick. "Tam o'Shanter." Ballade for Orchestra.
Strauss. "Also Sprach Zarathustra." Symphonic Poem.

An entirely orchestral concert, and entirely interesting from beginning to end. We might add, too, that it was entirely modern, but in the best modern school, without eccentricities or senseless experiments. The first work was a good example of Russian melodic beauty. The greatest promise of the new Russian school lies in the fact that it does not disdain melodic beauty, and this overture by Rimski-Korsakoff was altogether charming in its melodic grace its neat development, its brusque contrasts. It was much applauded and both musician and non-musician concurred in the favorable verdict.

In the last number of the program the supreme power of tone-coloring which the modern Germans possess was strongly in evidence, and the complexity of figure treatment which is creeping into the Teutonic music was also shown. This is all well enough when a tonal giant like Richard Strauss does the juggling, but in lesser hands this working of figures to death becomes very tiresome, and Reznicek, Reger, Bischoff, Lendvai, and others, become a heavy task for their auditors. And even Strauss is led into extremes by his skill in figure treatment, as witness his "Rosenkavalier," but generally saves himself by his skill in tone-coloring. "Zarathustra" minus its marvellous tone-coloring might be a rather boresome proposition. Nevertheless, in its brilliant scoring it is by no means dull to the trained auditor, and it was not written for the common herd.

It was a decidedly severe test for Mr. Chadwick's composition to be placed between the piquant melodies of Rimski-Korsakoff and the magnificent tone-coloring of Richard Strauss, but it came through the ordeal triumphantly. "Tam o' Shanter" is one of the most important scores in the whole American repertoire. Dr. Muck has, it seems, taken the American muse under his especial guardianship this year, and has given us native compositions both digestible and indigestible. It was a definite advance from Hill's amorous complexities of Lancelot and Guinevere, and Hadley's angels which marched into battle headed by military drums, to the bacchanalian adventure of Tam o' Shanter as narrated by Chadwick. The ballad (for thus Mr. Chadwick chooses to call it) was thoroughly dramatic, juicily humorous, and finely scored. It was a large score, too, calling for xylophone, rattle, Chinese drum, sand block, gong, and two piccolos, in addition to many other forces, the unusual instruments being employed effectively in the satanic orgie and subsequent chase.

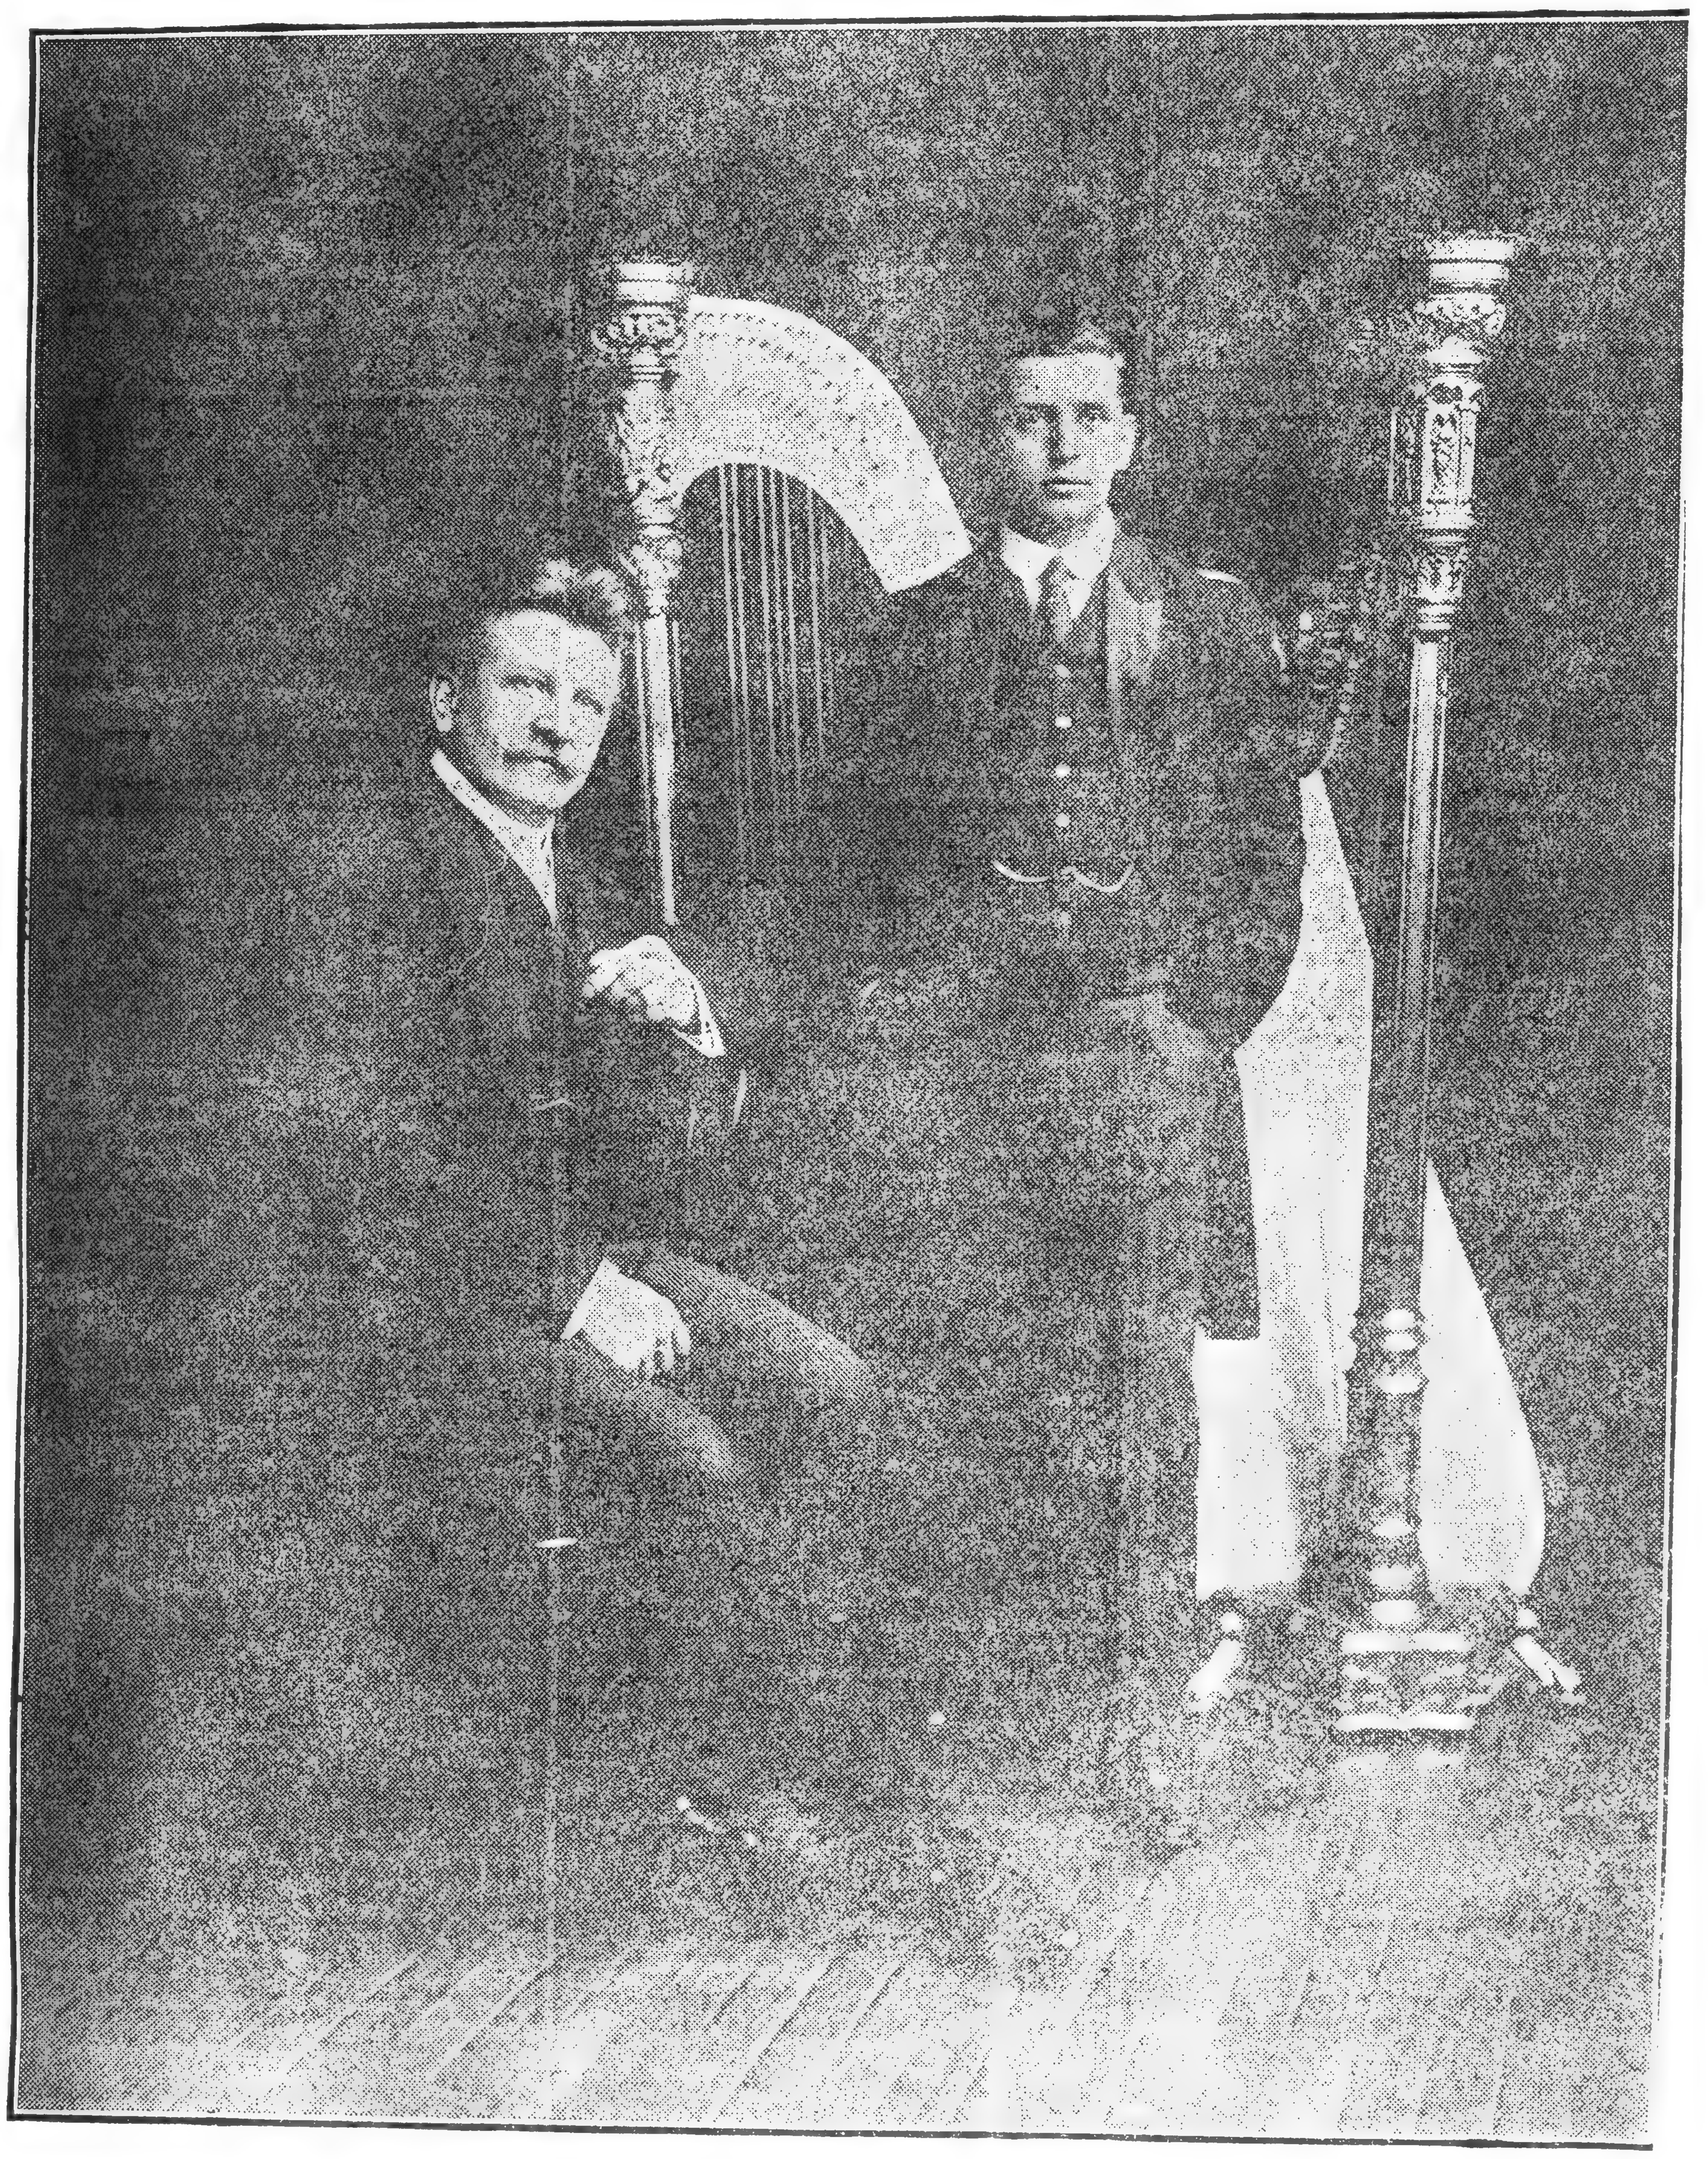
"Tam o' Shanter" is an excellent subject for musical treatment; the storm, the carousing, the witches' revelry, the audacious shout at Nannie, the sudden cessation of the dance, the wild pursuit, the escape, make a shifting panorama that is full of tonal possibilities and the composer has taken the fullest advantage of these. It is remarkable program music, and it is something more, for there are touches, especially at the end, which could be enjoyed without knowing the tale.

There are many legends about Alloway kirk in Scotland, but this summing up by Burns is the only one that is imperishable.

The work begins, like Schubert's

Transcript
April-27

Familiar Figures of the Symphony Concerts



Alfred Holy, First Harp; Thedore Cella, Second Harp

Advertiser
[illegible]-29

BRILLIANT NEW WORK BY CHADWICK

Feature of Entirely Orchestral Program at Symphony Concert

MOST IMPORTANT SCORE IN AMERICAN REPERTOIRE

Picturesque and Dramatic Work Can Hold Its Own With Europe's Best

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Rimski-Korsakoff, "[illegible]" Overture.
Chadwick, "Tam o' Shanter," Ballade for Orchestra.
Strauss, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," Symphonic Poem.

An entirely orchestral concert, and entirely interesting from beginning to end. We might also say that it was entirely modern, but of the best modern school, without eccentricities or senseless experiments. The first work was a good example of Russian melodic beauty. The greatest strength of the new Russian school lies in the fact that it does not despise melodic beauty, and this overture by Rimski-Korsakoff was altogether charming in its melodic grace, its vivid development, its brusque contrasts. It was much applauded and both musician and non-musician concurred in the favorable verdict.

In the last number of the program the supreme power of orchestration which the modern Germans possess was strongly in evidence, and the complexity of figure treatment which is creeping into the Teutonic music was also shown. This is all well enough when a tonal giant like Richard Strauss does the juggling, but in lesser hands this working of figures to death becomes very tiresome, and Reznicek, Reger, Bischoff, [illegible] and others, become a heavy load to their auditors. And even Strauss is led into extremes by his skilful figure treatment, as witness his "Rosenkavalier," but generally saves himself by his skill in tone-coloring. "Zarathustra," minus its marvellous tone-coloring might be a rather heavy proposition. Nevertheless in its brilliant scoring it is by no means [illegible] the trained auditor, and it was not written for the common herd.

It was a decidedly severe test for Mr. Chadwick's composition to be placed between the piquant melodies of Rimski-Korsakoff and the magnificent tone-coloring of Richard Strauss, but it came through the ordeal triumphantly. "Tam o' Shanter" is one of the most important scores in the whole American repertoire. Dr. Muck has, it seems, taken the American muse under his especial guardianship this year and has given us native compositions both digestible and indigestible. It was a definite advance from Hill's amorous complexities of Lancelot and Guinevere, and Hadley's angels which marched into battle headed by military drums, to the bacchanalian adventure of Tam o' Shanter as narrated by Chadwick. The ballad (for thus Mr. Chadwick chooses to call it) was thoroughly dramatic, juicily humorous, and finely scored. It was a large score, too, calling for xylophone, rattle, Chinese drum, sand block, gong, and two piccolos, in addition to many other forces, the unusual instruments being employed effectively in the satanic orgie and subsequent chase.

"Tam o' Shanter" is an excellent subject for musical treatment; the storm, the carousing, the witches' revelry, the audacious shout at Nannie, the sudden cessation of the dance, the wild pursuit, the escape, make a shifting panorama that is full of tonal possibilities and the composer has taken the fullest advantage of these. It is remarkable program music, and it is something more, for there are touches, especially at the end, which could be enjoyed without knowing the tale.

There are many legends about Alloway kirk in Scotland, but this summing up by Burns is the only one that is imperishable.

The work begins, like Schubert's

"Erlking," with the storm and the wind. Here are triplets and chromatics which give a sufficiently striking picture, while the muted horns give a baleful premonition of coming evil. Then there is an excellent contrast as Tam is pictured most comfortably drinking with the landlord and Souter Johnie. Tam's own motive, which enters here, is delightfully Gaelic, with its Scotch snap and its use of the pentatonic scale.

"The night drove on wi' songs and clatter,
And aye the ale was growing better."

The auditor can easily trace Tam's condition in the music. It is a very cosy contrast, the picture of Tam snugly ensconced in the ingle, enjoying himself, and the muttering of the storm outside, with the roll of distant thunder. Mr. Chadwick does not make Tam the "Blethering, blustering drunken blellum" that his wife calls him, but a more lovable, Rip-Van-Winkle-like character. The Scottish touches are not driven to excess but they are used very effectively at this part of the work, and, by the way, Tam's figure comes back at the end, quite sobered up, in a tender and quiet finale.

Now follows the unwilling departue and the jog-tot home as upon Maggie, the mare.

"Tam skelpit on thro' dub and mire, Despising wind and rain and fire."

The steady tromp of the mare is very graphically and clearly depicted. Trombones give a chorale-like theme at the approach to Alloway Kirk, and now comes the episode where the most spicy part of the music is naturally placed, and where all of the unusual instruments mentioned above are royally employed. This is a most fiery picture. The pizzicato mystery, as a background, upon the strings, the blatant muted horns, the entrance of Xylophone, the rattle and rasp of sand-block and the squeals of piccolos show the witches at

"Hornpipes, jigs, Strathspeys and reels" and the composer sees to it that for the next few minutes the piccolos earn their salary. Then comes Tam's audacious shout—"Weel done, cutty sark!"—(most clearly indicated), a pause and a gong stroke, quite alone, an anxious, inquiring measure, another pause, another louder gong stroke and then the chase begins.

There are many races in music. There is Wagner's racing stud in "Die Walkure," Raff's steeds driven by Frau Holle, Berlioz's black stallions in the Ride to Hades, and many others, not to speak of the pedestrian in Dvorak's "Spectre's Bride," but none call for such quick and changing contrasts as this run. And now the two piccolos scream for all they are worth as the satanic tribe rush after Tam. The gallop of Maggie, the mare, is well depicted, the final spurt is most exciting, when suddenly—a halt! The middle of the bridge is past; Maggie has lost her tail, but she and her rider are safe. Now follows a Lento Dolente passage, possibly showing that Tam's Spirituous courage has evaporated and the more earnest measures may serve to inculcate the moral with which the poem ends.

"Now wha this tale o' truth shall read,
Ilk man, and mother's son take heed,
Whene'er to drink you are inclined,
Or cutty sarks run in your mind,
Think! ye may buy the joys o'er dear
Remember Tam o'Shanter's mare."

The work is the most truly picturesque and dramatic that we can recall in the American repertoire. The large modern orchestra is handled with masterly skill by the composer, and the geniality, which is characteristic of Mr. Chadwick, extends through the entire ballad.

The work led by the composer and played by the orchestra with a full understanding of its meaning. The contrasts were finely brought out and it seemed that every auditor was "en rapport" with it, for at the end there was applause, loud and long-continued, and Mr. Chadwick, the composer-conductor was recalled three times with great enthusiasm. "Tam o' Shanter" is undoubtedly one of the very best of American works and can hold its own with the best European symphonic poems.

HERALD
-APRIL 29-

PLAY CHADWICK BALLADE UNDER AUTHOR'S BATON

Symphony Orchestra Gives Composition First Rendition in Boston—Work Illustrates Burns's "Tam o' Shanter"—Program Will Be Repeated This Evening.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Rimsky-Korsakoff, overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar,"; Chadwick, Ballade for orchestra, "Tam o' Shanter" (first time in Boston); Strauss, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

Mr. Chadwick conducted his Ballade, which, composed in 1914, was first performed at a concert of the Litchfield County Choral Union festival, held at Norfolk, Ct., June 3, 1915. Since then it has been played by the Symphony orchestras of Minneapolis and Chicago.

This Ballade must be ranked with Mr. Chadwick's more original and most characteristic compositions. He has written well for orchestra in classic and academic forms. His "Melpomene" overture has nobility and emotion; an overture that would be creditable to a composer of rank in any country. There are other works of long breath that show the workmanship of the skilled musician; but certain individual qualities, qualities that reveal a strong and peculiar personality, are to be found rather in the Scherzo of his second symphony, his "Symphonic Sketches" and "Tam o' Shanter." In these pieces there is humor that might justly be called American, a freedom of expression that is delightful recklessness, a devil-may-care spirit in the invention, and in the harmonic and orchestral expression, while at the same time these compositions are the recreations of a thoroughly grounded, well-equipped, thoughtful musician.

His latest orchestral work is in illustration of Burns's poem. Although a description of the Ballade, said to be inspired by the composer, has been printed in the program books from the start, there is no needs of a description in words for him that knows the poem. Mr. Chadwick's exposition of the various episodes is clear and unmistakable in his music. First there is the storm without the ale-house, and here as in all sections of the Ballade but one, the moderation of the composer is artistic. This storm, vividly portrayed, is not one of tragic import. There is the suggestion, however, of weather that would keep any man on any night snug by the "ingle," whether he were alone or with his souter Johnny. The Tam o' Shanter theme is a happy inspiration —a chorus in the manner of a Scotch tune that might be sung by malt worms and toss pots, brave two-handed drinkers. The beginning of the ride is deftly indicated and the "trotting figure" is not abused. The church is reached. We hear a choral theme taken from the old Scotch tune, "Martyrs," one of the tunes sung by Burns's cotter. "Compar'd with these, Italian trills are tame." A pause leads one to think of Tam astonished at the sight of the church in a blaze of light. He watches the warlochs and witches in their dances—hornpipes, jigs, strathspeys and reels. The tunes have demoniacal life; the instrumentation is appropriately fantastical. With Tam's famous applause for "Cutty-Sark," the ride is resumed with the witches in pursuit.

All this is excellent. According to the program "the music now loses its descriptive and realistic character and becomes more subjective." This epilogue seems to us too long and at times too sentimental. What is the moral as told by Burns?

Whene'er to drink you are inclin'd,
Or Cutty-Sarks run in your mind,
Think ye may buy the joys o'er dear,
Remember Tam o' Shauter's mare.

The Tam o' Shanter theme is now heard as a quiet, sustained melody. We doubt if Tam was lyrically inclined the next morning. Ten to one he had a severe katzenjammer. A little music indicating remorse—say the Tam o' Shanter theme transformed into something doleful, penitential—might better round the work. Strauss, in the prelude and epilogue of "Till Eulenspiegel," is heard saying at first "once upon a time," and at the end "Now I have told you the story," etc., but these measures are few in number.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture is of a light nature as a prelude to a grim opera dealing with treachery, love potions, poison, madness and murder. The opening section is the most striking section of the composition; the theme has character; there is a national flavor; the treatment is interesting. But the flowing second theme might have come to any writer of operettas as he was lathering his face before breakfast, and the contrapuntal tricks of the composer do not save him.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave an unusually impressive performance of Strauss's huge "machine," to quote the slang term of Parisian studios. The new 32-ft. reed in the organ enlarged the solidity of the foundation in the more majestic moments. Every member of the orchestra was an accomplished virtuoso in the ensemble. Yet in spite of the performance this tone-poem of Strauss again seemed inferior to "Don Quixote" and even "Heldenleben," far less romantic and moving than "Till," "Death and Transfiguration," and "Don Juan." There are more pages here than elsewhere that are fundamentally common, vulgar. If the fugured section "Of Science" is a joke at the expense of all knowledge, it is a dismal one, intolerably long-winded and dull.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week, the last of the season, is as follows: Liszt, "Dante" Symphony; Wagner, Prelude to "Tristam and Isolde." Funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods," Prelude to "Parsifal."

TRANSCRIPT
-APRIL 29-

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

ZARATHUSTRA AND TAM O' SHANTER MATED

A Unique Performance of Strauss's Tone-Poem That Made It Sound as a Masterpiece of Music, with Conductor, Orchestra and Audience at Utmost Pitch — The Contrasts of Mr. Chadwick's Ingenious and Amusing Ballad — His Humor Again

THOSE that sat in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon heard in "Thus Spake Zarathustra" as remarkable a performance of any music as Dr. Muck and the orchestra have ever achieved through the long association that has made the two as one. They heard also such a performance of Strauss's tone-poem as had never—it is nearly safe to say—fallen upon their ears before and may never fall upon them again. For the hour it was truly a deed of inspiration in the conductor, in the orchestra, in the audience even, since it has its share, when it is so swayed and transported, in the reactions it carries to leader and men. Whether this evening will renew the inspiration, none may say; but few that heard the performance will be quite willing to believe that there can be another like it, when the music of Strauss and all that it would impart; the conductor and the orchestra that were the transmitting and the intensifying medium; the audience, possessed for a time by a common understanding and a common emotion, were not only as one but were more also than are their ordinary selves. Once and again, since Dr. Muck has led the Symphony Orchestra and when the music in hand has invited such descent, the divine fire has descended upon a Symphony Concert. It fell again yesterday, and the breath of it melted music, performance and response into a single whole, quintessential, ideal, wordless.

The performance was remarkable, first of all, for the understanding, the imagination, the personal emotion even, with which Dr. Muck opened and imparted Strauss's music. He has known "Zarathustra" since the composer showed to him his early sketches for it; he followed it as it rose under his friend's hand to final magnitude; together the two have pored over the finished score; apart the conductor, as is his custom, has studied it long and deeply; more and more, as he freely acknowledges, it has kindled and moved him. With that penetrating and coördinating mind which in the sum of his many abilities may be Dr. Muck's finest faculty, he could stretch Strauss's great canvas, lay upon it the long lines of the tone-poem never once breaking, never once halting, through all its intricacies; hold them in unity and cumulation; set in individual clearness and mutual proportion each detail; paint the whole in the color and out of the passion that from moment to moment possessed the creating composer. The dryest analyst might have followed "Zarathustra" from the first deep measures of the organ to the unresolved dissonance of the end and found it as close, clearly and flawlessly woven as a web of the Gobelins or Beauvais. The most pedantic searcher after detail could not have missed one from the pointing hand of Dr. Muck and the pointing voices of the orchestra.

Marvellous indeed as a sheer piece of exposition in music was that fugato of the vanities of learning when scholarship would read the riddle of living—the unfolding of the musical thought; the intricate play with it; the withering of it; the upswelling of the climax wherein life lived and maybe dreamed is more puissant than all the science of the schools. Recall again, the ascending transition out of the music of the dance of joyous existence into the deep and mighty meaures of the aspiration of the night; the great climax over the sombrely booming bell as though there were naught in the world but that infinite longing, ever unfulfilled; the slow softening of the music into spiritual ecstasy out of which rises reiterated, as with the intruding dawn, the piercing questioning, more imperative and agonized at each repetition, the dark answer that none may read. A mystic and mysterious music, searching those that hear, as it sounded yesterday, and no mere vivid effect of the concert-room. And if magnificence and multiloquence were the word, remember the stirring depths, the mounting radiance, the flaming trumpets, the final flood of streaming tone that brings Zarathustra—and his music—into the world. Once more from Strauss and from the orchestra, the birth was sublime.

Yet emotion—as it seemed an intense personal emotion, be it never so controlled—bore part no less than understanding and imagination, design and divination, in this unique performance of a unique music. To the splendors of that introduction of the might of men facing the riddle of life succeed solemn measures of the religious impulse which would solve it—the Strauss of grave and meditative beauty in tones; to it followed surcharged with the poetry of tones so easy to forget in Strauss because he has also power and irony, wit and whim—music that opens the secrets of the inmost and the finest-tempered impulses of the human heart, that Strauss may write in its kind, as we have lately learned, at due moment even in a comedy of tones, no less than in an epic of the strivings and the bafflings of life; the music that beyond any other is the token and the crowning bent of his genius. It was as though Dr. Muck answering were reading out this music in the beauty that Strauss hid on the pages that bear it. Outside Franck none like it has been written in our day.

Then to the nervous passion, the restless joys, the sharp biting phrases, the racking progressions—the music of human futility as Dr. Muck made it sound, declining into the weariness of that plaintive music of the oboe, that almost stills the longing. So past the scorning of learning and the mounting passion of living and longing that floods it down and away into the first tingling measures that are to bring the rapture of the dance of joy. It is the custom to say that in spite of all his seeming exaltation in "Zarathustra," and all his cunning with his means, Strauss has here written a lapsing and even a trivial music. It did not sound so yesterday, in the intensity, especially of rhythming, with which Dr. Muck summoned that eager rapture, in his heightening of it by every device of modulation and cumulation, in the suffusing or the flashing beauty of tone that the orchestra shed upon it. Steadily the flood of exultation rose and beat, until it was still and smooth, into the great calm climax of the music of the night. Now it is divination that so discovers what lies within music that superficially may deserve the usual reproach and it is emotion that in performance so transfigures it.

Played in such inspiration, so touched by the divine fire, "Zarathustra" seemed yesterday the very masterpiece of Strauss among his tone-poems and a very masterpiece of the music of this our day, or of a day that is but a little behind us. It lacks indeed the youthful intensities, the passionate splendors of "Don Juan." There is no room in such grave matter for the wit, the whim, the irony of "Til Eulenspiegel." Only sharpness of delineation, magnificence of voice and the ringing undernote of its "Quit you like men," save "Death and Transfiguration" from the sentimental rhetoric that sets pitfalls for Mahler and Bruckner. "Don Quixote" is characterization in tones and so of explicit limitations. The "Sinfonia Domestica" is the private memoir in music of Richard Strauss, father, husband, composer, poet and genius. "Ein Heldenleben," with all its epical bigness, lacks fineness of fibre and of feeling, though it does stretch the same great canvas upon which to set forth the mysteries and the contradictions of life.

Strauss's imaginary hero conquers or withstands; but he does not read these riddles or penetrate these secrets. There is no hero in "Zarathustra," load it down with Nietzschean notes as the commentators may. There is only the great figure of mankind—a figure dear to the German imagination in all the arts—that rises out of the sublime introduction, to search out these mysteries, to solve these riddles. In him is the great longing that drives him ever and ever forward to that which he can never attain, that consoles him as everlastingly when he knows that it is unobtainable. The stream of life flows forward—faith, joys, passions, weariness, learning, as much of its vicissitude and contradiction as Strauss could well compress into a single tone-poem; floods, as it may, into joyous rapture only to rise again to the finer and deeper ecstasy of the great and sustained longing. Once more at the end the unsoluble riddle shrills and mutters; but behind, still luminous, is the great pillar of that ideal aspiration. Here surely is epic poetry of the deeper things of the universal heart, written in music with a beauty as fine and deep as they, with a power as still and strong.

The rest of the concert, as it seemed after "Zarathustra" was done and a transported audience in those tense instants of silence that more signify than rounds upon rounds of applause, had regained itself and daily reality—the rest of the concert seemed as mere vanished preluding to as marvellous and exalted an hour as the Symphony Concerts have ever known. No doubt Rimsky-Korsakov's overture to his opera, "The Betrothed of the Tsar" is an engaging piece, pleasantly savory of Russian folk-song, the composer's invention with lyric melody and his fancy and skill in light play with harmony, instrumentation and, as they seemed after "Zarathustra" other futilities of learning. No doubt Mr. Chadwick's ballad for orchestra is an ingenious and amusing piece in which the composer transparently, expertly and spiritedly delineates the successive episodes in the midnight and harried ride of Burns's "Tam o' Shanter"; makes equal play with Scottish folk-tune and hymn, his own keen sense of robust humor in music—his individualizing trait among American composers—and the constructive and decorative skill born of long experience with music-making. As truly it is of Mr. Chadwick as American in his sentimental epilogue as he has been in his free-handed tonal humors. Throughout the ballad, Mr. Chadwick is more spontaneous, fecund, inventive and individual than in many a recent and somewhat labored piece. It is good to hear Mr. Chadwick so in his sixties, even if he has written no more than a fantastic trifle that rollicks through much that contemporary dissonance and confusion of keys opens to a humorously minded composer. Had there been no "Zarathustra" in the same programme and no such wondrous performance of it, to think and to write of "Tam o' Shanter" would be easier. Misfortune, not shortcoming, effaced it. H. T. P.

From Addre
Date

Estab

TRANSCRIPT
-MAY 6-

Ending Another Year of Symphony Concerts

The Final Programme of the Season, with a Glance Backward and Forward Upon Dr. Muck and Other Matters

By H. T. P.

THE usual rites attended yesterday the final afternoon concert for the season of the Symphony Orchestra. That is to say, Symphony Hall was filled to the last seat, and when Dr. Muck came first to his place he was long and warmly applauded. Twice he sought to open the score of Liszt's Dante Symphony and turn to his men, and twice the audience bade him hear its praises for the work of the year and the personal regard as man and master in which not a few of it hold him. The applause was renewed at the close of the symphony, and was not to be stilled until the conductor had thrice returned to the stage. The fragments from Wagner's music-dramas that filled the rest of the concert were clapped beyond the usual, and when the end finally came the listeners lingered beyond ordinary wont to recall Dr. Muck again and again, to applaud him by himself and to applaud him with the orchestra, that is his image, in standing circle about him. In all this farewelling there was a clear and unusual note of personal regard for a conductor and a man who in a twelvemonth of trying circumstance has borne himself so quietly and so impeccably that the mean insinuations of baseless gossip have fallen, not upon him, but upon those that invented and repeated them.

As to German Pieces

One of those insinuations as groundless as the rest, lent a momentary interest to the long pages of statistics of the season that the final programme-book annually assembles. There and there only, is it possible to survey the twenty-four pairs of concerts in retrospect and to measure them by whatever yardstick best pleases the reader. The industrious and meticulous compiler counts his way through many tables that enumerate the pieces played, the "assisting artists," category by category, and all that sort of thing. For once, however, it is a pity that in his divisions and sub-divisions, he did not tabulate by nationality or school the composers of the music heard from week to week since last October. It is true that all this should in no wise matter to a public presumably open-minded to any and all pieces of intrinsic æsthetic interest and quietly resolved that the Symphony Concerts shall keep the catholicity of programme long one of the chief distinctions of them. On the other hand, an appreciable part of that same public has chosen to foster the notion that Dr. Muck—from motives normal to it but strange to him—has included more music from German composers in the Symphony Concerts than ever before in a single season. As a matter of fact, the percentage of "German works"—as the patois of music would call them—has been no higher than for many seasons past and lower than that of one and another year, before it was the fashion to inquire curiously and maliciously into such matters.

Moreover, in the series of concerts now ending, the proportion within these "German works" of acknowledged classics, established and unchallenged the world over—like the music of Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner—has been higher than for many a recent season. Even the purists, who like to fancy themselves at war and imitate European extremists according as their sympathies fall, agree that such pieces are "unexceptionable"—a part of what they, being fond of vague and lofty diction, like to call "the world-heritage." Per contra, outside Strauss's tone-poems, exceptionally few pieces by living German or Austrian hands have been played, partly because almost nothing that was new could be obtained from Berlin or Vienna and partly because Dr. Muck's choice happened to fall relatively seldom on such as he had in hand. "The Hunnish contamination"—to quote the exuberant rhetoricians of the cocktail hour—has been far slighter than it was in many a season before the war spread into Boston. Incredible as it may seem to many a mind over-preoccupied and warped with it, Dr. Muck, whom it closely and deeply touches, takes no thought of it when he sets to the choice of music. His concern, then, is quality and catholicity, interest and contrast and not patriotism—or even prejudice.

A Sore Need in "Soloists"

No: the valid reproaches to Dr. Muck's programmes for the year have been those traversed a few weeks ago in this place—the absence from them of music, equally distributed among French, German and Russian composers, that deserves to be heard at the Symphony Concerts, that a considerable part of the public frequenting them for their own sake is eager to hear and that the conductor strangely overlooks—pieces like d'Indy's second symphony or Debussy's "Iberia"; like Delius's tone poems or another symphony by Mahler, like Rimsky-Korsakov's "Schérazade" or Balakirev's "Thamar," all scores that lie on the shelves of the library or that are readily obtainable on this side of the sea. It is necessary now to renew the regret rather than to recall the list; but the eagerness of the younger generation in the audience and of the elder devotees of symphonic music and of the conductor himself to hear this and much other overlooked music under his hand is keener and wider-spread than perhaps Dr. Muck believes.

To look forward as well as backward discloses another shortcoming in this thirty-fifth year of the Symphony Concerts that is for the management rather than the conductor to remove. There is sore need of new blood and of young blood that has proved its quality among the "assisting artists" summoned to the concerts. Round and round they have gone year after year, with established and middle-aged "soloists" familiar and thrice familiar, diversified only by a few newcomers whose actual performance has more than once suggested that other influences than pure merit set them beside the orchestra. It is no reproach to the high abilities and high rank of Mr. Bauer, for example, to say that he might be spared for a season at the Symphony Concerts, and it is only the truth that by virtue of her past and not her present is Mme. Melba worthy of a place in them. Meanwhile the younger virtuosi, who have proved themselves by their works worthy of the severest standards of Symphony Hall are overlooked or must yield to futile and obvious protégés; while singers of equal deserts receive no call thither. It is time that the public of the Symphony Concerts heard Mr. Spalding and Mr. Zimbalist of the younger violinists and even Mr. Elman again; that it renewed acquaintance with Mme. Zeisler and listened to Mme. Leginska among the pianists; that it saw the quarrel with Mr. Hofmann composed; that it heard the voices of Miss Hempel, Miss Destinn and Mme. Gluck, of Mr. Whitehill and Mr. McCormack—say in the airs of Mozart that he sings incomparably—of this or that ripened and rising singer. True, there are virtuosi so manifold and engrossing that annually the public of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening hears them gladly—Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Kreisler and maybe Mr. Gabrilowitsch for example; but outside these the choice of "soloists" is falling gradually into a rut of the established from which it should be timely lifted. So vital an institution as the Symphony Concerts cannot afford to become routine, elderly, or the playground of occasional "pull."

The Miracle of the Orchestra

Again, if this final day of the Symphony Concerts be a sort of day of atonement, the audiences that sit week after week before them may not go quite unreproached. Not long ago, the company of the Metropolitan Opera House paid a long visit to this town. There are singers in its ranks who as musicians are veritably illiterate; there are also singers and conductors who hear and judge an orchestrra with the ears, the experience and the discrimination of connoisseurs. Since the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in New York are inaccessible to all but subscribers and since work at the Metropolitan is incessant and exacting, not a few of these expert ears and minds heard Dr. Muck and his forces in Boston for the first time. If they marvelled at the technical skill and resource of the orchestra, at the quality of its tone, at the range of its expressive voice, at its sensibility to every suggestion of music and conductor, at the rare commingling of virtuosity and vitality, of beauty and power in its playing, at the labor of preparation and re-preparation that it bestows regularly upon what would be repertory pieces anywhere else—if these connoisseurs marvelled at such perfections, they marvelled no less at the easy complaisance of a public too prone to take such superlative excellence for granted.

It is an old story that there is no symphony orchestra in Europe or in America to equal the band at Symphony Hall in the estate to which Dr. Muck has gradually raised it. In the judgment of these connoisseurs, in the judgment of many more that have a wide basis of orchestral comparison, in the weekly delight and excitement of those that hear with steadily fresh and steadily stimulated ears the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck has become almost a band of miracle, almost the band of his ideal—his seemingly impossible ideal—fulfilled by his own works and the work of men moulded and answering to him. As the evangelists tell, many that saw the miracles of the Gospels, "departed hardening their hearts." So custom and complaisance have hardened the heart of many an auditor at the Symphony Concerts to the weekly miracle wrought for six months of each year upon ear and sensibilities. The more has it been good through the season now ending to watch the audience of Friday afternoons wax in intent interest and warm applause.

The Concert of Yesterday

This miracle was wrought yesterday upon the Dante Symphony of Liszt, upon Wagner's Preludes to "Tristan" and to "Parsifal" and upon his music in "Gotterdämmerung" that glorifies the slain Siegfried. Perhaps, it was wrought the more clearly and movingly upon these excerpts of music-drama because they kindle it more finely and amply than does the comparatively halting, labored and sometimes sterile symphony to which "The Divine Comedy" stirred the elder composer. With Wagner, the tonal torrent gathering fuller and fuller from sombre tonal shallows; the tonal radiance expanding from the blackness of lament into the brilliance of apotheosis; the upswelling barbaric clangor; the heroic tonal epitome of a hero's life; the high exaltation and the white-hot power of the whole, lifted this "Trauer-Musik" for Siegfried into epic mourning and epic acclamtion. For the instant, it was as though it flooded not the hall but the world. Again in the prelude to "Parsifal," as Dr. Muck seemed to take it yesterday, he less stressed the note of anguish that recurs in the music than the note of pity and beatitude that finally soothes it; that hangs in the air, like the voice that descends upon the Eucharist of the Grail, when the last measure is done. Perhaps in zeal for that note and in spiritual comfort from it, he took the prelude at what seemed an unusually slow pace. Yet even so—and Wagner notoriously did it before him—it has seldom sounded as so remote and spiritualized music of pain, and pity, and final healing. The conductor's version of the Prelude to "Tristan" will never please those who would have it blaze with passion and dart with fate Torcanini-wise. For Dr. Muck, it is rather a music of the finest and sharpest intensities of longing and foreboding, of passion mounting and sinking into a final twlight of human impulse and human desire—a music, perhaps, of Tristan and Isolde wandering in Hades rather than in the white night of the garden or beside the crumbling battlements. Never before with the Prelude have he and the orchestra in the intensities of their tone, in the suggestion of their detail so fully attained this seeming goal.

All that such a conductor, such an orchestra and the choir of the Musical Art Club—limpid and lustrous of voice and flawless of intonation—could do with such music as Liszt's Dante Symphony, they did to the full. It was no reproach to all three, that very rarely does the symphony attain the full measure of its design and voice, whether it descends into Hell and visions Francesca and Paolo there or mounts through Purgatory into the bliss of Paradise. Even when for the instant Liszt does gain his end, the striving is so obvious, the means emphasized rather than concealed. A year ago, his Faust Symphony withstood every test of time and change; was the more eloquent for the susceptible ears fifty years of advance in such music had opened to it. Yesterday, the presumably "great phrase" of "All Hope Abandon" sounded very like the dead-and-gone rhetoric and even fustain of the romantic forties; while the tonal bliss of Purgatory seemed but an attenuated and calculated music beside that, for example, which still sings, near a century and a half old, out of the Elysian Fields of Gluck. In the manner of Gluck, Puvis has painted them for our generation; in the manner of Ary Scheffer and Kaulbach, Liszt would paint them in tones; but it seems now hollow, rhetorical, unsensitive.

Nearly as out-moded of voice are the measures of the tumults and the tortures, the remorse and the impotent memories of Liszt's Inferno. They sound big, high-pitched, frenzied even, like many a passage in Hugo's plays; they are well-declaimed; they bring a kind of picture and atmosphere by sheer exuberance of sound; yet they never bite into imagination and emotion—not even when there is a Muck to intensify them. Yet this same over-straining and over-voluble Liszt has his compensating flashes of imagination and accomplishment that for the instant burn away all else. So he still Hades for Francesca and Paolo to pass and remember in the silence; so he swarms back the tortured phantoms; and so, toward the end, the orchestra makes exalted answer to the ethereal song—if only boys' voice had sung it—of Paradise rejoicing as those that see God.

Sunday HERALD
- MAY 7th -

The 35th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra closed last night. The index published in the 24th program showed at a glance the work accomplished.

First of all, the catholic nature of the programs is seen. In the course of the season some commented carelessly on the "exclusion" of composers not Germans.

We find these French composers represented: Berlioz, 4 times; Bizet, 1; Cherubini (Italian by birth), 1; Debussy, 1; Dukas, 1; Enesco (Roumanian by birth, but long busied in Paris and associated with French music), 2; Ravel, 2; Saint-Saens, 1. Then there was a performance of Loeffler's "Mort de Tintagiles." Perhaps Mr. Loeffler prefers to be ranked with the French composers.

Nor were the Russians ignored. There were three works by Rimsky-Korsakoff and three by Tschaikowsky. (Dvorak, Liszt, Mendelssohn and Strauss received no greater attention.) Rachmaninoff was represented by his best symphonic poem; and two works by Sibelius, the Finn, were performed.

Then comes up the question of the American composer, the neglected and abused American composer, whose genius is crushed under the iron heel of foreign and despotic imported conductors, if we are to believe the wailing of certain contributors to music periodicals. Last season works by these Americans lator suite was played twice): Chadwick, Hadley, Hill, Kelley, MacDowell, Schelling. Mr. Stock, whose symphony was performed here for the first time, was born in Germany, and we do not know how he would like to be classified.

[147]

Beethoven led with seven performances; then followed Mozart five, Wagner five, Berlioz four, Brahms four; and these composers with three works, Dvorak, Liszt, Mendelssohn, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Strauss, Tschaikowsky.

The works performed for the first time at these concerts were as follows. (We give in parenthesis the date of some first performances elsewhere):

Oct. 22—Enesco: symphony in E flat major.
Nov. 12—Braunfels. Carnival overture to Hoffmann's "Princess Brambilla."
Nov. 19.—Mozart: Concertante Symphonie for violin and viola—the second and third movements for the first time.
Dec. 24—Carpenter: Suite "Adventures in a Perambulator." (Chicago, March 19, 1915; Boston by the N. Y. Symphony Orchestra, Nov. 16, 1915.)
Dec. 31—Schelling: Impressions in Form of Variations on an original theme for orchestra and piano. First performance anywhere.
Jan. 14—Kelley: Symphony No. 2, "New England." (Norfolk, Ct., June 3, 1913.)
Jan. 21—Liszt: "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne." Symphonic Poem, No. 1. Weimar, Jan. 7, 1857.)
March 10—Stojowski. Pianoforte concerto No. 2. (London, June 23, 1913.)
March 24—Hill: Symphonic Poem, "The Parting of Lancelot and Guinevere." [After Stephen Phillips.] (St. Louis, Dec. 31, 1915.)
March 31—Stock: Symphony in C minor.
April 7—Hadley: "Lucifer." Tone poem after Vondel. (Norfolk, Ct., June 2, 1914.)
April 7—Sibelius: Nocturne, Serenade and Ballade from incidental music to Paul's tragedy, "King Christian II."
April 28—Chadwick: Ballade. "Tam o'Shanter." (Norfolk, Ct., June 3, 1915.)

Braunfel's overture was hardly worth while, and it was forgotten the next day. Enesco's symphony contained interesting pages. Carpenter's suite was amusing. There were sections of pleasing fancy and genuine beauty. Probably the most durable impression made by this suite on the audience was owing to the agility of the xylophone players. Schelling's Variations—there were too many of them—showed skilful workmanship and imagination.

Kelley's symphony disappointed admiers of his other compositions. It was the example of music "made in Germany." It was more doleful than the New England it sought to portray. Liszt's symphonic poem made a profound impression. The wonder was that it had not been performed here before. Stojowski's concerto was brilliant, and, as played by Mr. Paderewski, could not fail in exciting applause. Hill's symphonic poem and Hadley's "Lucifer" are not among the more significant works of these composers. The first was a mosaic without marked continuity or salient feature; the second was feeble and at the same time bombastic. Hazlitt said of the Marquis Wellesley's speech on India affairs in 1813 that he was "soaring into mediocrity with adventurous enthusiasm, harrowed up by some plain matter-of-fact, writhing with agony under a truism, and launching a commonplace with all the fury of a thunderbolt." Stock's symphony, conspicuous for its thoughtful and elaborate workmanship, suffered from undue length. The roaring apotheosis, with a remarkable performance by Mr. Neumann of the kettledrums, aroused enthusiasm. The stage music of Sibelius was in his Finnish idiom, yet as concert music of little importance. Chadwick's "Tam o' Shanter," with its graphic pages, is fresh in the minds of all.

The soloists were as follows: Singers—Mmes. Farrar and Melba. Violinists—Messrs. Kreisler, Noack and Witek. Violoncellists—Messrs. Malkin and Warnke. Pianists—Mr. Bauer, Miss Deyo, Mr. Gabrilowitsch, Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Schelling. Organist—Mr. Marshall.

Of these soloists, five were members of the orchestra.

The success of the Boston Symphony orchestra in a season of 24 concerts (48 in all) does not depend on the number of unfamiliar compositions produced or the number of the soloists.

It should be remembered that it is not now easy to obtain the orchestral parts of comparatively new works or even the parts of old ones. (Thus it is said that no parts of Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony can be purchased at present in this country).

The soloist, as a rule, disturbs the concert. The chosen concerto or aria seldom fits in the general scheme of the program. If the soloist is a celebrated person, he or she becomes in the eyes of many the feature of the concert. What goes before the solo is heard with indifference; after the soloist leaves the platform the orchestral music, overture, rhapsody, what-not, serves as a hat-and-overcoat piece. But soloists are stil necessary to attract some to the concert hall. The attraction is probably not so potent as in former years, when the first question asked was: "Who is the soloist this afternoon?" More are now interested in the purely orchestral music. It is true that some men, as Messrs. Caruso, Kreisler, McCormack and Paderewski, would draw a crowd to a Symphony concert, no matter what the character of the orchestral music might be. There is always a huge audience for a favorite prima donna.

Dr. Muck's programs have been adversely criticised. We have shown the injustice of one reproach: that they were "exclusively" German. But it has been said that they have been strangely arranged; that inferior music has been played. Some wish that well known symphonies by Haydn should be shelved and they wonder why one should be forced to hear at regular intervals the first and second symphonies of Beethoven. There were a few programs this season that were trying; that of April 14-15 for example: Humperdinck's overture to "The Forced Marriage"; Dvorak's violin concerto; Haydn's symphony in D major; truly a program to strike terror to the stoutest soul. Such instances, however, were few, very few. If there are some that grow restive at the thought of too many orthodox compositions in good and regular standing, to quote the old formula of letters applying for membership in a sister Congregational church, there are others who denounce all "ultra-modern" pieces,

From Addre
Date

Estab

are hardly reconciled to Richard Strauss, and look on Debussy as Anti-Christ—poor Debussy who even now is becoming a classic, so swift is the march of the years, so shifting the expressive forms of music.

Any fair-minded person of a receptive nature, experienced in hearing orchestral concerts, will now remember familiar works that were made fresh and vital by the beauty of the performance. For it is not extravagant to say that the performance of the orchestra under Dr. Muck week in and week out has never been equalled in this city. Performances of this nature are in all probability not heard in any city, European or American. There may be a brilliant performance of this or that piece in Paris, Vienna, Dresden, London, Chicago, New York; but where are 24 concerts of a similar nature so conspicuous for technical perfection and supreme interpretation to be heard? These concerts in Boston are so remarkable, they have been so remarkable under the leadership of Dr. Muck, that they are now taken by too many as a matter of course.

For the Boston Symphony orchestra is not merely one that contains certain accomplished virtuosos; the orchestra is a virtuoso. It is an instrument that, having been brought to a state of perfect mechanism by Dr. Muck, responds to his imaginative and poetic wishes. He stands there calm, undemonstrative, graceful, elegant, aristocratic; a man of singularly commanding and magnetic personality even in repose. The orchestra is his speech, the expression of the composer's music as it appeals to the conductor's brain, heart and soul.

It is now hardly possible to think of this orchestra without the vision of Dr. Muck at its head as the interpreter of beauty and brilliance. Fortunate, thrice fortunate, is he in having at his command this orchestra, largely his own creation; wholly the superb interpreter of composers as he understands them, as he shares in their own emotions, confessions, declarations, griefs and longings.

HERALD
MAY 7

THE POP CONCERTS

In old Music Hall, in the spring of 1885, began the annual series of promenade concerts given by members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which soon came to be known as the Pops, and, as such, have become famous throughout the country as an institution peculiar to Boston.

The current season of Pops is the 31st and beginning tomorrow (Monday) evening, May 8, they will run through the first week of July, to Saturday evening, July 8. For the general public, the formal opening will come Tuesday evening, May 9, for the Women's City Club of Boston has taken the first night as a semi-private affair.

Messrs. Ernst Schmidt, Andre Maquarre and Clement Lenom will be the conductors; Mr. Schmidt conducting the first, third, sixth, seventh and ninth weeks; Mr. Maquarre the second, fourth and fifth weeks, and Mr. Lenom the eighth week. The orchestra will be the largest ever employed at these concerts. There will be a minimum of 75 musicians used and, on special occasions, if necessary, this number may be augmented to over 80. Practically the entire orchestra, except the leaders of the various choirs, is on call for these concerts. This fact will increase decidedly the musical value of the entertainment.

In the first week, Mr. Schmidt has arranged two special nights. Wednesday, May 10, will be Russian night, when, with the exception of three numbers, the entire program will be by Russian composers, the exceptions being pieces by Sibelius, Paderewski and Ganne. Friday night, Mr. Schmidt will devote the larger part of the program to Wagner. Monday night will be the Women's City Club night.

The program for Monday night is as follows:

Wedding March, from "A Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn
Overture, "The Sold Bride"	Smetana
Procession from "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Selection, "Madame Butterfly"	Puccini
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai
Largo	Handel
Violin, Mr. Hoffman; harp, Mr. Holy; organ, Mr. Marshall.
Intermezzo, from "The Jewels of the Madonna"	Wolf-Ferrari
Ballet music, from "Carmen"	Bizet
Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea"	Suppe
Selection, "Sweethearts"	Herbert
Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song"	Strauss
March, "The Belles of Chicago"	Sousa

The program for Tuesday night, the popular opening, is as follows:

Coronation March from "The Prophet"	Meyerbeer
Overture, "Der Freischuetz"	Weber
Indian Dance	MacDowell
Selection, "The Jewels of the Madonna."	Wolf-Ferrari
Overture, "Tannhaeuser"	Wagner
Andante, from Violoncello Concerto	Dvorak
Violoncello, Mr. Keller.
Selection from Act III. "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 1	Liszt
March, "Red-White-Blue"	Schmidt
Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea"	Suppe
Humoreske	Dvorak
American Patrol	Meacham

Moulton
-May 6-

BOSTON MUSICAL NOTES

The annual series of popular spring concerts given by members of the Boston Symphony orchestra begins Monday night and continues until Saturday, July 8. The concerts were started in old Music hall in the spring of 1885 and have been held every year since, save one. The present season, therefore, is the thirty-first. The tickets for the opening night have all been taken by the Women's City Club. Accordingly for the general public the opening will be Tuesday evening, May 9.

Ernst Schmidt, André Maquarre and Clement Lenom will be the conductors, Mr. Schmidt conducting the first, third, sixth, seventh and ninth weeks; Mr. Maquarre the second, fourth and fifth weeks, and Mr. Lenom the eighth week. The orchestra will be the largest ever employed at these concerts. There will be a minimum of 75 musicians, and, on special occasions, if necessary, this number may be augmented to over 80. Practically the entire orchestra, except the leaders of the various choirs, is on call for these concerts. The programs will run along much the same lines as the past. The music will be popular, and there will be during the course of the season nights devoted to special composers or schools.

In the first week, Mr. Schmidt has arranged two special nights. Wednesday, May 10, will be Russian night, when, with the exception of thre[illegible]bers, the entire program will be [illegible]ssian composers, the excepti[illegible]eing pieces by Sibelius, Pader[illegible] and Ganne. Friday night, Mr. [illegible]dt will devote the larger part of [illegible] program to Wagner.

The program for Monday, Women's City Club night, is as follows:

Wedding march, from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; overture, "A Sold Bride," Smetana; procession of women, from "Lohengrin," Wagner; selection, "Madam Butterfly," Puccini; overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; largo (violin, Mr. Hoffman; harp, Mr. Holy; organ, Mr. Marshall), Handel; intermezzo, from "The Jewels of the Madonna," Wolf-Ferrari; ballet music from "Carmen," Bizet; overture, "The Beautiful Galatea," Suppé; selection, "Sweethearts," Herbert; waltz, Strauss; march, "The Belles of Chicago," Sousa.

The program for Tuesday night, the popular opening, is as follows:

Coronation march from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer; overture, "Der Freischütz," Weber; Indian dance, MacDowell; selection, "The Jewels of the Madonna," Wolf-Ferrari; overture, "Tannhäuser," Wagner; andante from violoncello concerto (violoncello, Mr. Keller), Dvorak; selection from Act III., "Die Meistersinger," Wagner; Hungarian rhapsody, No. 1, Liszt; march, "Red-White-Blue," Schmidt; overture, "The Beautiful Galatea," suppé; "Humoreske," Dvorak; "American Patrol," Meacham.

LISZT-WAGNER PROGRAM ENDS SYMPHONY YEAR

SYMPHONY HALL—Twenty-fourth and last program of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of May 5: Liszt, symphony after Dante's "Divina Commedia" (chorus of women from Musical Art Club assisting); Wagner, prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," funeral music from "Götterdämmerung" and prelude to "Parsifal."

Wagner has said the farewell word at the Symphony concerts for six years in succession: Once in the triumphant pæan of the "Tannhäuser" overture; twice in the meditative, aspiring psalm of the "Parsifal" prelude; and three times in the proud and joyous song of the prelude to "Meistersinger." He may have been thus chosen to speak the parting message at the desire of the sustainer of the orchestra, or he may have been picked out because he happened to suit the plans of the two men who in turn have served as conductors; but in any case he has answered the purpose fitly. He has met the requirements of a good valedictorian, addressing hearers briefly and directly and giving them a single, easily remembered and exalted sentiment to think about.

[illegible]ll these six closing programs Wag[illegible]nay be said to have filled a part in [illegible] social ceremony. For he has had the duty of sending the Symphony subscribers away for the summer pleased with the concerts they have heard and desirous of hearing more in the autumn; and in the whole time he has never caused any doubt to arise as to his aptitude for the function. But of course he has needed help to do the thing. Help he had five years ago in Tschaikowsky, with the "Pathetic" symphony; the two following years in Brahms, with the symphony No. 1; the next year in Saint-Saëns, with the organ symphony; last year in Beethoven, with the symphony No. 5, and this year in Liszt, with the "Dante" symphony.

[illegible] way of looking at the situation, Wagner has become the official speaker of the May farewell, just as in time gone when season tickets for the Symphony concerts were sold under the hammer, a certain accomplished auctioneer became the official speaker of the October welcome. The composer in this view will be thought of as having acquired institutional standing. He will seem to be handled like a business proposition rather than like an artistic force.

That way, however, is the wrong way of looking at it. There is no mixture of business and artistic economies in the matter. The composer of the pieces that have closed recent Symphony seasons is the man to say the last word because he is the preeminently expressive writer of all those who have scored for orchestra in the century and a quarter that the technique of scoring has been mastered.

Others have had deeper insight than Wagner into form—Beethoven, for example, and Brahms; others have had abstruser notions of thematic development than he—Liszt is an instance, who preceded him on Dr. Muck's final program, and Strauss also. But no composer has ever disclosed a surer power of keeping the music saying something every moment than he, or of keeping it more consistently in the mood in which he wants it. Wagner in a way is the greatest borrower who ever composed for orchestra. Without the thematic method of Liszt, the rhythmic method of Weber, the melodic method of Schubert and the instrumental method of Beethoven to lean on, he could have done nothing. In spite of all his revolutions, he was not essentially an inventor; instead of that, he was a combiner of the best ideas in other men's inventions. And when he combined, it was always for a rich, individual and original expression. He borrowed not to dilute and degrade but to ennoble and perfect.

How Wagner completed the work which his most useful master, Liszt, blocked out, is clearly understood when selections from his music-dramas are placed, as on this program, next to the "Dante" symphony. The "Götterdämmerung" excerpt in any 20 bars has more descriptive content than all Liszt's pages on the "Inferno." In its lowest moment it is nearer to Dante's level of poetic expression than the Liszt symphony is at its highest. As for romance, who would exchange the first line of the "Tristan" prelude for the whole of Liszt's "Paolo and Francesca" episode?

The music of the twenty-fourth program was presented in the best manner of the Symphony orchestra. A well-prepared and masterfully executed reading of the works of the two leaders of mid-nineteenth century musical thinking is to be put to the credit of the conductor. Praise without stint is due the players and the assisting group of singers no less.

AMERICAN
-MAY 7-

Pop Concerts Will Begin Tomorrow

THE current season of Pops is the thirty-first. Beginning tomorrow evening, they will run through to Saturday evening, July 8. For the general public the formal opening will come Tuesday evening, the Women's City Club of Boston having taken the first night as a semi-private affair.

Ernst Schmidt, Andre Maquarre and Clement Lenom will be the conductors; Mr. Schmidt conducting the first, third, sixth, seventh and ninth weeks; Mr. Maquarre the second, fourth and fifth weeks, and Mr. Lenom the eighth week. The orchestra will be the largest ever employed at these concerts. There will be a minimum of seventy-five musicians used and, on special occasions, if necessary, this number may be augmented to over eighty.

In the first week, Mr. Schmidt has arranged two special nights. Wednesday will be Russian night. Friday night, Mr. Schmidt will devote the larger part of the program to Wagner.

The program for Monday night is:

Wedding March from "A Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn
Overture "A Sold Bride"	Smetana
Procession of Women to the Cathedral, from "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Selection, "Madame Butterfly"	Puccini
Overture, "The Marry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai
Largo	Handel
Violin, Mr. Hoffman; Harp, Mr. Holy; Organ, Mr. Marshall.
Intermezzo, from "The Jewels of the Madonna"	Wolf-Ferrari
Ballet Music, from "Carmen"	Bizet
Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea"	Suppe
Selection, "Sweethearts"	Herbert
Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song"	Strauss
March, "The Belles of Chicago"	Sousa

The program for Tuesday night, the popular opening, is:

Coronation March from "The Prophet"	Meyerbeer
[illegible]	Weber
Indian Dance	MacDowell
Selection, "The Jewels of the Madonna"	Wolf-Ferrari
Overture, "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Andante from Violoncello Concerto	Dvorak
Violoncello, Mr. Keller.
Selection from Act III., "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 1	Liszt
March, "Red-White-Blue"	Schmidt
Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea"	Suppe
"Humoreske"	Dvorak
American Patrol	Meacham

POST
-MAY 7-

THE POP CONCERTS

In the old Music Hall, in the spring of 1885, began the annual series of promenade concerts, given by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which soon came to be known as the Pops, and as such have become famous throughout the country as an institution unique in Boston. At the very beginning, they were modelled after the then famous Bilse concerts of Berlin, but soon they were modified in character, so that since that first season they have been what they are today, except today the orchestra is much larger. They have been given every season except one, when there was trouble about the license, and one season, 1900, they were given in Mechanics' Hall.

The present season of Pops is the 31st, and beginning tomorrow (Monday) evening, May 8, they will run through the first week of July to Saturday evening, July 8. For the general public the formal opening will come Tuesday evening, May 9, for the Women's City Club of Boston has taken the first night as a semi-private affair.

As already announced, Messrs. Ernst Schmidt, Andre Maquarre and Clement Lenom will be the conductors; Mr. Schmidt conducting the first, third, sixth, seventh and ninth weeks; Mr. Maquarre the second, fourth and fifth weeks, and Mr. Lenom the eighth week. The orchestra will be the largest ever employed at these concerts. There will be a minimum of 75 musicians used, and on special occasions, if necessary, this number may be augmented to over 80. Practically the entire orchestra, except the leaders of the various choirs, is on call for these concerts. This fact will increase decidedly the musical value of the entertainment.

The programmes will run along much the same lines as the past. The music will be popular, but at the same time good, and there will be during the course of the season special nights devoted to special composers or special schools.

In the first week, Mr. Schmidt has arranged two special nights. Wednesday, May 10, will be Russian night, when, with the exception of three numbers, the entire programme will be by Russian composers, the exceptions being the pieces by Sibelius, Paderewski and Ganne. Mr. Schmidt will devote the larger part of the programme to Wagner. As already announced, Monday night will be the Women's City Club night.

The programme for Monday night is as follows:

WOMEN'S CITY CLUB NIGHT.

Wedding march, from "A Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn
Overture, "A Sold Bride"	Smetana
Procession of women to the cathedral, from "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Selection, "Madama Butterfly"	Puccini
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai
"Largo"	Handel
Violin, Mr. Hoffman; harp, Mr. Holy; organ, Mr. Marshall.
Intermezzo, from "The Jewels of the Madonna"	Wolf-Ferrari
Ballet music, from "Carmen"	Bizet
Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea"	Suppe
Selection, "Sweethearts"	Herbert
Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song"	Strauss
March, "The Belles of Chicago"	Sousa

The programme for Tuesday night, the popular opening, is as follows:

Coronation march, from "The Prophet"	Meyerbeer
Overture, "Der Freischutz"	Weber
Indian Dance	MacDowell
Selection, "The Jewels of the Madonna"	Wolf-Ferrari
Overture, "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Andante from violoncello concerto	Dvorak
Violoncello, Mr. Keller.
Selection from Act 3, "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 1	Liszt
March, "Red-White-Blue"	Schmidt
Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea"	Suppe
"Humoreske"	Dvorak
"American Patrol"	Meacham

[148]

are hardly reconciled to Richard Strauss, and look on Debussy as Anti-Christ—poor Debussy who, even now, is becoming a classic, so swift is the march of the years, so shifting the expressive forms of music.

Any fair-minded person of a receptive nature, experienced in hearing orchestral concerts, will now remember familiar works that were made fresh and vital by the beauty of the performance. For it is not extravagant to say that the performance of the orchestra under Dr. Muck week in and week out has never been equalled in this city. Performances of this nature are in all probability not heard in any city, European or American. There may be a brilliant performance of this or that piece in Paris, Vienna, Dresden, London, Chicago, New York; but where are 24 concerts of a similar nature so conspicuous for technical perfection and supreme interpretation to be heard? These concerts in Boston are so remarkable, they have been so remarkable under the leadership of Dr. Muck, that they are now taken by too many as a matter of course.

For the Boston Symphony orchestra is not merely one that contains certain accomplished virtuosos; the orchestra is a virtuoso. It is an instrument that, having been brought to a state of perfect mechanism by Dr. Muck, responds to his imaginative and poetic wishes. He stands there calm, undemonstrative, graceful, elegant, aristocratic; a man of singularly commanding and magnetic personality even in repose. The orchestra is his speech, the expression of the composer's music as it appeals to the conductor's brain, heart and soul.

It is now hardly possible to think of this orchestra without the vision of Dr. Muck at its head as the interpreter of beauty and brilliance. Fortunate, thrice fortunate, is he in having at his command this orchestra, largely his own creation; wholly the superb interpreter of composers as he understands them, as he shares in their own emotions, confessions, declarations, griefs and longings.

HERALD
May 7

THE POP CONCERTS

In old Music Hall, in the spring of 1885, began the annual series of promenade concerts given by members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which soon came to be known as the Pops, and, as such, have become famous throughout the country as an institution peculiar to Boston.

The current season of Pops is the 31st and beginning tomorrow (Monday) evening, May 8, they will run through the first week of July, to Saturday evening, July 8. For the general public, the formal opening will come Tuesday evening, May 9, for the Women's City Club of Boston has taken the first night as a semi-private affair.

Messrs. Ernst Schmidt, Andre Maquarre and Clement Lenom will be the conductors; Mr. Schmidt conducting the first, third, sixth, seventh and ninth weeks; Mr. Maquarre the second, fourth and fifth weeks, and Mr. Lenom the eighth week. The orchestra will be the largest ever employed at these concerts. There will be a minimum of 75 musicians used and on special occasions, if necessary, this number may be augmented to over 80. Practically the entire orchestra, except the leaders of the various choirs, is on call for these concerts. This fact will increase decidedly the musical value of the entertainment.

In the first week, Mr. Schmidt has arranged two special nights. Wednesday, May 10, will be Russian night, when, with the exception of three numbers, the entire program will be by Russian composers, the exceptions being pieces by Sibelius, Paderewski and Ganne. Friday night, Mr. Schmidt will devote the larger part of the program to Wagner. Monday night will be the Women's City Club night.

The program for Monday night is as follows:

Wedding March, from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Overture, "The Sold Bride" .... Smetana
Procession from "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Selection, "Madame Butterfly" .... Puccini
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor" Nicolai
Largo .... Handel
Violin, Mr. Hoffman; harp, Mr. Holy; organ, Mr. Marshall.
Intermezzo, from "The Jewels of the Madonna" .... Wolf-Ferrari
Ballet music, from "Carmen" .... Bizet
Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea" ...... Suppe
Selection, "Sweethearts" .... Herbert
Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song" ..... Strauss
March, "The Belles of Chicago" .... Sousa

The program for Tuesday night, the popular opening, is as follows:

Coronation March from "The Prophet" Meyerbeer
Overture, "Der Freischuetz" .... Weber
Indian Dance .... MacDowell
Selection, "The Jewels of the Madonna." Wolf-Ferrari
Overture, "Tannhaeuser" .... Wagner
Andante, from Violoncello Concerto..... Dvorak
Violoncello, Mr. Keller.
Selection from Act III. "Die Meistersinger" .... Wagner
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 1 .... Liszt
March, "Red-White-Blue" .... Schmidt
Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea" ..... Suppe
Humoreske .... Dvorak
American Patrol .... Meacham

Monitor
-May 6-

BOSTON MUSICAL NOTES

The annual series of popular spring concerts given by members of the Boston Symphony orchestra begins Monday night and continues until Saturday, July 8. The concerts were started in old Music hall in the spring of 1885 and have been held every year since, save one. The present season, therefore, is the thirty-first. The tickets for the opening night have all been taken by the Women's City Club. Accordingly for the general public the opening will be Tuesday evening, May 9.

Ernst Schmidt, André Maquarre and Clement Lenom will be the conductors, Mr. Schmidt conducting the first, third, sixth, seventh and ninth weeks; Mr. Maquarre the second, fourth and fifth weeks, and Mr. Lenom the eighth week. The orchestra will be the largest ever employed at these concerts. There will be a minimum of 75 musicians, and, on special occasions, if necessary, this number may be augmented to over 80. Practically the entire orchestra, except the leaders of the various choirs, is on call for these concerts. The programs will run along much the same lines as the past. The music will be popular, and there will be during the course of the season nights devoted to special composers or schools.

In the first week, Mr. Schmidt has arranged two special nights. Wednesday, May 10, will be Russian night, when, with the exception of thre[redacted]bers, the entire program will be ussian composers, the exceptio eing pieces by Sibelius, Pader and Ganne. Friday night, Mr. dt will devote the larger part of program to Wagner.

The program for Monday, Women's City Club night, is as follows:

Wedding march, from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; overture, "A Sold Bride," Smetana; procession of women, from "Lohengrin," Wagner; selection, "Madam Butterfly," Puccini; overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; largo (violin, Mr. Hoffman; harp, Mr. Holy; organ, Mr. Marshall), Handel; intermezzo, from "The Jewels of the Madonna," Wolf-Ferrari; ballet music from "Carmen," Bizet; overture, "The Beautiful Galatea," Suppé; selection, "Sweethearts," Herbert; waltz, Strauss; march, "The Belles of Chicago," Sousa.

The program for Tuesday night, the popular opening, is as follows:

Coronation march from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer; overture, "Der Freischütz," Weber; Indian dance, MacDowell; selection, "The Jewels of the Madonna," Wolf-Ferrari; overture, "Tannhäuser," Wagner; andante from violoncello concerto (violoncello, Mr. Keller), Dvorak; selection from Act III., "Die Meistersinger," Wagner; Hungarian rhapsody, No. 1, Liszt; march, "Red-White-Blue," Schmidt; overture, "The Beautiful Galatea," suppé; "Humoreske," Dvorak; "American Patrol," Meacham.

LISZT-WAGNER PROGRAM ENDS SYMPHONY YEAR

SYMPHONY HALL—Twenty-fourth and last program of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of May 5: Liszt, symphony after Dante's "Divina Commedia" (chorus of women from Musical Art Club assisting); Wagner, prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," funeral music from "Götterdämmerung" and prelude to "Parsifal."

Wagner has said the farewell word at the Symphony concerts for six years in succession: Once in the triumphant pæan of the "Tannhäuser" overture; twice in the meditative, aspiring psalm of the "Parsifal" prelude; and three times in the proud and joyous song of the prelude to "Meistersinger." He may have been thus chosen to speak the parting message at the desire of the sustainer of the orchestra, or he may have been picked out because he happened to suit the plans of the two men who in turn have served as conductors; but in any case he has answered the purpose fitly. He has met the requirements of a good valedictorian, addressing hearers briefly and directly and giving them a single, easily remembered and exalted sentiment to think about.

I[redacted]ll these six closing programs Wag- may be said to have filled a part in social ceremony. For he has had the duty of sending the Symphony subscribers away for the summer pleased with the concerts they have heard and desirous of hearing more in the autumn; and in the whole time he has never caused any doubt to arise as to his aptitude for the function. But of course he has needed help to do the thing. Help he had five years ago in Tschaikowsky, with the "Pathetic" symphony; the two following years in Brahms, with the symphony No. 1; the next year in Saint-Saëns, with the organ symphony; last year in Beethoven, with the symphony No. 5, and this year in Liszt, with the "Dante" symphony.

[illegible] way of looking at the situation, Wagner has become the official speaker of the May farewell, just as in time gone, when season tickets for the Symphony concerts were sold under the hammer, a certain accomplished auctioneer became the official speaker of the October welcome. The composer in this view will be thought of as having acquired institutional standing. He will seem to be handled like a business proposition rather than like an artistic force.

That way, however, is the wrong way of looking at it. There is no mixture of business and artistic economies in the matter. The composer of the pieces that have closed recent Symphony seasons is the man to say the last word because he is the preeminently expressive writer of all those who have scored for orchestra in the century and a quarter that the technique of scoring has been mastered.

Others have had deeper insight than Wagner into form—Beethoven, for example, and Brahms; others have had abstruser notions of thematic development than he—Liszt is an instance, who preceded him on Dr. Muck's final program, and Strauss also. But no composer has ever disclosed a surer power of keeping the music saying something every moment than he, or of keeping it more consistently in the mood in which he wants it. Wagner in a way is the greatest borrower who ever composed for orchestra. Without the thematic method of Liszt, the rhythmic method of Weber, the melodic method of Schubert and the instrumental method of Beethoven to lean on, he could have done nothing. In spite of all his revolutions, he was not essentially an inventor; instead of that, he was a combiner of the best ideas in other men's inventions. And when he combined, it was always for a rich, individual and original expression. He borrowed not to dilute and degrade but to ennoble and perfect.

How Wagner completed the work which his most useful master, Liszt, blocked out, is clearly understood when selections from his music-dramas are placed, as on this program, next to the "Dante" symphony. The "Götterdämmerung" excerpt in any 20 bars has more descriptive content than all Liszt's pages on the "Inferno." In its lowest moment it is nearer to Dante's level of poetic expression than the Liszt symphony is at its highest. As for romance, who would exchange the first line of the "Tristan" prelude for the whole of Liszt's "Paolo and Francesca" episode?

The music of the twenty-fourth program was presented in the best manner of the Symphony orchestra. A well-prepared and masterfully executed reading of the works of the two leaders of mid-nineteenth century musical thinking is to be put to the credit of the conductor. Praise without stint is due the players and the assisting group of singers no less.

AMERICAN
-MAY 7-

Pop Concerts Will Begin Tomorrow

THE current season of Pops is the thirty-first. Beginning tomorrow evening, they will run through to Saturday evening, July 8. For the general public the formal opening will come Tuesday evening, the Women's City Club of Boston having taken the first night as a semi-private affair.

Ernst Schmidt, Andre Maquarre and Clement Lenom will be the conductors; Mr. Schmidt conducting the first, third, sixth, seventh and ninth weeks; Mr. Maquarre the second, fourth and fifth weeks, and Mr. Lenom the eighth week. The orchestra will be the largest ever employed at these concerts. There will be a minimum of seventy-five musicians used and, on special occasions, if necessary, this number may be augmented to over eighty.

In the first week, Mr. Schmidt has arranged two special nights. Wednesday will be Russian night. Friday night, Mr. Schmidt will devote the larger part of the program to Wagner.

The program for Monday night is:

Wedding March from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Overture "A Sold Bride" .... Smetana
Procession of Women to the Cathedral, from "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Selection, "Madame Butterfly" ...... Puccini
Overture, "The Marry Wives of Windsor" .... Nicolai
Largo .... Handel
Violin, Mr. Hoffman; Harp, Mr. Holy; Organ, Mr. Marshall.
Intermezzo, from "The Jewels of the Madonna" .... Wolf-Ferrari
Ballet Music, from "Carmen" .... Bizet
Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea" ..... Suppe
Selection, "Sweethearts" .... Herbert
Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song" .... Strauss
March, "The Belles of Chicago" .... Sousa

The program for Tuesday night, the popular opening, is:

Coronation March from "The Prophet" Meyerbeer
Weber
Indian Dance .... MacDowell
Selection, "The Jewels of the Madonna" Wolf-Ferrari
Overture, "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Andante from Violoncello Concerto..Dvorak
Violoncello, Mr. Keller.
Selection from Act III., "Die Meistersinger" .... Wagner
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 1 .... Liszt
March, "Red-White-Blue" .... Schmidt
Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea" ..... Suppe
"Humoreske" .... Dvorak
American Patrol .... Meacham

POST
-MAY 7-

THE POP CONCERTS

In the old Music Hall, in the spring of 1885, began the annual series of promenade concerts, given by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which soon came to be known as the Pops, and as such have become famous throughout the country as an institution unique in Boston. At the very beginning, they were modelled after the then famous Bilse concerts of Berlin, but soon they were modified in character, so that since that first season they have been what they are today, except today the orchestra is much larger. They have been given every season except one, when there was trouble about the license, and one season, 1900, they were given in Mechanics' Hall.

The present season of Pops is the 31st, and beginning tomorrow (Monday) evening, May 8, they will run through the first week of July to Saturday evening, July 8. For the general public the formal opening will come Tuesday evening, May 9, for the Women's City Club of Boston has taken the first night as a semi-private affair.

As already announced, Messrs. Ernst Schmidt, Andre Maquarre and Clement Lenom will be the conductors; Mr. Schmidt conducting the first, third, sixth, seventh and ninth weeks; Mr. Maquarre the second, fourth and fifth weeks, and Mr. Lenom the eighth week. The orchestra will be the largest ever employed at these concerts. There will be a minimum of 75 musicians used, and on special occasions, if necessary, this number may be augmented to over 80. Practically the entire orchestra, except the leaders of the various choirs, is on call for these concerts. This fact will increase decidedly the musical value of the entertainment.

The programmes will run along much the same lines as the past. The music will be popular, but at the same time good, and there will be during the course of the season special nights devoted to special composers or special schools.

In the first week, Mr. Schmidt has arranged two special nights. Wednesday, May 10, will be Russian night, when, with the exception of three numbers, the entire programme will be by Russian composers, the exceptions being the pieces by Sibelius, Paderewski and Ganne. Mr. Schmidt will devote the larger part of the programme to Wagner. As already announced, Monday night will be the Women's City Club night.

The programme for Monday night is as follows:

WOMEN'S CITY CLUB NIGHT.

Wedding march, from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Overture, "A Sold Bride" .... Smetana
Procession of women to the cathedral, from "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Selection, "Madama Butterfly" .... Puccini
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .... Nicolai
"Largo" .... Handel
Violin, Mr. Hoffman; harp, Mr. Holy; organ, Mr. Marshall.
Intermezzo, from "The Jewels of the Madonna" .... Wolf-Ferrari
Ballet music, from "Carmen" .... Bizet
Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea" .... Suppe
Selection, "Sweethearts" .... Herbert
Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song" .... Strauss
March, "The Belles of Chicago" .... Sousa

The programme for Tuesday night, the popular opening, is as follows:

Coronation march, from "The Prophet".. Meyerbeer
Overture, "Der Freischutz" .... Weber
Indian Dance .... MacDowell
Selection, "The Jewels of the Madonna" Wolf-Ferrari
Overture, "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Andante from violoncello concerto..... Dvorak
Violoncello, Mr. Keller.
Selection from Act 3, "Die Meistersinger" Wagner
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 1 .... Liszt
March, "Red-White-Blue" .... Schmidt
Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea" .... Suppe
"Humoreske" .... Dvorak
"American Patrol" .... Meacham

[148]

From Addre
Date
Estab

Post
- May 7 -

Pop Concerts Commence

Boston Symphony Season Has Brilliant Conclusion—Falling Off in Musical Importations Due to War—What American Composers Are Doing—Other Timely Music News

The Boston Symphony season of 1916-17 came to an end yesterday evening, with a notable performance of Liszt's "Faust" symphony and of Wagnerian excerpts. Tomorrow night, or for the public on Tuesday night, the Pop concerts commence. The musical season, now virtually at an end, has been a very rich one in performances and an unusually poor one in new works of interest. We have, for one thing, fallen off in our musical imports during war-time, as we shall doubtless continue to do in the immediate future, and for the other thing, conductors and opera companies have not shown particular enterprise in ransacking the libraries and music stores for interesting new works, all ready in existence and on sale.

Saying this, we can hear the American composer making his plaint, in spite of Dr. Muck's well-intended activities in his behalf; but the sad fact remains, that American composition up to the present time consists in those compositions of the older generation which are after European models, and are becoming rapidly outmoded, though often performed, and in their work the younger men have as yet for a majority shown little ability or conviction or seriousness in preparing themselves to strike out in new paths. The only two of these younger men who seem to us to deserve extended recognition are Henry F. Gilbert and John Alden Carpenter. Mr. Gilbert is the only American composer in the knowledge of the writer who has said things thoroughly beautifully and eloquently, and things that are American in the most fundamental are artistic sense of the word.

For the rest, even Mr. Carpenter, they are still imitating Europe, either in an inefficient or uninspired manner. Therefore the American composer has still to look within instead of without for his success, and he has as yet attained no particular right to complain because he is not given frequent performance.

The reason that such Americans as George W. Chadwick—the only composer of the older group who has struck at all the racial note—Horatio Parker, Arthur Foote, F. S. Converse and a number of others have their works performed constantly is that technically, at least, their works stand examination and make their effect in performance. It is not because of "pull" or "influence" or anything else of the kind that the older group of composers have attained their present position before the public. They now undoubtedly enjoy advantages of reputation, in many cases, of social position and of the most influential musical connections which do facilitate the productions of their works.

But how did they get this far? They were not born with golden spoons in their mouths and the twelve fairies of fortune about their cradles. They gained ground steadily because of solid acquirements as composers. If their productions seem smug or conventional or old-fashioned to younger men—as many of them do—the thing for the young man to do is to shut his mouth and learn his trade. When he can produce something as good in its workmanship—not necesarily similar in its workmanship, for no one wants to see art go on in its beaten track—but as solid in its facture, then let him raise his banner and make trouble for the old guard. But until he can do this he is wasting his time fighting windmills.

Even Mr. Gilbert has not, in our opinion, a technic nearly equal to the technic of the older group of composers. It is our personal impression that more than once, with exceptionally virile and poetic ideas, he finds himself cramped for a word; nevertheless, he has evolved a style unmistakably his own, a style which for character, raciness and in individuality has no parallel among the men of his own generation in this country. And inevitably he is going through the struggle that every new and substantial talent encounters in gaining recognition.

It is only logical and only to be expected that the unconventionality of his works, their disdain of what is smug and parochial, their virility and imaginative quality, should encounter misunderstanding and opposition on many sides. But they are making their way, because, in the first place, Mr. Gilbert has something to say, and in the second place, he is far more concerned with writing a few good pages of music before he dies than with making propoganda for self and country, or rather parish, as so many of his colleagues still persist in doing. The best talk about music, as Mr. Martin Loeffler once remarked to us, is music. That is what Mr. Gilbert is doing most of the time. When he does talk, or write, he does so with fully digested views and conclusions, which may be wrong, but are his and are the expression of his artistic life. Would that others would forsake front pages of periodicals and do as much real work for the cause as he.

But we wander. The past season, we said, has been rich in performances and poor in new productions. The nummultiplicity of concerts and new virtuosi has been due, of course, to the European war. What the conditions will be in the year to come, where the hunted artist, athirst for engagements and audiences and money, will hide his head, it is hard to tell. But during the season past there has been the unusual condition of an exceptional crop of visiting artists, and a public exceptionally willing to pay for their services. Piano houses acknowledge their busiest season in history in the activities of concertizing exponents. Opera seasons have gone, on the whole, well. Of course the usual ridiculous thing befell in Boston when the Metropolitan opera season was well patronized, while Mme. Pavlowa's season last fall was miserably neglected. But that is as yet the case in every American city, and musicians, critics and composers must continue to pull together, and do what they can to persuade the people that Mr. Caruso may sing in anything but an artistic manner, and that a performance of "Pelleas et Melisande" means more to the soul than this gifted song bird trilling forth his roulades as the Governor of Boston.

Occasionally a pianist has ventured something new. The opera company of Mme. Pavlowa revived Auber's "Masaniello," which was not worth a great deal. Next season they purpose to revive, among other operas, Rubinstein's "Demon," which is not worth any more. The Metropolitan Opera Company gave four new operas, and two of them were eminently worth while—"Boris Godunoff" and Strauss' "Rosenkavalier." Dr. Muck's programmes have obtained a few novelties, many of them by young American composers, but most of these were of negligible importance. Indeed, the only American novelty produced in the last two seasons by this orchestra which was at all worth while was Mr. Carpenter's suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," more attractive, it is true, by reason of its maturity of style and its resource of workmanship than because of deep intrinsic originality, but nevertheless music to be accorded the highest respect for the musicianly accomplishment which it reveals and the modesty, if that may be used, with which the composer expresses himself. If the war will promote fresher musical ideas in Europe, and more fundamental love and understanding and production of good music in this country, something, at least, may rise from its ruins.

Sunday
= May 7 -

"Pop" Concerts Begin This Week in Symphony Hall

In old Music Hall, in the Spring of 1885, began the annual series of Promenade Concerts given by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which soon came to be known as the "Pops," and, as such, have become famous throughout the country. At the beginning they were modeled after the then famous Bilse concerts of Berlin, but soon they were modified in character so that, since the first season, they have been what they are today, except today the orchestra is much larger. They have been given every season, except one, when there was trouble about the license, and one season, 1900, they were given in Mechanic's Hall.

The current season of "Pops" is the 31st, and beginning tomorrow evening, May 8, they will run through the first week of July to Saturday evening, July 8. For the general public, the formal opening will come next Tuesday evening, for the Women's City Club of Boston has taken the first night as a semi-private affair.

Messrs Ernst Schmidt, Andre Maquarre and Clement Lenom will be the conductors, Mr Schmidt conducting the first, third, sixth, seventh and ninth weeks; Mr Maquarre the second, fourth and fifth weeks, and Mr Lenom the eighth week. The orchestra will be the largest ever employed at these concerts.

There will be a minimum of 75 musicians used and, on special occasions, if necessary, this number may be augmented to over 80. Practically the entire orchestra, except the leaders of the various choirs, is on call for these concerts. This fact will increase decidedly the musical value of the entertainment.

The program will run along much the same lines as the past. The music will be popular, but, at the same time good, and there will be during the course of the season special nights devoted to special composers or special schools.

In the first week Mr Schmidt has arranged two special nights. Wednesday, May 10, will be Russian Night, when, with the exception of three numbers, the entire program will be by Russian composers, the exceptions being pieces by Sibelius, Paderewski and Ganne. Friday night Mr Schmidt will devote the larger part of the program to Wagner.

The program for the public opening Tuesday evening is as follows:

Coronation March from The Prophet..Meyerbeer
Overture, Der Freischutz..............Weber
Indian dance......................MacDowell
Selection, The Jewels of the Madonna......
Wolf-Ferrari
Overture, Tannhauser..................Wagner
Andante, from cello concerto..........Dvorak
Cello, Mr Keller

Concert Season Review

As begins and ends the 24 pairs of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, so is measured the concert season. More recitals by singers, pianists, fiddlers have been given than any preceding year. Many of them have been new. Some bear the proofs of true distinction. Any season bringing a Povla Frisch, an Eddy Brown, a Guiomar Novaes for the first time would be one to mark in the record.

Of the new orchestral music heard, there were three symphonies—by Georges Enesco, Stillman-Kelley and Frederick Stock. Mr Kelley's music of New England depicted character with sincerity and feeling if not with the epic force of genius. Mr Stock sailed along impressively for two movements, but on a grandiose scale which ran aground in the two which followed.

Of the symphonic poems, Mr Chadwick's "Tam O' Shanter," in rollicking humor and reverie, made a strong impression at the concerts. Mr Schelling's "Impressions" paid the orchestra the compliment of dedication and displayed its vertuosity. Mr Carpenter's perambulator suite is one of the most imaginative, graceful American scores that have appeared. Liszt's exhumed symphonic poem "Ce Qu'on Entend sur la Montagne," showed again the prophetic vision of the great Hungarian and the debt the modern programists owe him. Reger's variations and fugue in a Mozartian theme, must not be forgotten as the sign of a new perception and artistic restraint.

In the performance of these Dr Muck again made known to this public the force of his genius is disciplinarian in preparation, and as an interpreter of remarkably blended mentality and imagination. The orchestra remains, even increases under his hand, as an instrument of euphony, eloquence, poetic beauty.

Of the choral works, d'Indy's youthful "Song of the Bell" is still fresh in mind, Mr Townsend, with commendable initiative, introduced new works with his Boston Choral Society, of which Carissimi's "Jeptha," and Wolf Ferrari's "Sacred Mystery" would invite further acquaintance. From the chamber music played, Stawinsky's technically brilliant and highly imaginative little pieces for quartet leave stimulating memory. Sibelius' quartet is music of a vividly pictorial and emotional quality, which was not fully revealed in performance.

Music played for the first time in Boston during the year follows under the names of the composer. B S O stands for Boston Symphony Orchestra:

Amani—Orientale, Copeland recital, Jan 22, Jordan Hall.

Balakireff—"Thamara"; ballet, Feb 9.

Braunfels—Carnival overture, B. S. O., Nov 12.

Carpenter—Adventures in a Perambulator, N. Y. Symph Orch, Nov 16.

Casella—Sonata, op. 6, 'cello and piano, Casals and Deyo, March 15.

Chadwick—Tam o' Shanter, B. S. O., April 28.

Colburn, S. C.—Valse, March 1, Hans Ebell, piano recital.

Debussy—Six Antique Epigraphs, Copeland recital, Jan 22; sonata, 'cello and piano, Casals and Deyo, March 15.

Delius—A Dance Rhapsody, Minneapolis Orch, Feb 24.

Enesco—Symphony in E flat major, B. S. O., Oct 22; Variations for two pianos, op. 5, Longy Club, Mlle Longy and Mr de Voto, Jan 20.

Engel—Le bon vieux temps, Ebell, piano recital, March 1.

Grainger—Walking Tune, recital with Melba, Jan 17; The Leprechaun's Dance, recital with Melba, Jan 17.

Granados—Spanish Dance, Copeland recital, Jan 22.

Grovlez—Sicilienne and Menuet, Mrs Hall's concert, March 21, Jordan Hall.

Hadley—Lucifer, op. 66, B. S. O., April 7.

Heilman—The Prism in the Sun, Ebell recital, March 1.

Hill—"The Parting of Launcelot and Guinevere," op. 22, B. S. O., March 24.

Holbrooke—Sextet, No. 3, op. 33, Longy Club, March 9.

D'Indy—"The Song of the Bell," Cecilia Society, Chalmers Clifton conductor, May 4.

Juon—Bizarrerie, Douleur and Obstination from Six Silhouettes, for two violins and piano, Mr and Mrs Ondricek and Mr de Voto, Oct 28; Rhapsodie, op. 37, for piano, violin, viola and 'cello, Hoffman Quartet and Mr Ebell, Feb 23.

Kelley—New England Symphony, No. 2, B flat minor, op. 33, B. S. O.

Liszt—Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne symphonic poem, No. 1, B. S. O., Jan 21.

Moszkowski—Suite for two violins and piano, Mr and Mrs Ondricek, Mr de Voto, Oct 28.

Moussorgsky-Trepak and Chef d'Armee, Martha Atwood-Baker, recital, April 28.

Mozart—Concertante Symphonie for violin and viola, B. S. O., Nov 19.

Ornstein—Song, "Mother o' Mine," song recital, Jos. Ecker, March 2. See Ornstein under pianists.

Piatt—Violin and piano sonata, B minor, Keller-Wille recital, May 1.

Rachmaninoff—Hungarian Dance, for violin, Mr Ondricek, Oct 28; second piano sonata, Ebell recital, March 1.

Reger—Variations and Fugue on theme by Mozart, N. Y. Phil Orch, Nov 7.

Schelling—Impressions in form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Piano, B. S. O., Dec 31 (first performance).

Sibelius—Quartet, D minor, op. 56, Kneisel Quartet, Jan 4.

Sonetana—Bohemian Dance for violin from "The Sold Bride," Mr Ondricek and Mr de Voto, Oct 28.

Smith—Quartet, A major, op. 37, Kneisel Quartet, Nov 30.

Steinert—Prelude for piano, Ebell recital, March 1.

Stock—Symphony in C minor, op. 18, March 31.

Stojowski—Piano concerto, No. 2, op. 32, Mr Paderewski and B. S. O., March 10.

Strawinsky—"Three Pieces for Quartet," Flonzaley Quartet, Dec 2; "The Bird of Fire," ballet, Jan 31; "Pelrouchka," ballet, Feb 4.

Suk—Quasi Ballata Appassionata, from Four Compositions for violin and piano, Mr Ondricek, Oct 28.

Turina—A Los Toros, Copeland recital, Jan 22.

Woolett—Octuor and Dansas Paiennes, Mrs Hall's concert, March 21.

The following singers have appeared during the season on these dates for the first time in Boston. M. O. C. stands for Metropolitan Opera Company; C. P. M. stands for Copley-Plaza musicales; P. O. C. stands for the Pavlowa Opera Company; J. H. stands for Jordan Hall and S. H. for Steinert Hall.

Arkadij, Anne—Recital, J. H., Dec 1.

Alexander, Caroline Hudson—First time here in recital, J. H., Nov 29.

D'Arnalle, Vernon—C. P. M., Nov 15.

Axman, Gladys—Recital, S. H., Nov 18.

Barrientos, Maria — M. O. C., "Lucia," April 6.

Carson, Mary—Gretel, P. O. C., Dec 11.

Clark, Marian—Joint recital, with Miguel Llobet, guitarist, S. H., April 26.

Coudert, Clarisse—With Amato, Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, Nov 28.

Dostal, George—Tremont Temple, March 18.

Dresser, Marcia Van—Recital, J. H., March 18.

Dunlap, Marguerite—Tremont Temple, with Miuri and Baklanoff, Jan 14.

Ecker, Joseph—Recital, J. H., March 2.

Frisch, Povla—Recital, J. H., Dec 15.

Glenn, Wilfred—Handel and Haydn, Mozart Requiem, Walpurgis Night, Feb 27.

Graveure, Louis—First time here in recital, J. H., Nov 8.

Green, Marion—Voice of Christ, The Beatitudes, Cecilia Society, Dec 16.

(Harrod, James—Verdi's Requiem, People's Choral Union, April 30).

Hinkle, Florence—First individual recital, J. H., Nov [illegible]

[illegible]—C. P. M., Jan 3.

Kaiser, Marie—"Judas Maccabaeus," Handel and Haydn, April 23.

Kingston, Morgan—First time here in concert, April 23, as above.

Kousnezoff, Marie—C. P. M., Jan 31.

Kurt, Melanie—M. O. C., Isolda, April 6.

Linden, Einar—C. P. M., Dec 27.

De Luca—M. O. C., Marcello, "La Boheme," April 4.

Miura, Tamaki—P. O. C., Mme Butterfly, Nov 17.

Miura, Tamaki—First time here in concert, Tremont Temple, Jan 14.

Ober, Margarete—M. O. C., Ortrud in "Lohengrin," April 8.

Parker, Robert—With Melba, Symphony Hall, Oct 17.

Peterson, May—C. P. M., Dec 27.

Piersol, Marie Ladue—Apollo Club, March 7.

Reimer, Paul—C. P. M., Nov 22.

Roberts, Emma—First individual recital, S. H., Feb 13.

Rogers, Calista—Recital, S. H., Jan 27.

Russian Cathedral Choir—Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Feb 11.

Scheider, May—P. O. C., Micaela, "Carmen," Nov 16.

Sembach, Johannes—C. P. M., Nov 1 (Siegfried, Harvard Stadium, June 4).

Shaun, Jose—Recital, S. H., Nov 18.

Snelling, Lillia—Tremont Temple, Feb 3.

Torpadie, Greta—C. P. M., Dec 27.

Traveler
May 6 -

SYMPHONY CLOSES SEASON BRILLIANTLY

An exceptionally interesting program in which the orchestra fully sustained its great reputation brought the Friday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to a brilliant close yesterday afternoon. While the concert will be repeated tonight, that of yesterday was the close of the season for the Friday afternoon patrons. Dr. Muck was given a noticeably cordial reception and not an opportunity was lost during the concert or at its close by the audience to show its appreciation of his efforts in its behalf.

The concert feature was the Liszt Symphony after Dante's "Divina Commedia," in which the women's chorus of the Musical Art Club participated. One could well imagine more being made of the opportunity than Liszt has done, but one could scarcely imagine a better presentation than that afforded yesterday afternoon. It fully merited the exceptional enthusiasm of the audience. The women's voices were decidedly pleasing.

Then followed three Wagner numbers: Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," Funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods" and Prelude to "Parsifal." In these, Dr. Muck and his players were, as ever, right in their element.

Transcript
- May 13

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The New Scales of Fixed Prices Announced and the "Assisting Artists" for Next Season Made Known—A Longer and a Freshened List

A COMMUNIQUE from Symphony Hall to the morning newspapers announces the prices for seats and the "assisting artists" for the Symphony Concerts of next season. Briefly summarized, it enumerates the prices for tickets, under the new method of fixed charges and annual renewal of subscriptions, as $60, $48, $36 and $24 for the concerts of Friday afternoons and $60, $48, $36, $24 and $15 for the concerts of Saturday evenings. As hitherto, the seats in the second balcony for the concerts of Friday will not be included in the subscription but will be sold at the door each afternoon at twenty-five cents per place. By differences in the number of seats to be sold at the various prices, the average cost of tickets for the afternoon concerts will be higher than the average cost of tickets for the evening concerts. Thus for Fridays most of the places in the centre of the hall in front of the broad aisle will be sold at $60, whereas only relatively few of them will be priced so high for Saturdays. The lowest price of tickets for the concerts of Friday is $24; for the concerts of Saturday, $15, at which terms all the seats in the second balcony outside the first row will be sold. Moreover, some 500 seats on the floor of the hall, back of the broad aisle, will be marked at $24 for the concerts of Saturday evenings. Thus, presumably, the management hopes to increase the numbers of the audience and widen the public for the concerts of Saturday evenings, while it makes the most of the established vogue of the concerts of Friday afternoon. Circular letters announcing these prices and indicating the division of places for each series of concerts have been sent to all those who registered their seats last March as a preliminary to the renewal of subscriptions. Up to June 1, the recipients may make their subscriptions for next season, but they may pay for them at any time before Sept. 2. Seats not taken by subscription before June 1 will be available to the general public.

Dr. Muck will, of course, be the conductor of the orchestra and the concerts next season, the final year of his present contract. More "assisting artists" have been engaged than for many winters past and the list bears many new names. The singers announced are Mmes. Destinn, Gadski, Homer and Kurt of the Metropolitan Opera House; Mmes. Culp and Gerhardt of the concert-hall, and Mr. McCormack deservedly included for the voice and artistry with which he sings old airs. Two pianists of the first rank, Mr. Paderewski and Mr. Gabrilowitsch, will be heard, and along with them Messrs. Schelling, Friedberg and Gebhard. The violinists announced are Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Spalding and it is good to see the younger virtuoso gaining his deserts at last. As usual, too, the principal violinists of the orchestra—Messrs. Witek and Noack—and the principal 'cellists—Messrs Warnke and Malkin—will play solo pieces. All in

From
Add
Date
Es

From Addre
Date
Estab

Post
— May 7 —

Pop Concerts Commence

Boston Symphony Season Has Brilliant Conclusion—Falling Off in Musical Importations Due to War—What American Composers Are Doing—Other Timely Music News

The Boston Symphony season of 1916-17 came to an end yesterday evening, with a notable performance of Liszt's "Faust" symphony and of Wagnerian excerpts. Tomorrow night, or for the public on Tuesday night, the Pop concerts commence. The musical season, now virtually at an end, has been a very rich one in performances and an unusually poor one in new works of interest. We have, for one thing, fallen off in our musical imports during war-time, as we shall doubtless continue to do in the immediate future, and for the other thing, conductors and opera companies have not shown particular enterprise in ransacking the libraries and music stores for interesting new works, all ready in existence and on sale.

Saying this, we can hear the American composer making his plaint, in spite of Dr Muck's well-intended activities in his behalf; but the sad fact remains, that American composition up to the present time consists in those compositions of the older generation which are after European models, and are becoming rapidly outmoded, though often performed, and in their work the younger men have as yet for a majority shown little ability or conviction or seriousness in preparing themselves to strike out in new paths. The only two of these younger men who seem to us to deserve extended recognition are Henry F. Gilbert and John Alden Carpenter. Mr. Gilbert is the only American composer in the knowledge of the writer who has said things thoroughly beautifully and eloquently, and things that are American in the most fundamental are artistic sense of the word.

For the rest, even Mr. Carpenter, they are still imitating Europe, either in an inefficient or uninspired manner. Therefore the American composer has still to look within instead of without for his success, and he has as yet attained no particular right to complain because he is not given frequent performance.

The reason that such Americans as George W. Chadwick—the only composer of the older group who has struck at all the racial note—Horatio Parker, Arthur Foote, F. S. Converse and a number of others have their works performed constantly is that technically, at least, their works stand examination and make their effect in performance. It is not because of "pull" or "influence" or anything else of the kind that the older group of composers have attained their present position before the public. They now undoubtedly enjoy advantages of reputation, in many cases, of social position and of the most influential musical connections which do facilitate the productions of their works.

But how did they get this far? They were not born with golden spoons in their mouths and the twelve fairies of fortune about their cradles. They gained ground steadily because of solid acquirements as composers. If their productions seem smug or conventional or old-fashioned to younger men—as many of them do—the thing for the young man to do is to shut his mouth and learn his trade. When he can produce something as good in its workmanship—not necesarily similar in its workmanship, for no one wants to see art go on in its beaten track—but as solid in its facture, then let him raise his banner and make trouble for the old guard. But until he can do this he is wasting his time fighting windmills.

Even Mr. Gilbert has not, in our opinion, a technic nearly equal to the technic of the older group of composers. It is our personal impression that more than once, with exceptionally virile and poetic ideas, he finds himself cramped for a word; nevertheless, he has evolved a style unmistakably his own, a style which for character, raciness and in individuality has no parallel among the men of his own generation in this country. And inevitably he is going through the struggle that every new and substantial talent encounters in gaining recognition.

It is only logical and only to be expected that the unconventionality of his works, their disdain of what is smug and parochial, their virility and imaginative quality, should encounter misunderstanding and opposition on many sides. But they are making their way, because, in the first place, Mr. Gilbert has something to say, and in the second place, he is far more concerned with writing a few good pages of music before he dies than with making propoganda for self and country, or rather parish, as so many of his colleagues still persist in doing. The best talk about music, as Mr. Martin Loeffler once remarked to us, is music. That is what Mr. Gilbert is doing most of the time. When he does talk, or write, he does so with fully digested views and conclusions, which may be wrong, but are his and are the expression of his artistic life. Would that others would forsake front pages of periodicals and do as much real work for the cause as he.

But we wander. The past season, we said, has been rich in performances and poor in new productions. The number and quality of performances the multiplicity of concerts and new virtuosi has been due, of course, to the European war. What the conditions will be in the year to come, where the hunted artist, athirst for engagements and audiences and money, will hide his head, it is hard to tell. But during the season past there has been the unusual condition of an exceptional crop of visiting artists, and a public exceptionally willing to pay for their services. Piano houses acknowledge their busiest season in history in the activities of concertizing exponents. Opera seasons have gone, on the whole, well. Of course the usual ridiculous thing befell in Boston when the Metropolitan opera season was well patronized, while Mme. Pavlowa's season last fall was miserably neglected. But that is as yet the case in every American city, and musicians, critics and composers must continue to pull together, and do what they can to persuade the people that Mr. Caruso may sing in anything but an artistic manner, and that a performance of "Pelleas et Melisande" means more to the soul than this gifted song bird trilling forth his roulades as the Governor of Boston.

Occasionally a pianist has ventured something new. The opera company of Mme. Pavlowa revived Auber's "Masaniello," which was not worth a great deal. Next season they purpose to revive, among other operas, Rubinstein's "Demon," which is not worth any more. The Metropolitan Opera Company gave four new operas, and two of them were eminently worth while—"Boris Godunoff" and Strauss' "Rosenkavalier." Dr. Muck's programmes have obtained a few novelties, many of them by young American composers, but most of these were of negligible importance. Indeed, the only American novelty produced in the last two seasons by this orchestra which was at all worth while was Mr. Carpenter's suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," more attractive, it is true, by reason of its maturity of style and its resource of workmanship than because of deep intrinsic originality, but nevertheless music to be accorded the highest respect for the musicianly accomplishment which it reveals and the modesty, if that may be used. with which the composer expresses himself. If the war will promote fresher musical ideas in Europe, and more fundamental love and understanding and production of good music in this country, something, at least, may rise from its ruins.

Sunday
— May —

"Pop" Concerts Begin This Week in Symphony Hall

In old Music Hall, in the Spring of 1885, began the annual series of Promenade Concerts given by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which soon came to be known as the "Pops," and, as such, have become famous throughout the country. At the beginning they were modeled after the then famous Bilse concerts of Berlin, but soon they were modified in character so that, since the first season, they have been what they are today, except today the orchestra is much larger. They have been given every season, except one, when there was trouble about the license, and one season, 1900, they were given in Mechanic's Hall.

The current season of "Pops" is the 31st, and beginning tomorrow evening, May 8, they will run through the first week of July to Saturday evening, July 8. For the general public, the formal opening will come next Tuesday evening, for the Women's City Club of Boston has taken the first night as a semi-private affair.

Messrs Ernst Schmidt, Andre Maquarre and Clement Lenom will be the conductors, Mr Schmidt conducting the first, third, sixth, seventh and ninth weeks; Mr Maquarre the second, fourth and fifth weeks, and Mr Lenom the eighth week. The orchestra will be the largest ever employed at these concerts.

There will be a minimum of 75 musicians used and, on special occasions, if necessary, this number may be augmented to over 80. Practically the entire orchestra, except the leaders of the various choirs, is on call for these concerts. This fact will increase decidedly the musical value of the entertainment.

The program will run along much the same lines as the past. The music will be popular, but, at the same time good, and there will be during the course of the season special nights devoted to special composers or special schools.

In the first week Mr Schmidt has arranged two special nights. Wednesday, May 10, will be Russian Night, when, with the exception of three numbers, the entire program will be by Russian composers, the exceptions being pieces by Sibelius, Paderewski and Ganne. Friday night Mr Schmidt will devote the larger part of the program to Wagner.

The program for the public opening Tuesday evening is as follows:

Coronation March from The Prophet. Meyerbeer
Overture, Der Freischutz .... Weber
Indian dance .... MacDowell
Selection, The Jewels of the Madonna ....
Wolf-Ferrari
Overture, Tannhauser .... Wagner
Andante, from cello concerto .... Dvorak
Cello, Mr Keller.

Concert Season Review

As begins and ends the 24 pairs of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, so is measured the concert season. More recitals by singers, pianists, fiddlers have been given than any preceding year. Many of them have been new. Some bear the proofs of true distinction. Any season bringing a Povla Frisch, an Eddy Brown, a Guiomar Novaes for the first time would be one to mark in the record.

Of the new orchestral music heard, there were three symphonies—by Georges Enesco, Stillman-Kelley and Frederick Stock. Mr Kelley's music of New England depicted character with sincerity and feeling if not with the epic force of genius. Mr Stock sailed along impressively for two movements, but on a grandiose scale which ran aground in the two which followed.

Of the symphonic poems, Mr Chadwick's "Tam O' Shanter," in rollicking humor and reverie, made a strong impression at the concerts. Mr Schelling's "Impressions" paid the orchestra the compliment of dedication and displayed its vertuosity. Mr Carpenter's perambulator suite is one of the most imaginative, graceful American scores that have appeared. Liszt's exhumed symphonic poem "Ce Qu'on Entend sur la Montagne," showed again the prophetic vision of the great Hungarian and the debt the modern programists owe him. Reger's variations and fugue in a Mozartian theme, must not be forgotten as the sign of a new perception and artistic restraint.

In the performance of these Dr Muck again made known to this public the force of his genius is disciplinarian in preparation, and as an interpreter of remarkably blended mentality and imagination. The orchestra remains, even increases under his hand, as an instrument of euphony, eloquence, poetic beauty.

Of the choral works, d'Indy's youthful "Song of the Bell" is still fresh in mind, Mr Townsend, with commendable initiative, introduced new works with his Boston Choral Society, of which Carissimi's "Jeptha," and Wolf Ferrari's "Sacred Mystery" would invite further acquaintance. From the chamber music played, Stawinsky's technically brilliant and highly imaginative little pieces for quartet leave stimulating memory. Sibelius' quartet is music of a vividly pictorial and emotional quality, which was not fully revealed in performance.

Music played for the first time in Boston during the year follows under the names of the composer. B S O stands for Boston Symphony Orchestra:

Amani—Orientale, Copeland recital, Jan 22, Jordan Hall.

Balakireff—"Thamara"; ballet, Feb 9.

Braunfels—Carnival overture, B. S. O., Nov 12.

Carpenter—Adventures in a Perambulator, N. Y. Symph Orch, Nov 16.

Casella—Sonata, op. 6, 'cello and piano, Casals and Deyo, March 15.

Chadwick—Tam o' Shanter, B. S. O., April 28.

Colburn, S. C.—Valse, March 1, Hans Ebell, piano recital.

Debussy—Six Antique Epigraphs, Copeland recital, Jan 22; sonata, 'cello and piano, Casals and Deyo, March 15.

Delius—A Dance Rhapsody, Minneapolis Orch, Feb 24.

Enesco—Symphony in E flat major, B. S. O., Oct 22; Variations for two pianos, op. 5, Longy Club, Mlle Longy and Mr de Voto, Jan 20.

Engel—Le bon vieux temps, Ebell, piano recital, March 1.

Grainger—Walking Tune, recital with Melba, Jan 17; The Leprechaun's Dance, recital with Melba, Jan 17.

Granados—Spanish Dance, Copeland recital, Jan 22.

Grovlez—Sicilienne and Menuet, Mrs Hall's concert, March 21, Jordan Hall.

Hadley—Lucifer, op. 66, B. S. O., April 7.

Heilman—The Prism in the Sun, Ebell recital, March 1.

Hill—"The Parting of Launcelot and Guinevere," op. 22, B. S. O., March 24.

Holbrooke—Sextet, No. 3, op. 33, Longy Club, March 9.

D'Indy—"The Song of the Bell," Cecilia Society, Chalmers Clifton conductor, May 4.

Juon—Bizarrerie, Douleur and Obstination from Six Silhouettes, for two violins and piano, Mr and Mrs Ondricek and Mr de Voto, Oct 28; Rhapsodie, op. 37, for piano, violin, viola and 'cello, Hoffman Quartet and Mr Ebell, Feb 23.

Kelley—New England Symphony, No. 2, B flat minor, op. 33, B. S. O.

Liszt—Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne symphonic poem, No. 1, B. S. O., Jan 21.

Moszkowski—Suite for two violins and piano, Mr and Mrs Ondricek, Mr de Voto, Oct 28.

Moussorgsky-Trepak and Chef d'Armee, Martha Atwood-Baker, recital, April 28.

Mozart—Concertante Symphonie for violin and viola, B. S. O., Nov 19.

Ornstein—Song, "Mother o' Mine," song recital, Jos. Ecker, March 2. See Ornstein under pianists.

Platt—Violin and piano sonata, B minor, Keifer-Wille recital, May 1.

Rachmaninoff—Hungarian Dance, for violin, Mr Ondricek, Oct 28; second piano sonata, Ebell recital, March 1.

Reger—Variations and Fugue on theme by Mozart, N. Y. Phil Orch, Nov 7.

Schelling—Impressions in form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Piano, B. S. O., Dec 31 (first performance).

Sibelius—Quartet, D minor, op. 56, Kneisel Quartet, Jan 4.

Sonetana—Bohemian Dance for violin from "The Sold Bride," Mr Ondricek and Mr de Voto, Oct 28.

Smith—Quartet, A major, op. 37, Kneisel Quartet, Nov 30.

Steinert—Prelude for piano, Ebell recital, March 1.

Stock—Symphony in C minor, op. 18, March 31.

Stojowski—Piano concerto, No. 2, op. 32, Mr Paderewski and B. S. O., March 10.

Strawinsky—"Three Pieces for Quartet," Flonzaley Quartet, Dec 2; "The Bird of Fire," ballet, Jan 31; "Petrouchka," ballet, Feb 4.

Suk—Quasi Ballata Appassionata, from Four Compositions for violin and piano, Mr Ondricek, Oct 28.

Turina—A Los Toros, Copeland recital, Jan 22.

Woolett—Octuor and Dansas Paiennes, Mrs Hall's concert, March 21.

The following singers have appeared during the season on these dates for the first time in Boston. M. O. C. stands for Metropolitan Opera Company; C. P. M. stands for Copley-Plaza musicales; P. O. C. stands for the Pavlowa Opera Company; J. H. stands for Jordan Hall and S. H. for Steinert Hall.

Arkadij, Anne—Recital, J. H., Dec 1.

Alexander, Caroline Hudson—First time here in recital, J. H., Nov 29.

D'Arnalle, Vernon—C. P. M., Nov 15.

Axman, Gladys—Recital, S. H., Nov 18.

Barrientos, Maria — M. O. C., "Lucia," April 6.

Carson, Mary—Gretel, P. O. C., Dec 11.

Clark, Marian—Joint recital, with Miguel Llobet, guitarist, S. H., April 26.

Coudert, Clarisse—With Amato, Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, Nov 28.

Dostal, George—Tremont Temple, March 16.

Dresser, Marcia Van—Recital, J. H., March 18.

Dunlap, Marguerite—Tremont Temple, with Miuri and Baklanoff, Jan 14.

Ecker, Joseph—Recital, J. H., March 2.

Frisch, Povla—Recital, J. H., Dec 15.

Glenn, Wilfred—Handel and Haydn, Mozart Requiem, Walpurgis Night, Feb 27.

Graveure, Louis—First time here in recital, J. H., Nov 8.

Green, Marion—Voice of Christ, The Beatitudes, Cecilia Society, Dec 16.

(Harrod, James—Verdi's Requiem, People's Choral Union, April 30).

Hinkle, Florence—First individual recital, J. H., Nov

[149]

[illegible], Albert—C. P. M., Jan 8.

Kaiser, Marie—"Judas Maccabaeus," Handel and Haydn, April 23.

Kingston, Morgan—First time here in concert, April 23, as above.

Kousnezoff, Marie—C. P. M., Jan 31.

Kurt, Melanie—M. O. C., Isolda, April 5.

Linden, Einar—C. P. M., Dec 27.

De Luca—M. O. C., Marcello, "La Boheme," April 4.

Miura, Tamaki—P. O. C., Mme Butterfly, Nov 17.

Miura, Tamaki—First time here in concert, Tremont Temple, Jan 14.

Ober, Margarete—M. O. C., Ortrud in "Lohengrin," April 8.

Parker, Robert—With Melba, Symphony Hall, Oct 17.

Peterson, May—C. P. M., Dec 27.

Piersol, Marie Ladue—Apollo Club, March 7.

Reimer, Paul—C. P. M., Nov 22.

Roberts, Emma—First individual recital, S. H., Feb 13.

Rogers, Calista—Recital, S. H., Jan 27.

Russian Cathedral Choir—Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Feb 11.

Scheider, May—P. O. C., Micaela, "Carmen," Nov 16.

Sembach, Johannes—C. P. M., Nov 1 (Siegfried, Harvard Stadium, June 4).

Shaun, Jose—Recital, S. H., Nov 18.

Snelling, Lillia—Tremont Temple, Feb 3.

Torpadie, Greta—C. P. M., Dec 27.

Transcr
May 6

SYMPHONY CLOSES SEASON BRILLIANTLY

An exceptionally interesting program in which the orchestra fully sustained its great reputation brought the Friday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to a brilliant close yesterday afternoon. While the concert will be repeated tonight, that of yesterday was the close of the season for the Friday afternoon patrons. Dr. Muck was given a noticeably cordial reception and not an opportunity was lost during the concert or at its close by the audience to show its appreciation of his efforts in its behalf.

The concert feature was the Liszt Symphony after Dante's "Divina Commedia," in which the women's chorus of the Musical Art Club participated. One could well imagine more being made of the opportunity than Liszt has done, but one could scarcely imagine a better presentation than that afforded yesterday afternoon. It fully merited the exceptional enthusiasm of the audience. The women's voices were decidedly pleasing.

Then followed three Wagner numbers: Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," Funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods" and Prelude to "Parsifal." In these, Dr. Muck and his players were, as ever, right in their element.

Transcrip.
May 13

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The New Scales of Fixed Prices Announced and the "Assisting Artists" for Next Season Made Known—A Longer and a Freshened List

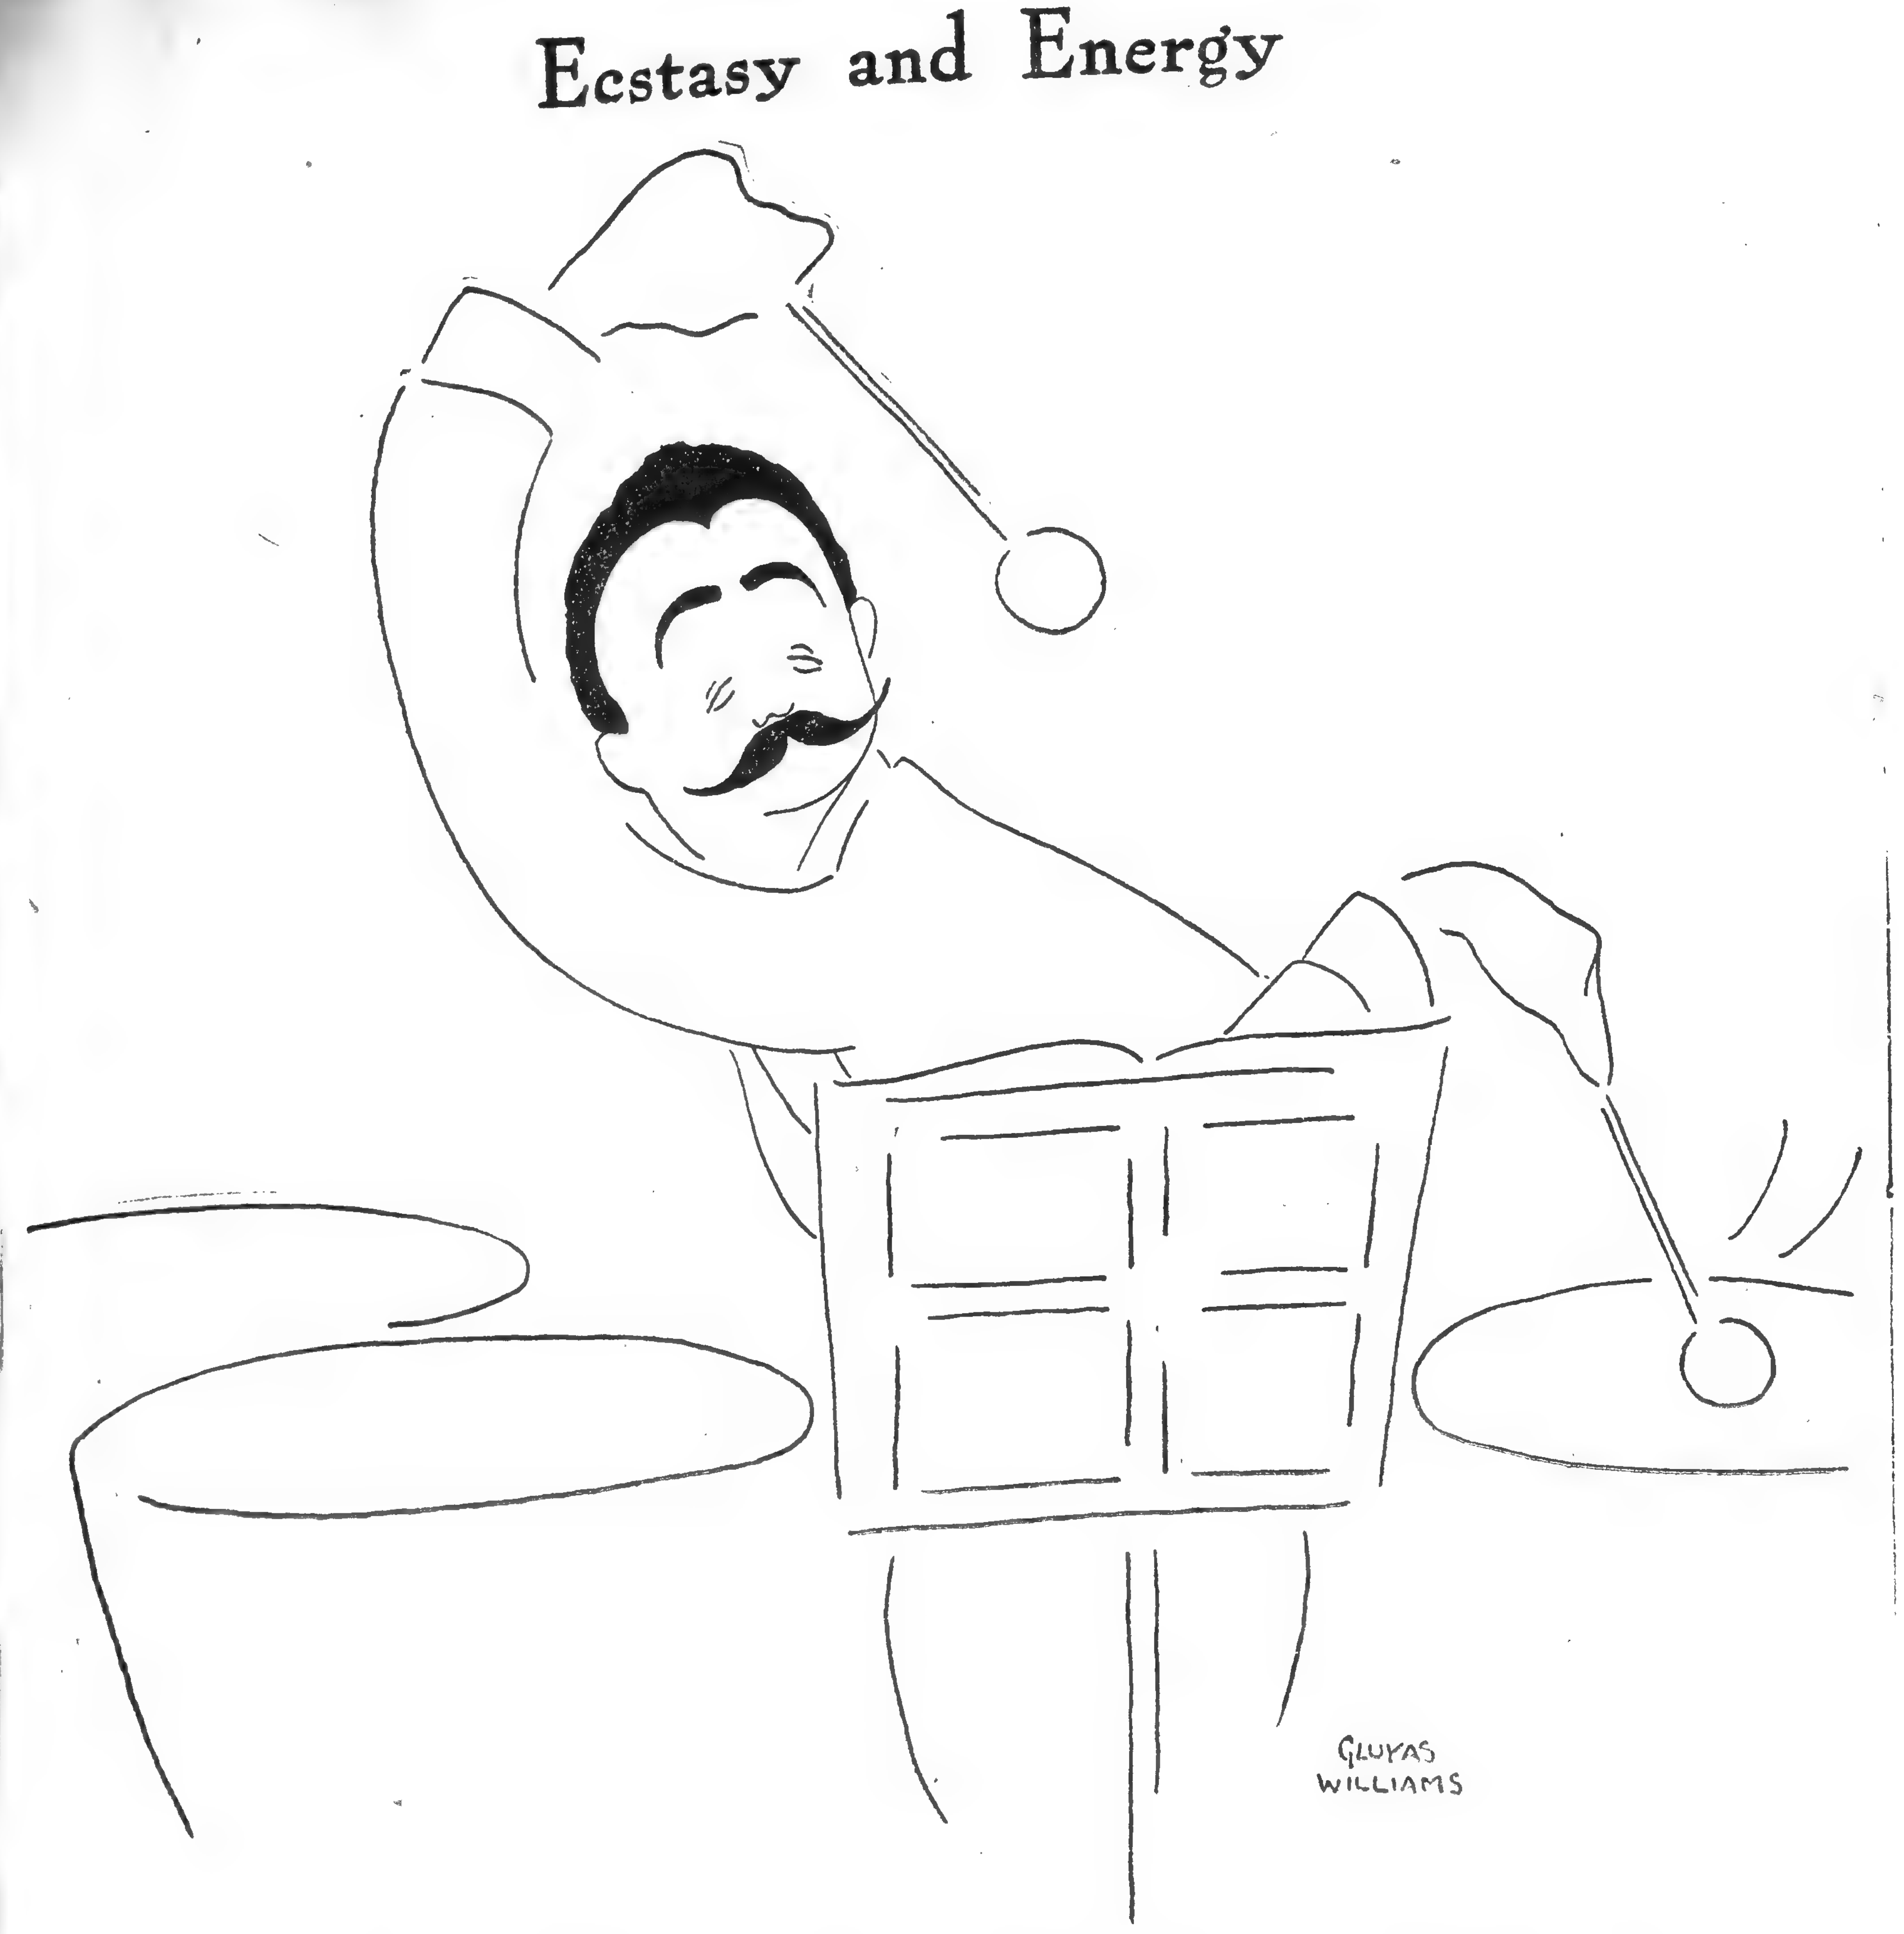
A COMMUNIQUE from Symphony Hall to the morning newspapers announces the prices for seats and the "assisting artists" for the Symphony Concerts of next season. Briefly summarized, it enumerates the prices for tickets, under the new method of fixed charges and annual renewal of subscriptions, as $60, $48, $36 and $24 for the concerts of Friday afternoons and $60, $48, $36, $24 and $15 for the concerts of Saturday evenings. As hitherto, the seats in the second balcony for the concerts of Friday will not be included in the subscription but will be sold at the door each afternoon at twenty-five cents per place. By differences in the number of seats to be sold at the various prices, the average cost of tickets for the afternoon concerts will be higher than the average cost of tickets for the evening concerts. Thus for Fridays most of the places in the centre of the hall in front of the broad aisle will be sold at $60, whereas only relatively few of them will be priced so high for Saturdays. The lowest price of tickets for the concerts of Friday is $24; for the concerts of Saturday, $15, at which terms all the seats in the second balcony outside the first row will be sold. Moreover, some 500 seats on the floor of the hall, back of the broad aisle, will be marked at $24 for the concerts of Saturday evenings. Thus, presumably, the management hopes to increase the numbers of the audience and widen the public for the concerts of Saturday evenings, while it makes the most of the established vogue of the concerts of Friday afternoon. Circular letters announcing these prices and indicating the division of places for each series of concerts have been sent to all those who registered their seats last March as a preliminary to the renewal of subscriptions. Up to June 1, the recipients may make their subscriptions for next season, but they may pay for them at any time before Sept. 2. Seats not taken by subscription before June 1 will be available to the general public.

Dr. Muck will, of course, be the conductor of the orchestra and the concerts next season, the final year of his present contract. More "assisting artists" have been engaged than for many winters past and the list bears many new names. The singers announced are Mmes. Destinn, Gadski, Homer and Kurt of the Metropolitan Opera House; Mmes. Culp and Gerhardt of the concert-hall, and Mr. McCormack deservedly included for the voice and artistry with which he sings old airs. Two pianists of the first rank, Mr. Paderewski and Mr. Gabrilowitsch, will be heard, and along with them Messrs. Schelling, Friedberg and Gebhard. The violinists announced are Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Spalding and it is good to see the younger virtuoso gaining his desert at last. As usual, too, the principal violinists of the orchestra—Messrs. Witek and Noack—and the principal 'cellists—Messrs Warnke and Malkin—will play solo pieces. All in all

From
Addi
Dat
Est

Transcript — May 6th

Ecstasy and Energy



S. Neumann: The Master-Drummer of the Symphony Orchestra

From an Original Drawing by Gluyas Williams

Transcr — May

MUSIC AND PLAYS

THE POPS AGAIN AND THE POPS OF RECENT YEARS

The Gradual Change in the Audiences—The Dominant Balconies and the Submissive Floor—Reactions Upon Orchestra, Programmes and Atmosphere—Mme. Farrar Reappears on the Screen—Sir Herbert Tree's Shylock of Artifice—Items and Announcements

PRESUMABLY The Pops have become what the present frequenters of them wish them to be—orchestral concerts of music, grave or gay, classic or popular, distributed through a leisurely and unexacting two hours and a half, and heard either from seats in the balconies (as on any similar and formal occasion) or from tables on the floor. Within easy memory the music was only incident, stimulation or intermezzo in the light talk of assembled parties quite as interested in themselves and their neighbors as in what they heard from the stage and pleasured as much by the smoking, drinking and other diversions along the way as by the works of composers, conductors and orchestra. In a sense The Pops are still informal concerts; the public may put on its hat and go to them without premeditation or preparation; if it keeps wisely clear of the balconies, it may take its fill of tobacco and light and liquid refreshments; in the pauses between the numbers, it may even chatter; but while the music is proceeding, an etiquette, with which the atmosphere is now somewhat rigid, prescribes that it must listen almost as silently and dutifully as it would at a serious concert of the regular season. So have the austere balconies gradually imposed their ways on what used to be the genially inattentive, pleasantly self-absorbed and measurably free-mannered floor of Symphony Hall; and so have The Pops become the listening ground of those that lack inclination for the orchestral concerts of the winter but would gladly take a course in the spring and summer through an approximation of them.

More and more numerous grows the band until now, sixty, seventy and eighty strong at need, it is like to a symphony orchestra or even the Symphony Orchestra itself, less the principal players in a few choirs. More and more frequent are the pieces that have been played at the Symphony Concerts themselves or are part and [illegible] of the "standard repertory" for such concerts: the overture to "Der Freischütz," the overture to "Tannhauser," the slow movement of Dvoràk's Concerto for violoncello, the dance from MacDowell's Indian Suite—all on the list of last evening; Sibelius's "Finlandia"; a fragment of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Antar"; his "Spanish Caprice"; Weber's overture to "Oberon"; Wagner's to "Rienzi"; the Nocturne from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"—scattered through the programmes for the rest of the week. Curiously few are the Viennese waltzes that used to spice The Pops and could be heard nowhere else; not too frequent are the pots-pourris from operettas and musical plays, current or unforgotten. Only on Saturday evenings and on "college nights," when the audience is presumed to be light-minded, do the programmes wear a like lightness. Nowadays the orchestra and the conductor—last evening Mr. Schmidt, excellent in such work—must not spare its pains; while, above all else, the assembled company must listen attentively, seriously, subordinating its other pleasures to the high purpose of concert-going.

By this time there is no mistaking the change, as it has descended from recent year to recent year upon The Pops. The American passion for self-improvement even in the concert-hall; the American inability to take even the lighter music of the spring and summer as merely so much "good fun" with other sorts of "good fun" to supplement it; the whole abomination that goes by the name of "culture," have laid chastening and formalizing hands upon them. The balconies with their long rows of rigid, intent and silent listeners, who smoke not, drink not, chatter not, arrive as the concert begins and go home when it ends, have subdued to themselves the whilom careless and pleasure-seeking floor. The public has willed it since nightly it fills those same dominant balconies and that same obedient and now seemingly sympathetic floor. The laws of The Pops, The Pops' new public gives and doubtless the knowledge and the taste in music of the community advance accordingly. There is no rejoinder; there is only submission—and regret, the eternal regret that somehow or other nature so made the Anglo-Saxon, and especially the American Anglo-Saxon, that at almost no time and in almost no circumstance will he take music for the fun of the thing.

Monitor — May 13 —

SYMPHONY YEAR PUTS AMERICAN MUSIC TO TEST

Dr. Muck Found to Have Given Larger Number of Works Than Usual by Orchestral Composers Living in U. S.

In the season of 1915-16 the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra has given composers who live in the United States an opportunity to be heard that they have never enjoyed before. At his Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts in Symphony hall, he has presented nine native works, all of complete cyclic dimensions. Seven of them, according to the official phrase in Philip Hale's program notes, he has performed for the "first time at these concerts," and six for the "first time in Boston." If a comparison of the programs of the past season is made with those of the previous five seasons, Dr. Muck will be found to have included in his schedule about twice the usual number of American compositions.

If the conductor were asked why he had thus enlarged his welcome to composers of the United States, he would doubtless reply that it was because these composers have of late shown an unwonted zeal in writing orchestral pieces, and have turned out scores that were worthy of a test before his audiences. While perhaps admitting that there were many new European symphonies waiting to be tried and many classics that called for revival, yet here the American documents were and here and now they must be reckoned with. If any further argument were needed to justify his procedure, all the works in question had already been heard and approved outside of Boston, so why

The performance of the nine works, at least of the seven novelties, is hardly to be explained, therefore, as a case of condescension on the part of the conductor toward the country in which he is a visitor. Nor, on the other hand, is it to be regarded as a case of wartime necessity. For a considerable amount of new European music has been available this winter, notwithstanding the difficulties of communication between the conductor and continental publishers. If the Strauss "Alpine" symphony could be sent through the blockades to the United States for production in Cincinnati and Philadelphia, certainly other pieces could have been shipped through for production in Boston. The American music, all who consider it must agree, was performed because it was worthy of a hearing. And now that it has been presented by an orchestra that rehearses all new music with great care and before a public that listens to all new music with a high feeling of accountability the question arises as to its permanent value. How much of it is likely to hold a place in the repertory?

The American composers as they appear in alphabetical order in the tabular review of the twenty-fourth program book, with the titles of their works, are as follows: Carpenter, "Perambulator" suite; Chadwick, "Tam o' Shanter" ballade; Hadley, "Lucifer" tone poem; Hill, "Lancelot and Guinevere" symphonic poem; Kelley, "New England" symphony; Loeffler, "Tintagiles" dramatic poem; MacDowell, suite in A minor; Schelling, "Artist's Life" variations for orchestra and piano; Stock, symphony in C minor.

Two of the pieces, those by Loeffler and MacDowell, may be looked upon as accepted examples of American orchestral art. At all events they may be thought of as established in the Boston Symphony routine of concerts. Having been long ago played, placed on the library shelf and later taken down and played again, they have a certain degree of historic standing. They have had their usefulness affirmed by repeated hearing. The other seven of the nine pieces, on the contrary, being but recently composed and now only fairly introduced to the public, are still unsolved problems. An embodiment of modern feeling, as pictures of present day society and as efforts at national expression, they still await full appraisal.

On being examined, the pieces fall at the outset into two groups, according to locality of origin. Those by Chadwick, Hadley, Hill, Kelley and Schelling, on the one hand, may all be assigned to the East; those by Carpenter and Stock, on the other hand, belong to the West. Again, they take double grouping from the circumstances of their composition. The Chadwick, Hadley and Kelley scores were written to order, having been commissioned by the sustainer of the Norfolk, Conn., music festivals and having been produced one after another in the last three years under the auspices of the Litchfield County Choral Union. In quite different manner, the Carpenter, Hill, Schelling and Stock scores were the outcome of the author's own wish to speak to the world. They came into existence without the encouragement of a patron. Whatever informal welcome may have awaited them, they were written on the initiative of the composers themselves.

These two pairs of situations hold out opportunity for comparisons. The first invites debate as to the relative knack of eastern and western composers at handling the orchestral mechanism; while the second raises inquiry as to the relative strength of music which men write by request and that which they write from impulse.

When East and West are compared, no particular differentiation, at first glance, is found. For in point of technique, and that must always be the first issue, they are evenly matched. In fact, algebraic rule may be brought to bear on the matter and United States composers of the East and the West may be called technical equals of each other, because both are technical equals of European composers. As regards instrumentation, there can no longer be any doubt that American composers, according to the showing of the seven records under discussion, understand how to score. There can be no denying that they have mastered the craft of combining tones of string, wood, brass and the rest of the orchestral scheme. If the much-used analogy of painting and engraving may be permitted, there are on one side of the exhibit the brilliantly colored canvases of Hadley and Hill, and there are on the other the monochromatic prints of Carpenter and Schelling. They ought to be sufficient argument to prove American mastery of pictorial method. Further respecting technique, East and West are evenly matched in command of the large modern cyclic forms of composition. To attest this, let mention of Kelley's finely-proportioned "New England" symphony and of Stock's vast, yet structurally compact, C minor symphony suffice.

In external matters, then, eastern western music are much alike.

qualities do differences come to light. And here the West at once shows at a certain advantage. For the "Perambulator" suite of Carpenter and the C minor symphony of Stock, more than any of the five compositions of the eastern group, are outspoken and frank in their utterances. Mr. Carpenter undertakes to narrate the experiences of a baby in its morning ride to the park, and he goes at it with an enthusiasm and an ingenuousness that wins all hearers. Mr. Stock in like manner begins an exploit in orchestral assertion that he means shall out-Strauss and out-Mahler anything ever before spoken. He plans the largest array of developments on a three-note theme that ever tone marshal paraded. And he achieves his desire. The only trouble is that narrator and asserter do not keep up their purposes to the end. The writer of the "Perambulator" loses his hold as humorist half way in his story. The writer of the symphony uses up all his emphasis by the time he reaches the quarter-way mark.

Comparison of expressive traits further followed out, the East shows at an advantage in its moderation. Not but that Mr. Hill in his "Lancelot" and Mr. Hadley in his "Lucifer" use the biggest sonorities they know how, and not but that Mr. Kelley in the "New England" symphony goes to the extreme in moroseness of mood; nevertheless, all this granted, the eastern group does hold the convictions of hearers to the last note. It does reserve some part of its message for the end.

So much for comparison by locality. Now as to comparison by motive of authorship, it must admitted that those who composed on their own enterprise have a more impressive message than those who composed on invitation. The four men who wrote for whatever audience they might deserve strike deeper than the three who wrote for a special occasion. The frankness of Messrs. Carpenter and Stock will not be easy for audiences to resist. The individuality of style and the humor of character-portrayal shown by Mr. Schelling will surely win hearings for the piano and orchestra variations another season. The sincerity of sentiment shown by Mr. Hill will be likely to bring more performances of "Lancelot."

Of the three contributions to American musical art in the Litchfield batch, those by Messrs. Chadwick and Hadley, notwithstanding their admirable qualities as scores, scarcely have enough appeal of originality to demand being reconsidered soon at the Symphony concerts. The composition of Mr. Kelley, however, though a labored study, ought in fairness, perhaps, to be performed again, because it had to be given by the assistant conductor of the orchestra. The public is inclined to think that a new piece is neglectfully produced, unless the regular conductor interprets it.

13

CHANGED SCALE OF PRICES FOR SYMPHONY OUT

Staple Cost Instead of Auction Sale to Be in Effect This Fall for Boston — Friday Rush Seats to Be Retained

Announcement of a new flat scale of prices for the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra is given out today by Charles A. Ellis, the manager. Tickets hereafter are to be put on sale in the summer at these prices, instead of being offered in the fall at auction. It is understood that the manager tried to scale Symphony hall in such a way as to bring into the treasury of the orchestra as nearly as possible the same amount as was realized from the auction sales, while at the same time removing certain inevitable inequalities to subscribers arising from the premium method. According to an estimate published in The Christian Science Monitor on Jan. 8 of this year, the receipts from the last auction sales were $100,346.50 for the Friday matinees, and $65,380.50 for the Saturday evening concerts. The new flat scale of prices is found to conform, generally speaking, with the difference in the Friday and Saturday demand here indicated. The Friday afternoon rush seats will be retained. Details as to the prices and to the plans for next season's subscriptions appear in the announcement, which is as follows:

"All the subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts of the past season who have registered their seats with the management are receiving this week subscription cards which will enable grams which show the fixed prices of subscription and the manner in which the hall has been divided. The problem of fixing the prices of seats for the Friday and Saturday series has presented many difficulties and it is hoped that these have been solved to the satisfaction of all concerned. The management feels that a great step for the better has been taken in abolishing the auction sales. For the patrons of the concerts, the fixed price subscription means a minimum of trouble in securing seats and an exact knowledge of the price they must pay for the seats they want. For the management, it means an exact knowledge of the resources on which to base the annual budget.

"In fixing the prices it has been the task of the management so to scale the house for both series that the total receipts from the sales will meet the minimum requirements of the orchestra from the Boston concerts; and, at the same time, maintain the average of prices for various parts of the house within the limits shown by the auction sales of the past several years. One of the chief objections to the auction sales has been the great inequality of prices from the maximum to the minimum and to regulate this has been the most difficult part of the work.

"The prices of the Friday and Saturday concerts will be the same, but, owing to differences in division, the average cost of the seats for Friday will be higher than for Saturday. This is made necessary by the fact that for the Friday concerts the entire second balcony, or 505 seats, is not included in the subscription sale, these seats being held out as in the past, to be sold at the door on the days of the concerts at 25 cents each.

"For both series the top price of season tickets will be $60. The bottom price for the Friday concerts will be $24; for the Saturday concerts $15, this being the price of all the seats in the second balcony except those in the front row. The intermediate prices for Fridays will be $48 and $36; for Saturdays, $48, $36 and $24.

"The records of the auction sales of the past several years show that patrons will pay for their seats practically the average price they have paid during those years. For Friday afternoons, a number of seats in the middle of the hall, which have brought very high prices, will cost considerably less. The bulk of the seats for the Saturday evening concerts are very moderate in price. For example, on the floor alone, there will be practically 500 seats at $24 each, or $1 per concert. These comprise nearly all the seats back of the broad aisle. Again, while for Friday afternoons the greater part of the center section in front of the broad aisle will be sold at $60 per seat, for the Saturday evening concerts only a few of the most sought-for seats in that section have been placed at that price.

"Holders of registered seats have until June 1 in which to subscribe for them and until Sept. 2 in which to make their payments. All seats which have not been subscribed for y June 1 will be offered for sale to the general public.

"Plans are in the making for next season. Dr. Muck, of course, will be at the head of the orchestra and in the personnel there will be few, if any, changes from that of this year. The list of soloists is more comprehensive than it has been in many seasons and on it will be found the names of several artists who are appearing with the Symphony orchestra for the first time.

"There will be seven singers, six of iem women. The women will be Julia ılp, Emmy Destinn, Johanna Gadski, ena Gerhardt, Louise Homer and lanie Kurt. All of these have apred with the orchestra one or more es, except Mme. Kurt, who was first d in Boston this spring with the opolitan opera company. The seventh r will be John McCormack.

ere will be five pianists—I. J. Padki, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Ernest ing, Carl Friedberg and Heinrich Of these, Mr. Friedberg is making his first appearance with the orchestra. He has been heard here in recital, making a most favorable impression. The violinists will be four—Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack. The last two named are, of course, drawn from the orchestra, and Mr. Spalding will make his first appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra. The other two soloists now announced are Heinrich Warnke and Josef Malkin, the admirable 'cellists of the orchestra. In all, there will be soloists at 18 out of the 24 pairs of concerts. This is the largest number the orchestra has had since Mr. Gericke's days, and the quality has never been higher."

Post
May 10 —

POPS OPEN WITH BANG

Enlarged Orchestra Adds to Popularity

BY OLIN DOWNES

The 31st season of the Pop concerts opened last night in Symphony Hall. Ernst Schmidt, the present concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted. The orchestra was of impressive proportions, larger than any Pop orchestra of recent seasons, completely filling the stage, and representing a number of instruments sufficient to perform practically any modern music, however formidably orchestrated.

ADMIRABLE ORGANIZATION

The virtouosity of the players is well known. The net result is that for the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall there is furnished this season an orchestra which, while not fully equal to the complete complement of players for the subscription season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the winter time, is yet so complete and so resourceful that Boston's Pop orchestra would be welcomed by many cities of pretension as an admirable symphonic organization which a conductor could count himself happy in being invited to conduct.

Mr. Schmidt arranged a programme for the first night of the Pops open to the general public—the entire hall being now engaged each first Monday night by the Women's City Club—which included music of substance and brilliantly effective workmanship, and also music of a popular and semi-popular cast.

To none of these classes does Mr. Schmidt's march, "Red, White and Blue," belong. This is a more generously colored composition. Greens and screaming yellows are included. All tunes ever associated with American patriotism sound in a jumble together. There are Suppe's overture, "The Beautiful Galatea," and for one of the encores the ever beautiful "Blue Danube" waltz of Strauss.

Music for Everybody

The concert opened with Meyerbeer's pompous coronation march from "The Prophet." There followed the romantic and melodious overture, "Der Freischutz," of Weber. One of the finest pieces of music so far composed by an American, the "Indian Dance" of MacDowell, followed; music of an uncommonly wild and dramatic character, based on typical Indian themes, and this group came to an end with selections of a piquant sort from Wolf-Ferrari's popular "Jewels of the Madonna." After the Indian dance there was played an entr'acte from Thomas, "Mignon," as an encore.

The second group was even more enthusiastically received. It commenced with the "Tannhauser" overture, one of the most eloquent and well made overtures in all operatic music. Then came the slow movement from Dvorak's violoncello concerto, played by Mr. Keller, violoncellist, and encored.

Then there was the performance which the augmented size of the Pop orchestra made especially effective, of selections from the third act of Wagner's "Meistersinger," and this group was completed by Liszt's first Hungarian rhapsody. After the "Meistersinger" selections, Massenet's "Crepuscule" was added in response to long continued applause.

— Journal M[illegible] —

RECORD ORCHESTRA AT POP CONCERT OPENING

Regular Symphony Aggregation Heard in Classic and Popular Numbers, But the Time-Honored Popping Is Gone—Theatre News and Gossip.

By E. F. Harkins

Formerly the Pop concerts had one opening night. Now there are two, the Women's City Club night, which comes first, of course, and then what might be called the Old Timers' night. This came last night attended by a greater orchestral dazzle than ever before and much less popping of corks than used to enliven the early soirees. These new fangled bottle caps have taken a good deal of the pop out of these concerts.

Last night Ernst Schmidt, the conductor, faced the largest Pop orchestra ever assembled. No less than 82 players took part, making up a full-grown symphony orchestra—about twice as big a band as they had to swing through the good old "Grubenlichter" and "Blue Danube" waltzes in the popping days of yore. Virtually all but the virtuosi members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are under engagement for the Pop season.

As a consequence the concerts are to be taken somewhat more seriously than was the rule when the enthusiasts shouted their requests to the conductor and then their thanks. There was no chorus of "Thank you, Mr. Schmidt!" last night; but there was enough applause to command several encores during the customary three hours or so. The audience was generous to a fault, in fact, for the orchestra was not by any means in flawless form. The artistic level of the performance can be much higher than it was on this second public opening night.

The balconies were well filled by those who prefer to take their music dry. There was also a crowd in the popular "rush seats" around the tables outside the fashionable reservation. There was much to please divers tastes—classical and popular music, fashion, society, promenades and things from the caterer's larder.

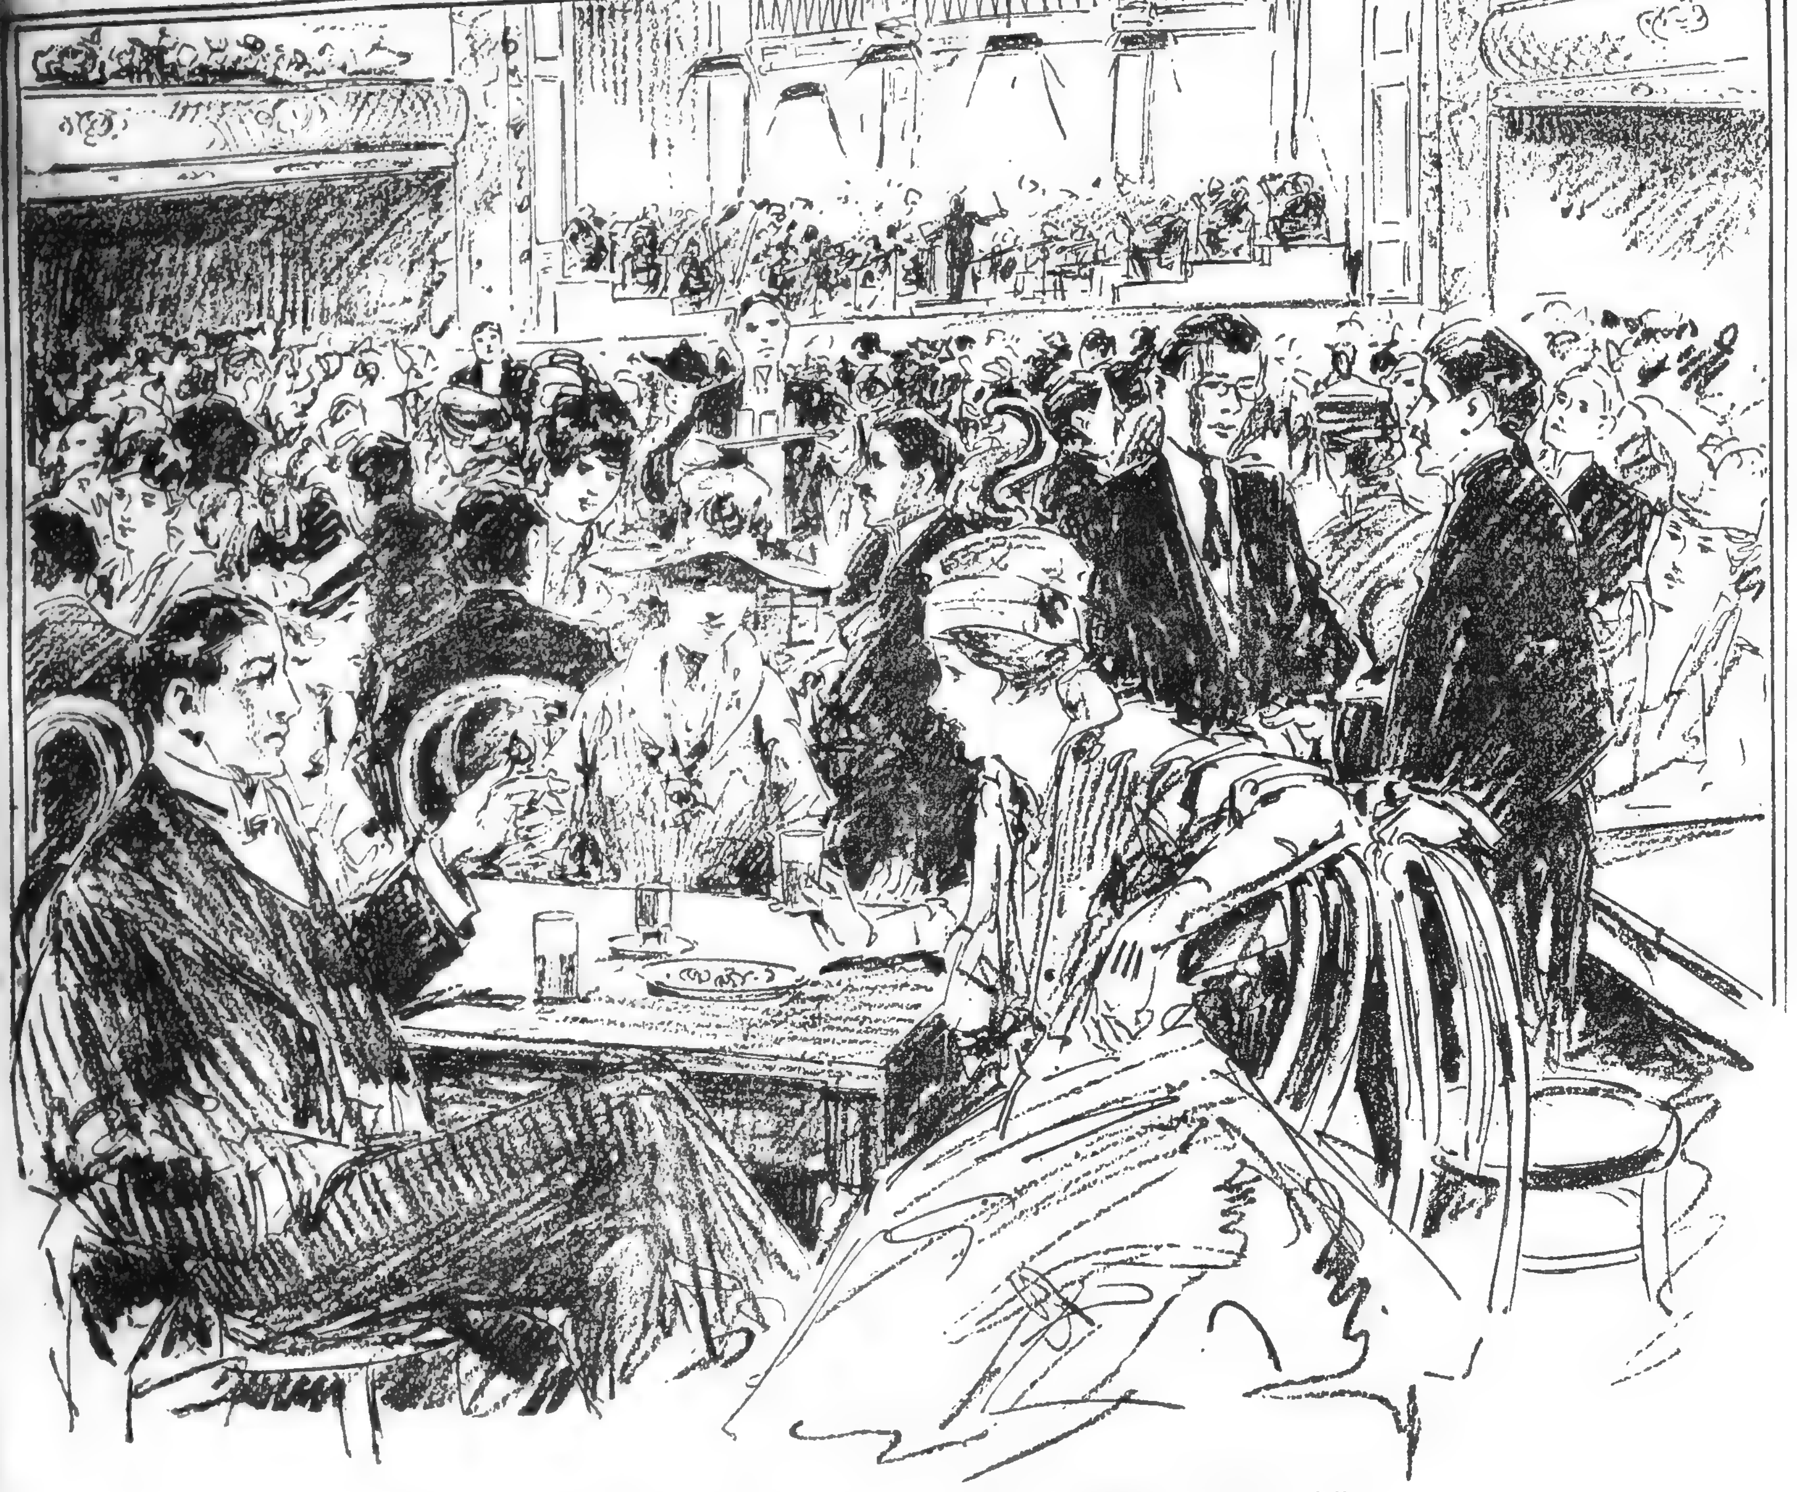
The Pops are a great spring tonic for Bostonians. It's a pity they don't last all summer.

Tonight will be Russian night. The program is made up of the festival march from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar," the andante from Glazounoff's piano sonata, the tone poem "Finlandia," by Sibelius; four Tschaikowsky numbers, the "Nutcracker" suite, the "Song Without Words," the "Pizziccato Serenade" and the "1812 Overture;" the "Cortege de Bacchus," from Rubinstein's "Feramors;" Paderewski's "Menuet a l'Antique;" Glinka's "Life of the Czar" overture and "Karaminskeya" and Ganne's "Czarina" mazurka.

THE BOSTON GLOBE—WEDNESDAY, MAY 10

FIRST PUBLIC NIGHT AT THE "POPS"

Orchestra Increased to 75 For These Concerts, With Ernst Schmidt Conducting This Week



OPENING OF THE POPS AS THE ARTIST SAW IT.

The first admission of the general public to the season's series of "Pop" concerts at Symphony Hall occurred last evening, the house having been taken privately by the Women's City Club for Monday night.

The orchestra this year has been increased to 75 players, the addition being an expansion of the string choirs. The conductor for the first week of the series of concerts, contrary to the usual apportionment of the office, will be Ernst Schmidt, who has been called to Dr Muck's duties at various times during the year. Next Monday Mr Maquarre, the flutist, will succeed him for a time.

With more experience in the ways of "Pop" concerts Mr Schmidt probably will relieve the seriousness of his programs. Much symphonic music has been heard in this town and played well. The acceptable thing in furnishing entertainment to these audiences who sit about tables seasoning their talk and enlivening their wit with a harmless beverage or a beguiling cigar, would be to give them more of the lighter, the sociable music, which for example, Victor Herbert in other times and places has known how to choose and to conduct it with something of the snap and style which he has found suitable, a style which reasonably is not that of a symphony concert, but would be the more grateful and effective with the orchestra Mr Schmidt now has at his disposal.

Why the audience should be asked to listen to the dolorous andante from Dvorak's cello concerto, on what should be a joyous occasion, is hard to say, even though Mr Keller plodded bravely through it.

The excerpt from "The Mastersingers," although it contained the dance of the apprentices, was too much Wagner for the middle group after the "Tannhauser" overture to begin it. The orchestra, after apparently reading through at sight the medley from "The Jewels of the Madonna," ending the first group of pieces, and in a manner that denoted but slight respect for Wolf-Ferrari's opera, caught the spirit of Liszt's First Hungarian Rhapsody which ended the second, and gave it a thoroughly spirited performance.

As extra numbers, the gavotte from "Mignon," one of the best played pieces of the evening, music from "Carmen," Massenet's "Crepuscle" and a tranquil song played by Mr Kellar with organ were rewarded with applause.

The first group of selections included such orthodox music as Meyerbeer's Coronation March and Keber's "Der Freischuetz" overture, which now may be wished a long and dreamless slumber, and MacDowell's Indian Dance.

In the last group were a march by the conductor, "Red, White, Blue," which the audience received gladly; Suppe's "Beautiful Galatea," Dvorak's "Humoriske," and Meacham's "American Patrol."

Prominent in the first chairs of the orchestra beside Mr Kellar, the 'cellist, were Mr Hoffmann, a familiar and excelent concertmaster at these occasions; Mr de Mailly, whose pleasing flute playing in the second intermezzo from "The Jewels of the Madonna" stood out in bold relief, and Mr Mimart, a clarinetist whose tonal quality is always to be enjoyed when heard in solo.

This evening will be Russian Night, with a program which appears of unusual interest. A Wagner program will be given Friday, May 12. Amherst Night will occur Wednesday, May 17.

Tonight's program:

Festival March, from "Antar,"	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Overture, "The Life for the Tsar"	Glinka
Andante, from a piano sonata	Glazounoff
Finlandia	Sibelius
Suite, "Nutcracker" "Song Without Words." Pizzicato Serenade; overture, "1812,"	Tschaikowsky
Cortege de Bacchus, from "Feramors,"	Rubinstein
Menuet a' l'Antique	Paderewski
"Karaminskeya"	Glinka
Waltz, "La Czarina"	Ganne

Globe – May 13 –

NEXT SEASON'S SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Details of the New Plan for Selling Seats

Personnel of Orchestra Unchanged —Famous Soloists Engaged

Since last Fall when it was announced that the custom of selling season tickets for the Symphony concerts by auction, which had been in vogue from the early years of the Orchestra, would be abandoned in the season of 1916-17 for a subscription at fixed prices, there has been keenest curiosity as to what the scale of prices would be for coming seasons. The problem has been finally settled and Charles A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, gives the details in a statement made yesterday:

"All the subscribers to the Symphony concerts of the past season who have registered their seats with the management are receiving this week subscription cards which will enable them to retain those seats for the concerts of 1916-17, together with diagrams which show the fixed prices of subscription and the manner in which the hall has been divided.

"In fixing the prices it has been the task of the management so to scale the house for both series that the total receipts from the sales will meet the minimum requirements of the orchestra from the Boston concerts; and, at the same time, maintain the average of prices for various parts of the house within the limits shown by the auction sales of the past several years.

"The prices of the Friday and Saturday concerts will be the same, but, owing to differences in division, the average cost of the seats for Friday will be higher than for Saturday. This is made necessary by the fact that for the Friday concerts the entire second balcony, or 505 seats, is not included in the subscription sale, these seats being held out as in the past, to be sold at the door on the days of the concerts at 25 cents each.

"For both series the top price of season tickets will be $60. The bottom price for the Friday concerts will be $24; for the Saturday concerts $15, this being the price of all the seats in the second balcony except those in the front row. The intermediate prices for Fridays will be $48 and $36; for Saturdays, $48, $36 and $24.

"The records of the auction sales of the past several years show that patrons will pay for their seats practically the average price they have paid during those years. For Friday afternoons, a number of seats in the middle of the hall, which have brought very high prices, will cost considerably less. The bulk of the seats for the Saturday evening concerts are very moderate in price. For example, on the floor alone, there will be practically 500 seats at $24 each, or $1 per concert. These comprise nearly all the seats back of the broad aisle. Again, while for Friday afternoons the greater part of the center section in front of the broad aisle will be sold at $60 per seat, for the Saturday evening concerts only a few of the most-sought-for seats in that section have been placed at that price.

"Holders of registered seats have until June 1 in which to subscribe for them and until Sept 2 in which to make their payments. All seats which have not been subscribed for by June 1 will be offered for sale to the general public.

"Plans are already in the making for a season of unusual brilliancy. Dr Muck, of course, will be at the head of the orchestra, and in the personnel there will be few, if any, changes from that of this year.

"There will be seven singers — Julia Culp, Emmy Destinn, Johanna Gadski, Elena Gerhardt, Louise Homer, Melanie Kurt and John McCormack.

There will be five pianists—I. J. Paderewski, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Ernest Schelling, Carl Friedberg and Heinrich Gebhard.

"The violinists will be four — Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, Anton Witek and Sylvian Noack. The last two named are, of course, drawn from the orchestra. The other two soloists announced are Heinrich Warnke and Josef Malkin, the admirable 'cellists of the orchestra. In all, there will be soloists at 18 out of the 24 pairs of concerts. This is the largest number the orchestra has had since Mr Gericke's days and the quality has never been higher.

Record
May 13

Symphony Plans are Explained

Fixed Prices Now Established

BRILLIANT SEASON PROMISED BY ELLIS

McCormack, Spalding, Kurt and Friedburg Among Next Year's Soloists

Since last fall, when it was announced that the custom of selling season tickets for the Symphony concerts by auction, which had been in vogue from the early years of the orchestra, would be abandoned in the season of 1916-17 for a subscription at fixed prices, there has been curiosity as to the details.

Charles A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, yesterday explained:—

"All the subscribers to the symphony concerts of the past season who have registered their seats with the management are receiving this week subscription cards which will enable them to retain those seats for the concerts of 1916-17.

"The management feels that a great step for the better has been taken in abolishing the auction sales. For the patrons of the concerts the fixed price subscription means a minimum of trouble in securing seats and an exact knowledge of the price they must pay for the seats they want. For the management it means an exact knowledge of the resources on which to base the annual budget.

"In fixing the prices it has been the task of the management so to scale the house for both series that the total receipts from the sales will meet the minimum requirements of the orchestra from the Boston concerts; and at the same time, maintain the average of prices for various parts of the house within the limits shown by the auction sales of the past several years.

"The prices of the Friday and Saturday concerts will be the same, but, owing to differences in division, the average cost of the seats for Friday will be higher than for Saturday. This is made necessary by the fact that for the Friday concerts the entire second balcony, or 505 seats, is not included in the subscription sale, these seats being held out, as in the past, to be sold at the door on the days of the concerts at 25 cents each.

"For both series the top price of season tickets will be $60. The bottom price for the Friday concerts will be $24; for the Saturday concerts $15, this being the price of all the seats in the second balcony except those in the front row. The intermediate prices for Fridays will be $48 and $36: for Saturday, $48, $36 and $24.

"The records of the auction sales of the past several years show that patrons will pay for their seats practically the average price they have paid during those years.

"Holders of registered seats have until June 1 in which to subscribe for them and until September 2 in which to make their payments. All seats which have not been subscribed for by June 1 will be offered for sale to the general public.

"Plans are already in the making for a season of unusual brilliancy. In the personnel there will be few, if any changes. The list of soloists includes several who are appearing with the Symphony Orchestras for the first time.

"There will be seven singers, six of them women. The women will be Julia Culp, Emmy Destinn, Johanna Gadski, Elena Gerhardt, Louise Homer and Melanie Kurt. All of these have appeared with the orchestra one or more times, except Mme. Kurt, who was first heard in Boston this spring with the Metropolitan Opera Company. The seventh singer will be John McCormack.

"There will be five pianists: I. J. Paderewski, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Ernest Schelling, Carl Friedberg and Heinrich Gebhard. Of these Mr. Friedberg is making his first appearance with the orchestra. He has been heard here in recital, making a most favorable impression. The violinists will be four: Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack. The last two named are, of course, drawn from the orchestra, and Mr. Spalding will make his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The other two soloists now announced are Heinrich Warnke and Josef Malkin, the admirable 'cellists of the orchestra. In all there will be soloists at 18 out of 24 pairs of concerts. This is the largest number the orchestra has had since Mr. Gericke's days and the quality has never been higher."

Saturday
May 13th

$60 TOP PRICE FOR SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS

Minimum Prices $24 for Fridays and $15 for Saturdays.

"RUSH SEATS" FOR FRIDAYS RETAINED

New System Replaces Sale by Auction—McCormack Among Soloists.

Beginning with next season, the subscription prices of seats for the Friday afternoon Symphony concerts will range from $24 to $60; for the Saturday night concerts, from $15 to $60. So the management announced yesterday. This schedule is the outcome of the decision to do away with the traditional auction sale of seats.

It was also announced that John McCormack, the celebrated Irish tenor, will make his first appearance as a Symphony soloist next season. There will be 18 soloists for the 24 pairs of concerts, which is the largest number in many years. The official statement says:

Equalizing Cost of Seats

"In fixing the prices it has been the task of the management so to scale the house for both series that the total receipts from the sales will meet the minimum requirements of the orchestra from the Boston concerts and, at the same time, maintain the average of prices for various parts of the house within the limits shown by the auction sales of the past several years. One of the chief objections to the auction sales has been the great inequality of prices from the maximum to the minimum, and to regulate this has been the most difficult part of the work.

"The prices of the Friday and Saturday concerts will be the same, but, owing to differences in division, the average cost of the seats for Friday will be higher than for Saturday. This is made necessary by the fact that for Friday concerts the entire second balcony, or 505 seats, is not included in the subscription sale, these seats being held out as in the past, to be sold at the door on the days of the concerts at 25 cents each.

"For both series the top price of season tickets will be $60. The bottom price for the Friday concerts will be $24, for the Saturday concerts $15, this being the price of all the seats in the second balcony except those in the front row. The intermediate prices for Fridays will be $48 and $36; for Saturdays $48, $36 and $24.

New Prices Strike Average

"The records of the auction sales of the past several years show that patrons will pay for their seats practically the average price they have paid during those years. For Friday afternoons a number of seats in the middle of the hall, which have brought very high prices, will cost considerably less.

"The bulk of the seats for the Saturday evening concerts are very moderate in price. For example, on the floor alone there will be practically 500 seats at $24 each or $1 per concert. These comprise nearly all the seats back of the broad aisle. Again, while for Friday afternoons the greater part of the center section in front of the broad aisle will be sold at $60 per seat, for the Saturday evening concerts only a few of the most sought-for seats in that section have been placed at that price.

"Holders of registered seats have until June 1 in which to subscribe for them and until Sept. 2 in which to make their payments. All seats which have not been subscribed for by June 1 will be offered for sale to the general public."

Dr. Muck will return next season, and there will be few, if any, changes in the personnel of the orchestra. The soloists will include Mr. McCormack, Julia Culp, Emmy Destinn, Elena Gerhardt, Louise Homer, Melanie Kurt, Paderewski, Gabrilowitsch, Ernest Schelling, Carl Friedburg, Heinrich Gebhard, Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, Anton Witek, Sylvain Noack, Heinrich Warnke and Josef Malkin.

Advertiser
—May 13—

ELLIS EXPLAINS SYMPHONY PLANS

FIXED PRICES REPLACE FORMER AUCTION SALES

John McCormack and Mme. Kurt New Soloists—Friedberg Added to Pianists

Since last fall, when it was announced that the custom of selling season tickets for the Symphony concerts by auction, which had been in vogue from the early years of the orchestra, would be abandoned in the season of 1916-17 for a subscription at fixed prices, there has been curiosity as to the details.

Charles A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, yesterday explained:—

"All the subscribers to the symphony concerts of the past season who have registered their seats with the management are receiving this week subscription cards which will enable them to retain those seats for the concerts of 1916-17.

"The management feels that a great step for the better has been taken in abolishing the auction sales. For the patrons of the concerts the fixed price subscription means a minimum of trouble in securing seats and an exact knowledge of the price they must pay for the seats they want. For the management it means an exact knowledge of the resources on which to base the annual budget.

"In fixing the prices it has been the task of the management so to scale the house for both series that the total receipts from the sales will meet the minimum requirements of the orchestra from the Boston concerts; and at the same time, maintain the average of prices for various parts of the house within the limits shown by the auction sales of the past several years.

"The prices of the Friday and Saturday concerts will be the same, but, owing to differences in division, the average cost of the seats for Friday will be higher than for Saturday. This is made necessary by the fact that for the Friday concerts the entire second balcony, or 505 seats, is not included in the subscription sale, these seats being held out, as in the past, to be sold at the door on the days of the concerts at 25 cents each.

"For both series the top price of season tickets will be $60. The bottom price for the Friday concerts will be $24; for the Saturday concerts $15, this being the price of all the seats in the second balcony except those in the front row. The intermediate prices for Fridays will be $48 and $36; for Saturday, $48, $36 and $24.

"The records of the auction sales of the past several years show that patrons will pay for their seats practically the average price they have paid during those years.

"Holders of registered seats have until June 1 in which to subscribe for them and until September 2 in which to make their payments. All seats which have not been subscribed for by June 1 will be offered for sale to the general public.

"Plans are already in the making for a season of unusual brilliancy. In the personnel there will be few, if any changes. The list of soloists includes several who are appearing with the Symphony Orchestras for the first time.

"There will be seven singers, six of them women. The women will be Julia Culp, Emmy Destinn, Johanna Gadski, Elena Gerhardt, Louise Homer and Melanie Kurt. All of these have appeared with the orchestra one or more times, except Mme. Kurt, who was first heard in Boston this spring with the Metropolitan Opera Company. The seventh singer will be John McCormack.

"There will be five pianists: I. J. Paderewski, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Ernest Schelling, Carl Friedberg and Heinrich Gebhard. Of these Mr. Friedberg is making his first appearance with the orchestra. He has been heard here in recital, making a most favorable impression. The violinists will be four: Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack. The last two named are, of course, drawn from the orchestra, and Mr. Spalding will make his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The other two soloists now announced are Heinrich Warnke and Josef Malkin, the admirable 'cellists of the orchestra. In all there will be soloists at 18 out of 24 pairs of concerts. This is the largest number the orchestra has had since Mr. Gericke's days and the quality has never been higher."

Herald
May 13th

NEXT SEASON'S SYMPHONY SEAT PRICES FIXED

Scale That Takes the Place of Auction System Is Announced—Average Higher for Friday Afternoons Than for Saturday Nights—Range from $60 to $15 for Series.

Since last fall when it was announced that the custom of selling season tickets for the Symphony concerts by auction would be abandoned in the season of 1916-17 for a subscription at fixed prices, there has been curiosity as to what the scale of prices would be for the coming seasons. The problem has been settled. Charles A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, gives the details in the following statement made yesterday:

"All the subscribers to the Symphony concerts of the past season who have registered their seats with the managements are receiving this week subscription cards which will enable them to retain those seats for the concerts of 1916-'17, together with diagrams which show the fixed prices of subscription and the manner in which the hall has been divided.

Problem Difficult.

"The problem of fixing the prices of seats for the Friday and Saturday series has presented many difficulties and it is hoped that these have been solved to the satisfaction of all concerned. The management feels that a great step for the better has been taken in abolishing the auction sales. For the patrons of the concerts, the fixed price subscription means a minimum of trouble in securing seats and an exact knowledge of the price they must pay for the seats they want. For the management, it means an exact knowledge of the resources on which to base the annual budget.

"In fixing the prices it has been the task of the management so to scale the house for both series that the total receipts from the sales will meet the minimum requirements of the orchestra from the Boston concerts; and, at the same time, maintain the average of prices for various parts of the house within the limits shown by the auction sales of the past several years.

"One of the chief objections to the auction sales has been the great inequality of prices from the maximum to the minimum and to regulate this has been the most difficult part of the work.

"The prices of the Friday and Saturday concerts will be the same, but owing to the differences in division the average cost of the seats for Friday will be higher than for Saturday. This is made necessary by the fact that for the Friday concerts the entire second balcony, or 505 seats, is not included in the subscription sale, these seats being held out, as in the past, to be sold at the door on the days of the concerts at 25 cents each.

Highest Prices $60 for Season.

"For both series the top price of season tickets will be $60. The bottom price for the Friday concerts will be $24; for the Saturday concerts $15, this being the price of all the seats in the second balcony except those in the front row. The intermediate prices for Fridays will be $48 and $36; for Saturdays, $48, $36 and $24.

"The records of the auction sales of the past several years show that patrons will pay for their seats practically the average price they have paid during those years. For Friday afternoons a number of seats in the middle of the hall, which have brought very high prices, will cost considerably less. The bulk of the seats for the Saturday evening concerts are very moderate in price. For example, on the floor alone there will be practically 500 seats at $24 each, or $1 per concert. These comprise nearly all the seats back of the broad aisle. Again, while for Friday afternoons the greater part of the centre section in front of the broad aisle will be sold at $60 per seat, for the Saturday evening concerts only a few of the most sought-for seats in that section have been placed at that price.

"Holders of registered seats have until June 1 in which to subscribe for them and until Sept. 2 in which to make their payments. All seats which have not been subscribed for by June 1 will be offered for sale to the general public.

Brilliant Season Planned.

"Plans are already in the making for a season of unusual brilliancy. Dr. Muck, of course, will be at the head of the orchestra, and in the personnel there will be few, if any, changes from that of this year. The list of soloists is more comprehensive than it has been in many seasons, and on it will be found the names of several artists who are appearing with the Symphony orchestra for the first time.

"There will be seven singers, six of them women. The women will be Julia Culp, Emmy Destinn, Johanna Gadski, Elena Gerhardt, Louise Homer and Melanie Kurt. All of these have appeared with the orchestra one or more times except Mme. Kurt, who was first heard in Boston this spring with the Metropolitan Opera Company. The seventh singer will be John McCormack.

"There will be five pianists—I. J. Paderewski, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Ernest Schelling, Carl Friedberg and Heinrich Gebhard. Of these, Mr. Friedberg is making his first appearance with the orchestra. He has been heard here in recital, making a most favorable impression. The violinists will be four—Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, Anton tek and Sylvian Noack. The last two named are, of course, drawn from the orchestra, and Mr. Spalding will make his first appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

"The other two soloists now announced are Heinrich Warnke and Josef Malkin, the admirable 'cellists of the orchestra. In all, there will be soloists at 18 out of the 24 pairs of concerts. This is the largest number the orchestra has had since Mr. Gericke's days, and the quality has never been higher."

Advertiser
May 10

CROWD PLEASED AT FIRST "POP" CONCERT

VARIOUS NUMBERS WARMLY GREETED

Ernest Schmidt Conducts and His "Red, White and Blue" Evokes Applause

The opening of the "Pops" last night proved that they are still as popular as in past years. Enthusiastic applause greeted each number. Ernest Schmidt conducted in his usual pleasing manner and his composition, "Red, White and Blue" was well received. The attendance was large.

Other numbers which pleased included a selection from "The Jewels of the Madonna," by Wolfe-Ferrari, Dvorak's "Humoreske" and "Andante from 'cello concerto."

The program follows:—

Coronation March, "The Prophet" Meyerbeer
Overture, "Der Freischutz"........Weber
Indian Dance ....MacDowell
Selection, "Jewels of the Madonna" Wolf-Ferrari
Overture, "Tannhauser"...........Wagner
Andante from 'Cello Concerto.....Dvorak
Selection, "Die Meistersinger"....Wagner
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1..........Liszt
March, "Red-White-Blue"........Schmidt
Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea," Suppe
"Humoreske" ....Dvorak
American Patrol ....Meacham

The Pops Tonight

The program for the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall this evening is as follows:—

RUSSIAN NIGHT

Festival March, from "Antar" Rimsky-Korsakoff
Overture, "The Life for the Tsar".....Glinka
Andante, from a Piano Sonata.....Glazounoff
Finlandia ....Sibelius
Suite, "Nutcracker"; "Song Without Words"; Pizzicato Serenade; Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky
Cortège de Bacchus, from "Feramors" Rubinstein
Menuet a' l'Antique...............Paderewsky
"Karaminskeya" ....Glinka
Waltz, "La Czarine"......................Ganne

Saturday
May 13th

$60 TOP PRICE FOR SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS

Minimum Prices $24 for Fridays and $15 for Saturdays.

"RUSH SEATS" FOR FRIDAYS RETAINED

New System Replaces Sale by Auction—McCormack Among Soloists.

Beginning with next season, the subscrption prices of seats for the Friday afternoon Symphony concerts will range from $24 to $60; for the Saturday night concerts, from $15 to $60. So the management announced yesterday. This schedule is the outcome of the decision to do away with the traditional auction sale of seats.

It was also announced that John McCormack, the celebrated Irish tenor, will make his first appearance as a Symphony soloist next season. There will be 18 soloists for the 24 pairs of concerts, which is the largest number in many years. The official statement says:

Equalizing Cost of Seats

"In fixing the prices it has been the task of the management so to scale the house for both series that the total receipts from the sales will meet the minimum requirements of the orchestra from the Boston concerts and, at the same time, maintain the average of prices for various parts of the house within the limits shown by the auction sales of the past several years. One of the chief objections to the auction sales has been the great inequality of prices from the maximum to the minimum, and to regulate this has been the most difficult part of the work.

"The prices of the Friday and Saturday concerts will be the same, but, owing to differences in division, the average cost of the seats for Friday will be higher than for Saturday. This is made necessary by the fact that for Friday concerts the entire second balcony, or 505 seats, is not included in the subscription sale, these seats being held out as in the past, to be sold at the door on the days of the concerts at 25 cents each.

"For both series the top price of season tickets will be $60. The bottom price for the Friday concerts will be $24, for the Saturday concerts $15, this being the price of all the seats in the second balcony except those in the front row. The intermediate prices for Fridays will be $48 and $36; for Saturdays $48, $36 and $24.

New Prices Strike Average

"The records of the auction sales of the past several years show that patrons will pay for their seats practically the average price they have paid during those years. For Friday afternoons a number of seats in the middle of the hall, which have brought very high prices, will cost considerably less.

"The bulk of the seats for the Saturday evening concerts are very moderate in price. For example, on the floor alone there will be practically 500 seats at $24 each or $1 per concert. These comprise nearly all the seats back of the broad aisle. Again, while for Friday afternoons the greater part of the center section in front of the broad aisle will be sold at $60 per seat, for the Saturday evening concerts only a few of the most sought-for seats in that section have been placed at that price.

"Holders of registered seats have until June 1 in which to subscribe for them and until Sept. 2 in which to make their payments. All seats which have not been subscribed for by June 1 will be offered for sale to the general public."

Dr. Muck will return next season, and there will be few, if any, changes in the personnel of the orchestra. The soloists will include Mr. McCormack, Julia Culp, Emmy Destinn, Elena Gerhardt, Louise Homer, Melanie Kurt, Paderewski, Gabrilowitsch, Ernest Schelling, Carl Friedburg, Heinrich Gebhard, Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, Anton Witek, Sylvain Noack, Heinrich Warnke and Josef Malkin.

Advertiser
— May 13 —

ELLIS EXPLAINS SYMPHONY PLANS

FIXED PRICES REPLACE FORMER AUCTION SALES

John McCormack and Mme. Kurt New Soloists—Friedberg Added to Pianists

Since last fall, when it was announced that the custom of selling season tickets for the Symphony concerts by auction, which had been in vogue from the early years of the orchestra, would be abandoned in the season of 1916-17 for a subscription at fixed prices, there has been curiosity as to the details.

Charles A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, yesterday explained:—

"All the subscribers to the symphony concerts of the past season who have registered their seats with the management are receiving this week subscription cards which will enable them to retain those seats for the concerts of 1916-17.

"The management feels that a great step for the better has been taken in abolishing the auction sales. For the patrons of the concerts the fixed price subscription means a minimum of trouble in securing seats and an exact knowledge of the price they must pay for the seats they want. For the management it means an exact knowledge of the resources on which to base the annual budget.

"In fixing the prices it has been the task of the management so to scale the house for both series that the total receipts from the sales will meet the minimum requirements of the orchestra from the Boston concerts; and at the same time, maintain the average of prices for various parts of the house within the limits shown by the auction sales of the past several years.

"The prices of the Friday and Saturday concerts will be the same, but, owing to differences in division, the average cost of the seats for Friday will be higher than for Saturday. This is made necessary by the fact that for the Friday concerts the entire second balcony, or 505 seats, is not included in the subscription sale, these seats being held out, as in the past, to be sold at the door on the days of the concerts at 25 cents each.

"For both series the top price of season tickets will be $60. The bottom price for the Friday concerts will be $24; for the Saturday concerts $15, this being the price of all the seats in the second balcony except those in the front row. The intermediate prices for Fridays will be $48 and $36; for Saturday, $48, $36 and $24.

"The records of the auction sales of the past several years show that patrons will pay for their seats practically the average price they have paid during those years.

"Holders of registered seats have until June 1 in which to subscribe for them and until September 2 in which to make their payments. All seats which have not been subscribed for by June 1 will be offered for sale to the general public.

"Plans are already in the making for a season of unusual brilliancy. In the personnel there will be few, if any changes. The list of soloists includes several who are appearing with the Symphony Orchestras for the first time.

"There will be seven singers, six of them women. The women will be Julia Culp, Emmy Destinn, Johanna Gadski, Elena Gerhardt, Louise Homer and Melanie Kurt. All of these have appeared with the orchestra one or more times, except Mme. Kurt, who was first heard in Boston this spring with the Metropolitan Opera Company. The seventh singer will be John McCormack.

"There will be five pianists: I. J. Paderewski, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Ernest Schelling, Carl Friedberg and Heinrich Gebhard. Of these Mr. Friedberg is making his first appearance with the orchestra. He has been heard here in recital, making a most favorable impression. The violinists will be four: Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack. The last two named are, of course, drawn from the orchestra, and Mr. Spalding will make his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The other two soloists now announced are Heinrich Warnke and Josef Malkin, the admirable 'cellists of the orchestra. In all there will be soloists at 18 out of 24 pairs of concerts. This is the largest number the orchestra has had since Mr. Gericke's days and the quality has never been higher."

Herald
May 13th

NEXT ~~SEASON'S~~ SYMPHONY SEAT PRICES FIXED

Scale That Takes the Place of Auction System Is Announced—Average Higher for Friday Afternoons Than for Saturday Nights—Range from $60 to $15 for Series.

Since last fall when it was announced that the custom of selling season tickets for the Symphony concerts by auction would be abandoned in the season of 1916-17 for a subscription at fixed prices, there has been curiosity as to what the scale of prices would be for the coming seasons. The problem has been settled. Charles A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, gives the details in the following statement made yesterday:

"All the subscribers to the Symphony concerts of the past season who have registered their seats with the managements are receiving this week subscription cards which will enable them to retain those seats for the concerts of 1916-'17, together with diagrams which show the fixed prices of subscription and the manner in which the hall has been divided.

Problem Difficult.

"The problem of fixing the prices of seats for the Friday and Saturday series has presented many difficulties and it is hoped that these have been solved to the satisfaction of all concerned. The management feels that a great step for the better has been taken in abolishing the auction sales. For the patrons of the concerts, the fixed price subscription means a minimum of trouble in securing seats and an exact knowledge of the price they must pay for the seats they want. For the management, it means an exact knowledge of the resources on which to base the annual budget.

"In fixing the prices it has been the task of the management so to scale the house for both series that the total receipts from the sales will meet the minimum requirements of the orchestra from the Boston concerts; and, at the same time, maintain the average of prices for various parts of the house within the limits shown by the auction sales of the past several years.

"One of the chief objections to the auction sales has been the great inequality of prices from the maximum to the minimum and to regulate this has been the most difficult part of the work.

"The prices of the Friday and Saturday concerts will be the same, but owing to the differences in division the average cost of the seats for Friday will be higher than for Saturday. This is made necessary by the fact that for the Friday concerts the entire second balcony, or 505 seats, is not included in the subscription sale, these seats being held out, as in the past, to be sold at the door on the days of the concerts at 25 cents each.

Highest Prices $60 for Season.

"For both series the top price of season tickets will be $60. The bottom price for the Friday concerts will be $24; for the Saturday concerts $15, this being the price of all the seats in the second balcony except those in the front row. The intermediate prices for Fridays will be $48 and $36; for Saturdays, $48, $36 and $24.

"The records of the auction sales of the past several years show that patrons will pay for their seats practically the average price they have paid during those years. For Friday afternoons a number of seats in the middle of the hall, which have brought very high prices, will cost considerably less. The bulk of the seats for the Saturday evening concerts are very moderate in price. For example, on the floor alone there will be practically 500 seats at $24 each, or $1 per concert. These comprise nearly all the seats back of the broad aisle. Again, while for Friday afternoons the greater part of the centre section in front of the broad aisle will be sold at $60 per seat, for the Saturday evening concerts only a few of the most sought-for seats in that section have been placed at that price.

"Holders of registered seats have until June 1 in which to subscribe for them and until Sept. 2 in which to make their payments. All seats which have not been subscribed for by June 1 will be offered for sale to the general public.

Brilliant Season Planned.

"Plans are already in the making for a season of unusual brilliancy. Dr. Muck, of course, will be at the head of the orchestra, and in the personnel there will be few, if any, changes from that of this year. The list of soloists is more comprehensive than it has been in many seasons, and on it will be found the names of several artists who are appearing with the Symphony orchestra for the first time.

"There will be seven singers, six of them women. The women will be Julia Culp, Emmy Destinn, Johanna Gadski, Elena Gerhardt, Louise Homer and Melanie Kurt. All of these have appeared with the orchestra one or more times except Mme. Kurt, who was first heard in Boston this spring with the Metropolitan Opera Company. The seventh singer will be John McCormack.

"There will be five pianists—I. J. Paderewski, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Ernest Schelling, Carl Friedberg and Heinrich Gebhard. Of these, Mr. Friedberg is making his first appearance with the orchestra. He has been heard here in recital, making a most favorable impression. The violinists will be four—Fritz Kreisler, Albert Spalding, Anton Witek and Sylvian Noack. The last two named are, of course, drawn from the orchestra, and Mr. Spalding will make his first appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

"The other two soloists now announced are Heinrich Warnke and Josef Malkin, the admirable 'cellists of the orchestra. In all, there will be soloists at 18 out of the 24 pairs of concerts. This is the largest number the orchestra has had since Mr. Gericke's days, and the quality has never been higher."

Advertiser
May 13

CROWD PLEASED AT FIRST "POP" CONCERT

VARIOUS NUMBERS WARMLY GREETED

Ernest Schmidt Conducts and His "Red, White and Blue" Evokes Applause

The opening of the "Pops" last night proved that they are still as popular as in past years. Enthusiastic applause greeted each number. Ernest Schmidt conducted in his usual pleasing manner and his composition, "Red, White and Blue" was well received. The attendance was large.

Other numbers which pleased included a selection from "The Jewels of the Madonna," by Wolfe-Ferrari, Dvorak's "Humoreske" and "Andante from 'cello concerto."

The program follows:—

Coronation March, "The Prophet"	Meyerbeer
Overture, "Der Freischutz"	Weber
Indian Dance	MacDowell
Selection, "Jewels of the Madonna"	Wolf-Ferrari
Overture, "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Andante from 'Cello Concerto	Dvorak
Selection, "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1	Liszt
March, "Red-White-Blue"	Schmidt
Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea,"	Suppe
"Humoreske"	Dvorak
American Patrol	Meacham

The Pops Tonight

The program for the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall this evening is as follows:—

RUSSIAN NIGHT

Festival March, from "Antar"	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Overture, "The Life for the Tsar"	Glinka
Andante, from a Piano Sonata	Glazounoff
Finlandia	Sibelius
Suite, "Nutcracker"; "Song Without Words"; Pizzicato Serenade; Overture, "1812"	Tschaikowsky
Cortege de Bacchus, from "Feramors"	Rubinstein
Menuet a' l'Antique	Paderewsky
"Karaminskeya"	Glinka
Waltz, "La Czarine"	Ganne

Record
May 10 –

SERIOUS MUSIC PLAYED AT THE POPS OPENING

With a larger orchestra and a smaller audience than usual the Pops opened their season at Symphony Hall last evening. Monday there was a special performance for the Women's City Club, so last evening's performance was the first regular performance. It must have surprised some of the inveterate first nighters to see vacant places. There were tables untaken and plenty of balcony seats. Just why is a question. Possibly Boston has not taken too kindly to having a premiere on a Tuesday after the first performance has been made a private affair.

The program was a pretentious one last evening. There was no Sousa march, no Victor Herbert selection, no catchy encore pieces for the multitude. Enricht Schmidt, the conductor, evidently wanted his band presented in the most pretentious repertoire heard by the Pop patrons, so he played much Wagner, MacDowell's highly colored Indian dance, the slow movement from the Dvorak violoncello concerto, with Mr. Keller as soloist, a Liszt rhapsody—the first, not the omnipresent second, etc. His own "Red, White and Blue," an elaborately orchestrated march with many national and near national airs for thematic material, is interestingly written but not especially effective. If the Pops are to maintain as high a standard as last evening, why not go a step farther and play some of the novelties that the Symphony patrons have heard this year, some of the works in shorter form and of quick appeal to the musically educated—such works as "The Adventures in a Perambulator" and "Tam O'Shanter"?

Still for the many the Pops mean light music and we believe the majority of auditors like lighter music than made up the bulk of last evening's program. In realty last evening there was an interesting concert of serious music well played, but the occasion lacked the lightness, the enthusiasm and the gaiety that have made the Pops famous.

The Pops are here and all Boston is glad. They make a delightful place at which one can wile away an evening hearing good music and partaking of light refreshment. Mr. Schmidt will conduct this week and Mr. Maquarre next week. J. V. C.

Herald
May 10

FIRST POP CONCERT OFFERS AN EXCELLENT PROGRAM

Increase in Price of Seats Seems to Affect Attendance.

A fair sized audience attended the opening of the 31st season of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall last night. That a larger crowd was not in attendance was due to two reasons—the increased price of seats on the floor and the fact that the opening was not on the first night of the week.

The floor was fairly well filled, and the second balcony, as usual, was crowded, but in the first balcony there were more empty than filled seats. Conductor Ernest Schmidt and his musicians were freely applauded, and it was necessary to give frequent encores.

All the old-timers were there—from the young girl who always orders pink lemonade and has a whale of a time to the gent who is satisfied only with Scotch ale in a stone bottle.

The selections from "The Jewels of the Madonna" and "Die Meistersinger" and Mr. Keller's numbers were especially enjoyed. The encore numbers included excerpts from "Carmen," entr'acte from "Mignon," "Beautiful Blue Danube" waltz and "Crepuscule," by Massenet.

The program follows:

Coronation March from "The Phophet"... Meyerbeer
Overture, "Der Freischutz"............Weber
Indian Dance........................MacDowel
Selection, "The Jewels of the Madonna"... Wolf-Ferrari
Overture, "Tannhauser"..............Wagner
Andante from Violoncello Concerto.....Dvorak
(Violoncello, Mr. Keller.)
Selection from Act III. "Die Meistersinger"..............................Wagner
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1................Liszt
March, "Red-White-Blue"..............Schmidt
Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea"......Suppe
"Humoreske"..........................Dvorak
American Patrol.......................Meacham

Tonight is Russian night.

Monitor
– June 10 –

BOSTON MUSIC NOTES

An announcement in regard to the Symphony orchestra season ticket sales is given out from the office of the manager at Symphony hall as follows:

The subscription sale of season tickets for next year's symphony concerts, which has been in progress since the middle of last month, far surpasses the highest expectations of the management. Only now are the books open to that part of the musical public which did not own seats for the concerts of 1915-1916, or failed to register their seats, but the subscription has progressed far enough to make it certain that next year, as in the past, the Friday afternoon concerts will be entirely sold out, and that the number of seats sold for the Saturday evening concerts will be larger than it has been for many years past.

There are still available to the public excellent seats for both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series, at all prices, but it will be wise for those expecting to subscribe to apply for their seats this spring, as interest in the concerts and the subscription shows itself to be unusually keen. The very gratifying feature about this subscription is that it has already proved that the management has made no mistake in giving up the old method of selling seats by auction and substituting for this a subscription at fixed prices. There have been practically no criticisms of the scale of prices and the patrons of the concerts seem to be thoroughly satisfied with the new method.

The concerts of the Friday afternoon series will begin Oct. 13, and those of the Saturday evening series Oct. 14. There will be 24 of each.

The Pop Concerts

Mr. Maquarre concludes his term of directing the pop concerts in Symphony hall tonight. For the next two weeks Mr. Schmidt will conduct and for the two final weeks of the series Mr. Lenom will conduct. On Monday, Tuesday and Thursday evenings of the coming week members of organizations of various kinds will occupy a large part of the hall. On Wednesday evening there will be no concert. The program for tonight is as follows:

Festival march, Triebel; music from "Feramors," Rubinstein; waltz, "España," Waldteufel; selection, "Pom Pom," Felix; overture, "William Tell," Rossini; selection, "La Bohème," Puccini; violin solo, rhapsodie Hongroise, Auer Mr. Theodorowicz); "Chanson D'Amour," Maquarre; overture, "Tannhäuser," Wagner; largo, Handel; Japanese love-song, Thomas; American fantasy, Herbert.

Transcript
– June 10 –

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The subscription sale of season tickets for next year's Symphony Concerts, which has been in progress since the middle of last month, far surpasses the highest expectations of the management. Only now are the books open to that part of the musical public which did not own seats for the concerts of 1915-1916, or failed to register their seats, but the subscription has progressed far enough to make it certain that next year, as in the past, the Friday afternoon concerts will be entirely sold out, and that the number of seats sold for the Saturday evening concerts will be larger than it has been for many years past.

There are still available to the public excellent seats for both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series, at all prices, but it will be wise for those expecting to subscribe to apply for their seats this spring, as interest in the concerts and the subscription shows itself to be unusually keen. The gratifying feature about this subscription is that it has already proved that the management has made no mistake in giving up the old method of selling seats by auction and substituting for this a subscription at fixed prices. There have been practically no criticisms of the scale of prices and the patrons of the concerts seem to be thoroughly satisfied with the new method.

As already announced, concerts will begin next October; the Friday afternoon series Oct. 13 and the Saturday evening series Oct. 14. There will be twenty-four of each. The list of soloists engaged for these concerts is most comprehensive, and includes not only all of the great well-known artists in the country, but several artists who will be making their first appearances with the Symphony Orchestra. Applications for seats should be made to C. A. Ellis, manager, at Symphony Hall.

Monitor
– May 20 –

BOSTON MUSICAL NOTES

Symphony hall reports that the response which has been made by the patrons of the Symphony concerts to the announcement made by the management last week concerning the prices which will be charged for the concerts of the coming season has been gratifying. Although there has been some criticism, there has been much approval of the scale of prices and the various divisions of the house for the Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. The Symphony subscribers are prompt in taking up their seats for next year. A large number of changes in location are asked, but these cannot be reached until well toward the end of next month.

The general plan of the management is, first, to take care of simple renewals for seats held the past season. Those who have registered have until June 1 in which to renew. After these have been disposed of, those who have registered who want additional seats, or ask for changes, will be taken care of. Finally, seats will be allotted to new applicants. These new applicants can hardly be reached before the summer. Mr. Ellis is more convinced than ever that the changing of the method of disposing of the seats was a wise move, and that it meets fully the approval of the patrons of the concerts.

Third Week of the Pops

Ernst Schmidt resumes his place as conductor of the Pops during the coming week. Attendance thus far has been good and the public seems well satisfied with the programs and the manner in which they are played. Mr. Schmidt, for the coming week, has met the many requests that have been sent in to make his programs somewhat lighter and the list of pieces for each night will be found to be popular in all senses of the word.

The one special night of the week will come Friday evening, when the alumni of the Roxbury Latin school hold their annual reunion. The program for this was chosen largely by the committee in charge. Moreover, the orchestra on that evening will have the assistance of the Harvard University Glee Club quartet, which will sing songs in the intermission.

For Tuesday night Mr. Schmidt has arranged a program devoted almost entirely to French composers. On that evening Mr. Brooke, one of the flautists of the orchestra, will be soloist. Mr. Maquarre will make his last appearance for the present at tonight's concert and has arranged the following program:

March, "Merry Soldiers," Sabathil; selection, "The Prima Donna," Herbert; waltz, "Girls of Baden," Komzak; overture, "Poet and Peasant," Suppé; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; organ solos, (a) benediction, Karg-Elert, (b) march in E flat, Faulkes, Mr. Marshall; selection, "Aida," Verdi; march, "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar, organ, Mr. Marshall; overture, "Tannhäuser," Wagner; reverie, Rissland, violin, Mr. Hoffman, harp, Mr. Cella; organ, Mr. Marshall. Selection, march, "Frisch d'rauf los," Blon.

Transcript
– May 16 –

MAQUARRE AT THE POPS

The Well-Liked Conductor Returns to the Summer Orchestra in a Characteristic Programme

FOR the first time this spring, Mr. Maquarre conducted at The Pops last evening and brought the orchestra as he might under the suavity and elegance of his touch. But it is a band accustomed to go pretty much its own way without yielding to the sternest conductor except as the serious business of a season's concerts compels the condescension. And what a band, even in these lighter moments! Even in the freer atmosphere of The Pops it keeps to its glories. Going its own gait in these humors of bonhomie, it could still provide any city with a great orchestra. In the serene surety that has come to it in these long years of association, it might easily play—a Pop programme, at least—without a conductor. Little is left to its leader but his choice of programmes and of tempi. Indeed, these lighter concerts disclose, too often without deserved notice, new virtuosities in the band. The lighter music calls out of it an unsuspected and almost frisky mobility and deftness. Mr. Maquarre's best efforts are toward this very deftness and elegance. While he conducted a symphony orchestra, he never forgot that he was conducting, except in the few pièces de résistance, music of a sportive character, and he realized, with elegance and charm, all the humor that comes of applying such ponderous musical resources to waltzes, to the airs of the music comedy, to idyls like his own graceful "Clair de la Lune" and the Intermezzo, likewise his own, which he was good enough to play as an encore. As a matter of course the evening was not allowed to pass without the inevitable "Largo"—beautifully played, by the way, [illegible] testimony to [illegible]nding of old

---

Boston Globe
– May 6 –

LAST SYMPHONY

Dr Muck Ends Season With Liszt and Wagner

"Dante" Symphony and "Tristan" Inspire Conductor and Players

Remembering the deep impression Liszt's "Faust" symphony made at the two performances last year, Dr Muck reserved for the closing concerts of the season the symphony after Dante's "Divine Comedy." The division of the program with Wagner was grateful as a parting exception and curiously appropriate. Hearing the preludes to "Tristan and Isolda" and to "Parsifal" after Liszt's "Dante" music, Wagner's debt to his friend and predecessor was the clearer.

Liszt said he could wait for the recognition given him begrudgingly as a composer which flowed lavishly upon him as a virtuoso pianist. What orchestra of his day would have taken sufficient pains even if it had the technic to rehearse the music of the "Inferno" thoroughly? Although the formulas and harmonic devices are comparatively simple, how dramatic are passages in this movement—the last measures portentious with awe and terror, as played yesterday strikingly suggestive of doom, of stupendous shock, of infernal wars; the proclamation of dreadful warning by the brass, "all hope abondon," intensified as it is repeated; the cries of despair and rage of the damned; the graphic uses of orchestral color in which none but Berlioz had pointed the way, as in the revolutionary writing for double basses, who like a crew of snarling demons, gave effects not to be found in any other instrument or choir.

Development in this section may seem too extended, too diffuse for modern ears, as that in the following one of Purgatories and Magnificat, or as the Gretchen music in the "Faust," but this second movement of the Dante completes the broad, all understanding nature. Eloquent in sardonic raillery, Liszt, the able and mystic, the great romanticist to whom all life was a thing of character and beauty, has written of aspiration, at times ennobled, purged of the strife and pomp of the world, music which was as integral a part of his subconsciousness as that of diabolical frenzy which preceded.

The performance was actuated throughout by a spirit of love and reverence. Dr Muck's preparation clearly had been that of minute care in detail as in the broad lines of dramatic feeling. The orchestra played as a body of virtuosi, not merely as brilliant technicians in the infernal conflict, but as interpreters. Never was Mr Longy's art more resplendent. The chorus of women from the Musical Art Club rehearsed by Stephen S. Townsend, their conductor, sang with good tone, intonation and security.

Three Wagnerian excerpts—the prelude to "Tristan and Isolda," funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods" and prelude to "Parsifal"—were read and played with nobility of feeling and a wealth of beauty. The impassioned note in the "Tristan" distinguished and glorified its broadly sustained song. Dr Muck was given the prolonged greeting habitual to the day when he first appeared. After the Liszt and again after the group of Wagner he called the orchestra to its feet. After many novelties of fretful, noisy or obvious effort, how significant the music of this program which, with the exception of the "Parsifal" of advancing years, is more vital today than when it was written.

Record
May 10 –

SERIOUS MUSIC PLAYED AT THE POPS OPENING

With a larger orchestra and a smaller audience than usual the Pops opened their season at Symphony Hall last evening. Monday there was a special performance for the Women's City Club, so last evening's performance was the first regular performance. It must have surprised some of the inveterate first nighters to see vacant places. There were tables untaken and plenty of balcony seats. Just why is a question. Possibly Boston has not taken too kindly to having a premiere on a Tuesday after the first performance has been made a private affair.

The program was a pretentious one last evening. There was no Sousa march, no Victor Herbert selection, no catchy encore pieces for the multitude. Enricht Schmidt, the conductor, evidently wanted his band presented in the most pretentious repertoire heard by the Pop patrons, so he played much Wagner, MacDowell's highly colored Indian dance, the slow movement from the Dvorak violoncello concerto, with Mr. Keller as soloist, a Liszt rhapsody—the first, not the omnipresent second, etc. His own "Red, White and Blue," an elaborately orchestrated march with many national and near national airs for thematic material, is interestingly written but not especially effective. If the Pops are to maintain as high a standard as last evening, why not go a step farther and play some of the novelties that the Symphony patrons have heard this year, some of the works in shorter form and of quick appeal to the musically educated—such works as "The Adventures in a Perambulator" and "Tam O'Shanter"?

Still for the many the Pops mean light music and we believe the majority of auditors like lighter music than made up the bulk of last evening's program. In realty last evening there was an interesting concert of serious music well played, but the occasion lacked the lightness, the enthusiasm and the gaiety that have made the Pops famous.

The Pops are here and all Boston is glad. They make a delightful place at which one can wile away an evening hearing good music and partaking of light refreshment. Mr. Schmidt will conduct this week and Mr. Maquarre next week. J. V. C.

Herald
May 1

FIRST POP CONCERT OFFERS AN EXCELLENT PROGRAM

Increase in Price of Seats Seems to Affect Attendance.

A fair sized audience attended the opening of the 31st season of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall last night. That a larger crowd was not in attendance was due to two reasons—the increased price of seats on the floor and the fact that the opening was not on the first night of the week.

The floor was fairly well filled, and the second balcony, as usual, was crowded, but in the first balcony there were more empty than filled seats. Conductor Ernest Schmidt and his musicians were freely applauded, and it was necessary to give frequent encores.

All the old-timers were there—from the young girl who always orders pink lemonade and has a whale of a time to the gent who is satisfied only with Scotch ale in a stone bottle.

The selections from "The Jewels of the Madonna" and "Die Meistersinger" and Mr. Keller's numbers were especially enjoyed. The encore numbers included excerpts from "Carmen," entr'acte from "Mignon," "Beautiful Blue Danube" waltz and "Crepuscule," by Massenet.

The program follows:

Coronation March from "The Phophet"	Meyerbeer
Overture, "Der Freischutz"	Weber
Indian Dance	MacDowel
Selection, "The Jewels of the Madonna"	Wolf-Ferrari
Overture, "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Andante from Violoncello Concerto (Violoncello, Mr. Keller.)	Dvorak
Selection from Act III, "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1	Liszt
March, "Red-White-Blue"	Schmidt
Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea"	Suppe
"Humoreske"	Dvorak
American Patrol	Meacham

Tonight is Russian night.

Monitor
– June 10 –

BOSTON MUSIC NOTES

An announcement in regard to the Symphony orchestra season ticket sales is given out from the office of the manager at Symphony hall as follows:

The subscription sale of season tickets for next year's symphony concerts, which has been in progress since the middle of last month, far surpasses the highest expectations of the management. Only now are the books open to that part of the musical public which did not own seats for the concerts of 1915-1916, or failed to register their seats, but the subscription has progressed far enough to make it certain that next year, as in the past, the Friday afternoon concerts will be entirely sold out, and that the number of seats sold for the Saturday evening concerts will be larger than it has been for many years past.

There are still available to the public excellent seats for both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series, at all prices, but it will be wise for those expecting to subscribe to apply for their seats this spring, as interest in the concerts and the subscription shows itself to be unusually keen. The very gratifying feature about this subscription is that it has already proved that the management has made no mistake in giving up the old method of selling seats by auction and substituting for this a subscription at fixed prices. There have been practically no criticisms of the scale of prices and the patrons of the concerts seem to be thoroughly satisfied with the new method.

The concerts of the Friday afternoon series will begin Oct. 13, and those of the Saturday evening series Oct. 14. There will be 24 of each.

The Pop Concerts

Mr. Maquarre concludes his term of directing the pop concerts in Symphony hall tonight. For the next two weeks Mr. Schmidt will conduct and for the two final weeks of the series Mr. Lenom will conduct. On Monday, Tuesday and Thursday evenings of the coming week members of organizations of various kinds will occupy a large part of the hall. On Wednesday evening there will be no concert. The program for tonight is as follows:

Festival march, Triebel; music from "Feramors," Rubinstein; waltz, "España," Waldteufel; selection, "Pom Pom," Felix; overture, "William Tell," Rossini; selection, "La Bohème," Puccini; violin solo, rhapsodie Hongroise, Auer Mr. Theodorowicz); "Chanson D'Amour," Maquarre; overture, "Tannhäuser," Wagner; largo, Handel; Japanese love-song, Thomas; American fantasy, Herbert.

– June 10 –

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The subscription sale of season tickets for next year's Symphony Concerts, which has been in progress since the middle of last month, far surpasses the highest expectations of the management. Only now are the books open to that part of the musical public which did not own seats for the concerts of 1915-1916, or failed to register their seats, but the subscription has progressed far enough to make it certain that next year, as in the past, the Friday afternoon concerts will be entirely sold out, and that the number of seats sold for the Saturday evening concerts will be larger than it has been for many years past.

There are still available to the public excellent seats for both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series, at all prices, but it will be wise for those expecting to subscribe to apply for their seats this spring, as interest in the concerts and the subscription shows itself to be unusually keen. The gratifying feature about this subscription is that it has already proved that the management has made no mistake in giving up the old method of selling seats by auction and substituting for this a subscription at fixed prices. There have been practically no criticisms of the scale of prices and the patrons of the concerts seem to be thoroughly satisfied with the new method.

As already announced, concerts will begin next October; the Friday afternoon series Oct. 13 and the Saturday evening series Oct. 14. There will be twenty-four of each. The list of soloists engaged for these concerts is most comprehensive, and includes not only all of the great well-known artists in the country, but several artists who will be making their first appearances with the Symphony Orchestra. Applications for seats should be made to C. A. Ellis, manager, at Symphony Hall.

Monitor
– May 20 –

BOSTON MUSICAL NOTES

Symphony hall reports that the response which has been made by the patrons of the Symphony concerts to the announcement made by the management last week concerning the prices which will be charged for the concerts of the coming season has been gratifying. Although there has been some criticism, there has been much approval of the scale of prices and the various divisions of the house for the Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. The Symphony subscribers are prompt in taking up their seats for next year. A large number of changes in location are asked, but these cannot be reached until well toward the end of next month.

The general plan of the management is, first, to take care of simple renewals for seats held the past season. Those who have registered have until June 1 in which to renew. After these have been disposed of, those who have registered who want additional seats, or ask for changes, will be taken care of. Finally, seats will be allotted to new applicants. These new applicants can hardly be reached before the summer. Mr. Ellis is more convinced than ever that the changing of the method of disposing of the seats was a wise move, and that it meets fully the approval of the patrons of the concerts.

Third Week of the Pops

Ernst Schmidt resumes his place as conductor of the Pops during the coming week. Attendance thus far has been good and the public seems well satisfied with the programs and the manner in which they are played. Mr. Schmidt, for the coming week, has met the many requests that have been sent in to make his programs somewhat lighter and the list of pieces for each night will be found to be popular in all senses of the word.

The one special night of the week will come Friday evening, when the alumni of the Roxbury Latin school hold their annual reunion. The program for this was chosen largely by the committee in charge. Moreover, the orchestra on that evening will have the assistance of the Harvard University Glee Club quartet, which will sing songs in the intermission.

For Tuesday night Mr. Schmidt has arranged a program devoted almost entirely to French composers. On that evening Mr. Brooke, one of the flautists of the orchestra, will be soloist. Mr. Maquarre will make his last appearance for the present at tonight's concert and has arranged the following program:

March, "Merry Soldiers," Sabathil; selection, "The Prima Donna," Herbert; waltz, "Girls of Baden," Komzak; overture, "Poet and Peasant," Suppé; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; organ solos, (a) benediction, Karg-Elert, (b) march in E flat, Faulkes, Mr. Marshall; selection, "Aida," Verdi; march, "Pomp and Circumstance." Elgar, organ, Mr. Marshall; overture, "Tannhäuser," Wagner; reverie, Rissland, violin, Mr. Hoffman, harp, Mr. Cella; organ, Mr. Marshall. Selection, march, "Frisch d'rauf los," Blon.

Transcript
– May 16 –

MAQUARRE AT THE POPS

The Well-Liked Conductor Returns to the Summer Orchestra in a Characteristic Programme

FOR the first time this spring, Mr. Maquarre conducted at The Pops last evening and brought the orchestra as he might under the suavity and elegance of his touch. But it is a band accustomed to go pretty much its own way without yielding to the sternest conductor except as the serious business of a season's concerts compels the condescension. And what a band, even in these lighter moments! Even in the freer atmosphere of The Pops it keeps to its glories. Going its own gait in these humors of bonhomie, it could still provide any city with a great orchestra. In the serene surety that has come to it in these long years of association, it might easily play—a Pop programme, at least—without a conductor. Little is left to its leader but his choice of programmes and of tempi. Indeed, these lighter concerts disclose, too often without deserved notice, new virtuosities in the band. The lighter music calls out of it an unsuspected and almost frisky mobility and deftness. Mr. Maquarre's best efforts are toward this very deftness and elegance. While he conducted a symphony orchestra, he never forgot that he was conducting, except in the few pièces de résistance, music of a sportive character, and he realized, with elegance and charm, all the humor that comes of applying such ponderous musical resources to waltzes, to the airs of the music comedy, to idyls like his own graceful "Clair de la Lune" and the Intermezzo, likewise his own, which he was good enough to play as an encore. As a matter of course the evening was not allowed to pass without the inevitable "Largo"—beautifully played, by the way— [illegible] testimony to [illegible]nding of old

---

Boston Globe
– May 6 –

LAST SYMPHONY

Dr Muck Ends Season With Liszt and Wagner

"Dante" Symphony and "Tristan" Inspire Conductor and Players

Remembering the deep impression Liszt's "Faust" symphony made at the two performances last year, Dr Muck reserved for the closing concerts of the season the symphony after Dante's "Divine Comedy." The division of the program with Wagner was grateful as a parting exception and curiously appropriate. Hearing the preludes to "Tristan and Isolda" and to "Parsifal" after Liszt's "Dante" music, Wagner's debt to his friend and predecessor was the clearer.

Liszt said he could wait for the recognition given him begrudgingly as a composer which flowed lavishly upon him as a virtuoso pianist. What orchestra of his day would have taken sufficient pains even if it had the technic to rehearse the music of the "Inferno" thoroughly? Although the formulas and harmonic devices are comparatively simple, how dramatic are passages in this movement—the last measures portentious with awe and terror, as played yesterday strikingly suggestive of doom, of stupendous shock, of infernal wars; the proclamation of dreadful warning by the brass, "all hope abondon," intensified as it is repeated; the cries of despair and rage of the damned; the graphic uses of orchestral color in which none but Berlioz had pointed the way, as in the revolutionary writing for double basses, who like a crew of snarling demons, gave effects not to be found in any other instrument or choir.

Development in this section may seem too extended, too diffuse for modern ears, as that in the following one of Purgatories and Magnificat, or as the Gretchen music in the "Faust," but this second movement of the Dante completes the broad, all understanding nature. Eloquent in sardonic raillery, Liszt, the able and mystic, the great romanticist to whom all life was a thing of character and beauty, has written of aspiration, at times ennobled, purged of the strife and pomp of the world, music which was as integral a part of his subconsciousness as that of diabolical frenzy which preceded.

The performance was actuated throughout by a spirit of love and reverence. Dr Muck's preparation clearly had been that of minute care in detail as in the broad lines of dramatic feeling. The orchestra played as a body of virtuosi, not merely as brilliant technicians in the infernal conflict, but as interpreters. Never was Mr Longy's art more resplendent. The chorus of women from the Musical Art Club rehearsed by Stephen S. Townsend, their conductor, sang with good tone, intonation and security.

Three Wagnerian excerpts—the prelude to "Tristan and Isolda," funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods" and prelude to "Parsifal"—were read and played with nobility of feeling and a wealth of beauty. The impassioned note in the "Tristan" distinguished and glorified its broadly sustained song. Dr Muck was given the prolonged greeting habitual to the day when he first appeared. After the Liszt and again after the group of Wagner he called the orchestra to its feet. After many novelties of fretful, noisy or obvious effort, how significant the music of this program which, with the exception of the "Parsifal" of advancing years, is more vital today than when it was written.

[154]

Post —
— Sat. May 6 —

MANIFEST AFFECTION FOR DR. MUCK

Symphony Audience Demonstrative at Last Matinee

BY OLIN DOWNES

The final afternoon concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The occasion had a twofold significance, first on account of the musical interest of the programme; secondly, because of the unmistakable warmth and cordiality of the reception accorded Dr. Muck, Not in the recollection of any recent season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has a conductor been so heartily farewelled at its close. When Dr. Muck entered, after the performance of the Faust symphony, and at the end of the concert, he was called back to the stage times without number. The orchestra also rose to its feet. The audience was loth to let him go.

APPRECIATION OF AN ARTIST

At least the greeting given Dr. Muck spoke equally for the artistic accomplishments of the season, the appreciation of the audience and the spirit of tolerance and good will which has been maintained between an audience of which the majority is unquestionably pro-ally, and a conductor whose opposing attitude regarding the present conflict is known with equal definiteness.

The man and the conductor have come to hold a high place with the Symphony audiences; the man and the audience have maintained toward each other the high esteem and the sense of hearty cooperation made possible by a common object.

Dr. Muck had elected to conclude his season with the "Dante" symphony of Liszt as one of the performances. His performances of Liszt's "Faust" symphony are still green in the memory, performances of this particular work which will probably never be surpassed in this city. The performance of the "Dante" symphony, in which the woman's chorus from the Musical Art Club of Boston, trained for this performance by Stephen Townsend assisted, fully rewarded expectations. But the days when any symphony or symphonic poem by Liszt was certain in advance to be hissed by the opponents of "the master," and applauded with deafening extravagance by his adherents, are passed and gone, and real values commence to emerge from the dust of the conflict. And in the light of these gradually shaping estimates, it is very questionable whether the Dante symphony will stand nearly as high as the Faust symphony for the generations to come. Grant that in this work, as in nearly every big orchestral work of Liszt, there are ideas, any one of which would have made the fortune of a lesser composer, the fact remains that the Dante symphony has far less intrinsic value than the symphony inspired by Goethe's poem.

Effort at Tone Painting

But perhaps the strictest comparisons are out of place, for the two works are widely diverment in technic as well as in purpose. The "Faust" symphony is a wonderful demonstration of Liszt's methods of building a musical structure, wherein are found the most remarkable evolutions of thematic material, shaped in accordance with a definite philosophic and dramatic purpose. The "Dante" symphony, on the other hand, must be taken as a sort of gigantic musical fresco after Dante. It is not characterisation at which the composer aims, but rather tone-painting in the broadest sense of the word. Unfortunately at times the tone painting is not less extravagant and already out of date than the awful plates of Dore, in editions of Dante's poem, which oppressed the imagination of childhood.

There is much that is very poor, especially in the Inferno section of this symphony. The abuse of the diminished seventh chord which—one says it with fear and trembling—is little better than amateurish. There are other sequences and progressions which imply that even Franz Liszt, the thunder-maker, was at a loss exactly what to do. He certainly wrote too much and too quickly in his lifetime, and we personally believe that even many pages of the "Dante" symphony bear damning evidence to this fact. No doubt in Liszt's day the trombones thundering out the turgid motive "All ye who enter here leave hope behind" made the audience shiver. Audiences then shivered readily. The professional poet and philanderer cut a mighty strong figure, and passion and bombast were the accepted custom. We are [illegible] to weary of bugaboo music.

[illegible] come down to the strict reckoning. The symphony, too, is overlong. The movement, "Purgatorio," is made interesting by its middle section, by progressions far in advance of Liszt's time, and eagerly developed by Cesar Franck. The Magnificat is cunningly and beautifully introduced, with all of that pseudo-mysticism which with Liszt was the baser metal of a spirit, often transfused with real light.

Suggests Church Windows

This, too, is essentially a pictorial effect. Indeed, the whole symphony gives one the impression that some fantastical church windows or mural ornamentation in an edifice of the middle ages might communicate. It is as if the hearer turned from some naive fresco of the sinners blazing in the lower regions to another in which an unknown artist offered his conception of purgatory, and, finally, the eyes fell on a stained window, wherein stiff, medieval saints and virgins were singing from old manuscripts to God. Look at the symphony as you look at the street car, and it is a poor, tawdry affair. Look at it with the religious and philosophic and romantic thought currents of the later 19th century, sousing itself in everything from Chateaubriad to Saint-Simonism in mind, and you find it a work that is fascinating and even sincere!

The performance was in all respects admirable. As much was done for the turgid opening—and how thankful Tschaikowsky must have been for these pages—for the music of the demand, for the episode of Paolo and Francesca, in which Tschaikowsky is incomparably superior to Liszt in the former's poem of that name—as could be done. The music was picturesque, indeed, striking fire from the imagination. And there was the long ascent from the darkness and terror of the lower circles to the gradually increasing light and luminosity of the conclusion.

Playing of Wagner

Still more stirring because of the greater intrinsic value of the music, was the Wagner music.

Other conductors find more that is sensuous in the Tristan music, but the music of Siegfried's death from "Die Gotterdamerung" had a mighty eloquence. It surely ranks among the grandest pages of Wagner. It towers by the side of Beethoven's music for the death of a hero in the 3d symphony. It is runic surcharged with the might of northern myth. Nor was the performance of the mystical prelude of "Parsifal" less worthy of the essential spirit of the music.

BRILLIANT END OF SYMPHONY SEASON

Wagner's Genius Dominates Program — Ovations For Orchestra.

The genius of Wagner dominates these final Symphony concerts and brings the season to a glorious conclusion.

At the matinee concert yesterday the audience paid affecting tribute to Dr. Muck and his matchless orchestra in ovations, first after the performance of Liszt's "Dante" symphony and then at the very end of the concert, following the almost celestial strains of Wagner's "Parsifal" prelude. Many in the audience lingered to recall Dr. Muck again and again.

As for the report that the brilliant conductor might not return, it was officially disposed of by the announcement in the program that the orchestra would open its 36th season Oct. 13; and in the middle of the advertisement is the familiar portrait—taken, apparently, some 10 years ago—captioned, "Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor."

Liszt dedicated his "Dante" symphony to Wagner. "As Virgil led Dante," he said, "so hast thou led me through the mysterious regions of tone-worlds drunk with life." But the "Dante" symphony pales before Liszt's "Faust" symphony; and it seems woefully hollow when heard in the same concert with three such Wagner masterpieces as the preludes to "Tristan and Isolde," and "Parsifal" and the music from the second scene of the third act of "Dusk of the Gods," which is generally known as the funeral music. In the symphony is a chorus for women's voices, and this was beautifully sung by members of the Musical Art Society.

But the truly memorable part of the concert, and the most thrilling event of the closing Symphony season, was the performance of the three Wagner numbers—the unrivaled love music from "Tristan and Isolde," the Olympian themes from "Goetterdaemmerung," and the "Parsifal" music, which Dr. Muck regards as the greatest of Wagner's efforts, and which the world at large has come to regard as something sacred, much as the story of the Grail itself. Prodigious music, beyond question; and on this occasion most worthily performed!

Advertiser
May 6 —

SYMPHONY SEASON BROUGHT TO AN END

LISZT AND WAGNER COMPRISE PROGRAM

Boston Assured of Greatest Orchestra and One of Greatest Conductors in Dr. Muck

BY LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM.

Liszt—"Dante" Symphony.
Wagner—"Tristan and Isolde" Prelude.
Siegfried Funeral Music.
"Parsifal" Prelude.

An entirely orchestral program devoted to Liszt and his son-in-law. Very brief in the statement, but nearly two hours in the performance—two hours of the best and noblest kind of modern music. Dr. Muck has almost discovered Liszt for Boston audiences. No auditor is likely to forget what a revelation his reading of the Liszt "Faust" symphony was in the recent past. The "Dante" symphony (symphony in name only) has not such sublime climaxes as that work, yet it still became more thrilling and exalting than we had ever imagined it to be, because of the magnificent interpretation it received.

In "Faust" the first movement is the least powerful, while in this work the opening picture of the infernal regions is decidedly the greatest part of the work. Time was when the reviewer said of this that it was a picture of hell and it sounded like it; that the "motto" theme of the brasses ought to be "Leave Richter behind all ye who enter here;" but we have become so inured to dissonances that the movement does not seem too intense to the auditor who has experienced and suffered Schoenberg or Stravinsky.

The weather report of Satan's dominions might run "High and variable winds, reaching gale force," and the hurricane lost nothing in its interpretation. But the tender episode of Francesca and Paolo was exquisitely in contrast with this turbulence, and the chromatic touches of the tempest were legitimate and graphic enough. The tubas and trombones were profoundly impressive in the delivery of the baleful inscription upon the gate:—

> "Through me pass on to endless misery;
> Through me they pass who are forever lost."

Equally effective was the monotonous reiteration of the trumpets and horns of the single note E, in the stern command:—

> "Leave Hope behind, all ye who enter here," which appears several times in this exciting movement. The clarinettes played finely in the Francesca episode, the bass clarinette being Dante, the others the two lovers, and here, too, the English horn deserves mention for the expressive touch portraying the lines:—

> "There is no greater sorrow,
> On vanished happiness."
> Than to think back, in days of Misery,

The skill of Liszt in managing the awkward 7-4 rhythm is remarkable, and the "Andante Amoroso" is one of the most beautiful points of this movement, made still stronger by the return of the sweeping hurricane, to contrast with it.

All in all, this first movement is much the strongest part of the work and we cannot hope ever to hear it played better than it was on this occasion.

Purgatory is distinctly weaker. It seems that the chief occupation there is the writing of fugues. We know of several contrapuntal students who will think that this makes an adequate picture of purgatorial punishment, but for the average auditor it is not very thrilling, especially coming after such a dramatic movement as the Inferno. Yet there is in this section a finely constructed fugue, one of the greatest modern achievements in this strict and difficult form. Matters seemed quite stagnant in Paradise, compared with the scintillations of the lower regions. The bright apothegm:—

> "Hell for society, Heaven for climate,"

might well apply here, for the chromatic storms had all vanished and peace was ushered in with the "Magnificat," which was cleanly and clearly sung by a female chorus from the Musical Art Club, trained by its conductor, Mr. Stephen S. Townsend. The Gregorian progressions made a lofty ending to the long symphony, but the work could not attain the sublimity of the performance of the "Faust" symphony. That composition grows steadily stronger to its end, while in the "Dante" symphony the trump card is played first.

[illegible] music can be adequately measured by this work. When played in these concerts in 1886, or even in 1903, it seemed the quintessence of dissonance (in its first movement), now we accept the progressions as a matter of course, and they are quite intelligible. Then the score was thought something beyond practicability, now its size is exceeded by Lendvai, Reznicek, Mrazek, Von der Stucken and several others of the second rank.

There was much applause for each movement of this symphony; more for the chromatic Hades than for the diatonic Paradise.

One almost wished that the Liszt symphony had come last, since it had a vocal climax which suited better to a finale than the cadences which have been added to Wagner to end the "Parsifal" prelude. Nevertheless, it is always a delight to hear Wagner as read by Dr. Muck, and the fervor of "Tristan and Isolde," the dignity and narrative style of the Death Music, and the religious exaltation of "Parsifal" were all in good contrast with each other. We have seldom heard the Death figure thundered so impressively, and the diatonic character of the Faith theme, in the final prelude, was the antithesis of the chromatic yearnings of the first prelude. In brief, the versatility of Wagner could scarcely have been better presented in such condensed form than by these three works.

Of the reading and the performance we can only speak in superlatives. It was a great end of a great season and we rest secure in the conviction that Boston has now the greatest orchestra and one of the greatest conductors of the world. The audience evidently thought so, too, judging by the many recalls of the conductor at the close of the program.

Herald
May 6 —

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES CONCERT

Performance of Funeral Music from "Dusk of the Gods" Moves Audience—Dr. Muck Received with Enthusiasm—Program Will Be Repeated This Evening.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 24th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Liszt, Symphony after Dante's "Divina Commedia";—Wagner, Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," Funeral Music from "Dusk of the Gods," Prelude to "Parsifal." A female chorus from the Musical Art Club of this city assisted in the performance of the symphony.

Liszt's "Dante," was completed in 1856; his "Faust," with the exception of the final chorus, in 1854. Of these two symphonies the "Faust" is by far the greater in respect to thematic invention, workmanship and orchestral expression.

When the "Faust" symphony was heard here last season, it amazed the audience by its freshness, ingenuity, beauty and grandeur. There was little in it that seemed old fashioned or commonplace. This cannot be said of the symphony performed here yesterday.

The average reader of Dante's "Divine Comedy" is deeply impressed by the "Inferno"; he plods through "Purgatory"; then, if he has the courage to continue the appointed task, he yawns his way through "Paradise." But in Liszt's symphony the "Purgatory" section is the more musical and, in spite of repetition and the fugue, the more engrossing. It might be asked what composer could hope to illustrate Dante's "Inferno" in tones? What musical phrase could emphasize the dread proclamation: "All hope abandon, ye who enter in"? The stern conciseness of the poet, the simplicity of his pathos, the terror of his journey—are these to be expressed in music?

Liszt's "Inferno" is chiefly one of noise and bluster. The blasts of brass do not shake the soul as do the dismal lines of the poet with their "dolente" and "dolore." Nor is there tragic force in Liszt's musical expression of the "sighs, complaints and ululations loud." There is even little theatrical effect to rasp the nerves or chill the blood. The phrases for the brass are not so full of dread as the "Fate" motto in Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. The Russian found more expressive music for

Post —
— Sat. May 6 —

MANIFEST AFFECTION FOR DR. MUCK

Symphony Audience Demonstrative at Last Matinee

BY OLIN DOWNES

The final afternoon concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The occasion had a twofold significance, first on account of the musical interest of the programme; secondly, because of the unmistakable warmth and cordiality of the reception accorded Dr. Muck. Not in the recollection of any recent season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has a conductor been so heartily farewelled at its close. When Dr. Muck entered, after the performance of the Faust symphony, and at the end of the concert, he was called back to the stage times without number. The orchestra also rose to its feet. The audience was loth to let him go.

APPRECIATION OF AN ARTIST

At least the greeting given Dr. Muck spoke equally for the artistic accomplishments of the season, the appreciation of the audience and the spirit of tolerance and good will which has been maintained between an audience of which the majority is unquestionably pro-ally, and a conductor whose opposing attitude regarding the present conflict is known with equal definiteness.

The man and the conductor have come to hold a high place with the Symphony audiences; the man and the audience have maintained toward each other the high esteem and the sense of hearty cooperation made possible by a common object.

Dr. Muck had elected to conclude his season with the "Dante" symphony of Liszt as one of the performances. His performances of Liszt's "Faust" symphony are still green in the memory, performances of this particular work which will probably never be surpassed in this city. The performance of the "Dante" symphony, in which the woman's chorus from the Musical Art Club of Boston, trained for this performance by Stephen Townsend assisted, fully rewarded expectations. But the days when any symphony or symphonic poem by Liszt was certain in advance to be hissed by the opponents of "the master," and applauded with deafening extravagance by his adherents, are passed and gone, and real values commence to emerge from the dust of the conflict. And in the light of these gradually shaping estimates, it is very questionable whether the Dante symphony will stand nearly as high as the Faust symphony for the generations to come. Grant that in this work, as in nearly every big orchestral work of Liszt, there are ideas, any one of which would have made the fortune of a lesser composer, the fact remains that the Dante symphony has far less intrinsic value than the symphony inspired by Goethe's poem.

Effort at Tone Painting

But perhaps the strictest comparisons are out of place, for the two works are widely diverment in technic as well as in purpose. The "Faust" symphony is a wonderful demonstration of Liszt's methods of building a musical structure, wherein are found the most remarkable evolutions of thematic material, shaped in accordance with a definite philosophic and dramatic purpose. The "Dante" symphony, on the other hand, must be taken as a sort of gigantic musical fresco after Dante. It is not characterization at which the composer aims, but rather tone-painting in the broadest sense of the word. Unfortunately at times the tone painting is not less extravagant and already out of date than the awful plates of Dore, in editions of Dante's poem, which oppressed the imagination of childhood.

There is much that is very poor, especially in the Inferno section of this symphony. The abuse of the diminished seventh chord which—one says it with fear and trembling—is little better than amateurish. There are other sequences and progressions which imply that even Franz Liszt, the thunder-maker, was at a loss exactly what to do. He certainly wrote too much and too quickly in his lifetime, and we personally believe that even many pages of the "Dante" symphony bear damning evidence to this fact. No doubt in Liszt's day the trombones thundering out the turgid motive "All ye who enter here leave hope behind" made the audience shiver. Audiences then shivered readily. The professional poet and philanderer cut a mighty strong figure, and passion and bombast were the accepted custom. We are beginning to weary of bugaboo music, and that is what this music is, if you come down to the strict reckoning. The symphony, too, is overlong. The movement, "Purgatorio," is made interesting by its middle section, by progressions far in advance of Liszt's time, and eagerly developed by Cesar Franck. The Magnificat is cunningly and beautifully introduced, with all of that pseudo-mysticism which with Liszt was the baser metal of a spirit, often transfused with real light.

Suggests Church Windows

This, too, is essentially a pictorial effect. Indeed, the whole symphony gives one the impression that some fantastical church windows or mural ornamentation in an edifice of the middle ages might communicate. It is as if the hearer turned from some naive fresco of the sinners blazing in the lower regions to another in which an unknown artist offered his conception of purgatory, and, finally, the eyes fell on a stained window, wherein stiff, medieval saints and virgins were singing from old manuscripts to God. Look at the symphony as you look at the street car, and it is a poor, tawdry affair. Look at it with the religious and philosophic and romantic thought currents of the later 19th century, sousing itself in everything from Chateaubriad to Saint-Simonism in mind, and you find it a work that is fascinating and even sincere!

The performance was in all respects admirable. As much was done for the turgid opening—and how thankful Tschaikowsky must have been for these pages—for the music of the demand, for the episode of Paolo and Francesca, in which Tschaikowsky is incomparably superior to Liszt in the former's poem of that name—as could be done. The music was picturesque, indeed, striking fire from the imagination. And there was the long ascent from the darkness and terror of the lower circles to the gradually increasing light and luminosity of the conclusion.

Playing of Wagner

Still more stirring because of the greater intrinsic value of the music, was the Wagner music.

Other conductors find more that is sensuous in the Tristan music, but the music of Siegfried's death from "Die Gotterdamerung" had a mighty eloquence. It surely ranks among the grandest pages of Wagner. It towers by the side of Beethoven's music for the death of a hero in the 3d symphony. It is runic surcharged with the might of northern myth. Nor was the performance of the mystical prelude of "Parsifal" less worthy of the essential spirit of the music.

BRILLIANT END OF SYMPHONY SEASON

Wagner's Genius Dominates Program — Ovations For Orchestra.

The genius of Wagner dominates these final Symphony concerts and brings the season to a glorious conclusion.

At the matinee concert yesterday the audience paid affecting tribute to Dr. Muck and his matchless orchestra in ovations, first after the performance of Liszt's "Dante" symphony and then at the very end of the concert, following the almost celestial strains of Wagner's "Parsifal" prelude. Many in the audience lingered to recall Dr. Muck again and again.

As for the report that the brilliant conductor might not return, it was officially disposed of by the announcement in the program that the orchestra would open its 36th season Oct. 13; and in the middle of the advertisement is the familiar portrait—taken, apparently, some 10 years ago—captioned, "Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor."

Liszt dedicated his "Dante" symphony to Wagner. "As Virgil led Dante," he said, "so hast thou led me through the mysterious regions of tone-worlds drunk with life." But the "Dante" symphony pales before Liszt's "Faust" symphony; and it seems woefully hollow when heard in the same concert with three such Wagner masterpieces as the preludes to "Tristan and Isolde," and "Parsifal" and the music from the second scene of the third act of "Dusk of the Gods," which is generally known as the funeral music. In the symphony is a chorus for women's voices, and this was beautifully sung by members of the Musical Art Society.

But the truly memorable part of the concert, and the most thrilling event of the closing Symphony season, was the performance of the three Wagner numbers—the unrivaled love music from "Tristan and Isolde," the Olympian themes from "Goetterdaemmerung," and the "Parsifal" music, which Dr. Muck regards as the greatest of Wagner's efforts, and which the world at large has come to regard as something sacred, much as the story of the Grail itself. Prodigious music, beyond question; and on this occasion most worthily performed!

Advertiser
May 6 —

SYMPHONY SEASON BROUGHT TO AN END

LISZT AND WAGNER COMPRISE PROGRAM

Boston Assured of Greatest Orchestra and One of Greatest Conductors in Dr. Muck

BY LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM.

Liszt—"Dante" Symphony.
Wagner—"Tristan and Isolde" Prelude.
Siegfried Funeral Music.
"Parsifal" Prelude.

An entirely orchestral program devoted to Liszt and his son-in-law. Very brief in the statement, but nearly two hours in the performance—two hours of the best and noblest kind of modern music. Dr. Muck has almost discovered Liszt for Boston audiences. No auditor is likely to forget what a revelation his reading of the Liszt "Faust" symphony was in the recent past. The "Dante" symphony (symphony in name only) has not such sublime climaxes as that work, yet it still became more thrilling and exalting than we had ever imagined it to be, because of the magnificent interpretation it received.

In "Faust" the first movement is the least powerful, while in this work the opening picture of the infernal regions is decidedly the greatest part of the work. Time was when the reviewer said of this that it was a picture of hell and it sounded like it; that the "motto" theme of the brasses ought to be "Leave Richter behind all ye who enter here;" but we have become so inured to dissonances that the movement does not seem too intense to the auditor who has experienced and suffered Schoenberg or Stravinsky.

The weather report of Satan's dominions might run "High and variable winds, reaching gale force," and the hurricane lost nothing in its interpretation. But the tender episode of Francesca and Paolo was exquisitely in contrast with this turbulence, and the chromatic touches of the tempest were legitimate and graphic enough. The tubas and trombones were profoundly impressive in the delivery of the baleful inscription upon the gate:—

"Through me pass on to endless misery;
Through me they pass who are forever lost."

Equally effective was the monotonous reiteration of the trumpets and horns of the single note E, in the stern command:—

"Leave Hope behind, all ye who enter here," which appears several times in this exciting movement. The clarinettes played finely in the Francesca episode, the bass clarinette being Dante, the others the two lovers, and here, too, the English horn deserves mention for the expressive touch portraying the lines:—

"There is no greater sorrow,
On vanished happiness."
Than to think back, in days of Misery,

The skill of Liszt in managing the awkward 7-4 rhythm is remarkable, and the "Andante Amoroso" is one of the most beautiful points of this movement, made still stronger by the return of the sweeping hurricane, to contrast with it.

All in all, this first movement is much the strongest part of the work and we cannot hope ever to hear it played better than it was on this occasion.

Purgatory is distinctly weaker. It seems that the chief occupation there is the writing of fugues. We know of several contrapuntal students who will think that this makes an adequate picture of purgatorial punishment, but for the average auditor it is not very thrilling, especially coming after such a dramatic movement as the Inferno. Yet there is in this section a finely constructed fugue, one of the greatest modern achievements in this strict and difficult form. Matters seemed quite stagnant in Paradise, compared with the scintillations of the lower regions. The bright apothegm:—

"Hell for society, Heaven for climate,"

might well apply here, for the chromatic storms had all vanished and peace was ushered in with the "Magnificat," which was cleanly and clearly sung by a female chorus from the Musical Art Club, trained by its conductor, Mr. Stephen S. Townsend. The Gregorian progressions made a lofty ending to the long symphony, but the work could not attain the sublimity of the performance of the "Faust" symphony. That composition grows steadily stronger to its end, while in the "Dante" symphony the trump card is played first.

The change that has taken place in music can be adequately measured by this work. When played in these concerts in 1886, or even in 1903, it seemed the quintessence of dissonance (in its first movement), now we accept the progressions as a matter of course, and they are quite intelligible. Then the score was thought something beyond practicability, now its size is exceeded by Lendvai, Reznicek, Mrazek, Von der Stucken and several others of the second rank.

There was much applause for each movement of this symphony; more for the chromatic Hades than for the diatonic Paradise.

One almost wished that the Liszt symphony had come last, since it had a vocal climax which suited better to a finale than the cadences which have been added to Wagner to end the "Parsifal" prelude. Nevertheless, it is always a delight to hear Wagner as read by Dr. Muck, and the fervor of "Tristan and Isolde," the dignity and narrative style of the Death Music, and the religious exaltation of "Parsifal" were all in good contrast with each other. We have seldom heard the Death figure thundered so impressively, and the diatonic character of the Faith theme, in the final prelude, was the antithesis of the chromatic yearnings of the first prelude. In brief, the versatility of Wagner could scarcely have been better presented in such condensed form than by these three works.

Of the reading and the performance we can only speak in superlatives. It was a great end of a great season and we rest secure in the conviction that Boston has now the greatest orchestra and one of the greatest conductors of the world. The audience evidently thought so, too, judging by the many recalls of the conductor at the close of the program.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES CONCERT

Performance of Funeral Music from "Dusk of the Gods" Moves Audience—Dr. Muck Received with Enthusiasm—Program Will Be Repeated This Evening.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 24th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Liszt, Symphony after Dante's "Divina Commedia"; Wagner, Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," Funeral Music from "Dusk of the Gods," Prelude to "Parsifal." A female chorus from the Musical Art Club of this city assisted in the performance of the symphony.

Liszt's "Dante," was completed in 1856; his "Faust," with the exception of the final chorus, in 1854. Of these two symphonies the "Faust" is by far the greater in respect to thematic invention, workmanship and orchestral expression.

When the "Faust" symphony was heard here last season, it amazed the audience by its freshness, ingenuity, beauty and grandeur. There was little in it that seemed old fashioned or commonplace. This cannot be said of the symphony performed here yesterday.

The average reader of Dante's "Divine Comedy" is deeply impressed by the "Inferno"; he plods through "Purgatory"; then, if he has the courage to continue the appointed task, he yawns his way through "Paradise." But in Liszt's symphony the "Purgatory" section is the more musical and, in spite of repetition and the fugue, the more engrossing. It might be asked what composer could hope to illustrate Dante's "Inferno" in tones? What musical phrase could emphasize the dread proclamation: "All hope abandon, ye who enter in"? The stern conciseness of the poet, the simplicity of his pathos, the terror of his journey—are these to be expressed in music?

Liszt's "Inferno" is chiefly one of noise and bluster. The blasts of brass do not shake the soul as do the dismal lines of the poet with their "dolente" and "dolore." Nor is there tragic force in Liszt's musical expression of the "sighs, complaints and ululations loud." There is even little theatrical effect to rasp the nerves or chill the blood. The phrases for the brass are not so full of dread as the "Fate" motto in Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. The Russian found more expressive music for Francesca after the wind storm than the labored section in which Liszt treats the famous episode. In his "Inferno" the composer fails in awakening horror and pity. His fretting and fuming are of one struggling for dramatic expression, but impotent; perhaps conscious of his vain endeavor; hence he is the more boisterous. There is a remark on one page of the score: "This whole passage should be understood as sardonic, blasphemous laughter." One does not hear this laughter, nor is the fault in ears or understanding. More than once is there a passage hopelessly commonplace, ordinary, as the thunderous descending figure, a pompous platitude. There is an old saying for a young composer: "When in doubt as to what should be done next, put in a unison passage."

But there are some beautiful pages in the "Purgatory" section. The opening is especially fortunate in the establishment of a peaceful, contemplative mood, in the creation of "atmosphere," to quote from the jargon of the studio. The simple melody for this and that instrument, as the oboe—played exquisitely by Mr. Longy—over the rocking figuration—the general expression of tranquility, the sense of something mystic, wonderful—all this is finely conceived. There is diabolical ingenuity in the fugue; but who, hearing this fugue, can say with Richard Pohl that it expresses the remorseful and penitent looking back of sinners and their hope in the future? Nor is this "Purgatory" wholly free from an assumed naivete hardly to be distinguished from childishness—a straining after mysticism, as is found in many works of Liszt's later period; for instance, in his "Silent" Mass for the organ. This, however, is quickly forgotten by reason of the "Magnificat" for female voices, with the gorgeous orchestral responses. The peaceful close leaves an enduring impression.

The interpretation of this symphony for its splendor is comparable to that of the "Faust" last season. That the effect was not so overwhelming was due to the inherent inferiority of the music. The chorus, although Liszt preferred a boy choir, sang admirably.

We have heard more passionate readings of the prelude to "Tristan"; seldom, if ever, a more moving performance of the Funeral Music. The Prelude to "Parsifal" loses greatly in effect when it is played in a lighted concert hall and without intimate association with the drama.

Dr. Muck was warmly greeted and enthusiastically applauded after the symphony, after the Funeral Music and at the end. The concert will be repeated tonight.

Remarks on the season of 1915-16 will be found in the Herald of tomorrow.

Amer
— Th

Chorus of Fifty Aids Symphony in Divine Comedy

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

The thirty-fifth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was brought triumphantly to a close yesterday, so far as the Friday audiences are concerned, by a superb performance of Liszt's huge "Divine Comedy" Symphony, and three Wagnerian fragments, Prelude to "Tristan," Funeral Music from "Dusk of the Gods" and Prelude to "Parsifal."

A chorus of fifty female voices from the Musical Art Club of Boston, chanted the Magnificat of the Liszt Symphony.

The Divine Comedy attempts to follow that of Dante, and is in three divisions, Hell, Purgatory and Paradise. The marvelous dexterity of Liszt, his ability to get terrific effects with a full orchestra, and the grandeur of the theme of the Inferno combine to make this the best part of the Symphony.

The love music of Francesca, the suffering and penitence of Purgatory, are painted with a sure hand, but the Paradise is nothing but a lot of female angels singing a conventional chorale with sonorous accompaniment. It is the weakest part of the work.

The choir sang with admirable tone and displayed the excellent training received from Stephen Townsend, who prepared it for this task. The orchestra never got finer tone and expression than in this symphony so enthusiastically conducted by Doctor Muck.

The three operatic pieces which brought the season to an end were no less admirably performed.

BLANK PAGE

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE

REWIND